Lieut.-Colonel Sir H. Gidney.] That is exactly what I expected you to answer, because I had intended asking you what exactly is the definition of a "diehard," because, judging from the evidence you have given—

Earl of Derby.] Are questions of this sort of any use to us?

Marquess of Reading.

14,709. They cannot be of any use?—It is hard to see what use they can be.

Lieut.-Colonel Sir H. Gidney.

14,710. Mr. Churchill, you have stressed very much the difficulties and dangers of giving over government and what should be done during the transitional period. What, in your mind, would you fix as the transitional period?—You mean how long?

14,711. Yes?—You would have to say, Transitional to what? In my opinion, if we made the advance to which I have committed myself here at the present time, there ought to be an interval of certainly more than 10 years—I use the expression "certainly more than 10 years" as the most definite statement I propose to make here—before the question of Constitutional change in India is again reopened by the Imperial Government.

14,712. You mean is further advanced?—Certainly. Even reopened, I said, by the Imperial Government.

14,713. Another point you have stressed largely has been the employment of Inspectorates. Have you any idea what would be the total army of this Inspectorate or the total number?—I had in mind, perhaps, there would be 20 or 30 high officials, experienced men. Perhaps a few more would be required but they would be additional to the existing staff in India and give opportunities for a strengthening, as it were, of the administrative cadres, and they would tour around the Provinces and keep the administration of one Province in touch with another and keep the administration of all the Provinces in touch with the Centre and that in the main—although I do not admit it is the only ground on which they could base themselves—their influence would arise from recommendations they might make as to grants from the Centre. But I did that only with a view to helping the Committee to meet the accusation which otherwise can be made against the White Paper scheme that we are disinteresting ourselves in the fortunes of the Indian masses.

CHURCHILL, C.H., M.P.

14,714. Have you any idea what exactly would be the cost of this Inspectorate?—Certainly it would not be anything like the cost of a great many other of the political proposals which are embodied in the White Paper scheme.

14,715. Who would pay for this Inspectorate—the Central or the Provincial Government?—As I should see it, it would be the Imperial Government—the Central Government.

14,716. For doing Provincial work?—But the Centre has an interest in the Provinces—a great interest.

14,717. Do not you not think that this would lead to a lot of friction between the Central and the Provincial Governments?—I do not think so, but a certain amount of friction would be better than having any very widespread breakdown.

14,718. Am I right in thinking that this suggestion of an Inspectorate is an alternative to a complete reservation of law and order, and that law and order and defence are your two main objections to the White Paper?—I am only speaking of the Provincial sphere. I am opposed to any important change in the Central sphere, but in the Provincial sphere the question of defence does not arise and I have given my statement in regard to the Police which is separate from that altogether.

14,719. Is it your desire that law and order should not be transferred at all in the Provinces?—I do not think that there are many places where it could be transferred at the present time. I will not say that there are none, because I cannot claim to have made such an exhaustive examination, but as an alternative to withholding it entirely I would advise a Deputy-Governor associated with the Governor to whom, as and when required, this branch of the administration could be entrusted; or, better still, if it were possible, to have an Imperial Police Force—an All-India Police Service.

14,720. Do you think that if law and order was a Reserved Subject under the Governor, it would interfere with Provincial autonomy and introduce dyarchy?—Pro tanto, of course.

14,721. Then there would not be Provincial autonomy in the Provinces?—That is not so. There are many cases where a very great and effective measure of autonomy is enjoyed by communities which, nevertheless, are subject to certain restrictions. The fact of there being a restriction or a reservation in one or two particulars does not destroy, although it proportionately diminishes, the quality of autonomy.

14,722. Then you would really have as your first choice an Imperial Police?—I should be glad to know that that were possible.

14,723. Do you think that that is possible?—I say I should be glad to know that it was possible.

14,724. Have you considered the point as to whether it is possible?—It is one of the many points on which I am hoping to receive enlightenment from the labours of the Joint Committee.

14,725. There is one other question. You do not recommend any alteration in the Central Government?—No important alteration at the present time, or until the Provincial experiment has been proved to be a success.

14,726. Then with an irremovable Central Government and Provincial autonomy as adumbrated in the White Paper, how do you think they would act? With an irremovable Central Government always able to override the Provinces how would Provincial autonomy operate or how could it operate effectively?—It cannot be such an absurd proposition because it was in essence the proposition of the Statutory Commission

Mr. M. R. Jayaker.

14,727. Mr. Churchill, before I begin, will you permit me to congratulate you on the very frank way in which you have put paragraph 1 of your statement. May I know in what year your visit to India was paid?—I was a subaltern officer in India from 1895 to 1898, or the spring of 1899.

14,728. You have not since visited India, after the Reformed Constitution?—Unhappily not.

24th October, 1933.] The Right Honourable WINSTON SPENCER
CHURCHILL, C.H., M.P.

14,729. Not even as a cold weather visitor?—Unhappily, I have not been able to.

14,730. Therefore, you have not had opportunities of personal observation on the spot as to how the Reformed Constitution has worked?—None.

14,731. As you have very frankly stated, most of your opinions are based upon your discussions with those who have had official experience or non-official experience in India. Is not that so?—From the discussions I have heard in the Cabinet over a very long period of time.

14,732. That is part of the source of your information?—That is the main part.

14,734. You know there are two schools of thought among officials—those who believe that the better policy is to go ahead with a large measure of advance and those who believe that it would be a disaster to do that?—I am very glad that you tell me that there are two schools of thought, because I understand Mr. Baldwin has claimed that nearly 90 per cent. of the serving officers are of one opinion.

14,735. I am not concerned with percentages; I am concerned with the fact that there are two opposite schools among officials, and I want to ask you whether those with whom you have had discussions belong to the school which think that it would be a disaster to extend self-government within the region of the Centre?—No; I gladly discussed it with those who held the opposite view.

14,736. You do not share that view?—I do not share that view, no.

14,737. Are you aware of, or have you had opportunities of considering for yourself, the great advance which has been made in public sentiment in India?—Certainly, I am aware of it.

14,738. And the changes in political opinion amongst the people?—Yes.

14,739. Have you had opportunities of studying that, if I may ask you?—I have had the opportunities which are open to any Member of Parliament who reads everything which is provided.

14,740. That is to say, by your studies in this country seven thousand miles away?—Yes, certainly. I have made it clear that I have not been back to India since 1899. Some of the greatest authorities, some of those who are playing the greatest part, the most responsible part, in this matter in the Government, have never been to India at all.

14,741. I am only speaking as an Indian. My remarks would apply to both. My point of view is that of an Indian, Mr. Churchill, and I would ask you not to forget it?—I know; I respect it.

14,742. May I ask you whether you share this view held by a very important administrator who has just retired from India after thirty-five years: Sir Charles Innes, an Indian Civil Servant who rose to be a Member of the Viceroy's Cabinet, and then, later on, became the Governor of Burma—a very important official. May I read to you a brief summary in his words of the changes which have happened in India since the Reforms? I will just read a short paragraph from page 549 of his evidence. He gave evidence before this Committee a short time ago, and this is what he stated: "I do not think it easy for those who knew India only in pre-war days to realise the changes which have come over India in recent years. Some of these changes astonish even men of my standing—Indian women coming out of purdah, and dining and playing tennis in public, and, most amazing sight of all, Indian peasants waiting on the roadside for the motor omnibus to take them to their market town. Such changes are bound to have far-reaching effects, but the change I have most in mind is the change in the mental outlook of the educated classes and the growth of political consciousness." Do you regard that as a fair estimate of the changes which have taken place in India?—Sir Charles Innes is a high expert and he has given his view. There are many other high experts (and this is one of the difficulties with which we are faced) who have given directly opposite views.

14,743. Is there anything in your own experience which would entitle you to say—I am not speaking of officials; I am leaving them out for the moment—that this view is wrong?—It obviously would be absurd for anyone to say that no changes have taken place in a world which is changing with the greatest rapidity. Obviously, when motor omnibuses and motor-cars were invented and come upon the scene they begin to be used, and so on; and certainly one has to admit that there have been great changes, considerable changes, in the appearance of life in India. I doubt very much whether any really deep changes have taken place, whether any profound, fundamental changes have taken place, in the life of the Indian masses.

14,744. Your answer, if I may say so, with great respect, is outside my question. I am putting to you whether you think that the change is most "in the mental outlook of the educated classes and the growth of political consciousness." Are you in a position to say that this is an exaggerated statement? I am aware of the other things that you have mentioned. That does not answer my question—All would depend upon the context in which it was viewed, but I do not generally find myself in agreement with the views of Sir Charles Innes.

14,745. Would you share the view of many officials, that the success which has been achieved by the Reform Constitution has been so conspicuous that there is no danger in enlarging the responsibility of the Indian people in the Provinces and in the Centre?—Certainly not.

14,746. You do not agree. May I know your reasons why you do not agree; is there any particular reason you could mention or is there any indication that you could give us as to why you do not agree? It is only your vague opinion created by your studies in this country and your conversations with retired officials, can you tell us any particular facts; for instance, can you say that there has been deterioration in direction A or that there has been deterioration in direction B that would make it hazardous to embark upon this large experiment?—What you are inviting me to do is to give an argument—my reasons—against the proposed departure. I could undoubtedly express my views but not in answer to a question. It would take me a very long time to do justice to a question so very wide and general, but I have had a good many opportunities of expressing my views and I hope I shall have a good many more.

14,747. I know. I have been following your utterances for the last three years, but my question is this: Beyond the vague opinion which you have in this matter, are you in a position to enlighten the Committee by definite facts, stating where the deterioration has taken place?—My opinion is not at all a vague one upon the matter, but if I were to be invited to formulate a particular indictment of any particular Service or any particular Province under the Montagu-Chelmsford Reforms I should require ample notice in order to marshal my facts in a manner worthy of Mr. Jayaker's attention.

14,748. I will not pursue that matter further, Mr Churchill. May I now ask your attention to paragraph 3; I am afraid I must take you into the metaphysical distinction between "Dominion Status" and "Dominion Constitution," just for a short time?—I do not mind at all.

14,749. I gather your position is this (correct me if I am wrong) that "During the Great War in which the martial races of India played so gallant a part, and in which we were sustained by the general goodwill of the many peoples of India, representation similar in form to that of the Dominions was accorded to India in the main Imperial and Inter-Allied Councils. Similar in form, but not in fact; for the Prime Ministers who represented the self-governing Dominions were responsible Ministers at the head of Governments elected on democratic franchises, whereas the distinguished Indian representatives were nominated upon the authority of the Secretary of State. In this sense, therefore, but only in this sense, did India enjoy 'Dominion Status' " and so on. I am reading from your paragraph 3. Now may I know whether, about the time of the war, and for a great many years afterwards, right up to about two or three years ago, this distinction was made that you are making now between Dominion Status and Dominion Constitution, by any responsible statesman in England?—I think the distinction existed, but the necessity of defining it arose from the evident misunderstandings which were being created by that loose use of the term "Dominion Status," as if it were interchangeable with an Australian or a Canadian Constitution.

14,750. I am not disputing for a moment that the distinction existed in your mind; I will take it from you?—I frankly admit that when one sees what are the misunderstandings which have arisen, the need for a much more precise definition has come upon me.

24th October, 1933.] The Right Honourable WINSTON SPENCER
CHURCHILL, C.H., M.P.

Mr. M. R. Jayaker.] That is exactly the answer I wanted. Therefore the precise distinction was openly made somewhere about two or three years ago. That is a fact, is it not? I am not disputing that it existed in your mind. A cautious statesman like you was not going to commit himself, but I am asking you when was it openly and precisely made?

Marquess of Reading.] I thought you said it was precisely defined two or three years ago?

Mr. M. R. Jayaker.] Yes.

Marquess of Reading.] I only wanted to know what that meant, but we will wait.

Mr. M. R. Jayaker.

14,751. When was this distinction openly stated by any person in authority from a place of authority, that Dominion Status does not involve Dominion Constitution?—I do not recognise that as a phrase which has been used by any ministerial or official person.

14,752. I am asking you when this precise distinction was made for the first time?—By whom?

14,753. By any person in authority in Parliament?—I think when I spoke in that December Debate, in my speech there, seeing all the misunderstandings that had arisen around this expression "Dominion Status", I opened up very much this argument which I have put in my paper.

14,754. Quite true; that is only three years ago?—Quite true.

14,755. I am asking you whether previously to that any such distinction was made openly by a person of authority in a place of authority?—I think it was perfectly well known and well understood by all the persons in authority responsible for the legislation of 1919 that the expression "Dominion Status" did not mean the grant of an Australian or a Canadian Constitution in any time which men could reasonably foresee.

14,756. I quite see that, but do you think that when His Majesty the King speaking through the Duke of Connaught, gave a message to the Indian Legislature "For years, it may be for generations, patriotic and loyal Indians have dreamed of Swaraj, for their Motherland. To-day you have beginnings of Swaraj within my Empire, and widest scope and ample opportunity for progress to the liberty which my other Dominions enjoy"—would you say that any such reservation was intended by His Majesty?—That speech referred to the Montagu-Chelmsford Reforms embodied in the Act of 1919 which were actually being inaugurated.

14,757. Perfectly true, but what I am suggesting is that it holds out a promise. "To-day you have beginnings of Swaraj within my Empire, and widest scope and ample opportunity for progress to the liberty which my other Dominions enjoy". Do you suggest that the words do not bear the interpretation that India is promised "the widest scope and ample opportunity for progress to the liberty which my other Dominions enjoy"? What interpretation do you put upon those words, Mr. Churchill?—I say that they referred to the definite proposals under the Act of 1919 and are governed by the Section I have mentioned—Section 84 (a).

14,758. That is not the question I am asking. Do not they hold out the hope to the Indian people "of the widest scope and ample opportunity for progress to the liberty which my other Dominions enjoy"? That is my question—That is quite true, but it is all limited by the conditions of this Section of the Act of 1919.

14,759. I am not speaking of that, Mr. Churchill. The hope cannot be limited. That section only speaks of the method in which further advance is to be made?—No; the achievement of the hope is regulated by the Section in the Act.

14,760. Then am I to understand that when that statement was made by the King—I am quoting the words in your paragraph, Mr. Churchill, "no member of that Cabinet, certainly not the Prime Minister, meant, contemplated or wished to suggest the establishment of a Dominion Constitution for India in any period which human beings ought to take into practical account"—that was the reservation made?—That is in my opinion a fact; that is my belief.

14,761. I suppose these utterances by His Majesty the King are drafted with very great care. I am asking you that question because you have the experience of a Cabinet Minister?—Necessarily.

14,762. Do you think that was a reservation? Then I am asking you, would you blame the Indian people if they took these words in their most natural meaning?—As I say, I consider that we were then in the presence of the definite legislation which was being translated into action, and that the statements referring to that legislation were limited by it. It is quite true that in the legislation, in the preamble, I think, the same hope is expressed in the words of a Statute and I consider myself bound as much by the one as by the other.

Mr. M. R. Jayaker.] I will not pursue it. Now your suggestion comes to this, Mr. Churchill, and I want you to meet my difficulty: If your proposal is accepted England will have to say to India: "Yes, no doubt we used an expression which is capable of that interpretation, and on the basis of that we had immense help from India in the War—men, munitions and materials. Men fought, men died. But all the while we never intended to give the particular meaning to that expression. We had at the back of our minds something different, and you gentlemen have made a mistake."

Sir Austen Chamberlain.] May I ask Mr. Jayaker, before Mr. Churchill answers, to what statement made during the War he is at this moment referring?

Mr. M. R. Jayaker.] I am referring to the statements made at the Imperial War Conferences; I am speaking of the statements made on the authority of His Majesty the King when the Legislature was opened.

Earl of Derby.] When was that?

Mr. M. R. Jayaker.] 1921.

Sir Austen Chamberlain.] That was not during the War; that is my point.

Mr. M. R. Jayaker.

14,763. My question is this: You will now have to say to India: "You took part in the War. Your men died; your money was spent. After the War, in conferences, we used the expression 'Dominion Status,' and in the King's Message in 1921 we promised you a hope of liberty on the same lines as other parts of the Empire, but, remember, gentlemen, you have made a mistake all these years. We never intended the expression in that way. All we meant was"—to use your amended expression—"honourific" (yesterday the expression was "ceremonial")—"all we meant was Dominion Status in the ceremonial and honourific way and we never meant to hold out the faintest hope to you"—to use your own expression again—"to suggest the establishment of a Dominion Constitution for India in any period which human beings ought to take into practical account." That will be your message to India?—No; my answer would be to read the first paragraph of the preamble of the Act of 1919: "Whereas it is the declared policy of Parliament to provide for the increasing association of Indians in every branch of Indian Administration, and for the gradual development of Self-Governing institutions, with a view to the progressive realisation of responsible government in British India as an integral part of the Empire: And whereas progress in giving effect to this policy can only be achieved by successive stages, and it is expedient that substantial steps in this direction should now be taken: And whereas the time and manner of each advance can be determined only by Parliament, upon whom responsibility lies for the welfare and advancement of the Indian peoples," and so forth.

14,764. Perfectly true, but where the expression "Dominion Status" is used what would be your answer?—I have given a very great number of answers upon it.

14,765. Your answer would be, in brief: "I never intended to use the expression for giving Dominion Status for India in the future"?—I did not say that. I said any period that it was useful or practicable for us to foresee. The life of man is short and the power of politicians to look ahead must necessarily be limited. What I complain of and where I think perhaps you would agree with me is that by the repeated use of this expression, especially now that there is so much importance attached to it, hopes are raised which ought not to be raised. It is also pointed out that any period in which this hope can be achieved is one which living men will not see.

14,766. I quite follow that. There is a lot in your memorandum with which I agree, especially where you speak of the reservation of the Army and what remains of the transfer of responsibility. I agree with that, but that is outside the question at the moment. not get the same Status as Australia has?—In my opinion, that statement ought to be made.

14,767. Do you know what the results of such a statement will be upon public opinion in India? Have you ever asked yourself the question what the result of such a statement will be in India, that even in the dim future there is no scope for India getting Dominion Constitution?—I did not say in the dim future. If you wish to quote my words or examine me on verbal implications you must not slip in a number of words of your own. I will defend my own words.

14,768. It was my fault; it was my paraphrase. I will take your words: "in any period which human beings ought to take into practical account"?—No; of having the Constitution which Australia and Canada enjoy under the Statute of Westminster.

14,769. Then would you say there is hope for her obtaining responsible government in British India as an integral part of the Empire?—We are taking a very great step forward in establishing Provincial Home Rule.

14,770. That is not my question, if you will allow me to say so?—Now that we know so much about all this, and we see what a controversy it is, I should strongly deprecate any expectation being held out of going beyond that until a long period has occurred in which the Provincial Home Rule administrators have proved that they have succeeded.

14,771. I am aware of that. My question was quite simple. I am asking you, if you were asked the question: "Is there a hope for India in any period which human beings ought to take into practical account of obtaining responsible government in British India as an integral part of the Empire", what would be your answer?—That raises a number of difficult questions, as, for instance, advance of responsible government in British India apart from the States and so forth, which I do not think it would be useful for me to go into now, but I really content myself with the Preamble of the Act.

14,772. I am quoting from the Preamble of the Act?—I content myself with the words of that Act. I am bound to accept it. The Acts of Parliament are the important things, and coupling that with this Section 84A I consider that that defines the position which I take as an individual member of the House of Commons forced to take a decision upon these matters.

14,773. Then may I say that there is hope for India according to the particular methods mentioned in section 84A?—I say we ought never to assign any limits to the progress of any part of His Majesty's Dominions or put any bar against the position which in the future may be achieved, of race, colour or creed.

14,774. Then I just want to ask a few questions on paragraph 6. You seem to be very much troubled about the Statute of Westminster, Mr Churchill, about the right of secession. Supposing India did not want that right, which is the most important feature, as you say, of the Statute of Westminster, what would be your objection to giving her Dominion status in the future?—The Secretary of State no doubt could show all the arguments which lie behind his numerous safeguards; the protection of minorities which, in the aggregate, I believe, are a majority; defence, foreign affairs, finance and so forth.

14,775. I am not speaking of the immediate transfer of Dominion status, I am speaking of the eventual growth of Dominion status. What would be your objection to that?—We do not need to close doors upon hope, but neither must we, now we see where we are, raise false hopes, because misunderstandings arise when words are used which are interpreted by the people who use them as a far distant goal and when they are interpreted by Indian people as something which is going to happen quite soon, and it is that evil which I am most anxious to avoid. If I have been at fault in the matter I have frankly admitted it.

14,776. Then what you object to is that Dominion status is going to be conferred upon India very soon; your objection is to the "very soon," is it?—My objection is that any idea should be given that it is possible in any period which it is reasonable for human beings to foresee.

14,777. In paragraph 7 you say: "The expression 'India' has been even more loosely used. India is not a country or a nation," and so on?—Yes.

14,778. You do not mean to discount those changes which have taken place in India in political consciousness of unity? Are you aware of that?—I am well aware of it.

24^o Octobris, 1933.] The Right Honourable WINSTON SPENCER
CHURCHILL, C.H., M.P.

14,779. And still you compare it with Europe?—The only differentiation is the strong structure of the Imperial Government which has given a superficial unity to India which Europe has not got, and it is thanks to that strong British structure that the whole century of peace or so many years of peace and of racial and religious peace have been enjoyed by India.

14,780. I am not disputing that the British Government and Pax Britannica have done it. I am asking you whether you agree that this political unity has come?—No, I do not think it has come. I think that a superstructure has been created around which many aspirations gather and upon which a certain unity exists, but I am quite sure if the British structure were removed the divisions which would break out in India would be just as fierce—far fiercer indeed—than those which exist in Europe to-day, and they are bad enough.

14,781. You do not mean to suggest that the White Paper removes that superstructure?—No; I should agree very much with you on that line.

14,782. That is what I say. Therefore there is no question of removing the British superstructure at all. May I point out to you an important statement in the Simon Commission Report, paragraph 459, Volume I?—I am afraid I have not got a copy of the Report with me.

14,783. May I read to you just a short sentence: "It would be altogether surprising" (they are speaking there of the political consciousness and its growth) "if 10 years of the Reforms had effected in India what many decades of representative institutions have failed to accomplish, under more favourable conditions, elsewhere." Do you agree with this statement or do you think it is exaggerated?—I read with very great interest and a considerable measure of agreement the Statutory Commission Report, and I am not quarrelling with this particular statement. I should like to know how you intend to use it.

14,784. If that is a true state of things in India, would you say still that the expression "India" is something like the expression "Europe," without any nexus, without any national feeling, without any communal affinities, without any common civilisation and culture? Would you say that of India in the light of this statement by the Simon Commission?—I think so. I think that the progress that has been made towards unity is the result of an artificial element in the life of India arising from the British Raj, and that if that were withdrawn the units which have grown up around the Central Government and express themselves through the English language would probably disappear within a very short time.

14,785. I just want to ask you one question about the point which Dr. Ambedkar took. I am calling your attention to what happened in the debate on the 3rd December, 1931. You took a very prominent part in opposing the policy of the Prime Minister, but do you remember that the Secretary of State made a speech as was a supplement to the Prime Minister's speech?—Yes.

14,786. And then you said that you completely agreed with the Secretary of State's speech, and you went the length of saying that if the Prime Minister would accept the Secretary of State's speech as a supplement to his own speech you would withdraw your amendment?—I would withdraw the amendment, but I should have considered myself perfectly free to examine the proposals of a subsequent White Paper or Act of Parliament when presented; but, of course, there was never any question of the Government accepting such a proposal.

14,787. You are very quick in anticipating my question, if I may say so. I was going to ask you a far simpler question. You agreed with the principles accepted in the Secretary of State's speech?—No; I did not say that. The fact that you do not persist in an amendment to a proposal when you have only small support behind you by no means commits you to agreeing.

14,788. Then you did not agree, may I take it, with the principles stated in the Secretary of State's speech?—I did not agree with the Prime Minister's speech because I am opposed to setting up a federal system at the present time, and I did not agree with his speech and I deplored the fact that the Parliament which had newly assembled without having had an opportunity of really being educated into these matters or having given any real consideration to them, was so early asked to take a decision, but I was very much relieved when I read Lord Hailsham's statement in the

CHURCHILL, C.H., M.P.

House of Lords, to which I attach great importance.

14,789. May I ask attention to a part of your speech on that occasion in the House of Commons? This is what you said: "I told my right honourable friend this morning that I should be quite willing to withdraw the amendment. I have been in consultation with honourable friends associated with me, and we should be quite willing to withdraw our amendment if the Government would agree to substitute for certain words at the end of the motion. 'That this House approves the India policy of His Majesty's Government as set out in Command Paper No. 3972 presented to Parliament on the 1st December, 1931, and also in the speech of the Secretary of State for India of the 2nd December.' Now I address myself to the Prime Minister, and I ask him publicly a question. I am authorised by those who are associated with me, no doubt, a forlorn and scanty band, to withdraw the amendment if the Government will merely add to their motion the speech of their own Secretary of State"—Will you read a little further?

14,790. "The statement of policy made by him, not merely an enumeration of the safeguards but the whole of the statement he made including his resolve to persevere with the policy of self-government and with the erection of a federal system. If he will include that speech in the motion which he is asking us to pass this evening he will have a unanimous vote so far as his supporters are concerned. I pause for a reply"—What happened?

14,791. The Prime Minister said: "It is perfectly plain that everything that was in the Secretary of State's speech is in the White Paper"—Go on, please.

14,792. I am asking you a question. You were willing on that occasion to withdraw your amendment and to drop your opposition and to give a unanimous vote if the Secretary of State's speech was taken as a supplement to the Prime Minister's speech. Is it or is not a fact?—You have read it out. We should have withdrawn our amendment.

14,793. Further than that?—We should have withdrawn our amendment if our terms had been granted then, and the effect of that undoubtedly would have been to give a different impression to India than was given by the carrying of the resolution in the form in which it was carried.

14,794. I am not speaking of that. You would have withdrawn your amendment, and there would have been a unanimous vote?—The withdrawing an amendment and not dividing the House against a Government policy does not in the slightest degree imply agreement to that policy.

14,795. What is meant by a unanimous vote?—A vote on which no division is taken. A unanimous vote in a Parliamentary sense is a vote upon which no division is taken. It does not mean that every single member votes for it.

14,796. It is the same as nem con.?—If nobody challenges it.

14,797. Nem con., you say, is the same as a unanimous vote. Do you see any departure between the principles stated in the Secretary of State's speech of which you felt so much enamoured on that occasion, if I may say so without offence, and the principles embodied in the White Paper?—I have always been opposed to the federal system at this juncture at the Centre, and the transfer of law and order to the Provinces except as I have indicated, and I had no different opinion then from what I have now at all, but, with the best will in the world, Mr. Jayaker is, I think, not fully appreciating the methods of the House of Commons and the way in which a discussion would go. A Government which has a great majority is carrying forward a policy. Those who do not like the policy take what foothold they can to secure an arrest or a delay, or to modify it as much as they can in the direction of their views, and naturally, if they are met by the Government, their amendment is withdrawn, but it does not follow at all that they have altered their views in consequence of that and that there is unanimity on the policy, because at one particular moment it is not thought desirable to push an amendment to a division. That has nothing to do with it.

14,798. May I ask, in great humility, your attention to the words you used? You may tell me that you do not attach to them the meaning or the importance that I do. I am asking you kindly to fix your attention on the words of your speech: "The statement of policy made by him" (the Prime Minister), "not merely an enumeration of the safeguards, but the whole of the statement he made, including his resolve to persevere with the policy of self-government and with the erection of a federal system." This you promised to support with a unanimous vote?—No, I said there would be a unanimous vote, but I should never have voted for that. I should have remained silent; I should not have divided the House.

CHURCHILL, C.H., M.P.

14,799 I am quoting from your own words?—Yes, and it does show me very much how difficult it is to avoid misunderstandings.

14,800. In your Memorandum, paragraph 8, you seem to suggest that Parliament "should never endanger any of them seriously for the sake of gratifying the Indian intelligentsia by making political changes." Throughout your memorandum (correct me if I am wrong), you seem to draw a distinction between the intelligentsia and their claims and the good of the masses of India. Is that not a fact?—I do.

14,801. Why do you do that?—Because I think that the demands which are put forward (I use it as no term of disrespect) by the Indian intelligentsia or political classes if they were carried into action would produce widespread devastation and misery and commotion throughout India.

14,802. Amongst the masses?—Amongst the masses, because it is the masses who suffer.

14,803. Why do you say that?—I say that because the racial and religious differences now held in suspense by the Imperial Government would eventuate in a series of terrible episodes similar to those we witnessed at Cawnpore only a few years ago.

14,804. I am not speaking of the removal of British control. I am speaking of the scheme of the White Paper?—But the scheme of the White Paper is not the demand of the Indian intelligentsia. It is not your demand, Mr. Jayaker.

14,805. Leave that alone?—You have said it is only a stepping stone, and only a means, or words to that effect.

14,806. In politics everything is only a stepping stone. There is no finality in politics. You said yesterday you cannot put a limit on the hopes and ambitions of a people. You imagine a conflict between the intelligentsia and the interests of the masses?—I imagine undoubtedly that if the complete Dominion constitution were given at this time, or in any period I can reasonably foresee, very great misery and desolation would be spread far and wide among the 300,000,000 of India.

14,807. That is not my question?—It is my answer.

14,808. Do you mean to suggest that what the intelligentsia demand the masses do not share?—I doubt very much whether there is any demand on the part of the broad masses of India for these political changes.

14,809. Will you take a sporting offer from me: You are a person of great authority with this Government. Will you see that this Government takes a plebiscite from the masses on a plain and simple question; everybody having liberty to advocate with the masses, your school, my school, the Government, and everybody a plebiscite on the simple question: Do the masses desire a Government of their own people or Government by the British? Will you take a plebiscite and be bound by that plebiscite?—No, I do not think that would be at all a fair or reasonable question to put to the masses of India. I am not aware of any machinery which exists by which an effective answer could be given to that at all.

14,810. On a simple question whether they desire the Government of the people or no. A very simple question which every villager understands?—Of course a statement like that, whether they desire a Government of the people or no, whether answered in the negative or in the affirmative, would not carry matters any further.

14,811. Will you take a plebiscite whether they desire the principles of the White Paper to be established or no as against the proposal which you are making?—Through India?

14,812. Yes?—No. I do not admit that it rests upon a plebiscite at all. The question is of the responsibilities of the Imperial Parliament and how far they can safely delegate them.

14,813. That is the constitutional position which I am not disputing?—No.

14,814. I am only asking you this. When you suggest that the masses are not with the intelligentsia in their political demands, I am asking you on that question: What is your proof?—I give my belief, that is all—my opinion.

14,815. May I quote the contrary opinion to you of Sir Charles Innes at page 552. I will quote a short statement from his evidence: "It is idle, in my view, to suggest that it is what the mass of the people as opposed to the educated classes want. That always seems to me to be a futile argument. In political movements, it is the educated people that count. Moreover, as we have had reason to know in recent years the masses are easily influenced against us and easily inflamed." Do you share this view that what the politicians think, a little in advance of the masses, the masses will accept. Do you share Sir Charles Innes' view?—No, I do not agree with Sir Charles Innes.

CHURCHILL, C.H., M.P.

14,816. Then I go on to paragraph 11. With regard to your scheme, Mr. Churchill, have you any reason to believe that your scheme will be accepted by the bulk of politically minded Indians?—I cannot forecast what the reception of any particular proposal will be by the masses of India.

14,817. Do you think it will be touched by those on whose co-operation and good will you will rely for its working?—I think they would be unreasonable to reject it.

14,818. They may be, but do you think they will accept it? In politics we are very often unreasonable?—Quite true.

14,819. That is the basis of advance in many countries. Have you made inquiries from those from whom you have drawn your information by discussion and in other ways that this scheme has a chance of being accepted as a rival to the White Paper?—I am well aware of that argument that unless we give the White Paper scheme the Indian political classes will withdraw their good will and refuse to work it. But I do not agree with that. In the first place, I do not think that the White Paper scheme is acceptable except to a small and, unhappily, not powerful minority among the Indian political classes. The bulk of them disapprove of it and dislike it, and they will dislike it anyway, or if they use it it will only be as a weapon of transition, and I do not see that any new position would arise if a better scheme, as I regard it, under my amendments were introduced.

14,820. If they dislike the White Paper, a fortiori will they dislike your scheme, will they not?—Exactly.

14,821. And you think that the measure of dislike would be the same in both cases?—I think so, and I think in neither case would it prevent a substantial advance being made so far as provincial government was concerned.

14,822. You know that politically minded Indians have set their hearts on central responsibility, and it is regarded by them as the substance of their demand?—I am sorry to hear that, because it is certainly not a sphere in which they are able to receive much satisfaction at the present time.

14,823. But the White Paper certainly makes for dyarchy at the centre?—I think it is a very great evil to introduce dyarchy at the centre.

14,824. That may be, but it certainly introduces the thin end of the wedge?—Undoubtedly. I quite understand that and, although it will not give any satisfaction at the moment, the hope is that the White Paper may be used to carry us into a position which the great majority of the Members of the Houses of Parliament would dislike very much.

14,825. That may be, but for the moment the popular voice gets a foothold at the centre by the White Paper, whereas under your scheme it gets no foothold at all at the centre?—I think it is better to form the provincial governments and make sure that they are successes and bind them together, if you think it right to do so, after a long interval.

14,826. As regards the possibility of such an opinion being accepted, may I invite your attention to Sir Charles Innes' opinion on this alternative proposal? This is what he says, speaking of proposals like yours, at page 552. "In my view, the alternative proposals fail, for they do not offer any real or lasting solution of our present difficulties. They would depend, I believe, on repression, and repression is no remedy. No nation can hope to hold another nation permanently in subjection. Sooner or later, we should have to give way, and when we did have to give way, we should be in a much worse position than we are to-day." This is how he estimates the political situation as it would be if your proposal were pushed through. What do you think of his estimate?—I think he is using ill-judged and mischievous language coming from a high authority, and I express my total disagreement with him and with the tone of his remarks, and with the occasion on which they were made.

14,827. Do you mean to suggest to this Committee that the opinion of such a veteran and trusted officer who has occupied very important offices should not be preferred to your opinion which has been vaguely formed from studies in this country?—It is for the Committee to judge entirely; he has expressed his view. You asked me what I thought of what he said, and I say I do not agree with it.

CHURCHILL, C.H., M.P.

14,828. Do you suggest that the Committee should accept your opinion in preference over the opinion of Sir Charles Innes?—I have my own ideas of what the Committee should do. If I thought they would avail me, I would gladly express them, but all I can do is to submit my view.

14,829. In paragraph 14, you say: "It would be ungrateful not to recognise the very great improvement in the tranquillity of India which has been brought about during Lord Willingdon's Vice-royalty. A complete reversal of administrative policy has occurred, the details of which are obvious. This has proved that the existing machinery of government at the Centre of India is fully capable of maintaining law and order, even in very difficult circumstances without any serious loss of life or use of British troops." Do you wish to suggest that the present tranquillity of India, assuming it is tranquillity, has been obtained by your machinery of law and order alone?—Mainly by the executive measures which were taken under Lord Willingdon.

14,830. Do you not take note of the fact that the large bulk of politically minded people have supported your policy either by refraining from civil disobedience, or by giving active support to the maintenance of law and order. Do you admit that?—I should be sorry to exclude it altogether, but in the main, I believe that the restoration of tranquillity, if tranquillity there be, as you say, has resulted from the firm enforcement of the ordinary law—

14,831. Perfectly true?—And without discrimination, which has characterised the present regime in India.

14,832. Do you further admit that those who have given you their support in the maintenance of law and order and in producing the tranquillity of which you speak in this paragraph, are the men who are expectantly waiting to see that a large measure of political self-government is given to India; that the support has been drawn from the ranks of such men who are expectantly waiting to see what measure of Indian self-government is given? Do you admit that fact?—It may be that some proportion of those classes are hoping for the White Paper. It may be that another proportion are hoping for something far in advance of the White Paper which they hope the White Paper will give them after a short interval. It may be that a large proportion of them would be perfectly content to see a success made of Provincial Home Rule, but, in any case, while naturally we must not speak without gratitude and good will towards all who support the maintenance of law and order, in my opinion the overwhelming element in the improvement of Indian affairs has been the decision to enforce the law without fear or favour.

14,833. But you could not have enforced law and order so easily if you had not had the support and co-operation of this class of Indians. Do you admit that? You would have found it more difficult to enforce law and order?—Certainly. The more support you have the easier it is to do what is right.

14,834. Do you not think that if you lost the good will and the co-operation of this class of people and that an attempt was again made of the nature which took place twice previously, it would be very difficult to maintain law and order without repressive proposals?—I do not admit that we should lose the support of all educated Indian opinion if we limit our extension at the present time to the Provinces.

14,835. What is your estimate of the measure of support you would get, if you can give me an idea?—How can I know that?

14,836. Then you cannot say what measure of support you would get from politically-minded Indians for a scheme like yours, not even roughly. Will you take it from me that it will receive very small support from the politically-minded people of India?—That is not a question, is it?

14,837. The last question I want to ask you is this. You talk in paragraph 13 like this: "This experiment in the Provinces must naturally precede the making of a Federal System for India." Then you go on about 8 lines from the bottom, "those who succeed should be examples and an encouragement; those who fail can be helped. If any one fails hopelessly, the delegated powers can be resumed. If nearly all or the greater part succeed, then after a broad interval in which the fact is proved, the joining of the units together in a Federation might well be a matter of common

CHURCHILL, C.H., M.P.

agreement." Can you give us some idea as to the approximate period for which you would like to wait?—I have committed myself to say certainly more than 10 years.

14,838. That is only one terminus. Which is the other terminus?—The other would be regulated by the development of the Provincial Home Rule Government and that might come very rapidly after 10 years had passed or, perhaps, during the 10 years, but I would not reopen the Constitutional question until more than 10 years had passed, and then take a view of the Provincial Services and Home Rule Governments, and if they were developing into prosperous, loyal, progressive, peaceful communities, it is perfectly evident that their desire to join themselves together around the Central Government of India in a Federal System with Federal Legislative Instruments would be a desire which it would be very difficult to resist in British public opinion.

14,839. You would not, for instance, set the period in these terms: "A period which human beings ought to take into practical account"—to quote your expression. You do not put it in that category?—No. That I was applying to an Australian or Canadian Dominion Constitution under the Statute of Westminster, but the institution of a Federal System could be considered the moment you had in existence as a working proposition effective Home Rule Administrations in the Provinces.

14,840. You say in paragraph 15, at the bottom: "What you have to give now, give and have done with it. What you cannot give, refuse and use your power, which is ample, to sustain your decision"?—Yes.

14,841. It does smack of physical power, does it not?—The maintenance of law and authority under the existing Constitutional relationships between Great Britain and India.

14,842. I do not quite see how it would work—"refuse and use your power, which is ample, to sustain your decision." Supposing India did not accept it, would you then use your powers to force it down? I do not quite see what you mean by that—"use your power, which is ample, to sustain your decision"?—I will answer your question as well as I can by another. Supposing India was not satisfied with the White Paper—I am using your language—and the Indian political classes were resentful of the safeguards and thought it apparently gave with the one hand and took away with the other, and so on, then surely that same situation would arise that I am facing in the last two lines of my fifteenth paragraph?

14,843. I say the same situation would not arise because my view would be in that case if there was united feeling of opposition to the White Paper, England would have to go further. That is my position?—I see.

14,844. What is the position which you see? Make a political experiment, tell the people they will not have more; if they refuse, use your power, which is ample, to maintain law and order? Tell me in definite words what would you do?—We should maintain the law.

14,845. But it does not cause a disturbance of the law to refuse your political experiment?—I see what you mean. If there was, so to speak, a general strike against helping in the Provincial Home Rule Governments.

14,846. They would refuse to work it?—I thought you meant something of an illegal kind. You mean if nobody wanted to take part in it?

14,847. Yes?—I think that would show that there was a great deal of insincerity behind the demand for representative Institutions of many Indian gentlemen who are asking for them, when they do not think they will get them or are doubtful of getting them if, when it came to the point of having the burden of administering these great Provinces cast upon them, they would gladly ride off and say "No; we expected something much finer than that," and would not take part in it. I should have thought that that showed that the demand for modern democratic electioneering and representative institutions in India was not nearly so widespread or so profound as we have been led to believe.

Sir Phiroze Sethna.

14,848. Mr. Churchill, you told Mr. Jayaker that you were in India from 1907 to 1909 as a subaltern and you add in the first paragraph of your Memorandum that you had many companions in peace and comrades in war amongst Indians. May I take it that as a subaltern you were stationed in towns where your regiment was, and not in principal towns such as Bombay and Calcutta and consequently you did not have opportunities of meeting politically-minded Indians and knowing their views?—I travelled all over India and I had the opportunity of staying in most of the principal Government centres there; I met a great many people, but I make no claim to be an Indian expert. I have carefully put in this paragraph to disclaim any such idea.

CHURCHILL, C.H., M.P.

14,849. If you say that I leave the question there. You told Mr. Jayaker that, whilst Sir Charles Innes held one view, you had consulted many other experts who hold different views?—Yes.

14,850. I am not asking for their names. May I know if those gentlemen have returned from India within the last few months or the last year, as Sir Charles Innes and Sir John Thompson have done, and who filled very important positions in that country?—I do not think it would be wise for me to define any of the sources from which I have formed the opinions you have asked me to lay before you.

14,851. The reason I ask as to when they returned is for the purpose of eliciting the information as to whether their knowledge is comparatively recent or many years old. Now, Mr. Churchill, in paragraph 14—I am not repeating what Mr. Jayaker has said—you observe that there has been great improvement in the tranquillity of India which has been brought about during Lord Willingdon's Vice-royalty. Are you aware that Lord Willingdon himself attributes that to the possibility of India getting a substantial measure of reforms within the near future?—Yes.

14,852. I would like to quote to you the last two sentences from a speech which he made to the two Houses of the Central Legislature as recently as the 30th August: "In conclusion, let me turn for a moment to the future. If we are to ensure the rapid progress which we all desire in the way of Constitutional Reforms, we must create the atmosphere in which that progress can develop. Little can be done by Government alone. An equal responsibility must lie upon Honourable Members themselves and other leaders of political thought in India to whom we must look to use their influence by their speeches, by public meetings and propaganda to see that the electorates of the future are made fully aware of the great advance we are striving to achieve through the White Paper proposals. I appeal to you, therefore, with all the sincerity at my command, to take up this responsibility with courage and energy so as to help your country forward to the attainment"—and mark these words—"to the attainment of her ultimate goal as an equal partner in the shaping of the destinies of the British Empire." May I ask if you agree with these views?—I think I found a lot in that speech which I regretted to hear Lord Willingdon say, at the present time when these matters, we are assured, are sub judice, and so much is being considered by the Joint Select Committee, and when we are repeatedly assured that we are not committed and so forth; but with a great deal of the language I am naturally in sympathy, and such language is frequently used by persons making statements of that kind, but I deprecate statements which seem to imply that the White Paper is to be carried into effect when Parliament has not yet decided upon it and this Committee has not yet reported, when we are continually begged to await the Report of the Joint Select Committee even before forming any opinion.

14,853. In an extract from your speech which Lord Irwin quoted yesterday you had said that Dominion Status could not be granted "within living memory" I draw your attention to those words, "within living memory". In your Memorandum now before us you say not before a hundred or two hundred years, and you supplement that to-day by saying not within any reasonable period which one can think of. Are we to paraphrase that by the word "never"?—No; but I have been drawing attention to what has now become so very evident, the great danger of the use of this term "Dominion Status" or "Dominion Constitution", because it is used very often in such a way as to give an idea to Indians that Dominion Constitution similar to Australia and Canada after the Statute of Westminster is likely soon to be achieved, whereas that is not intended as I believe by any of the British speakers who have used such an expression. Therefore, as the matter has been shown to be so full of misunderstanding, I think it is extremely important that everyone, if they say Dominion Status, should also point out that that is a distant, remote goal, which it is not practicable to take into consideration—I must repeat my words—in any period which human beings need take account of.

CHURCHILL, C.H., M.P.

14,854. India, justifiably or not, is asking for the control of her own destiny. Parliament can either give it by meeting her demands or by giving as much as will appease them. If they do not do one or the other, then I take it that you would like that idea to be suppressed. In regard to that, may I point out to you that Sir John Thompson has replied as follows? Sir John Thompson was asked by the Marquess of Lothian "Would you turn to paragraph 4 of your Paper. I just want to ask you to elaborate a little what you say under sub-paragraphs (c) and (d). You say: There are 'grave risks involved in an over-cautious policy; and (d) The impossibility of holding Indian aspirations in check for long, even by armed force.' Supposing Parliament put forward proposals which, in effect, were rejected not only by the left wing of Indian political aspirations but by the great mass of moderate politicians, what steps would be necessary, in addition to the maintenance of the Army, to maintain law and order over any considerable period of time. Would the existing mechanism be adequate?" The reply was: "It would be entirely inadequate." Sir John Thompson said that after having returned to this country a few months ago and after having filled the position of Chief Commissioner at Delhi?—Is this the same Sir John Thompson who has recently become a propagandist agent in favour of the White Paper?

Sir Phiroze Sethna.] I do not know about his being a propagandist: he is the President of the Union of Britain and India.

Marquess of Reading.

14,855. He was Chief Commissioner of Delhi?—He has a double qualification.

Mr. Zafrulla Khan.] That could also be said of Sir Michael O'Dwyer in the Punjab in martial law days.

Sir Phiroze Sethna.

14,856. Pursuing this point, Mr. Isaac Foot asked: "Would it be going too far to say from your answers to Lord Lothian that, in your opinion, there is no alternative in the future of India between a larger measure of self-government and Military autocracy?" And the answer was. "Yes, I think that is true, but I do not think that Military autocracy would ever work in India, under modern conditions." In the course of this, Mr. Churchill, you would not go the whole length of the White Paper but would advocate your own scheme?—No, Sir, I would not. I would not hand over the Police in the Provinces as defined, and I would not set up at this juncture a Federal system until after the Provinces had proved that they could make a success of it.

Chairman.] Sir Phiroze, I think this point has been very sufficiently covered by Mr. Jayaker's examination of this witness

Sir Phiroze Sethna.

14,857. Very well, my Lord Chairman; I will leave that point. May I refer to Mr. Churchill's scheme in another way, because I see his answer this morning differs from the answer so far as I remember which he gave yesterday? Yesterday he said that nobody in India, nor a party in this country, accepted the White Paper, and when he was asked whether his scheme would be acceptable I remember he said, "with the able assistance and co-operation of Indians we shall be able to carry on my scheme, provided we give Provincial autonomy with my reservations." Then he said. "They would not lead to a general refusal by Indians to take part in the Government of this country." I leave that matter?—We have a verbatim report of what I said, I think 14,858. Yes, I was reading from my notes. We have not yet got the verbatim report?—There will be one.

Sir Phiroze Sethna.] But I remind you that you said yesterday that your scheme was workable.

Chairman.

14,859. I think, having put that point, you must ask Mr. Churchill to give you an answer?—My answer is that I rely upon the verbatim transcript. I am not aware of anything I have said which is inconsistent. Sometimes an answer goes at a slightly different angle, but I would like to wait and see what has been reported.

Sir Phiroze Sethna.

14,860. You attach very great importance to the responsibility of Parliament to look after the interests of what you call mostly very poor and quite primitive people in the country?—I did not say that. I said something very like it.

14,861. In paragraph 15 I think you say that?—Let us just see. I do not think I said that. I said something very like it, but just one or two alterations will make a difference. I think I said mostly very poor and many quite primitive people.

24^o Octobris, 1933.] The Right Honourable WINSTON SPENCER
CHURCHILL, C.H., M.P.

14,862. I am sorry I omitted the word "many"—I do not wish it to be suggested that I said that all these masses of the Indian population were very primitive people. That would be derogatory and I would not say it. Mostly they are very poor and many of them are quite primitive.

14,863. That is the view advanced by yourself and others of your way of thinking?—Yes.

14,864. Would it be fair to ask if, rather than that, the real intention of those who oppose the White Paper was properly conveyed by you in a letter which you addressed in December, 1932, to the Conservative Conference which met at Blackpool and at which you were unable to be present owing to your illness?—The sentence is as follows: "The loss of a group of agricultural counties of Southern Ireland can be supported, but the loss of India, the central glory of the British Empire, will not only sound the death knell of our greatness, but destroy the very means of livelihood of millions of this island and especially of Lancashire." I say that this argument which is advanced by you and your friends about looking after the interests of the masses is, so to say the least, a mere camouflage. The real object is what I have quoted from your own letter?—Quite untrue.

14,865. If you say it is untrue are we to assume that the British people and Parliament here have been taking a greater interest in the welfare of the masses than the Indians would if they were given responsible government, and do you think they will neglect the interests of their kith and kin?—I think that undoubtedly the masses of India have derived enormous benefit from the contribution which Great Britain has made to Indian progress, and I see no inconsistency or contradiction at all between saying that the British connection with India is not only beneficial to the Indian masses, but also is beneficial to large numbers of our people here; the benefits which flow from trade and connections are by no means limited to one or other of the parties; they multiply themselves increasingly to both parties.

14,866. I have not denied for a moment the value of the British connection with India, but I put it to you that the Indians themselves must perforce have a greater regard for their own kith and kin than the British Parliament which is 6,000 miles away?—I do not agree with that. I think if you look at what happened in China you will see that however much people may have regard for their own kith and kin it very often happened in the history of Asia that poor people had very rough treatment from their own kith and kin.

14,867. Then I should like to ask you whether in your opinion, since certain subjects have been transferred and are under the control of Indians, those Indians have not looked after the interests of their own kith and kin as well as and better than the British?—I have answered that already. I am making no suggestion that they have not desired in every way to do so, but I have been led to believe that there has been a certain deterioration in some of the services, not, however, a deterioration in my judgment sufficient to make us lose heart within the limits which I now propose for a further advance.

14,868. In May, 1933, Mr. Churchill, speaking at Manchester, you said: "This White Paper is not a Constitution; it is a paradox, it is an elaborate grimace. At no part or period in its structure is there confidence, trust or decision. It is a jumble of contradictions and needlessly fomented antagonisms. It is an amalgamation of small expedients and counterchecks. It is a gimcrack edifice built up of odds and ends by the pygmies." Will you tell us in what way your proposal is superior to this?—I am referring to the whole of this elaborate structure of a Federal Parliament, Government of All India, with Ministers, partly responsible and partly not, and with all the reserved services so important, touching perhaps three-quarters of the whole field; it is to all that picture that I am referring. I am certainly not referring to a sensible matter of fact effort to build up self-governing administration in the Provinces.

14,869. You regard your scheme as a panacea for all ills?—Not at all. God forbid! On the contrary, I regard it as a slight improvement upon the proposals of the Statutory Commission and as a marked improvement against the proposals of the White Paper.

14,870. It offers distinctly less than the White Paper. That is so, is it not?—Certainly.

24th October, 1933.] The Right Honourable WINSTON SPENCER
CHURCHILL, C.H., M.P.

14,871. And in the opinion of those who have recently returned, men who have filled the highest positions, what the White Paper offers may not satisfy the Indian public. Do you think in that case that your proposal will carry weight with them?—You can judge as well as I can and better, but I am much interested in your statement that even the White Paper will not get that good will which is essential.

Sir Phiroze Sethna.] Not from all sections in India.

Sir Hari Singh Gour.

14,872. I see from your paragraph 1, Mr. Churchill, that you have admitted that your direct knowledge of India is far remote and that you derive your information from the perusal of confidential papers on Indian affairs and from the discussions and decisions required thereupon. Is that so?—I do not wish to alter the words of my paper.

14,873. Are those confidential reports to which you have had access confidential reports to which other members of the Cabinet have also had access?—Yes.

14,874. And are not the discussions to which you refer discussions available to other members of the Cabinet?—Yes.

14,875. Are you aware of any other member of the Cabinet who holds the view that you hold on the subject?—Do you mean members of the Cabinets of the past? I should like to read you what Lord Morley said about this proposal to give a Parliament at the centre to India.

14,876. I have read his "Recollections," and I think you are quoting from his book?—I learned a great deal under that great man. I will not trouble you by reading it.

14,877. Then I take it it is a mere matter of inference. You draw one conclusion; others draw other conclusions from the perusal of the papers and the discussions that you refer to?—That is inevitable.

14,878. Now in your evidence you spoke of the inalienable right of Parliament. You said that Parliament can delegate authority but cannot transfer authority to any constituted authority in India. Did I understand you aright?—I must adhere to the words of my paper. I said inalienable responsibility.

14,879. What do you mean by an inalienable responsibility? Is it a fetter upon the sovereign right of Parliament?—I really cannot find any word which expresses the meaning I wish to convey better than the word "inalienable."

14,880. Do I understand you to mean that the word "inalienable" in your mind means a right which Parliament is incompetent to transfer?—No. Parliament would be capable of doing it, but in my opinion it would be, if it did it imprudently and improvidently and great disaster occurred and great misfortunes arose thereafter, a reproach which would lie upon Parliament.

14,881. Then it is more a question of Parliamentary propriety than a question of constitutional right that you use the expression, inalienable responsibility of Parliament?—I dare say.

14,882. Now you have said that you stand more or less by the Preamble to the Government of India Act and to Section 84A of that Act. Are you aware, Mr. Churchill, that the Government of India Act and Section 84A of the Act deal with British India only? Will you please look at Section 84A?—I am aware of the scope of the Act.

14,883. And you know there are two Indias—greater India and India?—Yes, I am aware of that.

14,884. Are you aware that the development of Greater India, which includes British India, has proceeded on different lines from the constitutional development of British India?—You mean the Government of the Princes of India?

14,885. No. I mean the Government of India; that is to say the international status of India has been far in advance of the constitutional development of British India. Are you aware of it?—I should like to see what point you are leading up to.

14,886. I will explain it to you. In the Imperial War Conference of 1917, with which I am quite sure you are familiar, the ninth resolution was passed in the following terms, and I invite your attention particularly to the closing words of that resolution: "The Imperial War Conference are of opinion that the re-adjustment of the constitutional relations of the component parts of the Empire is too important and intricate a subject to be dealt with during the War, and that it should form the subject of a special Imperial Conference to be summoned as soon as possible after the cessation of hostilities. They deem it their duty, however, to place on record their view that any such re-adjustment, while thoroughly preserving all existing powers of self-government and complete control of domestic affairs, should be based upon a full recognition of the Dominions as autonomous nations of an Imperial Commonwealth, and of India as an important portion of the same, should recognise the right of the Dominions and India to an adequate voice in foreign policy and in foreign relations, and should provide"—mark these words—"effective arrangements for continuous consultation in all important matters of common Imperial concern, and for such necessary concerted action, founded on consultation, as the several Governments may determine." That was the recognition of the right of India, not only to a status, but to a position similar to that enjoyed by the Dominions now known as the self-governing Dominions of the British Commonwealth. Is not that so?—From the quotation you have read it seems to me that the statement in regard to India is carefully differentiated from the statement in regard to the self-governing Dominions, and, although much of the language flows together, there is a difference introduced, but, as I have said, I consider that all these statements are gathered up together and presented in statutory form in the Preamble to and in the Section of the Act of 1919, to which I have referred.

14,887. I am afraid that is exactly the point upon which I wish to correct you. This statement of 1917 deals with India, whereas the Preamble of the Government of India Act deals only with British India, and Section 84A of the Government of India Act, to which you have made repeated reference, only deals with the future development of British India. I am taking your mind to Greater India, namely, British India-cum-Indian States. The position that was accorded to this Greater India in 1917 is enunciated in the ninth resolution of the Imperial War Conference?—And effect was given to that to the full extent of the intention by the representation that India enjoyed at the Imperial War Cabinet and upon the International Conferences which followed the War.

(After a short adjournment.)

Sir Hari Singh Gour.

14,888. I shall read the passage from a speech of Sir Austen Chamberlain later when he comes and joins the Committee. In the meantime, I wish to point out to you, Mr. Churchill, that the evolution of India as distinct from British India has proceeded upon a line distinct from the constitutional framework in the Government of India Act of 1919, and I want to point out to you that, in consequence of the declaration made in 1917 in the ninth resolution of the Imperial War Conference, India was given a place alongside of the other self-governing dominions in that she was made to sign the treaty of Versailles, was admitted as a foundation member of the League of Nations upon its establishment in 1919, has been in her own right admitted to the several Imperial Conferences and international bodies, and became a party to the Kellogg Pact and the other treaties which had been entered into by her or on her behalf, and the other National Governments. My submission, therefore, is that your English institution is not a written constitution, but has evolved out of usages, practices, understandings and arrangements, and that this greater India, commencing from the declaration of 1917 down to the establishment of the Statutory Commission in 1927, has become so assimilated with the practice which gave the dominions the status which culminated in the enactment of the Statute of Westminster in 1931. Now, the question I wish to put to you is this: when we speak of India, and the political stature of India, we are speaking of quite a different entity from the British India to which the Government of India Act applies and that as regards even the Government of India Act it is not exhaustive and self-contained. May I point out to you that a Joint Committee of British Parliament reporting on the Government of India Act at pages 26 and 27, made this point perfectly clear? They wrote as follows: "A satisfactory solution of the question" (they were dealing with the question of the fiscal autonomy of India) "can only be guaranteed by the grant of liberty to the Government of India to devise those tariff arrangements which seem best fitted to India's needs as an integral portion of the British Empire. It cannot be guaranteed by statute without limiting the ultimate power of Parliament to control the administration of India, and without limiting the power of veto which rests in the Crown, and neither of these limitations finds a place in any of the statutes of the British Empire. It can only therefore be assured by an acknowledgment of convention. Whatever be the rights of fiscal policy for India for the needs of her consumers as well as for her manufacturers, it is quite clear that she should have the same liberty to consider her interests as Great Britain, Australia, New Zealand, Canada and South Africa." Here you have the implementing of the Government of India Act by a Convention which was recognised by the Joint Select Committee of Parliament, and which has been given effect to ever since the enactment of the Act of 1919. Now, do you not recognise therefore that the Government of India Act, dealing as it does only with British India, is incomplete and has to be supplemented by reference to conventions of the kind I have mentioned?—I am very grateful to Sir Hari Singh Gour for having put these matters so very lucidly. They are very important matters. I need scarcely say I shall endeavour to assimilate them with my general view if I possibly can.

CHURCHILL, C.H., M.P.

14,889. The point that I am making now is this, that when you have been referring so frequently to the Government of India Act, you are only dealing with the statutory piece of legislation which is not, all in all, dealing with British India and when you deal with the greater India, the Government of India Act is necessarily silent because it deals only with British India?—Then, of course, I would be forced to point out the very great distinction in fact, though not in form, between the representation of India upon the Inter-Allied War Councils and International Conferences, and the representation of the self-governing Dominions, like Australia and Canada. Whereas these self-governing Dominions were virtually independent states, though bound by close ties to us, and their Prime Ministers were the heads of Governments elected on democratic franchises the representatives of India were very eminent personages who owed their position solely to the nomination of the Secretary of State. There you see exactly that profound difference between the recognition of her rank and of her status in an honorific manner, and the practical assertions of power implied in the representation of the self-governing Dominions.

14,890. It then comes to this, that the terms of the resolution of the Imperial War Conference of 1917 have not been carried out because, let me remind you, it was stated in that resolution. "It should recognise the rights of the Dominion of India to an adequate voice in foreign policy and in foreign relations, and should provide effective arrangements for continuous consultation in all important matters of common Imperial concern"—Certainly; I do not see how that has not been carried out.

14,891. Therefore the mere fact that somebody responsible for carrying out the policy laid down by the Imperial War Conference has failed to carry out that policy, does not do away with the fact that there was a recognition of India's right to the same extent as the right of the Dominions to control her external policy?—No, I do not quite agree with that I could not quite accept that, but I do entirely endorse the action taken by the Imperial Conference in 1917, and the legislation that has come into existence since. I accept that.

14,892. And you further accept that it was in consequence of the resolution of 1917 that the Statute of Westminster was passed when it was passed?—That is so.

14,893. The Balfour Committee was appointed in consequence of this resolution where a promise was held out that a further investigation will be made on the cessation of hostilities?—I should like to know what is the view of His Majesty's Government as to whether anything said at the Conference of 1917 requires us to establish a Dominion constitution on the Statute of Westminster basis in India in any period which it is useful to consider. I should like to know their view, and I think you gentlemen ought to find out their view on that.

14,894. I want your valuable co-operation in obtaining their views?—You shall have it.

14,895. What is your personal view? Having been given the facts, what is the conclusion to which we are irresistibly drawn?—My conclusion is that in all that makes for the honour and status and representation of India, and of our Indian fellow subjects all over the world, not only in their own country, everything possible should be done, but in what affects the essential relations of Great Britain and India and what affects the wellbeing of the broad masses, there we must be guided by

CHURCHILL, C H., M P.

practical considerations as to whether a good result will at any given period be achieved or not.

14,896. Do these qualifications occur in or underlie the declaration to which I have referred?—These qualifications are implicit, in my opinion, in all of the declarations that have been made by any of the British representatives or agents.

14,897. Would you say they were also implicit in the case of the Dominions?—No, because I think there is a great difference, in fact though not in form, which I have tried to point out probably with less refinement than such a very fine constitutional argument requires. There is a very great difference between fact and form, and it was never intended and never meant, and I do not believe ever really understood, that by anything that happened in 1917, or anything that happened in 1919 or 1921 India was going to receive an Australian or a Canadian constitution straightaway, or in any period which we could reasonably foresee.

14,898. Then in what way should we carry out the pledge which was given by the Joint Select Committee that in matters of fiscal autonomy India should be treated exactly on the same footing as Australia, New Zealand, Canada and South Africa?—As a matter of fact, has that not been the practice?

14,899. It has been the practice?—Then where is the grievance?

14,900. So that is an attribute of Dominion function which India has at present as distinct from Dominion status?—The practice of the British Government in regard to fiscal matters connected with India has run over a good many years. It rests upon a statement that if the Viceroy is in agreement with the Government of India upon a particular measure, the Secretary of State will not interfere, but, of course, you must again go behind that if you are distinguishing the fact from the form, and remember that the Viceroy is appointed by the Crown on the advice of Ministers of the British Parliament, and therefore, although it appears and should I think be very much in the form in which it has been worked, there is a difference, and the difference should not be overlooked.

14,901. That point was adverted to somewhat in the following language of the Joint Committee. They say "generally speaking"?—What do you mean by the Joint Committee?

14,902. By the Joint Select Committee of Parliament which reported on the Bill which became the Act of 1919?—Yes, the former Committee.

14,903. Yes. They say that in the exercise of his responsibility to Parliament which he cannot delegate to anyone else, the Secretary of State may reasonably consider that only in exceptional circumstances should he be called upon to intervene in matters of purely Indian interest where the Government and Legislature of India are in agreement?—I agree with that.

14,904. Are these not attributes of Dominion function as distinct from Dominion status?—There seems to be read substance in that, certainly.

14,905. Therefore, India has got beyond the mere status of a Dominion—even British India, I am speaking about?—Has got beyond what?

14,906. The mere stage of Dominion status in those matters, the mere honorific or ceremonial rank of a Dominion?—Yes.

Marquess of Reading.

14,907. We have been talking about the fiscal convention and comparing it with the Dominions, but there is this distinction, that in the fiscal convention, there must be agreement between the Government of India and the Legislature, and the Government of India is, under present conditions, not in the same position as the Government of a Dominion. I want to point that out?—Yes.

Sir Hari Singh Gour.

14,908. It is with reference to what fell from Lord Reading that I read the passage that the Secretary of State will stand aside in all cases generally where the Government of India and the Legislature are in agreement. Therefore to that extent the shadowy control of Parliament and the Secretary of State in fiscal matters disappears, and it is that attribute of fiscal autonomy that I regard as a substantial concession to India which distinguishes India from being merely a Dominion in form, and makes it a Dominion in substance pro tanto?—I am not going to go out of my way to quarrel with that. I am very glad that Sir Hari Singh Gour is pleased with that, and I am glad of his tribute and that the progress we have made towards that far distant goal in that respect has been so fully recognised by

24th October, 1933.] The Right Honourable WINSTON SPENCER
CHURCHILL, C.H., M.P.

him and his colleagues on the Indian Delegation

14,909. I only want that an adequate machinery should now be devised to give India a greater reality than what she has in the exercise of her rights now under fiscal convention and that cannot be done under your scheme?—Nothing in my scheme affects the existing practice. You call it my scheme but I call it the proposals for modifying the Statutory Commission report. That is what I call it. Nothing in that affects the ordinary practice of the India Office in dealing with those questions. There might be something to be said about it at a later stage, but there is nothing which I have said to-day which touches that.

Marquess of Lothian.

14,910. The fiscal convention under your scheme would remain in existence?—Under the proposals for modifying the White Paper which I have put forward, there is no mention of any change in the existing practice in regard to fiscal matters in India, but it is perfectly clear that that convention rests upon the fact, as Lord Reading has pointed out, of an agreement between the Government of India and the Assembly, and it must also be noticed that the Government of India itself is largely a projection of the decisions of the Crown upon the advice of Ministers of the British Parliament, which decisions are taken from time to time as vacancies occur. Consequently, it would be unfair to state that India has complete fiscal autonomy at the present time. It would not be true. But that she has a very great measure and that everyone would be abhorrent to the idea of a one-sided exploitation, for instance, on any question between the two countries is common ground, I imagine, amongst us all.

Sir John Wardlaw-Milne.

14,911. Mr. Churchill, you would agree that it has been the practice that India has had this freedom in fiscal matters since the bringing into force of the Fiscal Autonomy Convention?—I agree that the Viceroy, who is appointed on the advice of Ministers, has, when in agreement with the Legislature in India, not been overruled, formally, by the Secretary of State. That does not at all mean that many communications do not pass upon the subject before action is taken, and should do.

14,912. Quite, but you are in favour of that continuing?—No, I did not say that. I said that nothing in the Paper which I have written for the Committee raised any change in that matter.

14,913. Will you give the Committee the benefit of your advice upon that very important point?—I think if we reached some point where there was a very great feeling of general good will, a claim might be put forward on behalf of this country that while it assumes all the responsibility for the defence and security of India, and if it could be shown to be faithfully proceeding upon the general lines of its policy, discriminatory duties should not be put on and that the principle of Empire Free Trade should be given effect to as far as possible with the exception of, of course, bona fide revenue duties. That is not a matter which, I think, should be done except with a very broad measure of acceptance and agreement between the different parties involved.

14,914. As things are to-day, you would not be prepared to advocate the continuance of the present Convention—as things stand at this moment?—I have not opened that topic at all in any evidence I have sought to give before the Joint Committee.

Sir Samuel Hoare.

14,915. Could not Mr. Churchill give the Committee the benefit of his view as to whether the Fiscal Autonomy Convention as defined by him should continue?—I think I have really answered that when I said that a situation might arise in which the fiscal relations between the two countries would have to be reopened, but that it certainly should not be reopened in any one-sided spirit of one set of the interests concerned in this commercial matter asserting their rights and their claims, without the consideration of the other; but, at the same time, I do consider that while we are the defenders of India from aggression, whether by land or by sea, we have a very considerable claim to be heard with our Indian fellow-subjects and friends in regard to the treatment which affects the entry of our goods into India not only as against foreign countries but as against the Indian Home Trade.

Sir Hari Singh Gour.

14,916. Inter se?—I certainly think so, but I believe there is a fertile field there for friendly exploration of that problem and we might be found to have additional advantages which we could give in return for consideration which would be helpful to our own people, but it is certainly not a matter to be settled by the rough hand of power or authority in that way. It is a matter to be settled by a patient statement of the case. Just as you have a case which you courteously, skilfully and patiently deploy, so we have a case which we should similarly deploy as occasion serves.

24^c October, 1933.] The Right Honourable WINSTON SPENCER
CHURCHILL, C.H., M.P.

Sir Samuel Hoare.

14,917. Arising out of what Mr. Churchill has just said, would he then say that the present state of affairs should continue until agreement is reached by both sides for a change?—I would not go so far as that, but I would say until there was a sufficient measure of agreement and good will to make it clear that it was not the imposition by Government authority of a view from one side or the other.

14,918. What sort of evidence would Mr. Churchill accept? I was not clear from his answer exactly what he meant by "agreement." I am very anxious to know what is in his mind about "agreement"?—I am not prepared to define it.

Marquess of Lothian.

14,919. Would you accept the Legislature as being the body who would give the agreement from the Indian side as provided by the Convention?—No; not necessarily. I do not wish at this stage to define those conditions. I think that they would have to be judged as a whole. The situation would have to be judged as a whole, but that there are very fertile fields of inter-Imperial trade into which both India and Great Britain could enter, and from which they could both reap very large advantages, I have no doubt, and by some agreement we have got to endeavour to study that with our Indian friends.

14,920. You are not prepared to define who in those circumstances would speak for the Indian side of the general measure of agreement?—I do not think I could with advantage plunge into that, but certainly with notice I suppose I could give you a more detailed view. I rather hesitate just by question and answer to speak on a matter which everyone knows is a most delicate and burning matter.

Sir John Wardlaw-Milne.

14,921. May I put this last point to clear up what Mr. Churchill has said. Do I understand that your view, Mr. Churchill, is that where purely British interests may conflict with those of India, as things stand at present you would not be prepared to continue what has been the practice of the last few years, that is, that India should have freedom to decide by itself without practical interference by this country?—I do not think it is true to say that India has had freedom to decide by itself. The Viceroy and the Legislature must agree. The Viceroy is an official appointed by the Crown on the advice of Ministers responsible to Parliament and recallable by any strong resolve of Parliament at any time and replaceable by any other individual who may be chosen to carry out the will of Parliament. Therefore, it is not true to say that there has been complete fiscal autonomy.

Sir Samuel Hoare.

14,922. In actual practice, can Mr. Churchill recall any case in which pressure has been put upon the Viceroy to enforce the view of the British Government and the British Parliament against the Viceroy's own view and against the view of the Indian Legislature?—It is always very difficult to follow the sources of action to their very fountain spring in some of these matters. Obviously, communications have passed between the Secretary of State on many occasions and the Viceroy in regard to the incidence of particular Empire Duties, and great consideration is no doubt given and ought to be given to the views of the Secretary of State by the Viceroy, and a great deal is adjusted behind the scenes, as it ought to be, in a friendly manner, and the resulting proposals are naturally accepted, but that is not anything like the same complete fiscal independence as is enjoyed by Canada and Australia.

14,923. I am afraid that did not answer my question. I did not ask about correspondence passing between the Viceroy and Whitehall. I asked whether in actual practice pressure had been put upon the Viceroy and the Indian Legislature to alter their own views upon questions of this kind?—That depends at what stage their own view is formed, but to pretend that correspondence can never involve pressure is, I am quite sure, not a position which the Secretary of State would adopt.

24^o Octobris, 1933.] The Right Honourable WINSTON SPENCER
CHURCHILL, C.H., M.P.

14,924. Certainly not. That is not the question I asked Mr. Churchill. The question was whether he could recall any instance in which this pressure had actually been put upon the Viceroy and the Legislature?—I have not the permission of the Crown to reveal any Cabinet secrets which might occur to me at the moment.

Sir Hari Singh Gour.

14,925. Do I understand you, Mr. Churchill, to say that this recommendation of the Joint Select Committee of 1918 has remained for all practical purposes a dead letter?—No.

14,926. That it has not been given full effect to, as it was intended it should be given full effect to, giving India the same freedom as Australia enjoys?—In what respect?

14,927. In respect of Fiscal Autonomy?—I think the practice is well-known and everyone knows what it has been, and everyone can judge by seeing what has happened as to how far the resolution has been given effect to.

14,928. I am asking you to sum up in one word that the Fiscal Autonomy Convention to which I have referred has not been operative to the same extent as it has been in the case of Australia, Canada and the rest?—So far as I am aware the statement of the Secretary of State that when the Governor-General and the Assembly have been in agreement there has been no interference from here is quite well-founded.

14,929. Therefore, that is now a very defined attitude of Dominion Function as distinct from Dominion Status?—I am very glad there should be. Perhaps I understated it when I suggested that we had only advanced in status. There is an advance in function too, certainly, and I should welcome any practical advance in function as well as in status.

14,930. May I draw your attention to Clause 9 in the Instrument of Instructions issued by the King to the Governor-General. The words are as follows: "For above all things it is our will and pleasure that the plans laid by our Parliament for the progressive realisation of responsible government in British India as an integral part of our Empire may come to fruition to the end that British India may attain its due place amongst our Dominions. Therefore, we do charge our said Governor-General by the means aforesaid and by all other means which may to him seem fit to guide the course or our subjects in India whose governance we have committed to his charge so that subject on the one hand always to the determination of our Parliament and on the other hand to the co-operation of those on whom new opportunities of service have been conferred, progress towards such realisation may ever advance to the benefit of all our subjects in India." The words I wish to emphasise are "to the end that British India may attain its due place amongst our Dominions"?—But there is as much emphasis to be laid upon the words "its due place" as upon any other part of the phrase.

14,931. But due place is to be given not outside the Dominions but amongst our Dominions?—Certainly.

14,932. Then you recognise that that is the established policy which you are prepared to endorse?—I think that all belongs to the sphere of Dominion Status, but does not involve the grant of an Australian or a Canadian Status.

Mr. M. R. Jayaker.

14,933. You mean that "due place" does not necessarily mean an equal place?—"Due place" does not necessarily mean an equal place in function, but in the honorific aspect I think the idea of equality takes its part.

14,934. I am speaking of the Constitution. You mean that "due place" does not necessarily mean an equal place in functions of the Constitution?—No, it does not.

Sir Hari Singh Gour.

14,935. Is there anything in this paragraph to suggest that?—No, I think the paragraph has been very carefully expressed.

14,936. There is nothing to suggest it and nothing has been suggested except by yourself?—We have a better definition in the Preamble to and in Section 84A of the Act of 1919.

14,937. Again you are I fear forgetting. I have been trying to impress upon you that we are dealing with two Indias—British India and India. The evolution of India has been on a larger scale than the evolution of British India and I was striving to point out that even as regards British India the Government of India Act is not exhaustive, because its terms are implemented by other facts such as the fiscal convention, and that outside the Government of India Act we have the declarations and India's co-operation in the League of Nations and international bodies which place it on exactly the same footing alongside of the other Dominions. That is the point I was trying to make?—I am glad that it should be so, and I am partly responsible, with others, for the course of events that has made it so.

CHURCHILL, C.H., M.P.

14,938 I congratulate you upon it?—Let us rejoice together.

14,939. How will this scheme of yours further the progress of India towards this goal of becoming a self-governing Dominion?—My proposal deals with an entirely different branch; it has nothing whatever to do with the question of what you call a larger India at all. That is another question. It deals with a much more humble and much more practical and, in some ways, more important process of good self-government in the Provinces. Good Home Rule in the Provinces is what I am interested in. Therefore, they do not clash at all. What happens now is that for the moment there is no advance on what you may call the Dominion Status or sphere because, as you said, that has got ahead of the other. What we are now trying to do is to pull up the Provincial Home Rule aspect so that the institutions which are growing up in India shall enjoy life and health and bring them into closer correspondence with the Dominion Status as defined and as accepted by you, which India enjoyed in the War Councils and the Peace Treaties.

14,940. There are only two or three questions more that I want to put to you, Mr Churchill. One question I was going to put to you was this, that you admit that India in its Dominion functions cannot make any further progress under your scheme—India as a whole, apart from British India?—No, I have not made any such admission at all. I have not dealt with the general point.

14,941. May I put it to you that India makes international commitments and is entitled to do that under the agreement, because it is entitled to make effective arrangements for continuous consultations on all important matters of common Imperial concern?—It seems to me that you are making a very vigorous defence of all that we have done up to the present time.

14,942. Let it be so, but please answer my question. India enters into international commitments. How is she going to execute and carry out those commitments unless she has the power to do so, and that can only be done if she has got internal autonomy, control over finance, and so on?—There, you see, you begin to raise a very large issue. I think it has been most helpful. I am so grateful to you for your questions. I hope I have learned as much from your questions as you have learned from my answers. That is the argument, that Dominion Status is to be converted into Dominion Constitution and forthwith, or quite soon.

14,943. Now one last question which I wish to put to you, Mr. Churchill, is this. You admit that you have not first-hand knowledge of India. We have. You further admit, and it is a fact, that you have first-hand knowledge of England?—Yes.

14,944. I see from a speech published in "The Times" of the 8th July, 1933, the following passage occurs?—Is it a speech by me?

14,945. By you, yes. "Mr. Winston Churchill, addressing his constituents at Epping last night, expressed his intention of continuing his opposition to the proposals of the White Paper on India," and then occurs the following passage to which I wish to draw your attention: "India is vital to the well-being of Britain, and I cannot help feeling very anxious when I see forces from which our population is largely supported being gradually diminished; foreign investments are slowly shrinking and shipping is at a low ebb. If to these we add the loss of India in one form or another, then problems will arise here incomparably more grave than any we have known. You will have a surplus population here which it may be beyond the power of the Government to provide for effectively." May I take it that, knowing as you do your country, your angle of vision is more or less obscured by what you consider to be the interests of England as distinct from the interests of India?—No, I think that all legitimate interests are in harmony. I could make a speech of exactly the same kind, though the phraseology would be different, if I were endeavouring to explain to an audience of your countrymen the advantages they gained from the British connection and the loss which they would suffer if it were broken. There is no decided reason why one good set of results should exclude another good set of results.

Dr. B. R. Ambedkar.] My Lord Chairman, may I ask a question with your permission?

Chairman.] If you please.

24^o October, 1933.] The Right Honourable WINSTON SPENCER
CHURCHILL, C.H., M.P.

Dr. B. R. Ambedkar.

14,946. I just want to ask you one question, Mr. Churchill. Do you make any distinction between responsible government and Dominion Status?—Oh, yes. Responsible government has many interpretations, many that we know in practice and we have seen. Responsible government may mean serious, real, important functions transferred to the discretion of a Provincial or local body, or it may mean the various degrees of responsible government which have a technical understanding in the language of the Dominions and Colonial Office, namely, Ministers responsible to the Assembly and so forth, but there are very considerable gradations in the history of our outlying Dominions and Empire in the exact form of institutions, which would be all covered by the term "responsible government."

Sir Hari Singh Gour.] This was the passage I wanted to refer you to, Mr. Churchill—the speech by Mr. Chamberlain, now Sir Austen Chamberlain, the Leader in the House of Commons, on the 6th of August, 1918, Hansard, pages 1207 and 1208: "This year"—that is to say, 1918—"apart from the Secretary of State, who sits in the Imperial War Cabinet"—

Marquess of Salisbury.] Might I just ask, My Lord Chairman, for our guidance, is Sir Hari Singh Gour cross-examining the witness or cross-examining Sir Austen Chamberlain?

Sir Hari Singh Gour.

14,947. I am neither cross-examining the one nor the other. I am only questioning Mr. Churchill?—He is going to ask my opinion of what Sir Austen Chamberlain said.

Sir Austen Chamberlain.] Deal gently with me.

Sir Hari Singh Gour.] "This year, apart from the Secretary of State, who sits in the Imperial War Cabinet as one of the British Ministers dealing with Imperial affairs, India sits there in her own right, represented by an Indian Prince and an Indian gentleman whose distinguished career is familiar to this House. More than that, in the light of the discussions which took place and this year in the Imperial War Conference, a new recognition has been given to the equality of the Status of India and to her right of reciprocal treatment as between the Dominions and India or Great Britain and India and their respective citizens. In these matters within the last few years India has leapt suddenly into a place which is equal with other great portions of His Majesty's Dominions, and her representatives sit with them in great Imperial Councils just as and perhaps partly because, as my right honourable friend has said, in every theatre of this War her troops have fought beside our own and those of the rest of the Empire in defence of our common cause." The question I put to you is that Sir Austen Chamberlain was here dealing with Greater India, with the new functions and new responsibilities. Perhaps I may state, Sir Austen, that before you came I was trying to show to Mr. Churchill that we are not here dealing with India as if it were a single India. We were dealing with India which includes British India-cum-princely India and that the Government of India Act deals only with British India. I was trying to point out that in her larger conceptions of India the functions which she acquired were those of a character of a self-governing Dominion and that these functions were not merely matters of Status, but matters of Dominion Constitutional rights and that Sir Austen Chamberlain in the House of Commons recognized the existence of these rights which have placed India alongside of the other Dominions.

Sir Austen Chamberlain.] It is rather inconvenient, if I may say so, with all respect, to examine a witness by reference to the previous statements of a Member of the Committee who is not in the box. I was describing a state of things which then already existed. I was not foreshadowing a state of things which was at some time to be created.

Sir Hari Singh Gour.

14,948. I was only dealing with one aspect of the question, namely, the rights which India had acquired on the date when Sir Austen Chamberlain categorized her powers and rights in the House of Commons. So that India, as distinct from British India had in 1918 acquired something more than a mere Dominion Status?—I am quite content with the statement which Sir Austen has made.

Sir Hari Singh Gour.] But does not it amount to this, that India had acquired in 1918 something more than a mere Dominion Status?

24^o Octobris, 1933.] The Right Honourable WINSTON SPENCER
CHURCHILL, C.H., M.P.

Chairman.] I hardly think, Sir Hari Singh Gour, that you desire to press this question any further.

Sir Abdur Rahim.

14,949. I have only one or two questions to ask to clear up the position that I understand has been taken by Mr. Churchill. I am not going to deal with the question of Dominion Status and Dominion function or Dominion government or Constitution, but I should like to know if the responsibility for the government of India be placed upon Legislatures, Central and Provincial, would that amount to Dominion Constitution or not?—It would all depend upon the reservations that were made.

14,950. Supposing there were no reservations, supposing the reservations had lapsed or had been done away with, then in that case would it be complete Dominion Constitution or not?—I think so. I should like to look all round the question, but it seems to me that complete absolute responsible government without reservation of any sort or kind conferred upon the Ministers arising from freely elected Legislatures, central and local, in India would be indistinguishable from the Colonial Constitutions, the Australian and Canadian Constitutions, which now exist. I do not see the difference myself.

14,951. That is what I thought. I will just put to you the language of the declaration of His Majesty's Government in January, 1931?—But that is not the whole language of His Majesty's Government in 1931. Much as I differ from them, I am sure that it is not the whole language.

14,952. Once the transition period is tidied over, then in that case there would be the whole responsibility for the Government of India placed upon the Legislatures, Central and Provincial, and then in that case it would amount to Dominion Constitution?—It is very important, after all we have gone through and all the mistakes that have been made that there should not be misunderstandings. This transition period is used to try to bridge a gulf, which in fact is not being bridged, and it is understood on one side of the argument in one way, and understood or taken to be understood on the other side in the opposite sense. I think that is very dangerous. I take very strongly Lord Birkenhead's point of view: "Tell the truth to India." Whatever complaints you have against me, I will try absolutely to say what I think we ought to do and not lead to any misunderstandings because we have in our minds somewhat different interpretations.

14,953. If I may respectfully say so, I quite agree with you that you ought to tell the truth to India and we ought to tell the truth to England?—Quite right.

14,954. We ought to be frank with each other?—Hear, hear.

14,955. May I in connection with that declaration also remind you of the speech made by the Prime Minister? I am perfectly sure you have read the speech which he made to the First Round Table Conference at the end of its sessions?—Yes.

14,956. There he said that the Constitution which he adumbrated in that declaration on behalf of His Majesty's Government would give India the only thing that was needed to give India Dominion Constitution?—I do not think it was correct if he said that. I have not verified or studied his words, but I do not think that is correct, and I do not think the White Paper policy embodies or carries out anything like that.

14,957. I beg your pardon. He said the status of a Dominion. When I used the word "Constitution" I made a mistake; but if you take the declaration as a whole and his speech as a whole, I think you will agree that he made no distinction between status and Constitution government?—I am continually deploring the utterances of the Prime Minister.

14,958. That is another matter. Then you have laid down very emphatically and clearly that Parliament should not alienate its responsibility for the good government of India. I am sure you have studied the White Paper proposals very carefully?—Yes, as well as I can.

14,959. Then may I know from you, supposing the Governor-General and the Governors of the Provinces are vested with powers to legislate, to appropriate moneys and revenues, to pass any administrative orders, vetoing any legislation by the Legislatures, to overrule the Minister in any administrative action in exercise of his special responsibilities, which cover the whole field of administration, would you still call that abnegation of the authority of Parliament?—I think it is a course which, while not giving a real, full, effective satisfaction to the Indian political classes, weakens in principle and in practice a great many of the ties and controls which I think it is desirable for us to maintain until Provincial government is proved to be a success.

CHURCHILL, C.H., M.P.

14,960. I have followed that, but we have been told unhesitatingly by the Secretary of State that the chain of responsibility in the Provinces, for instance, would be the Governor, the Governor-General, the Secretary of State and Parliament, and then the Governor and the Governor-General are invested with all these unlimited powers over the entire field of administration, and they are agents of Parliament. Now does that amount in any way to alienation of the responsibility of Parliament?—I think it does, unless you take steps to follow up the quality of administration in the Provinces. One of the things I wish to see us avoid is saying, "We will hold on very firmly to those special points of British interest like the control of the Army, the finances and so forth, but as for the administration of the cultural and the social services, that is a matter which Indians can manage or mismanage for themselves." I should deprecate our taking that view, although I should like to go some distance.

14,961. Then just one question regarding the welfare of the masses. I am not quite sure whether you told us or implied that the interests of the political classes, or intelligentsia, as you may call them, are in conflict with or in any way inconsistent or in what respects inconsistent with the interests of the masses. I do not know whether that is your opinion—that the two interests are in conflict in any way?—I think, for instance, Mr. Gandhi's Non-co-operation Campaign or Civil Disobedience Campaign was one which did very little good to the masses and was a movement which caused a great deal of distress and did not achieve any remarkable advance or alter the basis of the controversy, as a whole; in fact, if it altered it at all, it altered it rather to the detriment of the side which he represented. That was a case where undoubtedly the Intelligentsia gave wrong guidance and where in pursuing their political aims they led great numbers of humble people into misfortune; that is only an instance, but I have no doubt many other instances could be adduced.

14,962. I quite understand as regards the Civil Disobedience Movement being against the interests of the masses, but may I enquire if you mean that the Civil Disobedience Movement of Mr. Gandhi was in the interests of the politically minded classes?—Those politically minded classes who took part in it thought it was.

14,963. Yes; but I should like to know your opinion, Mr. Churchill, if you will kindly give it me?—Very often one embarks upon a movement with the feeling that it will be in the interests of one's cause and after a short time one realises one has made a mistake, that certainly happens over here; I do not know whether it ever happens in India.

14,964. Then it is really a matter of opinion. As regards the social services, of course, you have read the Report of the Statutory Commission?—Yes.

14,965. And Sir Walter Layton's Report on the Financial Position of India?—Yes.

14,966. You may remember that Sir Walter Layton says—that was in 1930—that so far as the social services are concerned the activities of Government were practically nil—non-existent?—What are you referring to by "Government"—the transferred services?

14,967. The Provincial Government, yes, because of want of money, because these social services were in charge of a Minister responsible to the Provincial Legislature. You have suggested that there should be an Inspectorate employed by the Central Government in order to see how these social services are carried on and that the Central Government should supply the funds necessary for carrying on all those services; and therefore they will also have the power to see how those funds are applied and how those services are administered. I do not know that you have thought out whether it is possible for the Central Government with the resources at its command even at present to finance these services, or that they would not be obliged to resort to further taxation?—Of course, India is a very poor country if you take the amount of wealth to be divided amongst its immense population. Undoubtedly one cannot expect anything like the same high level of social service that you get in a wealthy Western country, but what I am anxious to do is to make sure that there is no retrogression, because that would be injurious to the hopes that are founded upon the success of Provincial Home Rule.

24th October, 1933.] The Right Honourable WINSTON SPENCER
CHURCHILL, C.H., M.P.

14,965. In the Report it was also pointed out that for the present, to make a beginning, there ought to be at least 40 or 50 crores available to the Provinces. What I am suggesting to you is this, that for that purpose it would be necessary to have further taxation, and that taxation would only be had if you got the support of the politically minded classes?—Whether it would be a good thing to have a great deal more taxation on these very poor people or not, even to achieve a somewhat higher standard of social services, is a very arguable question. I think it is quite possible that the very large masses in India would dread an addition to their burdens, and perhaps would prefer to wait in the present condition rather than advance forward. Certainly I think the Government ought to be very careful before it laid additional taxation upon the Indian masses.

14,969. The White Paper proposes a certain allocation of revenues between the Provinces and the Centre. Now take the allocation that is proposed for the Provinces. In order that the revenue that is contemplated may be realised through those sources I am putting it to you, Mr. Churchill, that you would require the active support of the Legislatures, and that could not be obtained unless the representatives of the people were able to obtain the consent of the people themselves to that taxation, and that could not be done by an autocratic Government in India?—No.

Sir Abdur Rahim.

14,970. That is all?—Thank you very much.

Mr. A. H. Ghuznavi.

14,971. Mr. Churchill, I would refer to your Memorandum, paragraph 14. You say in that paragraph that "it would be ungrateful not to recognise the very great improvement in the tranquillity of India which has been brought about during Lord Willingdon's Viceroyalty." In making that statement, Mr. Churchill, do you mean to say or do you imply that there was no such tranquillity during the latter period of the Viceroyalty of Lord Irwin?—Certainly. I consider that a very great change took place when the Civil Disobedience Movement was coped with and Mr. Gandhi was arrested instead of being invited to confer with the representative of the King Emperor.

14,972. I suppose you are aware that to a certain extent Whitehall governs the policy and that it largely depends upon the Secretary of State as to how he lays down the policy pursued. Do you agree to that?—You are really referring to the Secretary of State.

14,973. Let me refer you to the first paragraph, in which you say that you know all the workings of the Government in India and the India Office and you associate yourself with Lord Birkenhead and Lord Peel and others?—But you are asking me on a specific point. You are asking me whether the change of policy which occurred after Lord Willingdon's obtaining power was started by him or started by the Secretary of State. Naturally I cannot go into that.

14,974. No, my point was this. I say that to a certain extent Whitehall governs the policy of the Government of India by the Viceroy. Is that so or not?—The Secretary of State is in a position different from but in a way superior to that of the Viceroy, certainly.

14,975. But my point is whether Whitehall governs the policy to a certain extent. Is that so or not?—Much turns upon what meaning you attach to the words, "to a certain extent."

14,976. Are you aware that Lord Irwin's latter period of service in India in 1921 was under a Socialist Government and a Socialist Secretary of State?—Yes, quite. I certainly think that is a very proper point to make; not, I may say, a point against Lord Irwin at all, but obviously it makes a great difference to the position of the Viceroy what the position of the British Parliament is, I quite agree.

Mr. A. H. Ghuznavi.] Therefore any weakness which Lord Irwin might have shown in his administration was perhaps the result of the policy laid down by the Socialist Government and the Socialist Secretary of State?

Lord Irwin.] My Lord Chairman, as I seem to be an unwilling subject of this discussion, may I make it plain once for all that I accept my full measure of responsibility for whatever was done while I was Viceroy.

Sir Samuel Hoare.] I was going to ask whether really questions of this kind have a very direct bearing upon subjects that we are discussing with Mr. Churchill this afternoon. I would have thought myself we were looking much more to the future than looking back to the past.

24th October, 1933.] The Right Honourable WINSTON SPENCER
CHURCHILL, C.H., M.P.

Mr. A. H. Ghaznavi.

14,977 The present Secretary of State is a Conservative. (To the witness.) You have expressed your gratefulness to Lord Willingdon. I think you should give a share to the Secretary of State as well^o—I certainly do and have on other occasions. Certainly I do. I think the Secretary of State shares in the credit for the improvement which has been achieved.

Dr. Shafa'at Ahmad Khan.

14,978. Mr. Churchill, you are here to represent your personal views or the views of the party?—No; I have no party, except that I am a member of the Conservative Party now.

14,979. So they are purely personal views not held by any section in England?—That would be a complete misreading of the answer.

14,980. In your memorandum, you have given a very brief description of the form of government you would like to see established in the Provinces?—Yes.

14,981. That description, if I may say so, is very sketchy. Do I take it that you agree with the principles underlying the present Government of India Act, except in so far as they are modified by you in your memorandum? What is the constructive plan of the Provincial Government as a whole which you had in mind when you sent in this memorandum? The existing form of provincial Government?—No. The Statutory Commission has proposed a very great advance in the Institution of Cabinets resting upon Assemblies in that way, and that is what I think we certainly should develop now in the Provinces—a very great advance.

14,982. May I take it that your memorandum is based on I should say, takes the recommendations of the Statutory Commission for granted, and supplements it by your specific recommendations?—In the main, my memorandum lies within the ambit of the report of the Statutory Commission with certain special points which I ventured to note by way of reduction from that position.

14,983. And I suppose you would say that those special points also lie within the ambit of the Simon Commission?—Certainly. This idea of having a deputy by the side of the Governor to whom the portfolio dealing with the police can be entrusted in certain circumstances is certainly founded upon a suggestion which, although it was not in the final recommendations, found its place in the report of the Statutory Commission.

14,984. Then your recommendation regarding the reservation of judiciary also lies within the ambit of the Simon Commission?—It always has been customary to associate the police and the courts together in their treatment, and I think the provisions which were indicated by the Statutory Commission, although not put forward as their final recommendation would equally well cover both points.

14,985. You think the Simon Commission recommendations implicitly contain within themselves the reservation both of police and of judiciary?—No, on the contrary, the Simon Commission on the whole were in favour of the transference of these two services, and I do not agree with them there. That is one of the points on which I do not come abreast of the full position of the Commission, but they indicated an alternative procedure, and it is that alternative procedure that I am endeavouring to bring forward now.

14,986. So that, except in so far as you recommend the reservation of judiciary and police, you substantially agree with the recommendation of the Simon Commission regarding the Provincial Government?—In the main, I am in favour of a great experiment being made in provincial home rule.

14,987. Then as regards the police, you must have read the arguments in favour of transference of police adduced by the Simon Commission?—Yes.

14,988. I do not wish to go over them here?—No.

14,989. I only wish to put one consideration before you. If you reserve police you concentrate upon the Government (the Government in the sense in which we understand that word now as something external, something imposed from above) or really the Governor plus the person in charge of the police, all the criticism which would be levelled by the legislative councils of the Provinces?—Yes.

14,990. Have you thought of the possibility of this criticism which will be levelled constantly, almost perpetually in the Provinces, and what will be the position of the Governor if your proposal regarding the police and judiciary is accepted?—I think it would be the lesser of two sets of very serious dangers. I think undoubtedly there are difficulties and disadvantages arising from the criticism, but those are not really comparable to the dangers which would arise, if, for instance, the Muslims in a Province thought they were not getting fair treatment in regard to all their daily life from a Hindu head of police, or vice versa. I think that is a very great danger and to have an umpire obviously outside the range of those great clashes of creed, race, and of history, would be a benefit and a boon to the life of the Provinces which would more than repay the Governor having to bear a certain amount of criticism by people who said, "This is your police."

CHURCHILL, C.H., M.P.

14,991. I am afraid I did not make myself very clear. The conception of Government held at the present time by Indians of all classes, not merely politically-minded classes, is that the Government is essentially police with a big truncheon. Government is identified so much with police that anything that occurs in the form of riots and so on is attributed to the Government itself, so if you keep the police reserved, you will make the position of the reserved half, and also of the Governor, so extremely difficult that I am sure he himself will strongly recommend its transfer?—But the most serious troubles that have occurred in India in the last three or four years where the police have had to come in have not been troubles between what you may call the political classes and the Government; they have been fierce outbreaks between the great religions, and there is where life has been lost. I should not doubt to say that ten times as much life has been lost in communal strife as has been wrought by conflicts between what you call the people and what you call the big truncheon. The big truncheon has been invoked, where it has been invoked, to try to prevent troubles between the two great creeds.

14,992. Mr. Churchill, you referred this morning to the Cawnpore riots and to other riots?—Yes.

14,993. As one who was in the last stages of the riot at Cawnpore, and who went through the riots which occurred two months before, may I tell you now that in spite of these riots, the feeling in these places where these riots have occurred is almost unanimous that the police should be transferred. Instead of that being regarded as an argument for reserving the police, it is regarded as an argument for transferring them in order that civic consciousness may be fully developed, and in order that the people shall be made fully conscious of it. That is what the feeling in these places to which you refer specifically is?—You have been giving me evidence, but I will carefully consider it.

14,994. I mentioned that to give you some facts?—It is a very interesting point.

14,995. You have referred to the need for grants in aid with a view to establishing the control of the Government of India over the Provinces through the system of an Inspectorate?—Yes.

14,996. I take it that the grant in aid would be given only by the Government of India if and when funds are available; am I right?—That seems quite all right.

14,997. Then, if the Government of India cannot find money, which it has not been able to do during the last 13 years, how is it possible for your system to work, and for grants in aid to be given to the Provinces?—Of course, I was basing it on the principle that some of the provincial revenues would be derived from the centre, but if you should produce a financial scheme which renders the provinces completely self-contained without receiving any revenue from the centre, the argument about following up the expenditure of public money would naturally fall to the ground. I think it would be a pity, because I think those who care about the success of home rule Government in the Provinces of India would wish to see the Government of those different Provinces co-ordinated with each other and with the centre by a helpful friendly administration, provided it was not too expensive or too elaborate, and tended to bring things together. I think it would be a step likely to shorten the period before the next advance could be made in Indian Government.

14,998. That of course depends on the proviso that there is money available. If there is no money then your whole scheme fails?—But please do not suppose that this argument applies only to this small helpful suggestion which I have made to free the Secretary of State from a dangerous reproach. It applies to every aspect that you are considering now.

24th October, 1933.] The Right Honourable WINSTON SPENCER
CHURCHILL, C.H., M.P.

14,999. I am only concentrating upon your memorandum and not upon the White Paper, and your memorandum does not point out ways and means for financing the Central Government in such a manner as to enable it to give grants in aid on an adequate basis to the various Provinces?—You say you are considering the financial question quite separately, and naturally I am very glad indeed to hear that. Perhaps when you are considering it you will just bear in mind the humble suggestion I have ventured to make here and see if you can find a little for that too.

15,000. It is not a question of consideration. I am dealing with the facts that from 1919 to 1932, the Government of India have not advanced any grants-in-aid. In the scheme propounded in the White Paper, there is no system of grant-in-aid contemplated?—All right. But I do not see that I am asked a question.

15,001. Let me come to the other point you have referred to, the question of the intelligentsia. What is your conception of intelligentsia? Are they mere intellectuals without any stake in the country, without any influence, professional agitators, or professional demagogues, or are they the men of the type you find in other countries? Take, for instance, the men who are prominent in all countries, landed gentry, professional classes, who are taking a very active part in a very reasonable manner in making the reforms a success. Do you confound and confuse the purely intellectual and the demagogue with those classes just mentioned?—No. I used the word "intelligentsia" because it has a democratic ring about it which might be agreeable, and also because it seemed to me that it was not an offensive term, but I think probably a better expression would be the politically-minded classes, and naturally they include representatives of all the elements which go to form the politically-minded classes of any country.

15,002. And the politically-minded classes, I suppose, according to you, live in separate compartments absolutely divorced from all contact with the masses?—Where have I said that?

15,003. You have not said that, but that is the drift of the whole of your memorandum?—The proportion of the politically-minded classes in India is probably smaller, in proportion to the amount of the population, than in any other community in the world, far smaller than the proportion in the Western Countries.

15,004. At what time does a person who rises from the masses and becomes a political leader, cease to be a member of the masses and becomes a politically-minded class?—Every case must be judged individually.

Sir Phiroze Sethna.

15,005. On its merits?—On its merits or demerits.

Earl Winterton.

15,006. I want to ask, first of all, my right honourable friend a further question about the fiscal convention following upon the questions which he has already answered this afternoon put by the Secretary of State and others. In the first place, I understand my right honourable friend's general position to be that the central Government need not be changed under his scheme?—I think I answered that question, and I must bear in mind the appeal which the Lord Chairman has made against a repetition of questions. I am afraid that covers me also in the repetition of answers.

15,007. I think if my right honourable friend will ponder over my question he will see that there is no need for repetition. I merely asked whether I was correct in stating my right honourable friend's general position to be that the central Government need not be changed under this scheme?—My answers have been given and are on the record, and I do not desire to add to them at this moment.

15,008. I am much obliged to my right honourable friend. I hope I shall be more fortunate in my second question. Assuming the answer to my first question is in the affirmative, does my right honourable friend mean that the Fiscal Autonomy Convention will continue under his scheme?—I have not said anything in any paper which I have written and submitted to this Committee which has raised the question of any change or what has been the practice for a good many years.

15,009. The answer then is yes?—The answer to that is what I have said.

15,010. The next question that I want to ask my Right Honourable friend is really a point of elucidation of two sentences which occur in his Memorandum. In paragraph 10, he refers to the "abiding inalienable responsibility of Parliament for good government" and he further defines that in paragraph 18 where he says the responsibility of

24th Octobris, 1933.] The Right Honourable WINSTON SPENCER
CHURCHILL, C.H., M.P.

Parliament for the well-being of the Indian masses may be delegated but is inalienable. May I ask my Right Honourable friend whether he would agree that, for example, the question of education and public health affects the well-being of the masses?—Yes; certainly.

15,011. Would he take it from me, as having some knowledge of the working of the Act so far as Parliament is concerned that, under the Act as interpreted by successive Speakers, it is extremely difficult to discuss in Parliament by question or answer, or in debate, certain aspects of the transferred Services; that, in other words, it is ruled to be out of order on the ground that these matters have been transferred to and are within the competence of an authority other than Parliament?—I do not think that amounts to any serious point at all.

15,012. Would my Right Honourable friend take it from me that that is so?—When you delegate it does not mean you are always fiddling and fidgiting and looking in at every detail at all. You say "Take this great sphere of work and may the blessing of God attend you", but if after a period of years you found things had gone very wrong, then, in my opinion, at the present moment not only is there the responsibility, but the right to come in and see that things are put straight, but naturally Parliament would not be debating the details of the education service in India upon the India Office Vote in the interim.

15,013. It is not a question of what they would be naturally doing or otherwise. It is a question of the procedure of the House of Commons, and if it be true, as I maintain it is true, from a considerable knowledge of the working of the Act, that it is at the present time impossible to discuss the working of these matters, then, obviously, in order to effect the change which you contemplate you will require legislation. In other words, you will have to alter the Government of India Act returning to Parliament the power which you say is inalienable?—No; I do not think so at all. I am dealing with what I may call residuary responsibilities which rest upon the British people to see that India is piloted along, to see that India does not get into the condition which China got into. I am not dealing with the points of order or procedure which allow particular topics to be raised on this Vote, or on that, nothing of the sort.

15,014. It is not a question of on this Vote or on that; it is on any Vote?—Or on any Vote. I am bound to say I see no point at all in what Lord Winterton says because, quite clearly, Parliament can alter its rules and its procedure if it chooses, and, quite clearly, Parliament can legislate if it chooses.

15,015. But you realise that that being the interpretation, it would mean an alteration of the Act to give back that of which Parliament has, rightly or wrongly, divested itself?—I should think this was by no means the time to undertake such an amendment of the legislation.

15,016. I asked my Right Honourable friend if he does not accept the position that legislation is a necessity?—If all you are wishing to do is to give me some information on Parliamentary procedure I can only say I receive it with the greatest respect.

15,017. I am much obliged to you for your answer. May I ask a further question which refers to the Witness's answer yesterday at page 1814. There, in reply to question 14,450 my Right Honourable friend said, "The view I take is that Parliament has to prescribe what it thinks is right and best. That is the function and responsibility of Parliament at this stage and if you are going to say that Parliament must not prescribe anything that will not at any given moment be accepted by the representatives of political opinion in different Provinces of India, then I could not accept that. I do not feel that that is a limitation upon the powers of Parliament which I could agree to." Now might I direct my Right Hon. friend's attention to answer 14,496, where he says: "Obviously, a real widespread solid desire should be met as far as it is possible to meet it without bringing evils upon the country." I am not quite clear how he brings those two answers into relation. I gather from his second answer that he would have some regard to what has been described in the course of question and answer this afternoon as to political opinion in India?—I have been answering questions to the best of my ability continuously for a long period of time, and whatever my answers are, they have been given arising from one state of mind. I have not been conscious that any part of them has been inconsistent with another, but, if that should appear when the transcript is read that will be to my disadvantage. I do not wish to alter anything I have said.

15,018. My Right Hon. friend will realise I am merely asking all these questions in order that the Committee may have the benefit of his answers. I am not anxious to score points off my Right Hon. friend?—My Noble friend has asked me to compare two sets of answers which I gave yesterday. At this moment the transcript has been put in my hand. If I am to do that, I must ask for the references and I must ask for a few moments to compare them.

15,019. I do not wish to press it?—What are the two points? I will look them up.

15,020. One is on page 1814, the answer to Q. 14,450?—Yes.

Earl Winterton.] And the other is on page 1818, and is in answer to Question 14,496.

Sir Austen Chamberlain.] Would Lord Winterton be good enough to say what is the contradiction which he sees between them; it would assist the witness and the Committee. I was not able to follow him.

Earl Winterton.] My Right Hon. friend may not see the contradiction that I saw. Possibly I am wrong. My Right Hon. friend the witness said: "That is the function and responsibility of Parliament at this stage, and if you are going to say that Parliament must not prescribe anything that will not at any given moment be accepted by the representatives of political opinion in different Provinces of India, then I could not accept that." My Right Hon. friend in answer to the second question said: "Obviously, a real widespread solid desire should be met as far as it is possible to meet it without bringing evils upon the country."

15,021. The first answer gave me the impression that my right honourable friend did not consider it necessary to take into account what I have described as political opinion in India. The second answer gave me the impression that he thought it necessary to take it into account?—No. These questions are questions of degree. Obviously, if a very great deal of satisfaction could be given by advance which perhaps did some harm it might be worth while to make the advance. If, on the other hand, a great many dangers and evils were open and not very much political satisfaction resulted, then I think it would be better to stay where you are. There is no inconsistency between them.

15,022. What I was really trying to get at was this: my right honourable friend, it would not be impertinent to say, in view of the whole of his political career, would be prepared to consult the accredited representatives of Indian opinion?—I certainly agree, and I strongly approve of the continual, ceaseless contact and companionship which grows up between British and Indian representatives. One of the difficulties in the matter is to be quite sure how far the representatives of Indian opinion can respond for the whole opinion of India; obviously it is in different degrees that each of them responds to it. Meanwhile, there are others who are very well known in India who take an entirely different view. All that has to be borne in mind, but that we should consult and consider as we are consulting and considering, I am in entire agreement with my noble friend.

15,023. I ask my right hon. friend how he quite reconciles that answer with what he says is his objection to the Round Table Conference. I will ask him if the Committee were to accept the same powers that he has put before us, there would have to be the fullest consideration of Indian opinion?—My noble friend introduces a new topic when he suddenly brings in the Round Table Conference. I do not think the Round Table Conference as such and in the form in which it was held should have preceded the presentation to Parliament and consideration by Parliament of the Report of the Statutory Commission. I do not think so. I think that was an unfortunate stage, but obviously it was intended that consultation should be continued.

The Aga Khan.

15,024. Mr. Churchill, you are aware that the White Paper Scheme is the result, not only of many discussions at the Round Table Conferences between the Princes, their Representatives, Indians of all sections of opinion, Hindus of every important school of thought, the official representatives of the Muslims, who have behind them the overwhelming support of the Muslim Community, the Sikhs, and the Representatives of the Depressed Classes and Labour, but that the White Paper Scheme has come out of a long series of public and private discussions between them, the Secretary of State, the Prime Minister, the Lord

24^o October, 1933.] The Right Honourable WINSTON SPENCER
CHURCHILL, C.H., M.P.

Chancellor, ex-Viceroy like Lord Irwin and Lord Reading, and that the authorship of this White Paper is really the result of the experience of people drawn from all conceivable elements that could represent India. On the other hand, your scheme has behind it for authorship a small number probably of experts whose knowledge of India is not up-to-date, none of whom has had recent experience of responsibility, and yourself who, in the midst of your many very important activities and so on, could not have given except very slight attention to it; and you have what I may call a cursory knowledge. Now of the two schemes, if you were alone asked by Parliament as a responsible individual which one you were going to recommend, which one would you recommend?—I do not think this matter can be settled at all by trying to pile up expert authority on one side or the other. This is a decision which is sought from the British Parliament, and the British Parliament does not consist of experts upon India; a great many of them have not had the opportunity of serving out there or of serving in high positions. It is a decision which is asked from the Sovereign Assembly under the Crown in this country, and I do not think it is to be settled apart from a free use by the Members of both Houses of their own good judgment. They have to weigh the different assertions that are made by the experts and high authorities on the one hand or on the other, and I certainly do not feel myself bound because two ex-Viceroy are in favour of the scheme to suspend the discharge of my duty as a Member of the House of Commons.

15,025. You have not really understood my question, I think, Mr. Churchill. Those behind the White Paper Proposals are not merely experts. They are, many of them, responsible to millions of people in India. The Princes are not experts. They are rulers of vast States, and they think that this scheme is likely to work as well as any scheme can work for India, as far as we can see. That is the Indian side of it, and they have convinced responsible British opinion. Are you ready to tell Parliament that this scheme has not any support behind it other than that of two ex-Viceroy?—If that argument is valid, why is the Joint Select Committee sitting?

15,026. The Joint Select Committee is sitting to sift it as far as it can, but it must pay some attention to the fact that the authorship of a scheme for a Constitution for India should have some Indian responsibility behind it as well?—I think all opinion should be weighed as far as possible, but I am not prepared in any way to admit that because these consultations took place at the Round Table Conference and because a lot of discussions have gone on between the Secretary of State and various gentlemen and notabilities and Princes, the function of Parliament is in any way impaired or the responsibility of Parliament in any way diminished, and I, of course, base myself upon the recent statement of the Secretary of State that we are uncommitted.

15,027. Would you say that it would be a good thing for India to have a Constitution in the authorship of which no important section of Indian opinion or Princes or classes or communities took any kind of moral responsibility?—It would not be a good thing, but neither would it be a good thing to establish prematurely a Federal system before the units which are to compose it have come into being and without regard to the solution of a great many difficulties attendant upon it. When I am told that there is a great body of Indian opinion gathered behind this scheme it is quite true that a large number of Indian gentlemen and statesmen are moving along in support of the scheme, but with very different purposes and with a very different voice, and a very large number of those who accept this scheme for the time being accept it only as an instrument of machinery to lead to something very much larger.

15,028. That is inevitable, of course. No scheme that had not the possibilities of a future development in it would be accepted. This scheme has those possibilities; it is not being accepted. The kind of people who are advocating this are not the people who want to use this only as a step forward for agitation. It is only a scheme out of which the country's commercial and agricultural prosperity could be developed further and general peace gained during the next decade?—I must take exception to my friend the Aga Khan's use of the expression that I have a scheme—that it is my scheme.

15,029. The alternative scheme?—The basis of the proposals with which I associate myself is the Report of the Statutory Commission which did not establish the Federal system at the

24th Octobris, 1933.] The Right Honourable WINSTON SPENCER
CHURCHILL, C.H., M.P.

Centre, but which did in fact, under some reservations, propose to transfer Law and Order in the Provinces. All I do is that I suggest that that transference should be effected only in the manner which I have ventured to define. Then there was this additional point about inspectorates which is intended to be helpful and to co-ordinate the working of the transferred services in the different Provinces, but that does not constitute a scheme at all. In the main, all that I have said rests entirely within the scope of the recommendations of the Statutory Commission, and so you have not a right to brush it aside and say these are only the opinions of one man, with a few aged Indian administrators whom he may have consulted. On the contrary, this is a Commission of Parliament appointed for the purpose; it went to India for three years, and saw everybody, on which the three Parties were represented, and on which the three Parties gave a unanimous Report. You cannot brush it aside like that.

15,030. There is another question. According to the scheme of which you approve there will be autonomous Provinces, will there not?—Yes.

15,031. Do you think that the present Centre, as it is now, with a sort of isolated Viceroy and Executive drawn half and half from Indian and from British officials, with a huge Assembly, always criticising, without responsibility, is a better Centre to meet these Provinces than a Federal Centre in which the Princes and all the important sections of Indian thought and opinion are represented and who are behind the Viceroy and in which he has got a much larger influence?—I have not the slightest doubt that the proposals at the present time to establish a Federal system for India will be fertile of friction and in inconvenience and that the existing system, in spite of its disadvantages is far more likely to enable us to get through this period, when the Provinces are being brought into existence as autonomous entities. It would be, in my opinion, a most dangerous thing to introduce a principle of dyarchy at the Centre and summit of India at this time. Surely it would be only reasonable to carry out one great forward step in the Provinces by itself and await the result of that step before the Federal solution is taken.

15,032. You think that the Government of India as at present constituted will be better able to deal with autonomous Provinces than a Government which has behind it the support of the Princes and the new elements that are being brought in?—You say the support of the Princes. I do not wish to go into that in very great detail, but I have heard a great deal one way and another about the support of the Princes and about misgivings on the part of the Princes and about pressure put upon the Princes. I have heard a great deal about that, and I am not at all prepared to assume that there is a fierce demand on the part of the Princes of India for this departure. When this matter comes to be debated in Parliament we shall then have a proposal before us, no doubt for a Federal Constitution. It will be presented in the precise language of a Statute. I have not the slightest doubt that it will be possible to apply to that proposal far more damaging criticisms than any that can be laid against the present system which, with all its defects, is at the present moment functioning and working.

15,033. Without the autonomous Provinces. With regard to the Princes, I will leave it to my friends here, but do you know of any individual Prince who would give way to pressure of that kind and would not speak up? Do you happen to think that there are any among your acquaintances who would do anything like that?—I was very much pained to see that the Jam Sahib was silenced by the Viceroy when he was unfolding arguments which seemed to me very right and worthy to be stated as a contribution to this discussion. It grieved me very much, and I may say the grief was widespread throughout this country—especially, when that episode was so swiftly succeeded by his untimely death.

The Aga Khan.] I do not wish to ask anything more.

Sir Samuel Hoare.] Perhaps I might clear up the misunderstanding that Mr. Churchill's last observation may leave in the minds of some Members of the Committee. The incident to which he referred was very different in actual practice from what he actually seems to think.

The Aga Khan.] Hear, hear!

Sir Samuel Hoare.] The Jam Sahib was under the impression that it was the moment at which to make a speech about Federation. That was not the case. The Viceroy stopped him because the particular speech was obviously out of order upon the occasion, which was the reception of the report of the Princes delegation at the Round Table Conference. I am not disclosing any confidence when I say that the Jam Sahib himself fully realised that fact and afterwards assured the Viceroy that he fully accepted his ruling, and he thought that in the circumstances it was a very good ruling.

24th Octobris, 1933.] The Right Honourable WINSTON SPENCER
CHURCHILL, C.H., M.P.

Mr. Isaac Foot.] Is not it right, too, that at the Round Table Conference the Jam Sahib was one of the strongest advocates of the Federal system?

Sir Samuel Hoare.] Certainly.

Witness.] But, after all, this speech which was not delivered on that occasion because it was out of order had already been published, and no one who reads it can possibly contend that it did not contain very grave words of warning, falling from one of the best known of the Princes of India, and I believe at that time the President—is it not so?—of the Princes Association.

Marquess of Reading.

15,034. Chancellor of the Chamber of Princes?—I beg your pardon.

Mr. Zafrulla Khan.

15,035. Mr. Churchill, I am sorry to have to start with just one question on paragraph 3 of your Memorandum, merely perhaps to enforce, if I have understood it rightly, the point that you try to make in it. My first question is this. I have not been able to follow the point you have sought to make in this paragraph 3, as to whether, even with regard to rank you mean that India should be given Dominion Status?—Is not it wiser to look at what has actually happened? We know what happened in the great Conferences during the War and at the end of the War. When the facts are so well known and so apparent I do not know that they gain by my trying to cast them into verbal form.

15,036. I am only trying to understand the drift of that paragraph. May I add that in addition to what you have said with regard to the nominal character of that rank, it is not merely that Representatives of India to these Conferences, and so on, are nominated upon the authority of the Secretary of State, but they are bound to give expression to the policy which is set down by the Secretary of State?—I did not say that because the very high-class representatives who have been chosen would not be merely Delegates speaking under instructions at all. Still, there is a very great difference between a nominated representative speaking and a representative of a Prime Minister of an autonomous government.

15,037. What I was trying to put to you was this. As a matter of purely constitutional fact, the constitutional position is that they must give expression to the policy as settled by the Secretary of State; the foreign policy of India not being a subject upon which people can make their own pronouncements, it being a Reserved Subject?—I think that is true in the main.

15,038. Then leaving that matter aside, may I call your attention to paragraph 9 of your Memorandum. You have expressed an apprehension in the beginning of that paragraph that an extension of self-government is likely to lead to a sensible deterioration in the services, but during the course of your evidence here you have supported that by saying that there has been such deterioration already under the existing system of Reforms; you have also explained that by deterioration you mean not so much in personnel but in the services rendered. My question is that it would be clearer to us as to what was exactly meant by that, that there has been deterioration in the services rendered, if you gave the Committee an instance or two of what you exactly mean?—I have already said that I am not proposing to frame a particular indictment against any service or any Province at all. I make a general statement, not a violent statement at all, that there has been a deterioration. I may be right, I may also be wrong, but anyhow I have given my opinion, and I have no further evidence to give upon that point.

15,039. Would you be prepared to accept the opinion of some distinguished Indian administrator if you found that with regard to the Province of which he may have had some experience he was of the opinion that there had been progress and efficiency in the administration of these transferred departments in achieving the results that they are designed to achieve during the period of the Montagu-Chelmsford Scheme of Reforms?—I should receive such a statement with great interest and attention and with pleasure.

24^o October, 1933.] The Right Honourable WINSTON SPENCER
CHURCHILL, C.H., M.P.

15,040. Having regard to the difficulty that you have once or twice expressed with regard to locating exactly which particular officer was meant, I was wondering whether you had heard the name of a distinguished administrator in India called Sir Michael O'Dwyer?—Yes, I have.

15,041. May I draw your attention to what he said in this connection with regard to the Punjab while giving evidence before this Committee? I shall proceed to give you in very brief words a summary of what Sir Michael O'Dwyer has stated in his evidence, which is printed at pages 118 and subsequent pages of Volume II (a) of the Proceedings of this Committee. He was asked a question as to what he meant by progressive administration, as he had said that that was one of the tests of advance, and he defined this expression as being "developing the resources of a country, like developing railways, public works, hydro-electric works and so on," and then he added: "Great works have been carried out in the Punjab about which you know more than I"—meaning that as he had not been in the Province actually during the working of the Reforms probably the questioner had a better knowledge of these things. Then he went on to add in various parts of his evidence: "As regards elementary education there has been enormous improvement." Then he went on to say: "There has been a great development with regard to the education of girls." That is one of the most satisfactory achievements. Then with regard to hydro-electric schemes he admitted that a great scheme of that kind had been carried out in the Punjab during this period of Reforms with the sanction of a fund granted by the Legislative Council. Then he was asked: "What is your opinion with regard to the development and improvement of communications in the Punjab during the last 14 years?" He said: "There has been a great improvement undoubtedly. I have not been there since 1920, but I understand there has been a great improvement." Then he was asked: "And also with regard to public health and medical relief?" He said: "There has been a great extension of dispensaries. You had a very go-ahead Council in the Punjab and they were carried through. They were all improvements." Then a question was put: "With regard to the progressive administration, may I take it that your view is that the Punjab has, under the Montagu-Chelmsford Scheme of Reforms, given an example of progressive administration?" The reply is: "I think so, with the agency of the All India services." After hearing the views expressed by Sir Michael O'Dwyer, would you agree that on the whole with regard to matters as to which he has given evidence there has been a great improvement in that Province during the Reforms?—I certainly attach great importance to the views of Sir Michael O'Dwyer, and I am very glad to see the importance which is attached to them on this Committee.

15,042. Perhaps you would attach importance to them coming from that quarter rather than from any other quarter?—I think it is all the more remarkable that a man who is expressing such an authoritative opinion based upon such wide knowledge and in such a fair-minded manner should have come to the conclusion which we know he has upon the general policy. I feel much fortified in my view about that.

15,043. I will not proceed to argue matters with you, Mr. Churchill, but I thought perhaps I had better give you authorities to which you would be disposed to attach importance?—I am very much obliged.

15,044. Then you go on to say in that paragraph that "how any Indian gentleman or notable can suggest that the government of these Provinces—great countries almost as large and as populous as France, Spain or Italy—is not a majestic task cannot be conceived." May I suggest to you that put in that way your scheme is not properly described in this sentence? You do not propose to entrust the government of these Provinces, great countries almost as large and as populous as France, Spain or Italy, to Indians in a responsible manner, and I proceed to put these considerations to you. The government of France, Spain or Italy is not a proper comparison with regard to the government of the Provinces as you suggest for this reason. Is it not a great factor in the government of a country to provide for its defence?—I did not say that the scheme of Provincial Home Rule would be similar to the rights enjoyed by the Sovereign States of Europe. Obviously I was not doing that, but I was saying that the sizes of these great Provinces and their populations corresponded to the States of Europe and that the functions which would be attributed to them under the self-governing scheme would be functions which ought to claim the earnest enthusiasm and interest of the Indian notables and gentlemen.

CHURCHILL, C.H., M.P.

15,045. May I assume that under your scheme the Provinces would have no control over these matters. Defence, external policy, railways, currency, customs, Post Office?—I demur altogether to the suggestion that it is my scheme I have already in answering His Highness said that I am not putting forward a scheme at all. I am only making a few modifications upon the Report of the Statutory Commission. That is all I am doing.

15,046. Under the scheme that you support, let us say?—That I support, yes, but the White Paper does not hand over defence to the Provinces.

15,047. No; it does not?—Nor even to the Centre.

15,048. Most certainly not, and if anybody says that the task that the White Paper proposes to entrust to Indians is as majestic as, say, the government of Switzerland, I would say it was not a correct description. I do not say that the White Paper does it?—No, but the well-being of the people in the Punjab or in Bengal or in Madras is a tremendous task and ought not to be disparaged as unhappily it is disparaged, by the advocates who wish to go a little further. It is a tremendous thing in itself.

15,049. Does not the well-being of the people of a country depend to a very large extent on the extension of what are known as the beneficent activities of the Government: Education, Communications, Medical Relief, Public Health, Veterinary Services, and so on?—Yes, provided the taxes have not got to be made too high for the country.

15,050. That is the next thing to which I was coming—provided the taxes are not made too high. Therefore, you can provide these benefits only if you can devise means to add to the taxable capacity of the people so that even with light taxation you may have a reasonable yield in the Revenue?—I do not know how you do add to the taxable capacity of the people. I do not know how you mean "add to the taxable capacity of the people" except by their becoming more wealthy, or else if you mean that a Government based upon democratic electioneering would be able to wring more money out of them, it may be true or it may not—I do not know.

15,051. I have not said so at all. What I mean is this: Would not the obvious way be to promote the development of agriculture, commerce and industry and would not this depend to a very large extent upon tariff policy, upon the provision of a means of transport, upon questions of currency, upon the level of prices?—All that seems perfectly true.

15,052. That being so, you propose that all these factors, upon which the prosperity of the Provinces would depend, should be reserved at the Centre?—That is the Government's Scheme.

15,053. No; that is not the Government's Scheme, excuse me. The Government's Scheme is, under the White Paper, to transfer railways and finance under certain safeguards?—Yes, under certain safeguards.

15,054. Therefore, the Government's Scheme would certainly be more responsive in its operation in these fields than the scheme whose support you are advocating here?—You mean the Statutory Commission Scheme?

15,055. Whichever it is, with your modifications?—With my modifications.

15,056. Then I put it that it is unfair to say that the Statutory Scheme with your modifications gives the Provinces a field of autonomy in which responsible Ministers can show their capacity for self-government by improving these Provincial Services when the means of improving them will all be controlled by a Reserved Centre. It is not a fair experiment?—I am not sure that the criticism applies to what I have said. I propose certain derogations from the Statutory Commission's Recommendations. The Government have proposed some additions to the Statutory Commission's Recommendations, but I have not expressed any opinion upon these particular arrangements in regard to railways, and so forth, to which you are referring.

15,057. But you want everything reserved to the Centre, do you not, Mr. Winston Churchill?—I must refer you to the safeguards to which the Secretary of State attaches so much importance.

15,058. I will not keep you upon the subject more than to say that it is a task, no doubt, but it is a task with the majesty taken out of it?—I do not agree there at all.

24th October, 1933.] The Right Honourable WINSTON SPENCER
CHURCHILL, C.H., M.P.

15,059. I am sure you do not?—I think there is no task which has more majesty than the administering to the well-being of very large masses of poor people.

15,060. That is so, with the means of having more money to administer to those needs to a satisfactory degree. Asking your attention to your next paragraph 10, apart from the two general statements made in the first and the second conditions laid down by you, you propose two modifications. May I ask you this general question with regard to this paragraph first. Do you think that what you propose in these two paragraphs, the third and fourth sub-paragraphs of paragraph 10 is an advance upon the present system of responsible government in the Provinces, or whether it lays further restrictions upon responsibility in the Provinces than are laid by the present Constitution which is in operation?—I think it would constitute an advance.

15,061. Very good. Now, let us take No. 3—your suggestion with regard to one or more Deputy-Governors. You say the Governor should have associated with him one or more Deputy-Governors appointed by the Crown on the advice of British Ministers to whom he may when and where expedient entrust the control of the Judiciary and also of the Police, unless it is found possible to organise the Police as an Imperial Service?—Yes.

15,062. In those cases where the Governor did find it so expedient would the Deputy-Governor, according to you, be or not be a Member of the Legislature? Supposing your suggestion was accepted and a Deputy-Governor was appointed in a certain Province and the Governor thought fit to entrust the portfolio of law and order, including justice, to him, what do you suggest—whether the Deputy-Governor should or should not be a Member of the Provincial Legislature?—I think it is a matter to decide when you came to elaborate the Proposals. He might be or he might not. A solution would be possible either way.

15,063. Could you suggest a solution?—At any rate, it would be to the advantage of the Legislature that he should be present there at their debate, and in the same way, I believe, as Ministers of the Central Government now attend from time to time sittings of the Central Assembly, but I certainly should not think that it would be necessary for him to be elected by the process of having a Constituency.

15,064. Of course not. If he was to be appointed by His Majesty on the advice of his British Ministers he could not as well be elected by a Constituency. That is perfectly obvious?—He could. Some of us have been appointed Ministers by His Majesty and then have been elected by a Constituency.

15,065. He might be appointed and then he might conceivably be elected by a Constituency?—Yes.

15,066. If he was an elected Member already, would you propose that he should continue to represent his Constituency as well as be Deputy-Governor, or would he have to resign his seat as an elected Member of the Legislature?—I have said that if the Joint Committee desired more precise details on these general proposals which I have put forward, I should like to have notice and present that branch of the topic with all the proper forethought and elaboration which it deserves. I do not think I will attempt to solve Constitutional propositions by question and answer, because I do not think that would be helpful; I do not think I should be giving you any valuable assistance in your task.

15,067. It is very important for this reason, that in order to understand all the implications of your suggestion on this point it is necessary to visualise as to how it would work in practice, and if at this stage you are not in your own mind clear as to how it would work in practice no doubt the Committee might be able to get the detail out of you after notice, but we who are shortly returning to India will not be able to appreciate it at its proper value?—Mr. Zafrulla Khan, the germ of this proposal was contained in the Report of the Statutory Commission. I have not got the reference, and I cannot put my finger on it at the moment.

Marquess of Reading.

15,068. I can give it to you if you want it?—You are no doubt familiar with the passage. You have upon this body a number of those who served upon that Commission, and no doubt they could tell you what was in their minds, but in principle I do not think I need go further than to say that the Governor, who is at present almost the sole British representative on the spot of the Crown, should have with him a colleague who would be nominated as he was on the authority of the Secretary of State, who would be his deputy when he wanted to be away, who would be his aide and assistant when he was administering, and to whom these functions with regard to the police could be entrusted. There is nothing very far-fetched or extraordinary about that. That would obviously mean that he would come to the Assembly and be criticised by the Assembly and give reasons to the Assembly. It would mean that he would sit in the Council when the Governor was present and discuss matters and would generally be a friend and colleague of those who were carrying on the responsible government. I do not see that it is necessary to add any more to that.

24th October, 1933.] The Right Honourable WINSTON SPENCER
CHURCHILL, C.H., M.P.

Archbishop of Canterbury.

15,069. May I just ask, to implement that, Mr. Churchill, this question You speak in the plural. Do you contemplate more than one of these Deputies, as you call them?—Well, of course, I said one or more, because the strain of the Indian climate takes a great toll, and Governors have to go on leave. The strain of government continually increases. I should like to see that element represented as strongly as possible, but that is not inherent in the point of having a nominated Minister or member to whom the control of the police can be delegated.

15,070. If there are more than one then you begin to have an official bloc open to all the criticism that it has received?—Yes; but in the Cabinet or Council—it is not like Parliament—in a Cabinet decisions are not taken by counting noses or forming blocs.

15,071. But I thought you implied that these Deputies would normally be Ministers of the portfolio working with and in conjunction with the Ministry?—Yes, but it is not an official bloc in that sense, because the majority does not decide things in a Cabinet.

Mr. Zafrulla Khan.

15,072. Mr. Churchill, I did not deny that the germ of this proposal was contained in the Report of the Simon Commission. What I am afraid I have put my question on is the reason that, even when in the Simon Commission's Report it appeared equally unworkable to me, as it is now in your submission, I am trying to see whether it can be made more workable. May I put one or two further questions on the working of this in actual practice? With a deputy in the case of the appointment or a Deputy-Governor who was placed in charge of Law and Order, or course, the necessary result would follow that the Ministry and Legislature could not take upon themselves the responsibility of the administration of these two Departments—Police and Justice?—Certainly. If it were reserved in the hands of a nominated Minister, to that extent the responsibility of elected Ministers would be diminished.

15,073. And you would agree that in the case of a discussion in the Legislative Council with regard to something that had occurred or some omission that had taken place in the Department of Law and Order it should be constitutionally open to the Ministers and their supporters to vote against the Governor, as it were, or the Government, whatever you would call it in those circumstances?—I suppose if the Governor uses his special powers, the Ministry of the day might differ from him and express their opinion in that way.

15,074. And there the White Paper recognises that the Governor would take the responsibility upon himself?—Yes.

15,075. But here I am submitting to you that it is not only with regard to the special reservations, but over the whole field of Law and Order the Ministry would not be responsible and could whenever there was a discussion, either take up a neutral attitude, or it would not be a case of the Governor overriding them under the powers of the Constitution, but this is a Department for which they are not at all responsible?—We should have to face that as an alternative to the still more grievous difficulties which would be entailed in the transference of Law and Order and the Police in Provinces where the state of feeling was such that very great disorders might arise.

15,076. Take another aspect of the question: Supposing in a certain Province the Governor did not think it was necessary to entrust the control of the Judiciary and the Police to the Deputy-Governor, what would happen then?—He would be the Governor's Deputy and assist him in his functions and relieve him when he was going away and so forth. He would be his alter ego. It would be like the second in command of a regiment helping the colonel.

CHURCHILL, C.H., M.P.

15,077. One reason that you have given for making this proposal is that if there was a Hindu Minister and a complaint by Muslims that he was not treating them fairly, or vice versa, a difficulty might arise, and your solution is this: Supposing a difficulty of that kind arose with regard to the Departments of Education, Medicine, or Health, what would be your remedy?—We are going to make the experiment and we are going to run the risk, and we all cherish the hope attendant upon an experiment of that kind. Things may go wrong in education or they may go right, but right or wrong, they do not touch the very grievous issues which are raised in a breakdown in the forces concerned with keeping the peace.

15,078. So that I understand with regard to the other Departments you would trust to the good sense of the Ministers?—Certainly. I think that that only shows how important is the discretionary sphere, the sphere of responsible government, which is being handed over. We should certainly have to give that power with the hope that, in the main, it will make an improvement, but with the belief that in many cases there will be considerable difficulty, but, still, it should be tried.

15,079. Now, Mr. Churchill, at what stage, if any, which you can visualise, would you be prepared to transfer the Department of Law and Order to the Ministers in the Provinces?—I think that every case must be judged by the Governor and the Government of India as a whole. There are some Provinces where it might come quite soon, others where it would not be reasonable to do it for a long time.

15,080. If the Governor of a Province and the Government of India were of opinion that in a certain Province it might safely be transferred, you would be prepared to advise Parliament that it may be so transferred?—It would not really depend upon Parliament. The Act would have been passed and the Deputy would be there, and the powers would be exercised in pursuance of the Act. Certainly, if the Governor thought that it would conduce to public tranquillity and smooth working of a Province to appoint a Minister responsible to the elected Assembly in charge of the Police, that would not involve any reference to Parliament over here at all.

15,081. So that in the Statute you would propose that provision should be made that in any Province where the Governor and Governor-General were satisfied that the transfer might take place they should have power to transfer it without coming up to Parliament for fresh powers?—Yes.

15,082. Now proceeding to your proposal under sub-paragraph (4) with regard to the Inspectorate, you have said in paragraph 11: "The Government of India, collecting taxes with the British Army behind it as its ultimate sanction, cannot transfer large grants from the Centre to the Provinces"—except under certain conditions. I have no reason to suppose that you are not fully aware of the financial position in India and of questions with regard to Federal finance, but may I ask you whether in your opinion Income Tax collected from people working in a Province would be a Provincial source of revenue or an Imperial source of revenue?—It would entirely depend upon the services in the Provinces or at the Centre which were to be provided for. Obviously, the Provincial Government must have revenues sufficient to carry on their business at a certain level and so must the Federal Government. They have got to divide it between them. I should have a lot to say about the assigning of a particular revenue to particular purposes. I think it is a very large question how far that is desirable, but if we were to go into the argument as to the relations of Federal and Provincial finance now, I am sure I could not do justice to it.

Chairman.

15,083. Mr. Zafrulla Khan, I must adjourn the Committee. I am under strict injunctions from the Committee to adjourn at five o'clock. I propose to ask Mr. Churchill whether he can attend the further meeting of the Committee to-morrow evening at five o'clock, when possibly his examination may be concluded?—I am entirely at your disposal, my Lord Chairman.

Ordered, That the Committee be adjourned to to-morrow at Five o'clock.

The MARQUESS of LINLITHGOW in the Chair.

The Right Honourable WINSTON SPENCER CHURCHILL, C.H. (A Member of the House of Commons) is further examined as follows:

Mr. Zafrulla Khan.

15,084. Mr. Churchill, yesterday when the Committee rose I was questioning you on paragraph 11 of your Memorandum with regard to the inspectorate. You said you were not willing to enter into a discussion of the details of Federal finance, but, without entering into those details, may I ask you one or two questions to get your meaning clear on some aspects of this suggestion of yours regarding the inspectorate. You say: "The Government of India, collecting taxes with the British army behind it as its ultimate sanction, cannot transfer large grants from the centre to the provinces, except in so far as it is sure they are spent for the purposes designed and with reasonable efficiency." Do you visualise grants-in-aid from the Centre to the Provinces for this purpose earmarked with regard to their object?—I certainly think that arrangement would be beneficial.

15,085. Supposing that there was money available for these grants and they could be earmarked for that purpose, your suggestion would then mean that the inspectors would go and inspect the administration of these Departments only so far as it related to the expenditure of money which had been granted by the Centre to the Provinces?—Yes.

15,086. How would you divide up the system of inspection in that case? Supposing the Province was paying nine-tenths of the expenditure on the Department of Education and one-tenth came as a grant from the Centre, what is the kind of method you have in view for the inspector to follow?—He would, of course, visit, first of all, the Centre of the Government and he would discuss with the officials. It is probable that in nine cases out of ten he would not be put to any further labours; the situation would be satisfactory. The additional one-tenth coming from the Centre would be granted and we should have to take a step forward, but if it was found that there was a very serious retrogression in the character of the education in this

CHURCHILL, C.H., M.P.

Province then he would go back to the Government of India and he would say: "This Province is much behind the others and the reasons for the differences which exist are not sufficient to explain this. We suggest that you should write to them, point out the defects, and ask them to take measures to improve the standard." Then if, after a long time, they paid no attention, they might have to continue to manage their education without the one-tenth which you have indicated would come from the Central Government. But before that point was reached in ordinary practice local administration would be found anxious to put its position in good order. After all, it would desire to have the children well educated and it would also desire to earn this additional grant from the Imperial Government, and it is very likely that without any deduction being made at all a better state of things would arise all round. The case for Provincial Home Rule would be made more secure.

15,087. I am afraid I was not able to make my question clear. My question was this: Do you propose that the inspectorate should inspect the administration of these Departments over the whole field of those Departments or only to the extent to which money had been granted from the Centre?—It is impossible, once money is put into a pool and spent out upon services to earmark any particular lakh of rupees to any particular school or form of education. Obviously, their inspectorial function would extend to the whole service.

15,088. That is what I would have thought. Therefore, this inspectorate of the Government of India would have the jurisdiction to inspect all the Departments of the Provincial Government over the whole of their field, except the Police and the Judiciary, which under your proposals would be reserved?—In principle, they would.

15,089. There may not be necessity for a time, but there would be jurisdiction to do so?—I think jurisdiction is not quite the right word.

15,090. Perhaps you would supply the correct word?—Yes. They would have a right of inspection.

15,091. Over the whole field of administration?—Yes; but supposing they found fault and the Provincial Government did not agree with them, it is not suggested that they would have any remedy; the inspectors would have no remedy, except to withhold a portion of the grant.

Sir Austen Chamberlain.

15,092. May I put one question to clear up what seems to me to be a misunderstanding? When you were speaking of the money being allocated to a service you meant a service like Education, and you would then examine whether the education was reasonably efficient or was seriously retrograde?—Yes.

15,093. But you did not mean, did you, that if you gave a grant-in-aid on education that would give you a right to inspect the sanitary service?—No—only in respect of the specific grant

Mr. Zafrulla Khan.

15,094. But you do mean, do not you, Mr. Churchill, that these grants-in-aid should be towards all the Departments of the Province, and therefore the inspectorate should have the right to inspect all the Departments, except Law and Order?—So far as the funds were partly supplied from the Centre—and I think they should be partly supplied from the Centre—the inspection would follow and the measure of control would be obviously proportioned to the importance attached by the Provincial Government to the grant which it received from the Centre.

15,095. So that your suggestion is this, if I am right in understanding it, that if the Centre is able to make grants-in-aid towards all the Provincial Departments, it should do so and it should, as a consequence, set up an inspectorate with regard to all Departments?—If it were able to do so it would be better that it should do so, and the inspection should follow the grant.

15,096. Of course you are aware that under the present system with regard to the transferred Departments in the Provinces. Education, Medicine, Public Health, Public Works, Local Self-Government, and other Departments which are transferred, there is at present exercised no control from the Reserved Centre?—Yes.

15,097. And you would agree, would not you, that if your system could be followed and were followed then the Reserved Centre which you propose would have in these Departments that have already been transferred a power of supervision over the Provinces which it does not at present possess?—But then I think you must look upon that as part of the process which I hope will continue during Provincial Home Rule, of laying the foundations for a unified Federal system when Provincial Home Rule has been proved to be a success. It is a certain sacrifice in the absolute independence of the Provincial administration, a sacrifice for value received, leading up to an object which I understand is sincerely desired.

CHURCHILL, C.H., M.P.

15,098. True, Mr. Churchill, it may be a very good suggestion as you say, but to the extent to which I have put it to you in the previous question, it is going back, as it were, and will be a supervision over Provincial administration which does not at present exist. To that extent it will be a restriction of Provincial authority in those matters—for a good object, as you say?—Yes; it would be a step back to make sure of taking a larger step forward towards the effective unification of India.

15,099. Now, taking another point, as you have said already, if it were not possible to grant these moneys from the Centre in the manner you have suggested, the basis of your proposal falls and you would view that with very great regret, because then the reproach which you have been trying to remove from the White Paper proposals would remain there?—Yes.

15,100. Supposing it was not possible, in the nature of things, to adopt this suggestion for the lack of funds, have you any other suggestion which might nevertheless remove this reproach?—Of course, so long as things go on as they are at present, I accept the status quo. It is where these new cabinets are formed with responsible control of the Provinces that the new departure begins, and in regard to that I consider that the onus rests upon the Secretary of State and His Majesty's Government to provide a satisfactory answer to the complaint or charge which will be made against them, and is already made against them, that they are showing themselves negligent and careless of the well-being and cultural and social progress of the Indian masses.

15,101. You have said that you are willing to accept the present position so long as it exists?—Well, I am partly responsible for it.

15,102. I am going to put a question upon it. When the new responsibility of the Ministers begins you would wish to bring in a certain amount of control, but Ministers at present in the Provinces, who are in charge only of the Departments that have already been transferred are not subject to that control, as you have admitted, and yet they are at present responsible with regard to any new responsibility that arises under the White Paper only with regard to the subjects that have already been transferred?—To the Department?

15,103. Yes. I suggest that the responsibility with regard to these particular Departments will continue to be the same?—But the actual administrative responsibility of the departmental head for his Department, not the collective responsibility of the group of Ministers to a representative Assembly, which under Provincial Home Rule, will be, to all intents and purposes, a Cabinet for the Province.

15,104. Could you inform the Committee to what extent would the responsibility of the Director of Public Instruction in a Province be different under the new system from what it is under the present system?—He would be a member of a responsible administration instead of as under the Montagu-Chelmsford Scheme. He would not only be responsible for the management of his Department, but he would be a member of the Cabinet for the Province.

15,105. No, the Director of Instruction will not be a member?—If he was not a Cabinet Minister, it would be different. That may be a Department which was not included in it. There would be some member in a Cabinet for a Province who would be able to speak in the Council or Cabinet of the Province with regard to matters of education. We have many Ministers in our Government who have Departments under them of great importance, but sometimes they are not Cabinet Ministers. They would, however, be summoned to the Cabinet if their Departments were being considered and, failing that, other Ministers would assume the responsibility as Councillors.

15,106. The situation as regards the present Provincial Cabinet is not quite clear to you, if I may say so, Mr. Churchill. The situation is at present that the Minister of Education—you said Departmental Head—is a Member of the Cabinet. He will continue to be, and I say that the responsibility will be the same under the new Government; there will be no new responsibility added, and therefore the suggestion that, because there will be no responsibility, there should be no control, loses its basis. He is at present a Member of the Cabinet and responsible to the Legislature with regard to the Department of Education?—With regard to that Department, yes; but the collective power of the Cabinet will be increased by the establishment of Provincial Home Rule. He will be a Member of a body which has as a whole responsible functions collectively. That is a very different thing from being a Member of a body which is partly controlled by the Governor's Council and only partly controlled by the Ministers who are responsible to the Assembly.

CHURCHILL, C.H., M.P.

15,107. Now, looking at both these suggestions together (I have been asking you questions with regard to 3 and 4 separately) in case your suggestion was carried into effect, would you consider that any safeguards in the form of special responsibilities and special powers of the Governor would be necessary in the Provinces?—Do you mean in case of emergency?

15,108. In case 3 and 4 were given effect to—a Deputy-Governor in charge of Law and Order and an inspectorate; would you consider any further safeguards in the Provinces were necessary, or would you be content with these?—I take as my basis the Report of the Statutory Commission and I am contemplating the fabric of the Statutory Commission. I am not suggesting that those safeguards that they have proposed should be added to or altered at all. Their aim was broadly to entrust Provincial Home Rule to the elected Assemblies in the Provinces and to keep the principle of dyarchy out of the Provinces as far as possible, and to keep it out as far as possible is also my object.

15,109. Except that you would bring in dyarchy with regard to Law and Order?—That is quite true.

15,110. You would also impose as a condition of the functioning of this Home Rule approval of the policy of the Ministers from the Centre through their inspectorates?—No, not approval of their policy at all, but the power to withhold a desirable grant or to reduce a desirable grant; no more than that. They might say: "Well, we will do without your grant; we prefer to keep the service in its present condition." That would be their responsibility.

15,111. May I now draw your attention to page 55 of the White Paper? It is true that apart from the fact that your own scheme, as you said yesterday, is within the ambit of the Statutory Commission's Report, you have carefully studied the proposals of the White Paper nevertheless?—I have indeed.

15,112. Will you tell me, without reference to the Statutory Commission, whether in view of your suggestions in 3 and 4 of paragraph 10 of your own Memorandum any of the provisions of paragraph 70 on that page would still be necessary?—Oh, yes, certainly; my proposals are intended to be additional to what is set out in paragraph 70.

15,113. So you would require paragraph 70 plus your own suggestions?—Exactly.

15,114. Would you say that your Provincial Government constituted on that basis would be a responsible Government?—Certainly I should.

15,115. May I draw your attention to a certain portion of your speech, which has already been referred to, in the House of Commons on the 3rd December, 1931, at page 231. You say: "Internal security, in the ultimate issue, must be reserved. The protection of minorities must be reserved. The minorities in India, added together, are majorities, substantial majorities. They are entangled at every stage with the Hindus. There is to be no discrimination against British trade, and the interests of the Services are to be properly safeguarded." Then, omitting one sentence which has no bearing on this question, you go on to say: "I will not take up the time of the House in arguing how much will be left of responsible Government, or what will be the meaning attached to the phrase 'responsible Government' when all these safeguards have been given full and loyal effect to." Now my question is this: You have not explained to the House—perhaps you will explain to the Committee in answer to my question presently—how much responsibility will be left to the Provincial Government when all the safeguards under paragraph 70 are fully and loyally given effect to plus the two safeguards you desire to add to them?—I should be very much obliged if I might see a copy of my speech, if Mr. Zafulla Khan will allow me just to look at it for a moment, because there is always a difficulty in replying on one part of a statement without knowing where it fits in.

(A copy of Hansard is handed to the Witness.)

15,116. It is in Column 231²—I have refreshed my memory with that. Would you kindly tell me the question you want to ask? "How much responsibility will be left?"

15,117. You have there said, enumerating these safeguards as laid down in Paragraph 70 that you will not there argue the question as to "how much will be left of responsible government, or what will be the meaning attached to the phrase 'responsible government' when all the safeguards have been given full and loyal effect to"?—Yes

15,118. Will you tell the Committee if all these safeguards have been given full and loyal effect to, and the two further safeguards that you desire are added to them how much will be left of responsible government in the Provinces?—I have not been able to read the whole of the context, but I think that my purpose in speaking in that sense was mainly directed to the Federal aspect, and I think that the interpolation which I made there that I would not examine how much would be left of responsible government at the Centre is a point which in its place in the argument, may properly be used in respect of the Federal aspect; but, so far as the Provinces are concerned these reservations in Paragraph 70 are in the main reservations which only come into play when some exceptional state of affairs has arisen.

15,119. So it would be in the Federal sphere?—It seems to me that after these reservations had been confided to the Governor there would still remain an immense sphere of practical work and usefulness and discretion in which the responsible ministers could exercise their full functions and discretion.

Sir Samuel Hoare.

15,120. Perhaps Mr. Churchill will, not now but at some future time look at his speech. I think he will find, as far as I remember the occasion, that he and I were having something in the nature of an argument about the way these powers should be exercised. My memory if it is correct certainly goes to show that he was dealing with the Provincial administration, and, in any case, I would remind him the safeguards for the Federal Government are exactly the same with one minor exception as the Provincial safeguards?—No, I think my right honourable friend, intervening from memory, and guided by his wish to turn the point against me, has come down on the wrong side because I see quite clearly that in the passage immediately preceding this quotation it is perfectly clear that I am referring to the Federal aspect. I speak about the Statute of Westminster, and I proceeded to say how important it is for the House to read the Secretary of State's speech with all its reservations and safeguards. "He spoke of the army. That must be reserved. Foreign affairs must be reserved. Financial stability, that is to say the balancing of the budget, currency, the banking system—all these must be reserved," and so on. Those are the lines which immediately precede this passage, so it is perfectly clear that I am dealing with the Federal and not with the Provincial aspect, but it is also perfectly correct for Mr. Zafrulla Khan to say that the argument used in one sphere may be applied to the other. My argument on the second sphere of Provincial government would be that the addition of this inspectorate to follow up grants of money from the Centre, and the retention of the Police in the manner I have described, added to the safeguards in Paragraph 70, will still leave an immense effective sphere for the responsibility of ministers, and one which has only to be filled adequately to find itself constantly enlarged.

Mr. Zafrulla Khan.

15,121. That, of course, is a question of argument. With regard to this sphere of responsibility there have been many questions put to you, Mr. Churchill, with regard to the intelligentsia and the politically minded classes. I have no desire to repeat any of that but may I put this to you that whatever their standing, or their strength, or their influence over the masses, you will agree with me that those are the classes that must come in to work the constitution whatever constitution it may be?—Certainly.

15,122. And that if the constitution which emerges from Parliament finally is of the kind which the intelligentsia or politically minded classes think it is not worth coming into, not worth staking their credit in the country for, because it did not really place responsibility on their shoulders even in the Provincial sphere, the constitution would not properly work?—Of course, if the politically minded class of India, and all those innumerable capable servants and officials who have hitherto been the method by which the Government of India has been carried on, with a certain amount of assistance and supervision from the British—of course, if they all unanimously and unitedly decline to give their services, undoubtedly that would create a very difficult situation in India, but I do not contemplate such a thing happening. But I do not believe such a thing would happen or could happen except for a very few days or a very few weeks, because, numerous as are the official posts throughout India held by Indians, the number of Indians qualified to fill those posts is far greater (enormously greater) and I cannot believe with a fair offer being made and large new responsibilities being extended we should find ourselves in the presence of a universal strike against accepting functions of government on behalf of the Indian intelligentsia. On the contrary I think there might very well be immense eagerness to fill the places which were vacated, or which some refused to fill. There might be, so far from being a general abstention, be something like an ugly rush to fill these important places with the valuable services and remuneration attached to them.

CHURCHILL, C.H., M.P.

15,123. You will I am sure forgive me, working as I am under a handicap, English not being my mother tongue, and I repeatedly fail to make myself understood in my questions. May I make another attempt? I did not refer to the permanent Services which are filled largely by Indians; they are not, I hope, regarded as the politically minded classes who will have influence with the masses in order to work or not to work the Constitution. What I meant was that your legislatures and ministries in the Provinces whose, surely, must be the responsibilities, must be drawn from non-official responsible politically minded classes in India. Apart from the actual machinery of administration, if your scheme, as I assure you it will be looked upon, is looked upon by these classes as so unduly restricting the responsibility, even in the Provincial sphere, that they did not think it worth while to give up their ordinary avocations to come into the Government as legislators and administrators to work this constitution, will you agree with me that it would not be worth while trying to put into force such a constitution?—That is a contingency that might arise in regard to any scheme, and I cannot admit it is liable to arise merely because of the two additional suggestions which I have made, but if it did arise and there was a general disinclination on the part of the political classes to work the political part of the Provincial administration, then, of course, we should have to carry on as we have done for a great many years with great success, and for the time being we should have, as it were, to hold these powers, which were disdained or rejected, in trust until such time as opinion changed and people came forward anxious to exercise them. I have not, of course, all the details in my mind, but I believe there have been occasions when some of these bodies have failed to function, and when the Governor and officials have had to carry on without their aid and I believe they carried on extremely well sometimes to the great satisfaction of the masses in the Province.

15,124. With regard to the earlier part of your answer where you say you do not think your two additions will make all the difference may I put this to you? I did not say that by virtue alone of these two additions the people will think there is a restriction on responsibility. My contention is this, that even you seemed to think when speaking in Parliament on the occasion to which I have already referred that this set of safeguards in Paragraph 70 in themselves was a serious encroachment upon the principle of responsibility and the addition of two very large elements (you call them small, we differ) in the way of reservation of Law and Order and supervision of administration from the reserved Centre might make those classes feel that those were the last two straws that broke the camel's back?—I hope it would not be so. I hope the camel would be robust enough to bear those considering that he was moving forward along a path that led to such pleasant pastures and grazing grounds.

15,125. Only one or two questions more, and I need not trouble you any further. They are these. Will you kindly look at paragraph 14 of your Memorandum?—Yes.

15,126. You say: "There is therefore no case for reconstituting the Central Government on the grounds that it cannot discharge its functions." Supposing the Central Government had not proved itself fully capable of dealing with a situation of lawlessness and disorder in India, would you think that was a ground for advancing towards Responsibility at the Centre?—Yes, but it would not follow that the method of advance would be by further extension of autonomous institutions.

CHURCHILL, C.H., M.P.

15,127. May I put to you another consideration under this paragraph 14? Will you admit that the legislature at the Centre has, in trying to deal with the situation that has arisen given all the necessary powers by ordinary means of legislation to the Central Government recently? It has strengthened the general Criminal Law of the country in order to invest the Government with the necessary power to deal with the situation that has arisen?—Of course I follow these matters only as a Member of Parliament. I have not the special knowledge, but, as far as I have been able to follow these matters, the action of the Assembly has been a real support to the Government during this period, and I am very pleased to see that that has been the case in many matters, in many respects, and that is one of the reasons why I am not so convinced as some others are that the present Assembly is a bad one and ought to be swept away and replaced by something quite different. I think it looks as if the Montagu-Chelmsford Assembly was not working so badly at all in all the circumstances from everybody's point of view.

15,128. My point is this, and I put this to you as having some knowledge on the matter, not merely having looked at the matter from a disinterested point of view that the attitude of the Assembly in granting these powers, and the capacity of the Central Government itself to cope with the situation, has been beneficially affected to a very large degree which would otherwise have been impossible by two factors. One is that the hopes aroused in India that it was shortly going to shoulder the responsibility of government on a full responsible basis in the Provinces and a partially responsible basis in the Centre has, to a very large extent, deprived the elements of disorder and disruption of their support. The second factor is that in dealing with this situation the Assembly, hoping that the new constitution was soon coming into force, has thought that it was necessary to arm the Government with those powers in order that it might deal with that extreme element. If this hope is now dashed I think the two great supports of the Government in dealing with the situation will have been withdrawn. Would that affect in any way your attitude towards the scheme of the White Paper?—I certainly think that due weight should be given to the argument which Mr. Zafrulla Khan has addressed to us, certainly due weight should be given to it.

15,129. My last question is on the last sentence of your Memorandum. "The establishment of successful self-governing Provinces must precede all question of their union in a Federal system"?—Yes.

15,130. What would be your test of successful self-governing Provinces, and over what period of time would you extend it?—I have already said certainly more than ten years, and, as for the test, it would be a matter which everyone would have to judge, and which would be apparent. If the services were maintained or were improving, if there was good feeling and absence of subversive agitation of all kinds, if peace reigned between the different races and religions in the different Provinces, and generally people were animated by a strong spirit of co-operation and desire to ameliorate the general conditions of those among whom they lived, and for whom they were responsible, and if everyone who looked at the Indian scene could say, "See how much better this is being done now that they have Home Rule in the Provinces" the further advance to unite those Provinces would be irresistible, but you cannot lay down any precise test and say there must be so many pupils in a school or there must be such-and-such a standard in irrigation, or in forestry. It is taking a period of time. Obviously after a time an impression will be made upon everyone, and upon the whole world.

15,131. I do not want to ask any more questions?—I would like to say, if I might, that I have not felt that Mr. Zafrulla Khan has been at any disadvantage through any lack of command of the English language.

Sardar Buta Singh.

15,132. I want to put one or two questions, with your permission. I want to carry a little further a question which has been put by my colleague Chaudri Zafrulla Khan, and I would like to draw your attention to an answer given to a certain question put by Mr. Isaac Foot here in this Committee, to Sir John Thompson and his colleagues, and I hope that after hearing that reply, the answer given by those men who have got such a great administrative experience, and a very recent experience in India, you might modify or change your opinion. The question was put: "What would be the result of the loss of that co-operation?"—"co-operation" means not working the scheme as you present it, that is to say, if the politically minded people are not willing to work that scheme. The question put was: "What would be the result of the loss of that co-operation?" The reply was: "I think the result would be a storm of agitation such as we have never had to face before." Then another question: "Would it be going too far to say from your answers to Lord Lothian that, in your opinion, there is no alternative in the future of India between a larger measure of self-government and Military autocracy?"—(A) Yes, I think that is true, but I do not think that Military autocracy would ever work in India under modern conditions?"—That is Sir John Thompson is it?

25^o Octobris, 1933.] The Right Honourable WINSTON SPENCER
CHURCHILL, C.H., M.P.

15,133. Yes, and Sir Alfred Watson, and Mr. Edward Villiers, and many other distinguished people whom they represented, who have got many positions, such as that of Governor of a Province and others, this is their opinion, that if people are not willing to work that scheme, there would be a very great agitation, a huge flood of agitation, I should say, and that would be unable to be governed by military autocracy. What is your opinion after hearing that?—My opinion remains quite unmoved because these gentlemen are notorious propagandists and agitators in favour of the White Paper. They have formed a small society, supported I believe with the patronage in one form or another of the conservative central office, and are actively carrying on a partisan campaign in all parts of the country in order to gather support for the White Paper, and although their words are no doubt interesting to repeat and although we must not credit them with anything but sincerity, I decline utterly to take what they say as gospel. Indeed, I should hardly have thought there was any testimony which should be more readily discounted than that which they give.

Sir Austen Chamberlain.

15,134. You are in fact carrying on a propagandist campaign of your own in opposition to them?—I am in fact. That is perfectly true.

Sir Samuel Hoare.

15,135. It would also be true to say, would it not, that representatives of your propagandist organisation have given a great deal of evidence before this Committee?—That may be so, true, but you would hardly expect to convert Sir John Thompson by reading out to him passages from my evidence.

Archbishop of Canterbury.

15,136. Are we to understand, then, that whether it be Sir Michael O'Dwyer or Sir John Thompson or anyone who has given the benefit of his experience to the guidance of English opinion in this matter they are not to be trusted and their evidence is to be discounted by us?—No, I did not say that, nor would that be, your Grace, a fair assumption from what I said, if you will allow me to say so. I am dealing with the point put to me as to whether my personal opinion, as one whose opinion has been known and declared, is likely to be altered or should be altered by the evidence of the protagonist on the other side. The Committee have a different function altogether. They hear all opinions, and it is their duty to balance them, but when my friend here invites me to say whether my opinion is altered in consequence of Sir John Thompson's evidence, I cannot help saying, and it would be dishonest for me to conceal the fact, that I have not felt my opinion at all affected thereby.

15,137. I thought you indicated in what you said that such evidence was to be much discredited?—To be discredited by those who do not agree with that point of view and who are engaged in this controversy, but I was not suggesting at all that the Archbishop should not weigh it and treat it at its proper value in relation to all the other evidence to which he is listening in this enquiry.

Archbishop of Canterbury.] I am grateful to you for leaving my judgment free.

Marquess of Lothian.

15,138. Mr. Churchill, are we entitled to take it that it would be legitimate for this Committee to apply the same adjectives to your propagandists as you have applied to the propagandists on the other side?—I have not the slightest doubt

25^o Octobris, 1933.] The Right Honourable WINSTON SPENCER
CHURCHILL, C H., M.P.

that Lord Lothian has already applied worse adjectives to them. Naturally I will weigh what Sardar Buta Singh has pointed out, and we all ought to.

Sardar Buta Singh.

15,139. I have another question to ask which extremely concerns me, being a member of the masses which are in India?—Yes.

15,140. I have been much interested in your evidence here, in your memorandum and speeches made by you outside—I should not have said propaganda. You claim to be very much interested in the welfare of the masses, and I hope that it is true and there is no mental reservation behind that?—No, none.

15,141. That is very good. I would like to put this before you. You have said that what these Indian masses require is "Peace, justice, hygiene, and scientific development," and they "form the sole foundation whereby not only the well-being and progress but even the very existence of scores of millions of Indians depends." I would request you whether you would be willing—because you say this is the sole foundation—also to add that it is not only the sole foundation but the Indian masses are also interested in many things, such as the advancement of agriculture, co-operative banks, the advancement of education, and one thing in between, because most of the masses you will agree with me, if they come from the villages, and most of them depend upon agriculture, are agriculturists. That you would agree with me?—Yes.

15,142. Then in that case those people would also depend upon easy accessibility to markets, and cheap freight rates, and also they are interested in the exchange rates?—Yes.

15,143. Because the value of their produce depends upon that?—Yes.

15,144. So you would agree with me that the sole foundation is not what you said but you would also include these things?—Yes, I would certainly add them.

15,145. In that case I would request you to remember that these Indian masses have got much to say as to the amelioration and betterment of their conditions. You would agree to that as well?—Yes.

15,146. Taking all these things into consideration—because I take my stand on that—you are actuated by very good feelings for the well-being of those masses?—Yes.

15,147. Would you agree that the masses should be given adult suffrage?—No.

15,148. Why not?—Because I think it is quite impracticable.

15,149. If it is practicable and if it is to their interests, would you or would you not agree to it, if it is proved to you that it is to their benefit, because in that case I would like to put before you that they would be able to look after their own affairs, not only the handful of educated people, as you appear to say, but they will themselves come forward, and will look after and take care of their own interests?—I think adult suffrage in India is outside any idea which anyone has put forward at the present time, and I think it is extremely arguable if it were practicable to have elections in which, I suppose, seventy or eighty millions or more of voters could record their votes. It appears to me to be very doubtful whether that would afford a foundation upon which good government would arise. Of course, we have to bear in mind how many countries in Europe have tired altogether of the Parliamentary system, have put it aside, have regarded the expression of opinion by the voting masses as leading to very injurious results, and how, supported by those very masses, they are almost everywhere now setting up autocracy and Dictatorships, we being almost the only exception.

15,150. It is not so in this country. You are governed by that system, and I am also looking forward to that system. I have got nothing to do with Germany or France or anybody else?—But still it is a movement of world opinion which I regret.

15,151. Then you so far agree that these masses have got much at stake and that they should be given much more power to manage their own affairs?—But experience often shows that when they are given votes and told that they can manage their own affairs the first step they have taken in a great many countries is to yield themselves up to Dictatorship.

15,152. But you say that you are prepared to make that experiment?—That really embodies the strength of the position I am unfolding. Here we have made that experiment; but how? Over hundreds and hundreds of years we have built our institutions up out of tiny little Village Councils year by year until we have got to a body of solidly grown opinion. That is why we must be so careful in India to begin at the top and build down and create institutions which even in this country are open to great criticism and are only kept in being by an enormous amount of comprehension and give and take.

CHURCHILL, C.H., M.P.

15,153. But do not you think that times and circumstances have already changed? Things might have been done in that way years ago, but in this Twentieth Century things are done very rapidly and differently?—That is just the point; they are done very differently from the Nineteenth Century.

15,154. I want to put another question to you. You say in your Memorandum, paragraph 8. "The government of India is mainly an administrative problem. Constitutional questions scarcely at all enter the life of the people"—Yes.

15,155. I would draw your attention again to a reply by a very distinguished administrator in India, Sir Charles Innes. He says: "The White Paper scheme is consistent with our past policy in India and with the pronouncements made by the Prime Minister, and moreover it seems to me to be correct in principle." This is the passage I wish to draw your attention to: "India used to be primarily an administrative problem; now it is primarily a political problem, and for the problem as it is now, the true remedy, if there is one, lies in responsibility." Again he says: "Moreover the White Paper sets out to range on its side the forces of public opinion in India without which, as already pointed out, no constitution can be expected to work successfully, and I attach the greatest importance to this object for two reasons. In the first place, the only permanent link between this country and India is mutual goodwill, and secondly, it is most desirable that we should switch the thoughts of educated India off political controversy on to constructive work of which there is so much to be done in so many fields in India." After hearing this reply, what have you got to say, because the reply I have read to you was made by a man who has got experience. As for yourself, as you have admitted, you have not been to India for a very long time, and here is a man who comes just now, and he says these things with his own experience, with his own knowledge of things which he has seen with his own eyes?—I could find gentlemen with just as great experience and just as great knowledge who would interpret the facts you have mentioned in a different way, and who would draw different conclusions from them. As between the different views of the experts I do not incline to the view of Sir Charles Innes. I am so sorry.

15,156. You do not agree with Sir Charles Innes and you do not agree with other very successful administrators there, but I may tell you that I am one of the masses in India, and I do want all these things, not only for myself but for all the masses of India?—The fact that you are one of the masses will greatly increase my regard and admiration for them.

15,157. There is one question which has already been put, but I want to draw your attention to it, Mr. Churchill. It is my painful duty again to refer to the sentence about the "sensible deterioration of services." I have given you plenty of evidence in proof of the facts which I wanted to prove to you, but you do not agree with me nor with those administrators, but here you make a certain statement. My friends have tried to find out whether you had got any instances or authority in support of it. You have failed so far to give any authority or any instance. I would like to draw your attention to a sentence which you yourself have so cogently put. It is the last line of paragraph 13. You say: "But the proofs must be facts and not words." Just as you claim that when we say anything we should give hard facts as proof, you have not given any proof. So I would request you kindly to take into consideration that you have not been able to substantiate this claim of yours, that there is a sensible deterioration of the services, and I would request you to modify that statement?—I have not attempted to do so with details, and if I were to do so I should require to present a very lengthy case, but I am not making any sweeping accusations at all. I have heard from various quarters and, of course, the Joint Select Committee will have to make up its mind about that, that there has been a deterioration in some services and in some Provinces, but I may be wrong.

15,158. Yes, you are wrong?—I am wrong?

15,159. Yes?—If that is so, I am, but I shall hold my judgment in suspense.

25th October, 1933.] The Right Honourable WINSTON SPENCER
CHURCHILL, C.H., M.P.

since you say that, until I have seen what the Joint Select Committee report, and until we have finished the debates in Parliament upon the Bill.

Sir Akbar Hydari.

15,160. Mr. Churchill, are you one of those who consider that the Indian Princes at the time of the Declaration which they made at the first Round Table Conference were stampeded into Federation?—I should hardly like to use such an expression of such exalted personages, but I think they were very precipitate in what they did. I think they took a course which a long view will show will not be in accordance with their interests as ruling Princes.

15,161. You are aware I suppose of the institution of the Indian States Committee presided over by Sir Harcourt Butler in 1928 and 1929?—I have not the details in my mind.

15,162. But you would I suppose accept that Committee to be a Committee of administrators who had very much a conservative bias?—I have not the personnel of the Committee before me, and I am bound to say that I am not at the moment familiar with the document from which you are going to quote.

15,163. Have you seen the Simon Report, within the ambit of whose recommendations you want a great deal, and rightly?—Yes, I have read that Report.

15,164. Then may I refer you to what they extract in paragraph 228, Volume II, page 195, of that Commission's Report: "We have left the door open to closer union. There is nothing in our proposals to prevent the adoption of some form of federal union as the two Indias of the present draw nearer to one another in the future. There is nothing in our proposals to prevent a big state or group of states from entering now or at any time into closer union with British India. Indeed, in the next section of our report we make suggestions which, if adopted, may have this result. These things may come. But it has been borne in upon us with increasing power, as we have studied the problems presented to us, that there is need for great caution in dealing with any question of federation at the present time, so passionately are the Princes as a whole attached to the maintenance in its entirety and unimpaired of their individual sovereignty within their states". So that this Committee actually made this recommendation and they sounded a note of caution because they did not want to disturb the Princes in their idea that anything might be done which might interfere with the internal sovereignty of their States. This problem, therefore, was before the Butler Committee, and if you were to look into it, they made several proposals with regard to bringing the two Indias into closer union in response to a demand which they said was insistently being made by the Princes themselves. Now may I refer you to paragraph 227, pages 193 and 194, Volume II, of the Simon Commission Report. I will not read the whole of it because I do not want to take up your time; I have only two or three questions to ask; but I would like to invite your attention to the fact that this Committee came to the conclusion that they could not proceed further with the consideration of British India's Constitutional problem until they had got in also the opinion of the Indian States, and they therefore welcomed the letter of the Prime Minister in response to theirs in which the Round Table Conference was suggested, and in which there were representatives of all the Parties. I am simply referring to this Statutory Commission Report because, rightly as I say, it is a document of the highest importance and to whose conclusions I for one attach the greatest possible value. Therefore, this was the position at the time of the Round Table Conferences, and if you will take this Report, paragraph 228, you will be aware that after reading this announcement of the Viceroy about the Round Table Conference, His Highness the Maharajah of Bikaner, who has been the Chancellor of the Chamber of Princes for many years, referred to the sympathy and support of the Princes which he believed would be forthcoming in a very substantial and practical manner at the proposed Conference, and added—and now his own words are quoted: "The Princes have openly given expression to the belief that the ultimate solution of the Indian problem and the ultimate goal, whenever circumstances are favourable and the time is ripe for it, is Federation, which word has no terrors for the Princes and Governors of the States". Therefore, does not this follow, that the Princes had been giving a great deal of consideration to these problems and that Federation

CHURCHILL, C.H., M.P.

was not a new idea for them and that it had no terrors for them? May I say that before I was sent out to this Round Table Conference my own instructions from His Exalted Highness the Nizam were also, after carefully considering all the pros and cons of Federation, to say that he desired—and I am quoting his words—“To an All-India Federation the attitude of my Delegation should be one of sympathy but also of wise caution”. So that you see before we landed here we were quite prepared to go into this question in all its bearings and also when we came here. Would not this show that any statement that we were stampeded suddenly is unfounded?—I made no such statement.

15,165. Then you would concede that whatever declarations were made, were made after due deliberation?—I have no doubt.

15,166. From several of your observations I thought that you were under the impression that the Princes had not carefully made their position clear and that they had come in by a sudden gust of impulse?—No. Of course, I could say a good deal upon that subject, but I should not be sufficiently sure of every word that I should say upon it before this Joint Select Committee to make me feel that it would be useful or me to embark upon it. I certainly know, of course, that Federation had long been discussed and three or four years ago when the Round Table Conference was set up there was a somewhat different atmosphere in Great Britain upon the Indian question from the present atmosphere, and there was I think more uncertainty in India about the whole position of the British Raj than there is now. It seemed to me that there was a great deal of disorder and disturbance there and there seemed to be a lack of will power on the part of the Imperial Government to do its duty and maintain law. In consequence of that it seemed to me that the Princes felt insecure—felt that perhaps there was going to be a great departure of the British, a relinquishment of power by the British altogether and in that case it would be necessary for them to come to terms with the new authorities which were going to rule. In that sense I think they came to a conclusion which has not been proved correct by the march of events, that they were misled in their judgment of conditions here, because now the position in India is very much better and those dangers which seemed to threaten us then do not seem to threaten either the British or Indian Communities now in the same degree. I am bound to say that I think the Princes would be well advised to wait until these Provincial Home Rule Governments have proved themselves living entities and there are these strong, prosperous, well-governed Provinces in existence throughout India which will be in a way the counterparts of the States over which the Princes rule, and then you will have all the different units out of which a Federation could be made. Therefore, I have regretted certainly that the Princes should have come forward at this stage when so much is unknown and unknowable and have committed themselves, or some of them have committed themselves, to this Federal scheme.

15,167. That is, of course, your opinion which we greatly value, but all that I wanted to point out was that the Princes consider this position to be in their interest, and if you are referring to the condition of things in England and to the Government that was in power in England when the First Round Table Conference took place, was it not also the same Government which was in power when the Second and Third Round Table Conferences took place?—No, it was a different Government, but it boasted that it carried on the same policy. In fact, however, it made a lot of strangers.

15,168. I thought, however, you implied, at any rate, that the Government that was in power subsequently gave an assurance of a different constitution or had a constitutional mentality different from what we had to face at the time of the First Round Table Conference, but is not it a fact that the Princes, so far from resigning, have continued to work towards Federation? May I refer you to a speech which I made at the end of the Third Round Table Conference, an extract from which, taken out of its context, has been very much misread. I said there in reply to the British Indians this. I was making an appeal to them not to suspect us with regard to the Federation and the way in which we had tried to make the whole picture more stable: “On the contrary, Sir, during this Conference as we of the Indian States have come up against difficulties, in the same proportion have we shown our desire to overcome them and to attain the goal.” I pointed out as to how with regard to the Legislature, taxation and so on, we tried to meet our British Indian friends as far as possible. Does not all this show that the Indian Princes felt that forces are moving so fast both in India and in England that when they have received an invitation to join in constructing a policy for India it should be framed on lines on which they could also continue to work, in which their connection with the Empire should also continue, and in which the legitimate demands of British India could be satisfied; and it is for that reason that the Indian Princes have come and tried to work the Federation?—I think they are judging the circumstances wrongly. There was another Party open to the suspicion of British Indians as regard Federation and that was the Secretary of State, some British Indians had an idea that he would use the Indian States in wrecking Federation and thereby deny responsibility in the Centre, and it was in that connection that I used the words which, as I have said, when taken out of their context, have been very much misread.

CHURCHILL, C.H., M.P.

15,169. Although you feel that English politics here changed so rapidly, as there has been a change, between the time when the Conference first met and when you thought that several of us came into it because we felt that the British Raj was disappearing. There is only one question that arises from your reply to Chaudri Sahib Zafrulla Khan. You said that the Montagu-Chelmsford Assembly was a very good Assembly and that the Legislature which is functioning now is a very good Legislature. Have I understood you correctly?—I said that in many respects it had borne out the hopes which its creators attached to it, or words to that effect.

15,170. Would you give an Assembly of that kind responsibility in the limited field?—No, I would not introduce the element of dyarchy at the Centre now with any Assembly, however constituted.

Sir Manubhai N. Mehta.

15,171. Mr. Churchill, in your Memorandum you do not, I am sorry to say, throw any light on the Princes' problems. You regret, on the other hand, that the Princes should have made up their minds to come into the Federation?—I do at this stage.

15,172. May I ask you in whose interests you deplore their readiness to help their country? I will put three questions: Do you consider that the Princes have walked into the parlour light-heartedly like the fly, or do you consider from the standpoint of certain British Indian democrats that the Princes' advent into the Federation has spoilt their idea because it has diluted their democracy; or, thirdly, do you deplore this attitude of the Princes from the standpoint of certain Englishmen who think that if the Princes had not come in responsible Government would have been denied to India, but since they have come in they have supplied the moderating influence and therefore there is no excuse to deny them that responsible Government? I should like to ask you from which of these three standpoints do you deplore it?—Naturally, I look at it, first of all, from the point of view of the Imperial Government—the British Government. I think that the British Government in India will be greatly weakened and that serious difficulties will arise if at the time that you are setting up these Provincial Home Rule Governments the power at the Centre is confused and divided by dyarchy, and, consequently, I am not in favour of the institution of responsible Government at the Centre now at the present time. That is not an extreme opinion because that was the opinion on which the Statutory Commission rested, and it was, I believe, also the opinion embodied in the despatch of the late Viceroy, or something very like it. That is my first reason; therefore, naturally, I do not welcome the arrival of the Princes to render possible or to bring within the sphere of action a course which I think will be detrimental.

15,173. May I remind you that this opinion is fundamentally opposed to the opinion of the Government of India themselves; they want the Princes. You said that the Government of India are exercising an undue pressure, or a subtle pressure, over the Princes to bring them into the Federation?—I did not say in this room undue or subtle pressure.

15,174. You said you had heard of it?—Pressure.

15,175. So the view you put forward as the Government of India's view is not really the view of the Government of India at present?—Of course, I cannot measure the relations between His Majesty's Government at home and the Government of India which they are so largely responsible for forming which is connected with Great Britain through the

CHURCHILL, C.H., M.P.

Secretary of State. I cannot do that, but I do not feel bound by the view of the Government of India. I take a different view. I think it is the duty of Parliament to survey the whole field. If we were simply to take the opinion of the Government of India I suppose we should have followed the despatch of the late Viceroy before the Round Table Conference assembled.

15,176. Then from the Princes own standpoint I thought you sympathised with them that they were being brought into the snare without proper consideration, that is, they had no time to think maturely of what the implications of Federation would be. May I in this connection ask you whether you know that before the Montagu-Chelmsford Inquiry, the desire of the Princes for Federation was before the Government of India and that in the Montagu-Chelmsford Report that fact has been referred to on several occasions?—I consider that time is the element that must be brought in in all these matters. If the great experiment of Provincial Home Rule were successful and these Provinces were powerful living entities with strong local pride and tradition growing up, and a system of government focussed around their capitals, then, it seems to me, you would have a similarity and parity among the units which afterwards if they wished would join together in a Federal system, but, at this moment, when we cannot tell at all how the Provincial Home Rule will turn out, and when the Government at the Centre should be very strong in order to guide the Provinces in their early days, it seems to me altogether premature from the Princes' point of view for them to associate themselves with the kind of Assembly that is going to be brought into being and in the face of agitation which is bound to follow, in the face of the very severe Constitutional agitation which is bound to follow the polity of the White Paper scheme at the Centre. I think it is premature for them to involve themselves in that. I think they may very easily find themselves exposed to subversive movements in their own States, and in the Assembly find themselves criticised for not giving a greater measure of contentment to their people. Whereas if in a few years' time and 10 years' time is very little in the life of great peoples, these things may settle down. One will know where one is. One will be dealing with realities and not with abstractions, and then it would be quite proper to follow on the lines of all that His Excellency, the Prime Minister, has said.

15,177. I am coming to that point of strong Provincial Home Rule Governments and all that, but, before that, I would like to remind you of the recommendations of the Montagu-Chelmsford Report. They appear on pages 192 and 78, but I will not detain you on those recommendations. May I ask you if you have studied or paid any consideration to the problems of the Princes that have induced them to come into Federation?—I have indeed given as much consideration to it as I am capable of.

15,178. Firstly, may I ask you if the Princes under the present Government have any chance of consultation or deliberation when large questions of policy are being discussed, questions, for instance, of discriminate protection that was adopted in 1921, or agreements as to Imperial Preference. On such questions of large policy have the Princes at present any occasion or any device by which they are consulted or can be consulted?—But surely it is the duty of the Government of India to keep in touch under present conditions with the Princes of India and their States and to make sure that their point of view is understood and the Chamber of Princes enables that point of view to be focussed.

15,179. But in the Joint deliberations they have no means to make themselves heard?—It is perfectly true that they have not an Assembly where the matter can be argued out as it can in the House of Commons or the House of Lords, but there are many most effective methods of bringing views to the notice of Government besides that of raising them in a debating assembly.

15,180. That was the very reason why the Montagu-Chelmsford Report suggests that on such questions of joint concern the Princes ought to be brought into something like Federation. Secondly, may I ask you if you are aware of the Princes' feeling, and whether you approve of that or not that in any concern a party should not be a judge and party in its own cause. Do you approve of that? In disputes with government the Princes at present feel that they have no independent tribunal. The Federal structure will give them the Federal Tribunal, and you say that they have prematurely come into Federation. If you deny Federation, will they be satisfied that they will have any judicial relief?—I think that they will lose more than they will gain.

CHURCHILL, C.H., M.P.

15,181. That is their concern, but that is your advice to them?—That is my advice.

15,182. Thirdly, have you thought of their financial problems. You know that a States' Enquiry Committee was appointed in 1928, presided over by Sir Harcourt Butler?—Yes.

15,183. And perhaps you know, the Committee came to the conclusion that in many matters the States had suffered and that equity and justice demanded that substantial financial relief ought to be given to them and that another Committee should be appointed to go into these details. Are you aware that another Committee presided over by Mr Davidson was appointed to look into these financial claims?—Yes; he went out 15,184. Are you aware that the Davidson Committee also reported that many States had not been very fairly treated, and large financial sums were due to them and they would be paid to them only if they entered the Federation. You now stop the Federation. What becomes of their financial claims?—As I say I regret very much that a Committee should have reported that large sums would be paid to the States if they came into the Federation and not paid to them if they did not. If that is so, I deplore it.

Sir Samuel Hoare.] If I may intervene for a moment I think Sir Manubhai, no doubt in the desire to put his question very shortly, has not correctly represented what was the recommendation of the Davidson Committee?

Sir Manubhai N. Mehta.] Not exactly.

Sir Samuel Hoare.] Not only not exactly, but not at all, I would have said. Mr. Davidson is here. I withdraw and leave it to him.

Mr. Davidson.] I think if Sir Manubhai reads the Terms of Reference of the Committee, which was appointed, the basis of our whole enquiry was an assumption that the recommendations of the Round Table Conference, that there should be a Federal Government, would be achieved; and the whole of our recommendations were based on the assumption that a Federation was the policy for the future Government, and, therefore, our Committee was bound by our terms of reference, and that was the basis on which they were made.

Sir Manubhai N. Mehta.] That is really what I meant, that if the Federation disappeared, then nothing will happen to these financial claims.

Sir Austen Chamberlain.] No; that does not follow at all.

Sir Samuel Hoare.] Sir Manubhai, I think if you read both the Report and the Recommendations of the Committee, you will find there was nothing even remotely suggested in the way of a bargain.

Sir Manubhai N. Mehta.] Not a bargain. I merely said that these different kinds of relief would be given to the Princes when they come into Federation.

Sir Samuel Hoare.] What actually was said in a single sentence was that supposing there was a Federation these kinds of payments were certainly a non-Federal kind of payment.

Mr. Davidson.

15,185. The crucial sentence is: "An ideal system of Federal finance would be one under which all Federal units would contribute on a uniform basis to the Federal Services." Then it sets out the task of the Committee which was to try and arrive at some basis on which the States would as nearly as possible conform to that ideal of contributing on a uniform basis?—Answering the point which has been raised, I said a little while ago, when I was asked whether I thought subtle pressure had been brought to bear upon the Princes, that in this room I had not used the word "subtle."

Sir Manubhai N. Mehta.

15,186. Outside; that is, propaganda?—But I think if what I have just heard had been before me I should have felt perfectly justified in using that word because it is perfectly clear that there has been in the minds of the Princes or some of the States the fact that they will receive financial benefits from the Government of India, I will not say as a bargain (No, there never are bargains!) but as a consequence of their accession.

Sir Akbar Hydari.

15,187. As far as I can understand, is not this so, that even without Federation, the Butler Committee reported upon all these very matters, and they would all have been adjusted?—They ought to have been.

15,188. By the British Government; all these claims would have been adjusted by the British Government practically on the same lines, but that when there was Federation in sight, the British Government did not feel themselves justified in coming to any conclusion or figuring out all those matters in such a way as the other parties to the Federation might not agree to, but there was absolutely no idea that without Federation the Indian States would not get the same amount of relief under those very questions which had been raised by them before the Butler Committee?—Exactly. I had not appreciated fully this very important point that has been put to me. I should like to consider it much more carefully. I think it is certainly a matter which should be opened up and ventilated in Parliament. It is a new point to me altogether. I had not followed it. I ought to have done so.

 *CHURCHILL, C.H., M.P.

Sir Manubhai Mehta.

15,189. If Federation is not brought about, where is the money to pay the financial claims of the States?—I understand that the new system of government which the White Paper embodies is to cost a good deal more than the old one, so as there is only a limited amount of money to be divided for all purposes in India, there will obviously be less means of gratifying the requirements of the States after the Federal system has been erected (unless more taxes are put on of course) than there is at present.

15,190 If the Federal system comes into being, the Princes are willing to forgo their claims for sea customs, but if you are not bringing in Federation, the Princes will naturally revive their claims to sea customs. Where is the money to come from?—I think the Princes should take their decision upon very broad and long views of what the whole future interests of their sovereignties in India are going to be, and I think it would be a great pity if they allowed themselves to be influenced by the fact that a more favourable financial arrangement in the next few years might be reached as a consequence of their acceding to the pressure of His Majesty's Government to enter the Federation.

15,191. As to pressure, did you come across a letter signed by Sir Akbar Hydari and the Ministers of several other large States like Mysore, Baroda and Patiala, and by myself, which categorically denied that there was any pressure?—It is not a point which is really capable of denial. Pressure is not necessarily illegitimate pressure. If I use an argument which has any effect upon you, that is legitimate pressure; and there is no doubt that when the Government of India and His Majesty's Government over here, the Viceroy and all the high officials of the State are known to be anxious that the Princes shall come in, the very loyalty of the Princes, their desire to fulfil what may be the general inclinations of the Imperial Government, constitutes a form of pressure, not improper pressure, although, as I think on this occasion, unwisely applied; but certainly one of the difficulties we have had to contend with in getting a fair consideration for the point of view which I represent upon the Indian question here, has been the immense, pervasive power of the Government, official and unofficial, through every channel and by every means; and you have yourself touched upon one I had not noticed myself before, in order to procure the co-operation of the Princes in the scheme; and then you tell us the next day, "But the Princes have come in, that changes it all, and the Princes stipulated when they came in that there must be responsible government at the Centre, so we have to have responsible government at the Centre," and the whole of this movement, as I say, is largely induced by the great and lawful and legitimate influence of the Crown on the loyalty of the Princes. I deplore it very much.

Sir Samuel Hoare.] Would the representatives of the Princes here substantiate what Mr. Churchill has just said, namely, that the action of the Princes was due to pressure, direct or indirect, from here.

Sir Manubhai N. Mehta.

15,192. We deny it absolutely, categorically, as quoted by Sir Akbar Hydari from Sir John Simon's report. His Highness the Marajah of Bikaner several months before the Round Table Conference, anticipated that there would be the only solution which was the Federal solution, and he advised his friends that Federation must be accepted. That was the only destiny for the Princes, and Federation had no fear or threat for them. Notwithstanding that, I cannot understand why it is repeatedly said that pressure is being exercised upon Princes by the Government?—I do not wish to press this point here, because it would I think lead me into friction and controversy beyond those limits which are appropriate in this Committee, and, therefore, I will, if I

25^o Octobris, 1933.] The Right Honourable WINSTON SPENCER
CHURCHILL, C.H., M.P.

may be excused by you, my Lord Chairman, not develop any further evidence upon this point. [I will reserve what I have to say for the House of Commons, in which this whole position must be examined, and in which I am prepared to substantiate what I have suggested, that pressure has been applied.]

Mr. Y. Thombare.] May I join Sir Manubhai in his repudiation of pressure? As a matter of fact, the proposals of the Davidson Committee came at a very late stage, and the desire of the Princes to join the Federation had been expressed much earlier and that itself is a proof.

Sir Akbar Hydari.] May I also state that so far from there being any pressure from the political department of the Government of India on the different States, in favour of Federation, I believe British India at any rate was afraid that the pressure would be exerted the other way, in tearing up Federation, and that was what I was referring to in my speech. I think that the Government of India in this matter have really—let me assure you, Mr. Churchill—behaved with absolute impartiality in their Political Department as trustees of the Indian Department, as they have always been, and as advisers when advice was sought.

Sir Manubhai N. Mehta.

15,193. I have two questions to ask you, Mr. Churchill. You thought that the Princes would do wisely if they came into a Federation when Provincial autonomy or Provincial Home Rule had worked satisfactorily and the Provinces had become strong?—Yes.

15,194. Are you aware that between the Princes and the Provinces there are many financial claims that are in conflict and the more the Provinces increase in strength the less chance there is for the Princes to get justice?—I am afraid that argument would not lead me to alter any of the answers I have given.

Sir Manubhai N. Mehta.] Are you aware that there is no Political Department to protect the Princes in the Provinces?

Marquess of Reading.

15,195. Is that right?—I still think the Princes' interest will be better safeguarded in the infancy of Provincial institutions by their contact with the Viceroy and the Government of India.

Marquess of Reading.] Surely you are not justified in making the statement, Sir Manubhai, are you, that there is no Political Department for the Princes in the Provinces?

Sir Manubhai N. Mehta.] I was referring to Mr. Davidson's Report. Mr. Davidson has said on many past occasions that whenever there was a clash the interests of the Princes were not sufficiently paid attention to.

Marquess of Reading.] That is a very different thing from what you said just now.

Sir Manubhai N. Mehta.] I can give many instances in which the interests of the Princes have suffered whenever they clashed with the interests of the Provinces.

Marquess of Reading.] That was not the point upon which I intervened at all. My interposition was merely because Sir Manubhai's question was in the form of a statement to which I object, because there is a Political Department and the Governor-General is responsible, and, of course, the Governors, and various officials are responsible to the Governor for the protection of the Princes; that is the constitutional position.

Sir Manubhai N. Mehta.] The Princes would not be in the Federation; there would be no Central Government, and yet the Provinces will become autonomous. Will they not become more and more powerful and will not the Princes' interests suffer more and more by being relegated to the Provinces?

Chairman.] Are you putting that question to the Witness, Sir Manubhai?

Sir Manubhai N. Mehta.

15,196. I am asking that question?—I still think that the Princes should rely in this interim stage upon the representations which they make to the Government of India and to the Viceroy.

15,197. Notwithstanding their past experience that they have suffered?—I am not sufficiently versed in the details to be able to admit at all that they have suffered injustice at the hands of the Imperial Government, but certainly I feel that they should continue to press their views upon the Imperial Government and have trust and confidence in that Government, much more than put their trust and confidence in untried institutions arising out of democratic electioneering which in many cases has proved fatal to the old traditions of States and countries.

15,198. Notwithstanding the fact that they themselves would be parties in that Government?—I think they would find themselves in a very dangerous position.

Mr. Y. Thombare.

15,199. Under the present Constitution important matters regarding All India

CHURCHILL, C.H., M.P.

are dealt with by the Legislative Council?
—Yes.

15,200. And no machinery has so far been found practicable to consult the States before final decisions are taken. It is this which has led to the result that the interests of the States are ignored and sacrificed. Now if the Federal proposals are not adopted your advice to the States would certainly not be one of stoical fortitude in such matters?—No; I did not apply it to the question of whether they had had due regard paid to their interests at all. I applied it to the question of whether the Princes would be greatly grieved if the Federal system was not set up now.

15,201. But there is this possibility, that if the Federal proposals are not accepted their rights would stand in danger of being ignored and even sacrificed?—Yes.

15,202. In that case you would not suggest that they should have no remedy?—I think it is a matter which should be considered, certainly. If the Federal proposals are not adopted it is quite possible that some method should be considered of enabling the Princes of the Native States of India to have a more continuous and direct access to the Government of India. But I am not prepared to formulate any proposal of that kind. Certainly if there were a feeling that that was omitted and the Imperial Government thought it right not to have the Federal system, then I think that that disappointment would have to be considered as part of the results of not going forward with Federation at this stage.

15,203. So that when you said that the present system should continue it would be subject to this?—I said the present system should continue subject to minor improvements, and I hope that the minor improvements would be from the point of view of the general Constitution of India.

15,204. But it would not be a minor improvement from the point of view of the States and their interests?—No.

Sir John Wardlaw-Milne.

15,205. I have a very short time, my Lord Chairman, to put any questions, but I will try to make them as short as possible in view of the very many which Mr. Churchill has already answered. I want first of all to ask him about paragraph 8 of his Memorandum, where he refers to the Government of India being mainly an administrative problem, and in the same paragraph he refers to various matters such as peace and justice which are the foundation of Indian life, and says these should never be endangered for the sake of gratifying the Indian intelligentsia. I want to ask him first of all whether he has any reason to suggest that this deterioration of which he spoke is due to the action of Indian Ministers or has come about especially in the transferred services?—I dealt with all that matter yesterday, and I have really nothing to add to it.

15,206. You dealt with it in general words. I will, if I may, refer you to your own words: "I think it would be going too far to say that it had been a complete failure; but, on the other hand, there has been a sensible deterioration in many of the Services. I remember being particularly struck when a very high authority some years ago was speaking to me of the deterioration in the agricultural sphere; there had been a great deterioration." I am quite aware that you are not prepared to go into the details of that deterioration, but I would ask you whether it is not a fact that all the official documents published in regard to the conditions of India in recent years do not go to support your argument that there has been deterioration. Are you aware that that is so?—I have seen a number of reports of that kind, but I have not felt able at this short notice to present a detailed statement. I have seen a number of reports and have been told from many quarters that there has been a deterioration. It is not a point I wish to stress in any manner which would be painful to our Indian friends who are here.

15,207. Would you allow me to ask you whether you have by any chance seen any extracts from a document which most of us go to for information regarding India; that is "The Moral and Material Progress of India", published, as you know, every year?—Yes.

15,208. In the first place, I am dealing with the point you specially mentioned—agriculture, which deals particularly with the growth of the Indian people in agriculture, which deals with the extension of the savings bank deposits, the extension of co-operative societies, the increase in land revenue, the value of land, and so on. For the sake of brevity, I am not going to read you extracts from it. The point I wanted to ask you was: Are you aware that all these statements in these official documents go to show that as a fact the transfer of responsibility in certain Transferred Services at any rate, and particularly in agriculture, has not been such as to support your view that there has been deterioration? I only want to know whether you are aware that the official documents while pointing out defects and difficulties, do not support, speaking generally, the view that there has been material deterioration?—As far as my recollection serves me, that is not correct. I have seen various reports which have shown deterioration, and also in the financial control and in the financial position of public bodies and so on, but I am speaking without having any opportunity of producing those reports.

CHURCHILL, C.H., M.P.

Sir Austen Chamberlain.

15,209. When you speak of this deterioration, is what you have in your mind the conditions of certain municipalities or is it the condition of the services which were transferred under the Montagu-Chelmsford Reforms?—I gave my evidence on this point yesterday. I have already said that I am not anxious to add to it at this time, unless the Committee wish me to present a separate statement to them on a later occasion; but with regard to what Sir John Wardlaw-Milne has said I am answering specifically the question in which he said: Am I aware that all the official documents declare that there has been no deterioration? I am not aware of it.

Sir John Wardlaw-Milne.] I did not go so far as to say all the documents. I said the documents which we commonly refer to.

Sir Austen Chamberlain.

15,210. In your answer to Sir John you referred to local bodies?—On the spur of the moment. He asked me whether I had seen any documents of that kind. I have in my recollection a report that was published a short time ago. No doubt you are right; it refers to local bodies.

Sir John Wardlaw-Milne.

15,211. What you have in mind does not really refer to the transferred powers?—The one I happened to have had in mind at that moment. That is why I think I was quite right in asking the Committee, if they wished me to give further evidence upon this question of deterioration, to allow me a further opportunity of doing so. I am not seeking to do so. I prefer to let it rest where it is, but if I am desired to give further evidence I shall be prepared to give an additional statement.

Marquess of Salisbury.] Perhaps I might call the witness's attention to the fact that in Sir Michael O'Dwyer's evidence there was abundant evidence of deterioration which has taken place and which he anticipated would take place.

Sir John Wardlaw-Milne.

15,212. I do not want to give a wrong impression, either to the Committee or to Mr. Churchill. My question was perfectly simple. Mr. Churchill has said quite rightly that the Committee must judge as to the extent of this deterioration. He was really giving his opinion founded no doubt upon what he had heard from people of experience. I was merely asking whether he was aware that "The Moral and Material Progress of India" and other documents do not bear out this suggestion of the deterioration?—No, I am not aware of it. My impression is opposite to that which Sir John is asking me to express.

15,213. In that connection, I would also ask him whether he is aware of the statement in the Statutory Commission Report, Volume I, page 19, which deals with another aspect of the same point. It says: "No fair-minded observer visiting the Indian countryside to-day can fail to be struck alike by the magnitude of the work to be done and by the zeal and exertion with which those, whether officials or Ministers, who have the work in hand, are tackling their stupendous task." I quote that particularly because it is from the Statutory Commission's Report. That does not seem to bear out that they found very serious deterioration. Is Mr. Churchill aware of that fact?—I have already said I do not desire to add to the evidence I have given on that point.

15,214. On that same paragraph, when you suggested, quite correctly if I may say so, that the problem is an administrative one, I take it you are afraid, as is rather borne out by the rest of your Memorandum, that the proposed Federal System may result in some deterioration in the Services which carry out that administration. I think that follows from what you have said. I wanted to ask you in that connection: Are you bearing in mind the immense change in the number of Indians who are now enrolled in the Indian Civil Service as compared with a few years ago?

25^o Octobris, 1933.] The Right Honourable WINSTON SPENCER
CHURCHILL, C.H., M.P.

Are you aware, for example, that whereas a few years ago the number of Indians in the Civil Service was under one-fifth, it is now about 40 per cent?—You are talking of the higher ranges.

15,215. I am talking of the Indian Civil Service itself. Therefore, the administration is already largely in the hands of Indians?—I am aware that that change has been taking place, I think, too rapidly, and has already reached limits which require careful consideration.

15,216. Are you in favour of permitting that great advance at the rate laid down by the Lee Commission?—It would almost follow from what I have said.

15,217. Regarding your proposed system of inspectors, you said, in answer to a previous question, I think, that was put to you yesterday, that you would like to apply this system as widely as possible. I will not read all your reply, but that was the gist of it. I took it (I do not know whether the rest of the Committee took it in the same way) that you wanted it applied to the transferred Services as well as to those presently reserved?—What I should like to see would be the Central Government able to give additional support to the Provincial Revenues in regard to particular Services, and, in return, for that additional support that it would give, being put in a position to keep in touch with the developments in the Provinces, and to keep the different Provinces fairly abreast of one another. That is what I had in mind.

15,218. In all the main Services of the Government, whether they would be transferred or not?—Certainly; agriculture, for instance.

15,219. I am not at the moment going into the question of grants, or the money question, or that part of it, but I am very anxious to know how that system of inspectors would work. You agree that they would have to be more or less expert inspectors in their various departments, irrigation, and so on?—Yes.

15,220. I want to get this from you. Where would these inspectors get their information from? Clearly half a dozen inspectors could not visit all these schools and various works; they must get the information from somebody. Where would they gather the information from to enable them to make their Report to the Government?—From the officials in the cities, from the officials of the Provincial Governments concerned with the different departments, and only in exceptional cases, if they thought there was something seriously wrong, would they find it necessary to go and examine some particular school or particular forest region, or particular agricultural college.

15,221. So that their information would come from the officials working under the Provincial Government mostly?—In the first instance.

15,222. And on that information, they would make a report direct to the Government of India?—Yes.

15,223. On that Report the Central Government would act. In effect these inspectors would be almost in the position of spies, would they not?—I think that is a most unreasonable term to use and unhelpful in every way. Take the Army in India with all its different great commands, held by general officers of the highest distinction. They are all subject to inspection from the Centre, but when the inspectors come along to the different branches to inspect not only the discipline of the troops, but the efficiency of special arms, artillery, and so forth, they are not regarded as spies.

15,224. Is there any comparison between the two cases at all? In the case of the Army these inspectors are from people in charge of the Army. In this case, they are inspectors from a higher authority over the heads of the people responsible for carrying out the work. The Ministers of the Provinces are the people responsible?—When the Inspectors of the Board of Education in this country visit a Catholic or a Jewish or a Wesleyan School, and have it in their power to make recommendations which affect the carrying on of that school they are not regarded as spies. They are regarded as collaborators in the achievement of a common purpose, namely, the education of the children.

Lord Irwin.

15,225. We do have a statutory responsibility?—Certainly, and I suggest this also would be a matter settled in the Constitution which is now being planned.

Sir John Wardlaw-Milne.

15,226. The reason I used the word "spies" is because there is no statutory responsibility, the statutory responsibility is with the Minister. I am putting it to you: Is not your suggestion, in fact, to have a system of inspectors over the head of the Provincial Government?—No, because it would be open to the Provincial Government to say, "We do not wish to have this inspection, and we do not wish to have the grant."

25^o October, 1933.] The Right Honourable WINSTON SPENCER
CHURCHILL, C.H., M.P.

15,227. It is only in the cases in which they would be getting the grant?—Yes.

15,228. Therefore they could refuse it and raise the money in some other way?—Yes.

15,229. It would make administration rather difficult?—You are not asking me a question on that, are you?

15,230. No, I am not asking you a question?—Thank you.

15,231. I want to ask you one question only regarding the Police. I understand from your evidence that you are opposed, as far as possible, to any system of dyarchy in the Provinces with the exception of the Police being reserved, but I want to ask you whether you are aware of the fact that the Statutory Commission has definitely laid down that the reservation of the Police in the Provinces is in fact undesirable?—The Statutory Commission recommended the transference of the Police, I am aware of that, and if the Police are not transferred to that extent there are the dual powers existing side by side certainly, but, although I do not like dyarchy in any form, yet so great is my desire to see Provincial Home Rule set up and become a success in the Provinces that I would face it to that extent in this case.

15,232. My only question was whether you were aware of this sentence in Volume II of the Statutory Commission Report, page 46: "If Police continues to be a reserved subject this necessarily means that dyarchy continues"?—Yes; I have read that Report.

15,233. You have?—Yes; and I have also read the paragraphs in it which suggest that the Governor should have a Deputy to whom he might transfer that.

Major Attlee.

15,234. On that point I find a great difficulty in recognising the Simon Report through the mouth of the Right Honourable Gentleman. What the Commission actually suggested was that in certain Provinces on certain occasions, a person, not necessarily an official and not necessarily a European, might be appointed to hold the portfolio, who was not an elected Member. That was rather different?—I think I used the very expression that the germ of the idea was to be found in certain paragraphs of the Simon Report.

15,235. But you have rather incubated the germ?—I have taken care of the seed and fostered it and brought it into flower.

Sir John Wardlaw-Milne.

15,236. You are aware, Mr. Churchill, that, apart from the All-India Police Service, the rest of the Police Service is recruited by the Provinces, and all of it is paid for by the Provinces?—Yes, but, in fact, the same conditions exist with regard to the Army; certainly they do. The Armies are all recruited in the different Provinces, and, although the Province does not pay the Army, the revenues of India on which the Provinces equally with India depend are the source from which the military expenditure is defrayed. It is purely a matter of the channel through which the money passes.

15,237. You are aware, of course, that for many years past, there has been continual criticism of the Police in India, whether because it is a reserved subject or not does not matter, but you are aware that there has been continual criticism of the control of the Police and the administration of the Police?—Yes; I think it on the whole an unjust criticism.

Marquess of Lothian.

15,238. May I ask merely one question in elucidation of a sentence which does not seem to me to be quite clear? It is not argument at all. It is merely for the purpose of elucidation. In paragraph 10, Mr. Churchill, your third proposal is as follows: "That the Governor of any Province appointed by the King on the advice of British Ministers should have one or more deputies similarly appointed, associated with him, to whom he may, when and where expedient, entrust the control of the Judiciary and also of the Police, unless it is found possible to organise the Police as an Imperial Service." What is the meaning of the words "when and where expedient"? Do you mean that from the start, and under all circumstances, these deputies should be in charge of the Police Department, or do you mean that the Governor, if he finds that law and order is not being properly managed by a Minister, should then declare that he is going to appoint a Deputy in place of the Minister?—I think the words "when and where expedient" are difficult to beat from the point of view of conveying the meaning I intended to convey. The only addition that I would make to them is that I do not consider that the Governor's judgment upon whether it was or was not expedient in any place or at any time should depend upon, first of all, there having been a serious breakdown or disaster.

25^o October, 1933.] The Right Honourable WINSTON SPENCER
CHURCHILL, C.H., M.P.

15,239. In other words, you do accept in effect the Simon Commission's recommendation that, in the first instance, the responsibility for Law and Order should be transferred?—No; on the contrary that is the exact reverse of what I endeavoured to convey. I am sorry not to be able to make it more plain.

Archbishop of Canterbury.] My Lord Chairman, I venture, with some diffidence, to make a suggestion to my colleagues. It is plain that if we adjourn now, all those who, including myself, have still the right to question, will ask Mr. Winston Churchill to return. We have all listened with the greatest admiration to his good humour, and have appreciated his patience, but I wonder whether there is very much more that we can learn with a view of elucidating such particular proposals as he has made. His general attitude, I should have thought, has been most abundantly and fully made plain. Moreover, our Indian colleagues have had their opportunity of asking Mr. Churchill questions, which we should have wished them to do; otherwise, speaking for myself, I have a great desire to get on to our discussions with our Indian Delegates so long as they are here, and unless my colleagues here who, like myself, have not yet had an opportunity of asking questions, feel that there is any point that really requires elucidating on Mr. Churchill's particular proposals, which, apart from argument, are not many, I would ask whether they would not join with me in a self denying ordinance in agreeing that it is not necessary that we should press our questions. I have a great many questions that I should have liked to have the privilege of addressing to Mr. Churchill, but I should be quite willing to forgo them if it would spare his return and enable us to get on with our discussions. I am always afraid in these matters that we may tend to get into the position of arguing with the witness through questions rather than elucidating facts or vital things. Therefore, with the leave of my Lord Chairman, I am only asking whether it is really necessary for us who remain to press our right of asking further questions.

Marquess of Salisbury.] My Lord Chairman, I should like to respond at once to what His Grace has said. For my part, I should be quite willing to resign the opportunity of asking my right honourable friend any questions in reference to his evidence. The Archbishop has said, with truth, that there is always a tendency to argue with a witness, a tendency which seems to have prevailed a good deal, and also sometimes to take the opportunity of asking a question of a witness for asserting one's own opinions which, though very interesting, may easily be carried rather too far. In any case, however that may be, so far as I am concerned, and I believe I speak for others, we will gladly respond to His Grace's invitation not to ask any questions.

Marquess of Reading.] I will support His Grace. Although there are questions that I would have liked to put to Mr. Churchill, there would not be many on the elucidation of his memorandum, and I would forgo that, being confident that we have in substance what Mr. Churchill has to say. He has submitted with great patience and great courtesy to every question that has been put to him. I would fall in with that view most readily if others would agree to it.

Chairman.] We are greatly obliged to you, Mr. Churchill, for having given us your evidence. Thank you very much.

Witness.] I should like to express my thanks to the Committee for the courtesy with which they have treated me, and particularly to the Indian Delegates, to whom I feel under great obligations for the care with which they have put so many matters before me, and to assure them that, though I have been giving evidence, I have also been trying to learn.

Ordered, That the Committee be adjourned to to-morrow at half past Ten o'clock.

DIE VENERIS, 3^o NOVEMBRIS, 1933.

Mr. J. HAROLD RODIER, Mr. T. D. BARLOW, Mr. W. H. CATTERALL, Mr. JOHN GREY and Mr. ARTHUR R. KNOWLES (on behalf of the Manchester Chamber of Commerce) are called in and examined as follows:—

Chairman.

15,240. Messrs. Rodier, Barlow, Catterall, Grey and Knowles, you are here on behalf of the Manchester Chamber of Commerce?—(Mr. Rodier.) Yes.

15,241. Mr. Rodier, you are the Chairman of the India Section and a Director of the Chamber; Mr. Barlow is a Director and ex-President of the Chamber; Mr. Catterall is President of the Federation of Master Cotton Spinners' Associations, Limited; Mr. Grey is the Chairman of the Cotton Spinners' and Manufacturers' Association; and Mr. Knowles is Secretary of the India Section of the Manchester Chamber of Commerce?—Yes.

15,242. You have been good enough to prepare a Memorandum of Evidence which you wish to give; it is numbered 88, and you hand that in at this stage?—Yes. It is as follows:—

MEMORANDUM 88 BY THE MANCHESTER CHAMBER OF COMMERCE WITH THE APPROVAL AND SUPPORT OF THE COTTON SPINNERS' AND MANUFACTURERS' ASSOCIATION AND THE FEDERATION OF MASTER COTTON SPINNERS' ASSOCIATIONS, LTD.

PREFACE.

1. The Evidence which is herewith submitted to the Joint Select Committee was prepared some months ago. Subsequent developments, which may have significant bearing on the future of trade relations between India and Lancashire, have encouraged the organisations to add this prefatory and supplementary statement.

3^d November, 1933.]

2. In July last the Chairman of the Bombay Millowners' Association, Mr. H. P. Mody, had a series of conferences with representatives of the Lancashire cotton industry, and in August a Delegation comprising representatives of the British cotton and artificial silk industries left for India, where they have since been participating in discussions with the Indian Government and the Indian Millowners.

3. The Lancashire organisations are gratified to learn that discussions have been proceeding in an atmosphere of cordiality and good will. They accept this as significant that Lancashire's own desire to bring about a mutually satisfactory understanding is shared in that country. The Lancashire organisations give their complete moral support to these efforts at exploring the field of co-operation. They do not hesitate to express an emphatic preference, before all other methods, for the practical solution of trade problems by genuine demonstration of reciprocal good will.

4. In regard to the negotiations now drawing to a close in India it will be appreciated that the organisations have not had the opportunity to receive and study a full report of results. They do not know to what extent agreement or conditional arrangements have matured or may be possible. They find themselves under this handicap in relation to their appearance before the Select Committee.

5. It seems to the organisations that their wish for the inclusion of safeguards in the Constitution should, not be regarded other than as a desire for a form of insurance against contingencies which, although possibly unlikely to arise, cannot be overlooked. As stated in their main Evidence, the Lancashire organisations do not question the legitimacy of Indian desire to make considerable and rapid progress towards responsible self-government. Neither do they entertain any doubt but that the foremost principle in Indian government should be to serve the best interests of the Indian people.

6. Having said that, the organisations would add the belief that Indian Statesmen ought of their own free will to agree to safeguards in the Constitution. They hope that their recommendations to the Select Committee will not be taken to imply any lack of confidence or distrust in the present-day leaders of Indian industry and responsible political opinion. They are concerned, however, lest under the proposed new Constitution developments in the political field might place power in the hands of those who would foster a policy of trade discrimination.

7. The organisations, trusting that there may be no misinterpretation of the views they have expressed, would point out that their proposals aim as much to ensure that the political progress of India shall not be jeopardised by a breach of commercial relations, as to provide that the channels of trade between the United Kingdom and India—of incalculable importance to both countries—shall be preserved for all time, and for the good of all concerned most open in character and most friendly in spirit.

8. Believing that reciprocal interest is the best and most permanent basis of international trade, the organisations have welcomed the opportunity to send a Delegation to India. They trust that the work of this Mission will be the forerunner of a new and fruitful basis for mutual co-operation in which old misunderstandings and differences may be forgotten and that, as the result of the joint discussions, a new era of long term agreements is at hand.

9. The organisations conclude by expressing their warm hopes that the deliberations of the Select Committee will reach a satisfactory and a comprehensive settlement worthy of the great problem which it is the Committee's duty to solve.

PART I.

The Indian Point of View and the British Cotton Trade.

1. Before submitting opinions and proposals regarding provisions in the Constitution and possible action by the British and Indian Governments, the Chamber feels it is of real importance to inform the Joint Select Committee of the point of view from which it approaches the position of the British Cotton Trade in the Indian market.

2. In the very first place, the Chamber wishes to make clear that nothing in the policy which it supports is in any way inspired by a desire to disregard the legitimate interests in their domestic market of the Indian cotton mills, or of the hand-loom industry. The Chamber recognises to the full that no matter what form of Government there might be in India it would be nothing less than the obvious duty of those responsible for that

30 November, 1933.]

Government to promote the well-being of the Indian industry in every way, subject only to due consideration of other equally legitimate interests within India which might be affected by any measures under contemplation. It is the object of the Chamber, whilst freely and fully acknowledging the foregoing position as regards the Indian industry, to point out some of the other interests which stand to be affected by proposals designed to promote the prosperity of the Indian mills, and to stress that in so far as these interests may not be quite so well able as the manufacturing interests to exert political influence in India it is desirable that the arrangements as regards the future relations of the British and Indian Governments should be such as to ensure proper consideration of all relevant factors.

3. A large and flourishing cotton industry in India is, under modern conditions and standards, a desirable thing from every Indian point of view. The cotton industry is a very natural channel to which India should turn in seeking to increase the strength of her economic position. It is not only able to use one of the principal crops in India, namely, raw cotton, but it offers valuable employment both directly and indirectly and it manufactures a product which is one of the principal needs of India's vast population. In all these ways it contributes to the well-being of the inhabitants and the wealth of the country as a whole.

4. The Chamber desires to point out, however, that it would hardly be possible, and would certainly not be desirable, to proceed on the assumption that at any time in the reasonably near future the whole of the requirements of India as regards cotton goods could be supplied by a domestic industry. A far-seeing Government of India would have good cause to hesitate from saddling India with too rapid a growth of its cotton industry, bearing in mind that a permanently high level of tariffs would be necessary for its preservation—to the serious detriment of a country like India where so large a proportion of the population is entirely dependent upon agriculture and has a low standard of purchasing power.

5. The Chamber feels that although Indian spokesmen would probably approach all the foregoing matters from a slightly different angle and would therefore use different words, most Indian authorities would in substance acquiesce in this reading of the fundamental position. On that assumption the Chamber may, it is hoped, proceed on the basis that a certain volume of import trade in Cotton Goods into the Indian market is to be regarded not only as desirable but an economic necessity, even from an Indian point of view.

6. In that connection, several points of major importance arise. In the first place, there is the question of revenue. Indirect taxation is at present and must remain for many years the principal source of revenue for the Government of India. The articles upon which indirect taxation can be successfully collected in amounts adequate to the circumstances are by no means numerous, and the Chamber feels that nobody with any knowledge of the matter would question the statement that revenue will have to be raised on Cotton Goods for many years to come. If the import trade were so diminished as to yield a totally inadequate amount of revenue, and if it was clear that increases in the import duty would only result in further contraction of imports it is at the very least conceivable that an Indian Government in those circumstances would find itself with no choice but to re-impose an excise duty on the products of the Indian cotton industry. That is one important reason from an Indian point of view for safeguarding the import tariff on cotton goods against any danger of its being made a pawn in purely political manoeuvres. But there are also other reasons.

7. India has an interest in the well-being of the British Cotton Industry from the point of view of a supplier of raw cotton. Under the Ottawa Agreement the British Government, in co-operation with the Cotton Trade, is taking active steps to extend the consumption of Indian cotton by the Lancashire industry. Measures injurious to the British Cotton Industry are therefore capable of causing indirect injury to Indian interests.

8. Furthermore, the consumers in India, although they may never be able to realise it, have an interest in imported goods because it is the presence of these goods on the market which constitutes for them an automatic safeguard against the possibility of excessive prices for the products of the domestic mills.

9. Lastly, India must not forget that as the greatest import market in the world, Britain contributes indirectly to the potentialities of Indian export trade.

3^o Novembris, 1933.]

and that any reduction of the standards of life in Britain would be followed by losses in trade by many countries upon whose purchases India also has to rely.

10. The Joint Select Committee is concerned with the future good Government of India from the point of view of Indian and British interests equally. The arguments above relate to the former aspect and the Chamber submits that they are adequate to support the view that, in the best interests of India, reasonable measures as regards the future of the British Cotton Trade in the Indian market are deserving of the Joint Select Committee's approval and support.

PART II.

The British Point of View of the Indian Market.

11. Facts are provided in an Appendix which clearly indicate the importance of the Lancashire Cotton Industry as an element in the economic well-being of Great Britain and, equally, the supreme importance of the Indian market to the British Cotton Industry. It is not too much to say that without the Cotton Textile export trade Great Britain could not hope to balance her external trade accounts so long as she maintained anything approaching her present population or attempted to retain the existing standard of life in the country. It is also true to say that unless a reasonable market for the products of the British cotton industry is permanently secured in India a satisfactory volume of export trade for British cotton goods will be quite impossible since no comparable alternative outlets exist.

12. The United Kingdom is dependent on its export trade for the maintenance of the leading part it plays in international commerce and affairs. That this dependence will continue, or that the necessity for an adequate contribution to national prosperity by the cotton export trade will not disappear, is unlikely to be questioned.

13. It cannot be questioned that the British Parliament is under an obligation to avoid any situation which would imperil the existence of the cotton trade. Despite the depression from which it is suffering, the cotton industry remains by far the most important exporting industry in the Kingdom, and India is still the largest outlet for its products.

14. Of the total population of Great Britain more than one-tenth reside in Lancashire. Of these, a high percentage are directly employed in the cotton trade, and a still further number—such as those engaged in packing, transport, distribution in its various phases, coal mining and engineering, etc.—are indirectly dependent on the prosperity of the cotton industry. Any further serious diminution, much less a cessation, in exports to India would strike a vital blow at employment with consequences of the gravest character. The well-being of Lancashire is an essential element in the economic structure of Great Britain as a whole and quite apart from the human suffering of those who are dependent upon the cotton industry there can be no question that a further intensification of unemployment in the North-west of England would entail calamitous results for the nation at large.

15. The Chamber profoundly hopes that the course of politics in India may be such that measures of economic warfare against Great Britain will never on any occasion receive the support of any responsible section of the Indian community. But it would be idle to pretend that such a possibility has not to be faced as things now stand. There is a party in India which commands considerable support, which has for its ultimate aim complete separation and independence from the British connection. This party on a past occasion has chosen to employ a boycott of British goods as a lever to bring pressure upon the British Government to concede its political demands. The same party, if in a majority in a future Indian Government, would not be disposed to hesitate for one moment in enacting measures which would have precisely the same object and intention as the boycott. British Industry is therefore entitled to say to the British Government that if independent powers are to be given to an elected Government in India, there must be some condition inserted giving the British Government or its representative the right to prevent measures of that kind being put into operation.

16. In a general way the fundamental principle of the need for safeguards against discrimination is already admitted in the White Paper. For example, paragraphs 122 and 123 provide that the Indian Legislatures shall not be at liberty to make laws involving any disability or discrimination against British subjects or British companies. But it appears open to doubt whether paragraph 124 does not in its present form open up a possibility of wilful discrimination against British interests which the preceding paragraphs are designed to prevent. It is unnecessary to say that the Chamber regards the inclusion of provisions against discrimination as essential, and considers that they should be carefully scrutinised to make sure that they adequately cover the fields in which discrimination might arise.

PART III.

Safeguards in the Constitution:

17. The grounds on which the Chamber submits that it is necessary to insert in the Constitution some safeguard against the possibility of enactments unduly penalising British export trade have been to some extent explained above. It is probably unnecessary to amplify them by dilating upon the danger to British interests during the early years of the functioning of a political machine in which some of the units have been engaged for some time in anti-British activities designed as levers to secure political concessions. At the moment when many of those concessions are to be granted it is only reasonable to seek for guarantees against the continuance of similar activities. Experience elsewhere has shown that the danger of such a continuance is very real. In the case of Ceylon it could be shown by quotations from debates in the State Council that certain members thereof have determined their attitude to proposals relating to tariffs on British goods primarily on such political motives. If the Joint Select Committee desires the Chamber to support this argument in detail it can be readily done, but the Chamber hopes it will not be necessary to extend the present memorandum in that direction.

18. It is not regarded as within the province of the Chamber to suggest a form of words for inclusion in the Constitution to provide the safeguards which it urges the Joint Select Committee to recommend. This, it feels, is rather a matter for Parliamentary draughtsmen.

19. Bearing in mind that British subjects and companies are protected in the existing proposals against any general disability or discrimination as compared with Indian subjects of His Majesty it may be taken that virtually the only avenue of action hostile to British interests in regard to which provision has not been made is that of tariff policy.

20. It is desirable to recall what is the present position as regards the enactment of tariff measures in India, and what are the reasonable liberties which any Government charged with responsibility for the welfare of India as a whole must obviously be allowed to exercise.

21. The present position is governed by the so-called fiscal convention. The Simon Report embodies what is perhaps the most authoritative explanation of what is meant by this term, and the Chamber does not propose here to repeat what the Simon Report has to say.* It will be agreed that what actually happens in practice under the existing form of Government is that tariff proposals are formulated by the Finance Member according to his view of the revenue needs of India and the desirability of protection for the Indian industry concerned. The Secretary of State for India is then made aware of the proposals which the Finance Member intends to lay before the Legislative Assembly and is at liberty to bring to the notice of the Government of India any considerations, including those affecting the welfare of British industries, which seem to him to be involved. Representations by the Secretary of State may or may not lead to a modification of the suggested fiscal measures prior to their being laid before the Legislature. Under the fiscal convention, however, the Secretary of State still possesses, and in the final analysis may exercise, a right to advise the Crown to disallow any measure which may be laid before the Legislature by the Government of India and approved by the Legislature, if in his opinion the consequences of its being passed would be so serious as to make that step necessary.

The Simon Commission in their Report say: "We do not suggest any modifications of the Convention itself."† Under the existing Government of India Act the Secretary of State possesses the ultimate power to withhold consent on behalf of the Crown to any legislative measure. The White Paper proposals as the Chamber interprets them, do not envisage that this power should be exercised in the future by the Secretary of State. The Chamber feels that efforts should be made to give statutory force to the Fiscal Convention and to the procedure which has grown up around it.

PART IV.

Trade Agreements.

22. In the mutual interest of India and United Kingdom the question of trade agreements should in the Chamber's opinion be explored to the fullest extent possible. There exists at the present time a universal inclination to enter into bilateral agreements based upon trade and common interest. This policy is, the Chamber believes, one which should be furthered and encouraged by all the countries which constitute the British Empire.

23. The existing Anglo-Indian Ottawa Agreement is hardly adequate, in the light of the above observations, so far as the cotton trade is concerned. The only mention of the cotton trade occurs in Article 11, reading as follows:—

“The Government of India will consider, in the light of the findings of the Tariff Board, the protective duties to be imposed on goods of cotton and artificial silk according as they are made in the United Kingdom or elsewhere, and will invite the Legislature to pass legislation by which, where protective duties are not imposed as a result of the recommendations of the Tariff Board upon United Kingdom goods of the kinds specified in Schedule G, the margins of preference shown in that Schedule will be extended to such goods.”

Attention may be drawn to the clauses in the Anglo-Canadian Agreement dealing with the tariff treatment of British manufactured goods. These read as follow:—

Article 11.

“His Majesty's Government in Canada undertake that during the currency of this Agreement the tariff shall be based on the principle that protective duties shall not exceed such a level as will give United Kingdom producers full opportunity of reasonable competition on the basis of the relative cost of economical and efficient production, provided that in the application of such principle special consideration shall be given to the case of industries not fully established.”

Article 15.

“His Majesty's Government in Canada undertake that United Kingdom producers shall be entitled to full rights of audience before the Tariff Board when it has under consideration matters arising under Articles 13 and 14 hereof.”

24. The Chamber feels that it would greatly assist in securing a political atmosphere in which a satisfactory Government of India Act could be passed if a fresh Agreement between U.K. and India dealing with the Cotton Trade and on the lines of the Anglo-Canadian clauses, but somewhat more particularised, could be negotiated forthwith. The initiation and negotiation of such an arrangement might contribute to the growth of a spirit of co-operation between the Indian and British cotton industries.

25. The negotiation of such an arrangement would, of course, be the business of the Government in consultation with the trade and would not directly concern the Joint Select Committee. The Chamber feels, however, that the Joint Select Committee is entitled to make its views known to the Government on this particular matter before reaching final decisions on the whole of the reference with which it is engaged. The Chamber earnestly hopes that the Committee may accept that view of its powers and exert its influence to secure the action the Chamber suggests.

26. As to the basis of negotiations, the Chamber contends it is essential to remind the Indian Government and Indian public opinion of the great significance from an Indian point of view of the contributions Britain is capable of making to Indian economy in the development of reciprocal and mutual trade exchanges on the lines which a commercial treaty would envisage.

27. There are two general considerations which the British Government is fully entitled to advance. In the first place, as has been mentioned earlier in this evidence, Great Britain is the most important import market in the world and by her large purchases from many countries which take substantial quantities of Indian exports contributes indirectly to the well-being of Indian export trade. In the second place, we are offering, or contemplating the offer of a vast enlargement of India's political rights and powers. A country yielding such powers is at least entitled to press for a continuance of the status quo in directions vital to her economic life.

3^o Novembre, 1933.]

28. As regards the more direct aspects of reciprocal trade, the Chamber would emphasise that the concessions offered to India by Great Britain at the Ottawa Conference are already proving of far greater value than comment at the time suggested, whilst potentially they are of still higher value. Public opinion in Great Britain is entirely favourable to a continuous enlargement of Great Britain's purchases of Indian exports and the experience of the last few years shows that with Governmental support, which would certainly not be lacking, a great deal can be done in this direction.

29. In the special case of Indian Cotton, under the arrangement entered into at Ottawa, steps have already been taken to promote a larger consumption in Lancashire. The measures under contemplation and others which will be devised by the Committee set up for the purpose offer every prospect of securing for India a stable outlet within the Empire for a much larger volume of her raw cotton. The value of this development to India is self-evident. It contributes to the principle of reciprocity in trade exchanges. It strengthens the resources of the domestic suppliers of the indigenous cotton industry in India. It extends the field of export trade on which India has to rely for a favourable trade balance.

30. In the uncertainties which appear to face every country so far as their external trade is concerned, there is surely a great deal to be said for individual commercial agreements under which a mutual contract exists by virtue of which a definite and growing volume of trade can be relied upon with reasonable confidence. Nothing could constitute a more hopeful promise that the political progress which is inherent in the White Paper proposals should be developed with the least possible delay and difficulty than an arrangement on the economic side from which both countries would derive clear and perceptible benefits. It is on these grounds that the Chamber feels that the Joint Select Committee is entitled to recommend an extended commercial treaty as a definite contribution to the problem of settled and harmonious relations between India and Great Britain.

15,243. Do you desire at this stage to say anything in extension of that Memorandum or to make any corrections therein?—With your permission, my Lord Chairman, may I read the Preface to the Evidence?

15,244. Most certainly?—May I say, before doing that, that we are here on behalf of the Lancashire Organisation as well as the Chamber of Commerce; that is, the Cotton Spinners' and Manufacturers' Association and the Federation of Master Cotton Spinners' Associations, Limited, who associate themselves with the Chamber of Commerce in this evidence.

Marquess of Salisbury.] I understand the Witness is going to read the Preface to the Evidence which we have before us?

Chairman.] I think the Committee would wish to take that as read.

Witness.] If your Lordship pleases.

15,245. Do you desire to make any statement apart from the Memorandum and the Preface?—We should just like to say that since we composed this evidence we sent out a Mission to India to confer with the Indian millowners and the Government of India, and we have an emphatic preference for solution by co-operation as being preferable to some of the arguments that we have advanced perhaps in the joint evidence.

15,246. You have been impressed by the results of that Delegation?—We have, but we are not able to tell what the result will be until we have got more figures from our friends; unfortunately they have not arrived; they expect to arrive next week; so that until we have conferred with them we do not know what practical results have been achieved.

Marquess of Reading.

15,247. There was a statement in the "Times" with regard to it which you saw, of course?—Yes.

15,248. I suppose in addition to that there is nothing that you can tell us at present?—We have heard that an agreement has been initialled between Sir William Clare Lees, the head of our delegation, and the Bombay Millowners detailing several provisions. Is that the one you refer to, my Lord?

15,249. Yes, I refer to the one which came rather unexpectedly. An announcement appeared to the effect that certain heads had been arranged. All I wanted to know was whether anything could be added to that or whether that was the last news that you had of it?—We had no details direct of that arrangement.

Chairman.

15,250. Mr. Rodier, before I invite my colleagues to put questions to you, would you care to tell us whether you have made any arrangement amongst yourselves as to particular witnesses taking particular subjects?—No, we have not.

15,251. You would like us to address our questions to you, Mr. Rodier, would you?—Yes.

Sir Austen Chamberlain.

15,252. Mr. Rodier, I hope I may be permitted to begin my few questions by offering you my congratulations on what seems to me, at any rate as far as we know of it, the very successful result of the negotiations which have taken place. I understand you to say that the procedure of friendly negotiation which has been followed in this case is the one which you would always prefer and which you think is most conducive to the interests both of this country and of India?—Yes.

15,253. And you lay great stress upon the fact that those interests are not divergent but that the prosperity of the one, so to speak, plays into the hands of the other?—Yes.

15,254. You express some apprehension as to what might happen if trade were considered not on its merits but merely as an instrument of political propaganda. That is so, is it not?—Yes.

15,255. That is the one danger which you, I will not say, anticipate, but foresee as a possibility?—Yes.

15,256. And it is against the misuse of trade relations for the purpose of putting pressure on the Government that you ask the Committee to consider security?—Yes.

15,257. Do you wish to say anything as to the nature of the security which you think we might provide, or are you content, having brought the matter to our notice, to leave it to our consideration?—We do not see how we can amplify our evidence at this moment, we are content to leave it.

Marquess of Reading.

15,258. Of course, you make reference to paragraphs 122, 123 and 124; you deal with those. I gather from an examination of the Precis you have placed before us you are raising an objection to paragraph 124?—Yes.

Marquess of Reading.] I am referring to the special exceptions that were made. I do not want to go into the matter further at the moment.

Sir Austen Chamberlain.

15,259. Have you got the White Paper actually before you?—Yes.

Marquess of Reading.

15,260. I only wanted to bring out that there was that point in question, and as far as I understood—of course, I shall be corrected by Mr. Rodier if I am wrong—the only criticism upon the paragraphs in the White Paper is in reference to that part of paragraph 124 which makes special exceptions in certain cases?—Yes.

Marquess of Reading.] I did not want to put questions upon that at the moment. I will wait till I have heard more of the questions put by some of the other members of the Committee, if I may.

Earl Peel.

15,261. I did want to put a question upon that specific point which Lord Reading raised, because I was in some difficulty as to what was meant by. "it appears open to doubt whether paragraph 124 does not in its present form open up the possibility of wilful discrimination." I really wanted to ask the Deputation what was their ground for saying that, because I am not quite clear what they mean by saying that paragraph 124 does take away the value of paragraphs 122 and 123. You, Mr. Rodier, have read it, of course, carefully and have studied it. It applies to two things: "payment of grants, bounties or subsidies out of public funds will not be held to fall within the terms of the two preceding paragraphs by reason only of the fact that it is limited to persons or companies resident or incorporated in India." That is to say, there is no discrimination there, is there? The condition is that they must be resident there in India and that the condition of a grant—the second part of paragraph 124—is "the company shall be incorporated by or under the laws of British India," and so it runs. Now I do not quite see how you establish the case that paragraph 124 does cut across or destroy the value of paragraphs 122 and 123. Perhaps you would deal with that point?—Yes. Paragraphs 122 and 123 are quite clear, but paragraph 124 contains a mention of grants and subsidies. We accept the principle that India in control of her own fiscal policy has the right to make any fiscal arrangements as regards tariffs or subsidies if she thinks it desirable, but we hope the discrimination against British nationals or companies as compared with others is not only contrary to the general spirit which animates the nations of the British Empire but in its essence is uneconomic.

Earl Peel.

15,262. I hope so too. These paragraphs 122, 123 and 124 deal with discrimination, do they not?—Yes.

Earl Peel.] I am not clear what you mean by saying that paragraph 124 contradicts the two others. Perhaps you would be good enough to state how you think discrimination can be set up under paragraph 124 and can neutralise to some extent the provisions of paragraphs 122 and 123.

Marquess of Zetland.] Lord Peel, would you give me the reference to the paragraph in the Memorandum which you are referring to?

Earl Peel.] It is paragraph 16.

Sir Joseph Nall.

15,263. Perhaps Mr. Rodier can give us an instance of what is intended. In paragraph 123 reference is made to British subjects domiciled in the United Kingdom, including companies, etc. Paragraph 124 says that that shall not apply if the subsidy or bounty provision is only made in respect of companies or persons domiciled in India?—Yes.

Marquess of Reading.] Or otherwise.

Sir Joseph Nall.] Paragraph 123 refers specifically to persons domiciled in the United Kingdom. Paragraph 124 says that shall not apply if the provision is only in respect of Indian undertakings.

Marquess of Reading.

15,264. As I understand, it makes three conditions, the result, as we know here, of the deliberations of the Committee which sat to inquire into this matter in India, and in respect of bounties, grants and subsidies it made the condition that companies not actually in existence and incorporated in India but nevertheless trading in India, before they could get any benefit from the grant or bounty or subsidy, would have to be incorporated in rupees, that is to say, incorporated in India with a percentage of Directors in India and facilities for training in India. That is the point, is it not?—Thank you, yes. What we feared when we made that remark was that it was designed to give bounties to Indians as against English.

Sir Austen Chamberlain.

15,265 Was that exactly your fear, that it was designed to give bounties to Indians as against English, or to manufacture carried on in India as distinct from manufacture carried on in England?—May I ask Mr. Barlow to answer that question?—(Mr. Barlow.) I think I may explain, my Lord Chairman, that our general attitude as regards this Clause 124 is this: We accept that if India has control of her fiscal policy she is entitled to do anything she likes in the way of bounties, subsidies or anything else, but as a general proposition we take the strongest objection to subsidies. We think they are, as the experience of the last decade has shown, a very dangerous weapon which has two-edged consequences which cannot be foreseen when these subsidies are introduced. Therefore, as a general proposition we venture to put before you that the creation of subsidies is to be avoided, and in addition we were not quite certain about this Clause, whether it did not imply (perhaps we were wrong in this assumption) that subsidies were only to be open to people of Indian nationality as against non-Indians.

Marquess of Reading.] Clearly not.

Sir Austen Chamberlain.] I think if that was your fear you can be reassured.

Earl Peel.

15,266. So that your objection is first of all generally to bounties and so on?—Yes.

15,267. Of course, this clause, as you know, does not deal with that specifically, but only as they bear on questions of discrimination?—Yes.

Earl Peel.] It does not discriminate, does it, between what I may call companies, provided they are incorporated in India, and specifically Indian companies; there is no discrimination in the first part, is there?

Marquess of Salisbury.

15,268. It all depends on the words "incorporated in India". Do you object to that from the point of view of discrimination?—(Mr. Rodier.) No.

Marquess of Salisbury. That is the point.

Earl Peel.] That is the first half of it. Now may I go to the second part: "it imposes on companies not trading in India before the Act was passed, as a condition of eligibility for any such grant, bounty or subsidy, that the company shall be incorporated by or under the laws of British India". Is this the difficulty that you find, that new companies if they are to get a grant or subsidy may have to submit to certain conditions? Is that the point you dislike?

Marquess of Reading.

15,269. Is it not rather companies that are not incorporated in India? They need not be new companies, but if they want to get the benefit of a grant or subsidy then they must be incorporated in India, subject to the conditions to which I have referred. That is the effect of it?—Yes; we could not object to that.

15,270. What I suggest to you is that if India chooses to give a grant or subsidy for trading in India for the purpose of encouraging Indian trade, it is not unreasonable to ask that companies trading from this country with India should, in order to get the benefit of a grant or subsidy, be incorporated in India, with the conditions that obtain there?—Yes.

15,271. That I have always understood the business men have not thought unreasonable. You do not think that unreasonable, do you?—No.

Earl Peel.

15,272. Then just one other question with regard to paragraph 21. You are talking there about the financial Convention and the Report of the Statutory Commission, and you say that: "The White Paper proposals as the Chamber interprets them, do not envisage that this power should be exercised in the future by the Secretary of State." Can you point to any passage in the White Paper which shows that? Does not the Secretary of State or the Governor-General retain the general power of veto on legislation? It is not taken away by the White Paper, is it?—No; that was not our point. We were referring to the fiscal Convention.

15,273. Yes, so I understood?—We base our view on statements made on several occasions by the Secretary of State for India that, whatever the legal position, the Secretary of State does not intervene when the Government of India and the Legislature are in agreement. We understand that the policy of the Government is to regularise that position in the new Constitution.

15,274. But you have referred in your Paper, very rightly if I may say so, to paragraphs 268 and 269 in the Report of the Indian Statutory Commission, and there also, in the paragraph you quote, there is a limitation as stated in that paragraph on the fiscal convention: "but as a member of His Majesty's Government he cannot divest himself of responsibility for ensuring that no such measure cuts across general Empire policy or is so unfair to any constituent part of the Empire as to bring India into conflict with it." There are rather limitations, are not there, to the full bearing of that fiscal convention?—The specific limitation which you mention, yes. We were not envisaging any further limitations.

15,275. Are you satisfied or not with those limitations as stated in paragraph 268?—We accept them.

15,276. But you also want that convention to have a statutory form, do you?—Yes.

15,277. You wish it to be embodied in the Constitution Act?—That is so.

15,278. May I ask you one further question, and that is on Part IV, of your Memorandum, "Trade Agreements"? You approve of the general policy of bilateral agreements, and so on. Do you wish then that a trade agreement of this kind should be entered into between whom?—Between the Governments.

15,279. You wish that scheduled to the Constitution Act?—No.

15,280. It is an agreement between this Government and the present Indian Government. Is that so, or between the Government to be set up under the proposed Constitution?—We were looking forward to trade agreements, more or less long term agreements. That is what we desire.

15,281. It is a general expression of a desire for long term trade agreements to be made, if possible, with the new Indian Government when that Government is set up?—Yes; that is so.

Mr. Morgan Jones.

15,282. I would like to ask one question in regard to the last paragraph, paragraph 30, of your Memorandum, and the last sentence. "It is on these grounds that the Chamber feels that the Joint Select Committee is entitled to recommend an extended commercial treaty as a definite contribution to the problem," etc. A treaty between whom, may I ask?—Between the Governments of India and of Britain.

Mr. Morgan Jones.] Might I ask the Secretary of State whether a treaty of that kind would be possible?—Would that be within the purview of the future Government of India to effect a treaty?

Sir Samuel Hoare.] A trade agreement?

Mr. Morgan Jones.] Yes, a trade agreement.

Sir Samuel Hoare] Yes, certainly.
Mr. Morgan Jones] It does not fall outside their purview?

Sir Samuel Hoare] No; a trade agreement would not.

Marquess of Salisbury.] It is not technically a treaty, of course.

Mr. Morgan Jones.] No, that is the word I was boggling at.

Mr. M. R. Jayaker.

15,283. May I just ask a few questions? Before I begin may I congratulate you on the spirit of your preface?—Thank you, Sir.

15,284. I suppose you are satisfied that the method of co-operation and goodwill is the right method in such matters, as you said in a previous answer?—Yes.

15,285. But do not you think that you will get better terms from India by the adoption of this method rather than by having strict provisions in the Constitution?—I think we have said so in the evidence.

15,286. You agree that you will get better terms by the adoption of this method than by having strict provisions in the Constitution?—In the main, yes.

15,287. I think you realise that, whatever rules there may be in the Constitution, their working will have to depend on the goodwill of the Indian people?—Certainly.

15,288. Therefore do you agree with some of us that to make the Viceroy the final custodian of your rights (the British Viceroy protecting British commercial interests) is likely to destroy this goodwill?—It is a question of degree, and it would be rather difficult to answer that without consulting our organisations.

Mr. M. R. Jayaker.] I will leave it there.

Sir Hubert Carr.] May I suggest that the Viceroy does not bring his powers into play unless those rights which we are referring to are attacked?—Is not that so?

Mr. M. R. Jayaker.] Even in the case of such an attack, if there is constant reference to the Viceroy when British and Indian interests are in conflict, you would agree that such a reference to the Viceroy (a British public man from here) is likely to destroy the goodwill on which the working would rest? However, I will leave it there.

Sir Hubert Carr.] May I ask one further question?

Sir Austen Chamberlain.] The witness's answer is a very fair answer, that it was a question of degree.

Mr. M. R. Jayaker.] I am leaving it there. Sir Hubert Carr is pursuing it further; I am not.

Marquess of Reading.] There is no question of the interference of the Viceroy unless there is some attempt to make discrimination. It never arises until then. The Viceroy does not come in to protect trade, or to encourage trade, directly. He comes in only when there is any interference.

Mr. M. R. Jayaker.

15,289. With reference to your preface, and paragraph 15 of your main Memorandum, I suppose most of your apprehensions are caused, as you mention here clearly, by the possibility that a certain party in India may get into a majority in the future Indian Government, and use the weapon of boycott wilfully and for political pressure. That is your fear?—Yes.

15,290. And if you were assured that the possibility of this party getting a majority in the Constitution was very remote, your apprehensions to that extent would be less?—Yes, that is so.

15,291. May I just ask you this. In paragraph 17 you say: "The grounds on which the Chamber submits that it is necessary to insert in the Constitution some safeguard against the possibility of enactments unduly penalising British export trade". What you mean by "unduly penalising" is a spiteful penalising, or penalising out of political motives?—Either one or the other.

15,292. But it must be not in the due course of administration of trade interests. What you mean is, taking the whole Memorandum, that you are afraid of a penalising which is spitefully intended to do injury to British interests, or which is political in its motives?—We did not necessarily mean spitefully, Sir, but we meant some legislative enactment such as the specific duty on plain grey goods, which is now 4½ annas per pound, which entirely prevented our competing in those goods in the Indian market.

Mr. M. R. Jayaker.] You would not complain, for instance, of an arrangement in the tariff which was necessary for the purpose of raising revenue or for the legitimate protection of an Indian industry?

Mr. W. H. CATTERALL, Mr. JOHN GREY and Mr. ARTHUR R. KNOWLES.

Marquess of Salisbury.] The two things are quite different. Please distinguish between the two.

Mr. M. R. Jayaker.

15,293. I will take them one by one. You would not complain of a penalising of British export trade which was necessary, and which the Legislature and the Governor-General thought was necessary, for the purpose of raising revenue?—If it was going to be to such an extent that it was going to close our mills and make it prohibitive, it would be only natural for us to complain, would it not?

15,294. Would you call that unduly penalising British interests?—It would defeat the end of raising revenue, and we should certainly be inclined to complain if it were so high as all that.

Marquess of Reading.] Penalising is by no means confined either to spite or politics, surely, in the ordinary interpretation of the language used by the witnesses?

Sir Samuel Hoare.] Anyhow, duties as high as that could not be held to be revenue duties. If they amounted to prohibition they would not be revenue duties.

Mr. M. R. Jayaker.

15,295. That is what I mean. If India was so foolish as to put on a duty which cuts down your trade, it would hurt India itself. Surely India is sufficiently acute to realise that? Therefore, it is not likely to put on a revenue duty which would injure your trade, because it hurts India?—We are glad to hear that.

Sir Hubert Carr.

15,296. Did not you say there was one duty in action at the present time which prevents you competing?—Yes.

Mr. M. R. Jayaker.

15,297. I come to the last point about your fiscal convention. I take it from your previous answers that you do not complain against the rule which is called the fiscal convention, namely, that when the Indian Legislature and the Government of India are agreed, the Secretary of State does not interfere as a rule, except in exceptional cases?—No; we accept that.

15,298. What you complain of (correct me if I am wrong) is that the present power of the Secretary of State in the final analysis to interfere in cases of commercial discriminatory legislation should be given a statutory recognition. That is what you want, I imagine?—That is our suggestion.

15,299. Is it clear to you that, under the scheme of the White Paper, the Secretary of State's power of the nature described here is not given up? I will explain my question to you so that you may be able to answer, and I will ask your attention to two paragraphs, if you have the White Paper before you, without taking you into many technical things. If you will kindly turn to paragraph 39 you will find there the Governor-General has the power of vetoing any legislation. I do not want to take you through all the details of the Constitutional veto. The Governor-General under paragraph 39 has the right of vetoing any legislation which, in his opinion, will amount to Commercial Discrimination. That power is given to him in paragraph 39. If you will turn to another paragraph, paragraph 20, you will find there that the Governor-General acting at his own discretion, as he will be in paragraph 39, is to be guided by instructions which the Secretary of State may send him from here. That is paragraph 20?—Yes.

15,300. "The Governor-General, in administering the Departments under his own direction and control, in taking action for the discharge of any special responsibility, and in exercising any discretion." You see therefore that the Governor-General in vetoing a Bill under his special responsibilities, or at his own discretion, will be guided by the Secretary of State's instructions. Therefore I am putting it to you whether you think that, under the scheme of the White Paper, the reference to the Secretary of State in the last resort is not given up in cases of Commercial Discrimination. It is there?—Yes.

15,301. Therefore what is your grievance?—We were relieved subsequently to hear, from a reply by the Secretary of State for India to Sir Joseph Nall, that the position of the Secretary of State remained substantially as before.

15,302. If it was so, you would not complain against that?—No.

15,303. That is what you want to secure?—Yes.

Mr. W. H. CATTERALL, Mr. JOHN GREY and Mr. ARTHUR R. KNOWLES.

15,304. And, if that is secured, you have no objection to the fiscal convention being followed?—No.

Marquess of Zetland.] I am not quite clear, from what Mr. Jayaker said, whether tariff questions would come under paragraph 20 as being a special responsibility of the Governor-General.

Sir Samuel Hoare.] So far as they are affected by discrimination.

Marquess of Zetland.] But I understood the witnesses to be not only referring to discrimination; they were objecting to the undue penalising of trade. That might not be discriminatory. The Indian Legislature might impose a very high tariff on certain classes of goods coming from all countries. That might unduly penalise the Lancashire trade, but it would not be discriminatory.

Sir Samuel Hoare.] In a case of that kind the Governor-General could not intervene directly under paragraph 20.

Marquess of Zetland.] No.

Sir Samuel Hoare.] He could intervene directly under paragraph 20 in the case of discrimination, supposing there was a high tariff, and there was discrimination against British trade as distinct from, say, Japanese trade, or any other trade.

Marquess of Zetland.] That is precisely what I thought, and I wanted to bring it out, because I am not sure that the witnesses appreciate that paragraph 20, to which Mr. Jayaker referred, would not give the Secretary of State power to intervene in the case of a high tariff unless it was discriminatory.

Marquess of Reading.] May I ask one question of the Secretary of State on that. I quite follow what is said with regard to paragraph 20, which only deals with special cases; but, as far as I have understood, the constitutional position always remains the same: that is, the Governor-General and the Viceroy always remain responsible to the Secretary of State and Parliament. Other matters may be discussed; correspondence takes place, but I thought nothing that we were doing here in any sense changed that. The Governor-General's responsibility still remains to the Secretary of State. Is not that so, Secretary of State?

Sir Samuel Hoare.] Yes, certainly.

Marquess of Reading.] That is the Constitution. That is a most important question. There cannot be any doubt about that, that constitutionally that is the very basis of everything that has happened in the Constitution; that where there is a responsibility on the Viceroy and Governor-General, the Viceroy and Governor-General is not responsible to the Indian Legislature directly, but, of course, he has a responsibility, and that is to the British Parliament, exercised as it is in discussions through the Secretary of State.

Marquess of Salisbury.] It all depends on whether it is "at his discretion" or no.

Marquess of Reading.] May I point out to my noble friend that that is not quite so, if he will forgive me for saying so? I am glad to have this opportunity of doing so. I know the Secretary of State will agree with this. The words "in his discretion" have formed the subject of a good deal of discussion in the past, as to whether, when a Statute imposes an obligation on the Viceroy to exercise his discretion, that means his discretion, or his discretion controlled and supervised by the Secretary of State. I do not want to discuss it, because it passes out of discussion now by paragraph 20, and it is made perfectly plain that no question of that kind arises. Whenever it is at his discretion, as the Secretary of State has told you, he is still responsible, in the exercise of that discretion, to the Secretary of State.

Marquess of Salisbury.] I know exactly what Lord Reading says. I understand that the words "in his discretion," or sometimes in the form "at his discretion," have a special meaning in this document, meaning with the consent of the Secretary of State. Of course, one would not know that in English it had that meaning, but that is now understood.

Marquess of Reading.] I am pointing out that that is the special thing which was cleared up, if there was ever any doubt, by what the Secretary of State has said and by the White Paper. With regard to all other matters in which you do not get the specific direction, the constitutional position nevertheless remains the same throughout, that the responsibility of the Governor-General and Viceroy is to Parliament through the Secretary of State.

Lord Eustace Percy.] What was said by Lord Zetland is not correct, if he will allow me to say so. Paragraph 20 does not cover only action by the Governor-General within his special responsibility, but any action in exercising any discretion vested in him in the Constitution Act. One of those discretions vested in him in the Constitution Act is the vetoing of legislation, and therefore the position is quite correctly stated by Mr. Jayaker. It is covered by paragraph 20 completely. Is not that so, Secretary of State?

Mr. W. H. CATERALL, Mr. JOHN GREY and Mr. ARTHUR R. KNOWLES.

Sir Samuel Hoare.] Yes, it is. I was not in my answer dealing with the question of veto, because one treats that as in a different category from the more direct action in the field of special responsibility. What I was pointing out was that this does not come into the field of special responsibility.

Mr. Morgan Jones.] May I ask a question to resolve a difficulty of my own arising from Lord Zetland's question? May I ask the witnesses whether they would take objection to the imposition of a tariff, however high, by the Indian Legislature, so long as that is applied without distinction to British and other foreign goods?

Sir Samuel Hoare.] You could not very well expect them to give any other answer to that question but the answer that British traders would object to high duties.

Mr. Morgan Jones.] I am not using the word "object" in the sense of not liking it; I am using it in a stricter sense, namely, whether they would regard that as a ground for arguing that the Indian Legislature was doing something that was particularly unfair in respect of British industry itself.

Sir Austen Chamberlain.] That is the subject of half the conversations conducted by the Foreign Office on behalf of traders of this country with other countries. If such a duty is unfair we try to get it down. You cannot ask traders in this country to forego the right to ask their Government to plead their cause.

Sir John Wardlaw-Milne.] Supplementing what Mr. Morgan Jones has said, may I illustrate it by the case of a duty put on to all goods of a certain class coming into India, when, in point of fact, such goods only come from Great Britain.

Sir Samuel Hoare.] In the Indian case the issue would then arise whether it was discrimination under the special responsibilities or not. It would depend on the particular case.

Marques of Reading.] In any event, the Lancashire members would object to it.

Sir Samuel Hoare.] Certainly.

Mr. Morgan Jones.] I would like to press my point in another way. Would the witnesses take the view that the Indian Legislature ought not to have the power to impose a tariff, which in fact amounts to a prohibitive one, upon all goods, as long as they are imported goods, foreign as well as British goods?

Sir Samuel Hoare.] Have not the witnesses just answered that?

Mr. Morgan Jones

15,305. I would like to put that question?—(Mr. Barlow.) It may be difficult, but one has to endeavour to be logical, and I do not quite understand the point in this question. If we admit the principle that India has fiscal control, all we have the right to object to is discrimination. If the Government of India, in the interests of India, thinks that a certain duty is necessary, and imposes that duty on all goods that come into India, we have no right to protest. Of course, I must say that we should protest if we could. We should make a lot of fuss about it. Whether it would do any good or not I do not know.

15,306. I am quite satisfied with the answer?—But may I add a further word in reply to what Mr. Jayaker said? Is it not possible, if politics are brought into these economic matters, that it would be quite possible to discriminate, in putting a duty against a particular country? Would not it be possible to go through your imports and say, "We can hit these people on this commodity. The effect of putting up the duties on this commodity against other countries does not matter, for we do not import it from them." I am sure Mr. Jayaker would agree that that would be essential and moral discrimination against us. I am sure he would not wish to do that.

Mr. M. R. Jayaker.

15,307. What I am pointing out to you is that, according to your previous statement with which you began, that you would give to India complete freedom to regulate her tariffs and fiscal policy, you can only complain if it fell under discrimination against Britain?—Yes.

Mr. W. H. CATTERALL, Mr. JOHN GREY and Mr. ARTHUR R. KNOWLES.

15,308. Is not that so?—Certainly.

15,309. That is all I was pointing out to you, and what I was pointing out to you in paragraph 20 was that it refers to special responsibility, meaning Commercial Discrimination, and it also refers to a discretion being exercised for veto. As Lord Eustace Percy says, it covers both?—Thank you.

Sir Austen Chamberlain.

15,310. May I just add that, if you take the extreme case put by the witness, it is this, that on examination of the tariff which is set up you find that all important articles of British trade are hit by the tariff, and that it has been carefully framed with that object in view and is not perhaps directly discriminatory in the particular duty but discriminatory in its total effect?—Yes.

Sir Austen Chamberlain.] Surely that is one of the cases to be decided, as the Secretary of State says, on its merits. Discrimination does not necessarily take the form of saying that this particular duty shall be levied on British goods only and not on those coming from other parts of the world. You may discriminate in fact in other ways.

Mr. M. R. Jayaker.] Then I can only reply that I hope you will give us a Viceroy who will have the acuteness to see that it is cloaked discrimination, and you have given him the power of dealing with that under his special powers.

Earl of Derby.] If what Sir Austen Chamberlain has suggested did occur, the Viceroy under paragraph 20 would have power to intervene.

Mr. M. R. Jayaker.] I understand the witnesses say that they do not complain of India having complete freedom to regulate her tariffs and fiscal policy; they can only complain if the tariff is so regulated as to discriminate against Britain.

Sir Phiroze Sethna.] I would like to quote a sentence from the 1919 Report of the Joint Select Committee: "Whatever be the right fiscal policy for India, for the needs of her consumers as well as for her manufacturers, it is quite clear that she should have the same liberty to consider her interests as Great Britain, Australia, New Zealand, Canada and South Africa." The Secretary of State of the day, in March, 1921, in reply to a deputation from Lancashire, said as follows "After that report by an authoritative committee of both Houses and Lord Curzon's promise in the House of Lords, it was absolutely impossible for me to interfere with a right which I believe was wisely given and which I am determined to maintain, to give to the Government of India the right to consider the interests of India first, just as we, without any complaint from any other parts of the Empire, and the other parts of the Empire without any complaint from us, have always chosen the tariff arrangements which they think best fitted for their needs, thinking of their own citizens first" I do not want to pursue the point further, after the assurance the witnesses have given that, so far as the present Fiscal Convention is concerned, they have no desire to see it altered. In your prefatory note, Mr. Rodier, in paragraph 6, you express the fear that developments in the political field might place power in the hands of those who would foster a policy of trade discrimination. Do you object to trade discrimination altogether, or would you agree to trade discrimination under certain circumstances?—(Mr. Rodier.) We disagree with trade discrimination, generally speaking, but what are the special circumstances that Sir Phiroze Sethna refers to?

Sir Phiroze Sethna.

15,311. I am referring to the trade discrimination that is allowed at present, preference to British goods that we have given of our own accord; that is trade discrimination. The instance I give is this, that we are already exercising trade discrimination in favour of British goods. The Witness said on no account is he in favour of trade discrimination. I am pointing out that India is agreeable to give trade discrimination, and has given it in the case of British imports.

Marquess of Reading.] He will not object to that.

Sir Phiroze Sethna.] The Ottawa Agreement is based upon the principle of discrimination between Empire and non-Empire goods. As discrimination between Empire and non-Empire goods is found necessary, so between nationals and non-nationals where the different units of the Empire are concerned; and if discrimination becomes necessary would you still object?—I did not grasp that question.

Sir Phiroze Sethna.] I said that the Ottawa Agreement has certainly allowed for discrimination; has distinguished between Empire and non-Empire goods. My next question was: Would you object to discrimination to some extent if necessary between nationals and non-nationals?

Marquess of Salisbury.] Would you explain to the Witness what you mean by nationals?

Sir Phiroze Sethna.] By nationals I mean Indians themselves.

Lord Eustace Percy.] Do you mean Indians or do you mean persons carrying on business in India?

Sir Phiroze Sethna.] No; I meant Indians.

Marquess of Reading.] Indian nationals.

Sir Phiroze Sethna.

15,312 Indian nationals?—We should object to that.

15,313. Now, coming to your statement, in paragraph 4 you advise that there should not be too rapid a growth of the cotton industry. Will you give some indication of what you mean by too rapid a growth of industry? Are you referring to an increase in the number of so many thousands of spindles and so many thousands of looms per annum?—Yes.

15,314. Have you any limits to fix in that regard?—No, no limit.

Sir Phiroze Sethna.] Then you say you do not want a rapid growth. Will you kindly define what you mean by a rapid growth?

Marquess of Reading.] "too rapid a growth."

Sir Phiroze Sethna.

15,315. "too rapid": I beg your pardon?—(Mr. Barlow.) What we would maintain is that the indigenous production of India has grown enormously and legitimately in the last fifteen years. We give the figures on the first page of the statistics. Our general proposition is that at the present time the textile production of the world is, broadly speaking, in excess of the consumptive capacity of the world, and this question should be regarded in a philosophic manner, and the enlargement of the textile industry at any point in the world at the present moment is to be deplored.

15,316. But are you not suggesting this in the interests of the consumer, so that he may not have to pay higher prices for the goods?—We are looking at it as a general proposition, and we consider that the differentiation between the producer and the consumer upon a question like that is unwise.

15,317. But I should have thought, from what follows in the subsequent paragraphs, that it is the interests of the consumer you have at heart, so that he may get cheaper goods?—There are occasions, surely, you would agree, would you not, when the consumer gets his goods too cheaply? When the level of prices is depressed unduly he can buy certain commodities too cheaply.

15,318. And you do not want him to buy too cheaply?—We want a proper balance.

15,319. You would object to his getting the cheapest goods without the interference either of Protection or of Preference, would you?—I am afraid the world has got so complicated that it is rather difficult to envisage it without Protection and Preference, is it not?

15,320. In the present world depression you will admit, will you not, that in India it is the agriculturist who suffers more than the industrial worker?—I should imagine so, yes.

15,321. Then would it be right for the Government of India to help industries so that many agriculturists might find profitable employment, and, becoming industrial workers, their standard of living would become higher?—I should say there is a great deal to be said for that policy, but it is a question of degree and balance, and if you are directing the question specifically to the textile industry, I would reply that the enlargement of your industry in the last two decades has been remarkable and one upon which you deserve congratulation. It is not desirable to stimulate too strongly any particular industry at too rapid a rate. In principle I would, personally, agree with what you have just said.

15,322. Then you would not like us to progress at the same rate in the next two decades?—I think it is dangerous to isolate India in this purely economic question from the general complex of the world structure of the textile organisation.

Mr. W. H. CATTERALL, Mr. JOHN GREY and Mr. ARTHUR R. KNOWLES.

Sir John Wardlaw-Milne.] Would Sir Phiroze allow me to ask one supplementary question?

Sir Phiroze Sethna.] Certainly.

Sir John Wardlaw-Milne.

15,323. As I understand your answer to his question, your difficulty is that if prices are too cheap the agriculturist will not be able to get proper prices for his product because of the general lowering of the level of prices?—Yes.

15,324. That is your only objection to a continual cheapening of prices?—The cheaper prices are the better. As a general proposition it is surely desirable that everything should be as cheap as possible, but we cannot isolate any particular commodity in this complex, and if one is unduly depressed it means that that section is suffering, and nobody desires really any section to suffer.

Sir Phiroze Sethna.

15,325. In paragraph 7, as also in paragraph 29, you refer to the Ottawa Agreement, where Lancashire promised to help India by endeavouring to get more Indian cotton consumed. May we know what efforts have been made in that direction so far, or if any success has been achieved or is likely to be achieved?—(Mr. Rodier.) The matter engaged our attention and the attention of Lancashire, as soon as the Ottawa Agreement was reached; and at once before we arrived at Ottawa a Committee was set up to enquire into this matter, and since then the Chamber of Commerce has formulated a Committee of Merchants to enquire into it. The British Cotton Growing Association have been communicated with to do all they can to foster it, and also special meetings have been held by the Chamber of Commerce in Manchester, with exhibitions of many kinds of cloth made from Indian cotton in order to examine them and to show to the merchants and consumers what goods can be made from Indian cotton. There has been a meeting this week of this Merchants' Committee. I should just like to add this point, that with regard to the rather course counts that you can spin from Indian cotton, that specific duty to which I referred before, of $4\frac{3}{4}$ annas per pound, is so high that it would be impossible for Lancashire to export goods of that category into India, as this week we hear that a large quantity of goods have been sold wholesale at $9\frac{3}{4}$ annas a pound. That means that the duty of $4\frac{3}{4}$ annas would represent the cost of the raw material or be equivalent almost to the labour costs in Britain; but in order to give you a fuller reply to that question, Sir, may I ask Mr. Grey, my colleague, to say a few words upon that point?

15,326 Certainly?—(Mr. Grey.) My Lord Chairman, we are using every endeavour in Lancashire to encourage as far as possible the use of Indian cotton. As Mr. Rodier has pointed out, no doubt you are familiar with the fact that there is a great deal of Indian cotton that can only be used in relatively low qualities of yarns and fabrics, and in the main those are not Lancashire productions. But I might say here as a Director of the Lancashire Cotton Corporation that we are using ourselves between twenty and thirty thousand bales of Indian cotton every year, and that use we are endeavouring to extend and to encourage its extension amongst all our spinners and our weavers. Of course, we realise this, that India will judge the question as to how many bales eventually are you able to take. We are not only pushing it by way of propaganda, but at the Shirley Institute the British Cotton Research Association are bending all their endeavours to devise machinery for the cleaning of Indian cotton to make it much more extensively usable for Lancashire productions. I might say that they are meeting with a very considerable measure of success, and that success will not possibly apply or be applicable to Lancashire alone. Any invention which improves the use or facilitates the use of Indian cotton will immediately become worldwide, and any mechanical device which makes it possible for Indian cotton to substitute American cotton will be very speedily available not only to Lancashire producers but to Indian producers, to Continental producers and producers all over the world. We are rendering, I claim, a very great service to the Indian cotton grower in that we are doing all we can to encourage the use of Indian cotton not only in Lancashire but all over the world by making it a substitute for the higher priced cottons 15,327. Mr. Grey, will you tell us what is the present consumption of Indian cotton in Lancashire—how many thousand bales?—I could not say from memory.

Sir Austen Chamberlain.] My Lord Chairman, is that last question or questions on those lines really material to what the Committee has to consider? I quite appreciate it is of interest to Indian Delegates and to Lancashire representatives, but it really does not help us in the consideration of this Constitutional question.

Mr. M. R. Jayaker.] May I point out, my Lord Chairman, that it is material, because one of the things these gentlemen want is a trade agreement, and Sir Phiroze Sethna's questions are intended to prove how far they have been able to carry out their own trade agreements at Ottawa. That is the relevancy of the question.

Sir Phiroze Sethna.] And the Witness has referred to it in two places, paragraphs 17 and 19.

Sir Samuel Hoare.] Are we really going into the details of a possible trade agreement? I should have thought if we do we should never end anywhere.

Marquess of Reading.] Surely it does not come within the deliberations of this Joint Select Committee.

Sir Phiroze Sethna.

15,328. I would not have put that question if it had not been referred to in the Memorandum, but if my Lord Chairman thinks I should not take up the time of the Committee I will pass on to the next question. We are very thankful to the witnesses for the very excellent Tables they have added to their Memorandum. At the end of Table 1 (a) in the last column you show that India's consumption per head has actually fallen. I hope I am justified in putting that question and that no objection is to be taken to the same. This shows, Mr.

Rodier, that the purchasing power of the Indian people has become less and less, does it not?—(Mr. Rodier.) The figure of 13.8, do you mean?

15,329. That is the one I am referring to?—It is lower than pre-war, but it is not very marked on the average.

15,330. Now in regard to paragraph 15 Mr. Jayaker asked you questions about the boycott. I certainly hold that a boycott did do harm to the Lancashire trade in India, but you are suggesting a safeguard in the Constitution Act. Do you not think that, as Mr. Jayaker put it, more than a safeguard in the Constitution Act, good will on both sides, will prove more useful, because no amount of safeguard will compel people to buy goods which they do not want to buy?—Undoubtedly.

Sir Phiroze Sethna.] Now in paragraph 23 you refer to Articles 11 and 15 of the Anglo-Canadian Agreement, and you suggest an Indo-British Agreement on similar lines. May I ask if in such Agreement you would agree to the inclusion of what is known as Article 10 in the Anglo-Canadian Agreement, which is as follows: "His Majesty's Government in Canada undertake that protection by tariffs shall be afforded against United Kingdom products only to those industries which are reasonably assured of sound opportunities for success."

Marquess of Reading.] May I ask, my Lord Chairman, what the bearing of this part of the discussion would have upon the matters that the Joint Select Committee has to consider? Of course they may be very interesting matters to discuss on the Ottawa Agreement.

Earl Winterton.] May I point out to the noble Lord that it is only fair to say that it is the witnesses who have raised this question in the last paragraph of their Memorandum.

Sir Austen Chamberlain.] The Committee is really not bound by what the witnesses have raised.

Earl Winterton.] I was not suggesting for a moment that they were.

Marquess of Reading.] Really the only point I am raising is more in the interests of the time of the Committee. It was simply, however, interesting these questions might be, and although they are raised, I agree, but the witnesses, nevertheless they are not matters which we as a Joint Select Committee will have to deal.

Mr. W. H. CATTERALL, Mr. JOHN GREY and Mr. ARTHUR R. KNOWLES.

Sir Phiroze Sethna.] It is a matter which from my point of view will contribute to a better understanding between Lancashire and India. That is the reason why I put the question. If you will allow me, my Lord Chairman, I will request the witnesses to answer it, otherwise I will not.

Earl Winterton.] Would not the witnesses be prepared to answer it?—Really it is extremely difficult for this Committee to discuss the last paragraph of the Memorandum.

Sir Samuel Hoare.] Is not the position, my Lord Chairman, really this: I think we are all agreed that we should like to see a Treaty of this kind; I think everybody is agreed about that, both Indians and British members of the Committee. The witnesses have drawn attention to this Treaty—I think we all accept it—but when it comes to going into the details of a Trade Agreement, that must be a matter between one Government and another, and I should have thought we could not go into that kind of detail here.

Chairman.] Sir Phiroze will appreciate that according to the procedure which governs our business the members of the Committee and the Delegates sitting with them will naturally be very largely guided by the feeling of the Committee as a whole upon a matter of this kind. I do not rule out Sir Phiroze's question, but I merely draw the attention of Sir Phiroze to the general feeling of the Committee upon it.

Sir Phiroze Sethna.

15,331. I have only one more question to ask, and that is in relation to paragraph 27. Mr. Rodier, I join with Mr. Jayaker, and I am sure every Indian Delegate is at one with us, in what you said in regard to the negotiations which have so happily started, and we trust that they will be the beginning of more cordial relations in the future. In view of that, and in view of what you yourself said, that co-operation and federations are better than arguments, would you not think it advisable to withdraw that paragraph, because the implication of that paragraph amounts to this, that you would like India to continue in perpetuity to supply the markets for British manufactured goods and not attempt to develop her indigenous industries?—No; we do not agree to that.

Sir Phiroze Sethna.] That is the clear implication of that paragraph, as I read it.

Sir Austen Chamberlain.

15,332. May we ask the witnesses whether they intended to convey that impression by the paragraph?—Emphatically, no. We want fair, reciprocal treatment for our trade.

Sir Hari Singh Gour.

15,333. Gentlemen, I also congratulate you on the tone of your Memorandum and the Preface to it. Now, frequent references have been made in your Memorandum and in the questions put to you to India's Fiscal Convention, and Sir Phiroze Sethna read to you a passage from the Report of the Joint Select Committee of Parliament on the Government of India Bill, to the following effect: "Whatever be the right Fiscal policy for India, for the needs of her consumers as well as for her manufacturers, it is quite clear that she should have the same liberty to consider her interests as Great Britain, Australia, New Zealand, Canada and South Africa." You agree with that view?—Yes.

Chairman.] Sir Hari Singh Gour, I trust you will not duplicate matters which have already been put to the witnesses. Unless I misunderstand, precisely the same question was put by Sir Phiroze Sethna and they gave the same answer.

Sir Hari Singh Gour.] But the next question is a more pertinent question, and I could not put the next question without putting the introductory question.

Chairman.] I still hope that Sir Hari Singh Gour will avoid duplication.

Sir Hari Singh Gour.

15,334. Yes. (To the Witness.) Now, having agreed with that, you are in favour of placing India in the same position as Canada, so that she may be effectively in a position to exercise her Fiscal autonomy?—Subject to the con-tions that we have discussed before with the Secretary of State.

Sir Hari Singh Gour.] How do you reconcile the existence of those conditions with the general statement to which you accede, and to which I have drawn your attention?

Lord Eustace Percy.] My Lord Chairman, I wonder if I might suggest that we are here to find out from the witnesses what is their view and their opinion? Having found that out, I do not think it is very profitable to try to discover the mental processes, logical or illogical, by which they have arrived at those views and opinions.

Sir Hari Singh Gour.] That is all, my Lord Chairman.

Sir John Wardlaw-Milne.

15,335. There is only one question that I want to put to the witnesses, and that refers to their paragraph 15, Part II, of the original paper, the last line. You ask, in effect, in connection with boycott, that the Joint Select Committee should suggest some means by which there will be a right to prevent measures of the kind, that is, boycott measures, being put into operation. Do you seriously consider that it is possible, if it were right, to put words into an Act which will prevent a boycott being carried out in India?—We feel it is desirable but, as we are not constitutional lawyers, we could not suggest how it should be done.

15,336. You would merely desire to put on record that we should do something which you are unable to do?—Yes.

15,337. You cannot suggest any means by which it could be done?—We could not get an agreement in our Organisation as to how it should be done or how to do it.

15,338. You realize, in fact, that it is impossible to suggest any?—We are not prepared to agree to that. (Mr. Barlow.) Nothing is impossible to a body like yours.

Sir Reginald Craddock.

15,339. There is one question I wanted to put. To go back to paragraph 16 and Proposal 124 in the White Paper, you certainly, Mr. Rodier, expressed some apprehension about the working of Proposal 124. Are your apprehensions satisfied now entirely on that point?—(Mr. Rodier.) I think the replies given explain more clearly than the section itself.

15,340. I may be wrong about this, but I would like to put one case: Supposing you had certain tariffs on the import of cotton goods which are designed partly for revenue and partly for protection of Indian cotton goods, then having arrived at that, to which you could take no exception I understand, bounties might be given to millowners in India, apparently, under that Proposal, which bounties would be in the nature of a further protection over and above the tariff to Indian mills. But I understand that you have no objection to such a proposal?—There may be objection to that, but we should have no greater objection to it than if the tariff were raised—the same sort of objection.

15,341. But might it not be an indirect method of raising the tariff, so to speak? It would enable the Indian millowners to sell their goods more cheaply than they could otherwise have done, which would give them a further benefit over and above the protection which they receive by the road of tariffs?—(Mr. Barlow.) My Lord Chairman, this is a very difficult question to answer, but I should have thought it was more or less covered by what we have said.

15,342. I do not think it is?—There is no case surely for giving a bounty or subsidy to a well-established industry. The justification, if ever there is a justification for a bounty, is for a nascent industry which in the national interests of the country should exist, but we regard subsidies with alarm. We think they are a pernicious instrument, but we cannot on that account go so far as to come and ask you that you should make Constitutional arrangements against them.

Sir Joseph Nall.

15,343. If, as a result of the trade agreement as suggested in the witnesses' Memorandum, their case is met, they would desire, would they not, that any conditions created by a trade agreement should not be afterwards frustrated by bounties to local producers?—(Mr. Rodier.) Yes, which would merely frustrate the agreement.

15,344. Therefore to that extent having achieved agreement in a trade agreement, you would desire that the provision relating to bounties should be so safeguarded that it should not ultimately frustrate the trade agreement?—Yes.

Mr. W. H. CATTERALL, Mr. JOHN GREY and Mr. ARTHUR R. KNOWLES.

Mr. M. R. Jayaker.

15,345. You do not suggest that this should be put in the Constitution as a rule?—Such an act is moral discrimination, is it not?

Sir Samuel Hoare.

15,346. Would it not be subject to the trade agreement itself? The conditions of the trade agreement would presumably be such as to make such an action impossible.

Sir Joseph Nall.] Therefore the Constitution should be such that it would not enable the trade agreement to be overridden by further Government action. The Constitution should contain provisions which would prevent further Government action frustrating the trade agreement.

Sir Samuel Hoare.

15,347. I would not at all be led into saying Yes to a general question of that kind. It must depend on the trade agreement. We are not, and I do not think the witnesses are, contemplating the trade agreement being scheduled?—No.

Sir Joseph Nall.] No, but, on the other hand, we are discussing Constitutional matters in advance of the proposed trade agreement, and the decision on the Constitutional matters may be very largely governed by what emerges in the trade agreement.

Mr. M. R. Jayaker.] We did not put any questions on the trade agreement because, as the witnesses say, they are outside the scope of the Committee, but, if Sir Joseph Nall is going to pursue all the ramifications of the trade agreement, we must have the liberty of examining the witnesses upon it.

Sir Joseph Nall.] I am not for a moment endeavouring to pursue the ramifications of the trade agreement. I am referring to such agreements as have been reached by the Delegation in India. As I understand the witnesses, their references to a trade agreement are to something which will ultimately emerge from the discussions in India. All I am asking on this point relating to agreements and bounties, is that in discussing these safeguards about discrimination and the Governor-General's powers under paragraphs 20 and 39 it would be entirely fallacious to ignore the possibility of bounties being used for the ultimate frustration of the trade agreement.

Sir Samuel Hoare.] I am sure this must be a matter for discussion by the Committee afterwards. I would only say now I do not accept Sir Joseph Nall's view.

Earl of Derby.] Nor do a great many others of us.

Sir Austen Chamberlain.] I would just mention to Sir Joseph that the protection which he thinks should be provided should find its place in the agreement itself.

Marquess of Salisbury.] But it is evidently legitimate to put a question to the witnesses as to whether certain alterations ought not to be made in the White Paper in order to prevent any interference with such a trade agreement under the bounties proposition. It seems to be quite relevant.

Marquess of Lothian.] Surely that is covered by the provisions against discrimination. Surely the only objection would be if the action was discriminatory.

Sir Joseph Nall.

15,348. I take it the witnesses would wish to avoid the possibility of bounties being used to frustrate the intention of the trade agreement?—Yes.

Sir Joseph Nall.] Arising from Mr. Barlow's answers on the expansion of industry, I take it that the witnesses are aware that evidence from Indian sources has been given to the Committee on that very matter in the Bengal Trades Union Memorandum, Memorandum 55, Volume IIC, page 58.

Chairman.

15,349. Are the witnesses aware of that? Yes. (Mr. Barlow.) I was not aware of it.

Lord Rankeillour.

15,350. May I call attention for a moment to paragraph 18 of your Memorandum, Mr. Rodier? You state there that you do not wish to suggest any form of words to secure the protection against discrimination, and so on, that you desire. May I ask if you have read the evidence of Sir Alan Anderson on behalf of the Associated Chambers of Commerce?—(Mr. Rodier.) Yes.

15,351. You remember he accepted a suggestion that he should take legal opinion as to what form of words he thought would be effective?—Yes.

15,352. May I suggest, from my own experience, that it is better to try to find your form of words than to trust to an overworked draftsman?—Might I suggest that you should get a draftsman who was not overworked?

15,353. The Parliamentary draftsman habitually is overworked when the Session comes on. Passing from that, you refer to certain proceedings in Ceylon. Can you refer me to the dates of those proceedings?—Yes, the year 1932, February 11th and 12th, May 25th, and the year 1933, January 17th and 18th.

Marquess of Salisbury.

15,354. I want to be quite clear, if I might put a question or two which will make it perfectly clear to the Committee exactly how you stand. You are afraid that there is a possibility of political action which would act as undue discrimination against British trade?—We would not like to put it as a possibility; we should like to safeguard ourselves against the probability of it.

Sir Austen Chamberlain.] Did not the witness mean the other way round, that they would not like to put it as a probability, but they would like to safeguard themselves against the possibility?

Marquess of Salisbury.] I understood the witness to say that.

Sir Austen Chamberlain.] No, he used the words the other way round.

Marquess of Salisbury.

15,355. I am very much obliged. For the purpose of protecting British trade you have been referred to paragraphs 20 and 39 in the White Paper?—Yes.

Marquess of Salisbury.] Those are protections against legislative discrimination, are they not? Paragraph 20 is. I ought to be more accurate. That is a protection against legislative discrimination, is it not, because it only refers to the power of disallowing statutes.

Marquess of Reading.] Is that so?

Marquess of Salisbury.] Is that not so?

Marquess of Reading.] I think you are wrong. Paragraph 20 refers to administrative action as well. I think paragraph 39 is the one you have in mind.

Marquess of Salisbury.] I cannot say how grateful I am for being put right.

Marquess of Reading.] It is only a question of getting the number right.

Marquess of Salisbury.

15,356. Let me put it quite generally. It is possible to have provisions protecting British trade against undue legislative discrimination, but you do not think it is possible to have rules which will protect you against administrative discrimination, except in so far as they are exercised by the Governor or the Governor-General in their special responsibilities. Is that so? Let me put it quite generally. You have no proposal to make for an alteration in the White Paper. Have you any proposal?—No.

15,357. You have no proposal?—No.

Marquess of Salisbury.] Thank you.

Marquess of Zetland.] My Lord Chairman, Lord Salisbury just expressed great gratitude for having been put right over paragraph 20. I want to express equal gratitude for having been put right over paragraph 20 by Lord Eustace Percy. I admit that I had overlooked the fact that paragraph 20 does cover the constitutional right which the Governor-General has of vetoing legislation, and if, in my previous interruption, I suggested that Mr. Jayaker had given a misleading interpretation, I wish to offer him my profound apologies.

Lord Rankeillour.] But Lord Salisbury was not fully put right.

Marquess of Zetland.

15,358. The question that arises out of this that I want to ask the witnesses is this: It being the case that under paragraph 20 the Secretary of State apparently would have the last word with regard to any proposal by the Governor-General to veto a legislative enactment, is not the security which they ask for in paragraph 21 in connection with the fiscal convention already provided for? You agree that it is provided for?—Yes; we are glad to hear that it is.

Marquess of Zetland.] That is all I want to ask you.

Mr. Isaac Foot.

15,359. One question which follows the question put by Mr. Morgan Jones. Taking the illustration of Australia, of whom it is complained that they have put duties of 100 or 200 per cent upon hosiery goods going from this country, protests have been made against that duty, and representations have been made by the Department concerned. Supposing India was unwise enough to put upon cotton goods correspondingly high duties as compared with the hosiery duty in Australia, does your Delegation ask for any greater power in dealing with India than we have at present in dealing with Australia?—We ask for the power that has been brought out and formulated in the discussions this morning which is rather different from Australia.

Mr. Isaac Foot.] May I put that in this way? You do not ask, do you, for any limitation of Indian fiscal autonomy that would put them in a worse position than Australia as compared with ourselves.

Chairman.

15,360. If any uncertainty in your mind about the exact position of Australia makes it difficult for you to answer the question, I am sure you have only to tell the Committee so.—(Mr. Barlow.) It is a little difficult to understand the reason for this question, my Lord Chairman. We understand the position that has been explained to us this morning. We accept that position. Is not that answer adequate?

Mr. Isaac Foot.

15,361. I understand the position of the Delegation is that they consider that the future of their industry depends ultimately upon goodwill and complete friendship between the Indian people and ourselves. That is the real basis?—Certainly.

Sir Samuel Hoare.

15,362. I have only one question to put to the witnesses, and I put it because I think it is possible that one of the questions, and one of the answers that the witnesses gave, may be open to misapprehension by the public outside. There was a question asked the witnesses as to whether they were in favour of cheap goods for the consumers in India, and the answer that they gave may have given the impression that they were not in favour of cheap goods for the Indian consumers. Should I be right in saying that their general position is this, that in any industry where there is a glut, and where prices inevitably fall to an uneconomic standard, the ultimate result is not cheap goods for the consumer, but expensive goods for the consumer, from the fact that there is a crisis in the industry and probably, and almost certainly, large numbers of factories close down their businesses, the result of a glut being, therefore, worse prices for the consumers rather than better prices for the consumers. Is not that their general position in regard to the questions which were asked about cheap goods this morning?—I think the proper answer (I am afraid I am responsible for this misunderstanding, my Lord Chairman) is that it is obvious as a general proposition that the cheaper goods are the better, and especially is it desirable in a country like India, where so large a proportion of the population are poor agriculturists, that they should have cheap goods, but, where you have a general level of low prices, and goods being sold below the cost of production, whether they are manufactured goods or agricultural products, that is a condition that should be, if possible, avoided, and it is not in the general interests of the community that a big section of goods, however produced, and from whatever industry, should be sold below the cost of production, because the ultimate effect on the economy of the country, if one of its vital industries is in distress, is disastrous for every body. I hope that makes it clear.

Sir Samuel Hoare.] That makes it quite clear to me.

Chairman.] We are greatly obliged to you gentlemen for having given evidence this morning.

Mr. DOUGLAS DEWAR is called in and examined as follows:--

Chairman.

15,777. Mr. Douglas Dewar, you served in the Indian Civil Service from 1898 until 1924?—Yes, my Lord Chairman.

15,778. And, amongst other appointments, you held that of Accountant-General, Bombay, from 1914-15, officiating Comptroller and Auditor-General in 1920?—Yes.

15,779. And Accountant-General in the Punjab from 1921 to 1924?—Yes.

15,780. You are now retired?—Yes.

15,781. You have been good enough to prepare two memoranda for the Committee which you have handed in. They are Nos 75 and 76?—Yes, they are as follows:—

MEMORANDUM 75 BY D. DEWAR, I.C.S. (RETIRED).

Précis of Evidence.

Although I have taken the utmost possible care in the preparation of this précis, the time at my disposal has been insufficient to enable me to undertake the revision of the text of the MS. and the figures which is so desirable in a report of its complexity.

In my opinion the White Paper proposals are objectionable because their adoption would impose a grievous financial burden on the people of India.

In support of this opinion I will adduce statistics showing that

(1) for many years India was very lightly taxed under British administration,

(2) the burden of taxation has been greatly increased of recent years,

(3) much of this increase is the result of the recent administrative changes in the Government of India,

(4) the changes recommended in the White Paper will result in still heavier taxation.

Much of the income of the British administration in India is derived from sources other than taxation, e.g., that from the land, forests, opium, railways, irrigation, etc. Those who pay revenue under such heads receive a tangible return, such as the right to hold a given area of land, or to receive forest produce, etc.

The only kinds of taxes paid by Indians for which no direct return, other than services rendered by the State, are Customs, Income Tax, Salt Duty, Excise Duties, Stamp Duties, Scheduled taxes and Registration Duties.

The following table shows (in lakhs of rupees) the revenues (Central and Provincial) in the years 1864-65, 1911-12, 1930-31.

1864-65. 1911-12. 1930-31

Source of Revenue—

Customs, Salt, Excise, Stamps, Income Tax, Registration ...	1,330	3,666	10,082
Other Sources ...	2,298	8,759	9,918
Total ...	4,628	12,425	20,600

Thus during the 47 years previous to 1911-12 taxation revenue increased by Rs.2,336 lakhs, while during the 19 subsequent years the increase was Rs.7,016 lakhs.

These increases are due to several factors, such as increase in the wealth of the people, growth of population, acquisition of Burma and increase in the rate of taxation. The only objectionable factor, from the point of view of the taxpayer is the last. I will deal with it alone.

In the year 1864-65, the taxes in force of the kind we are now considering were:

A tax on salt at the rate of Rs.2-12 a maund (82 lbs.).

A tax on all incomes from Rs.200 to Rs.500 per annum at the rate of 4 pies in the rupee, and on incomes over Rs.500 at the rate of 6 pies in the rupee.

Customs duties, a 7½ per cent. ad valorem duty on imports and an export duty of 2 annas a maund on grain.

Excise and Stamp duties, the rates of which I have not been able to ascertain.

The tax on salt was reduced from Rs.2½ to Rs.2 per maund in 1882, again raised to Rs.2½ in 1887, and then reduced to Rs.2 in 1903, to Re.1½ in 1905 and Re.1 in 1907.

The income tax (which had been introduced as a temporary imposition in 1860 in order to assist in the rehabilitation of India after the Mutiny) was abolished in 1865-66; but in order to make good part of the loss of revenue some extra Customs duties were imposed.

When taking off the income tax the Finance Minister, Sir C. E. Trevelyan, said, "As a potent but imperfect fiscal machine, it should be regarded as the great financial reserve of the country, and it will now be laid on the shelf complete in all its gear, ready to be imposed in case of any new emergency." Bad seasons, however, led to the reimposition in 1867-68 of a tax on incomes in the form of a licence on trades and professions, but this was in force only about 2 years. Bad seasons again led in 1877-78 to the reimposition of a licence tax on trades, and the Burmese War caused this tax in 1886 to be converted into an income tax, on non-agricultural incomes only, at the rate of 4 pies in the rupee on those between Rs.500 and Rs.2,000 per annum and 5 pies on all larger incomes. It remained at this rate until 1916.

As to the Customs duties, the increase in 1865-66 already referred to, consisted of an export duty of 3 per cent. ad valorem on jute, wool, tea and coffee and 2 per cent. on hides, sugar and silk. In 1875 the import duty was reduced from $7\frac{1}{2}$ to 5 per cent., and many articles were completely exempted. Import duties were entirely abolished in 1882, but were reimposed at the rate of 5 per cent. ad valorem (with an equal excise duty) in 1894. The duties remained at this rate until 1916.

From the foregoing it is apparent that the rates of taxation were considerably lower before the War broke out in 1914 than they had been fifty years earlier; Excise duties, however, were higher, having been increased from time to time, mainly with the object of discouraging excess of drinking and drug-taking and, at the same time, not giving too great a temptation to illicit production.

Despite the fact that the rate of taxation had diminished the total revenue of the Indian Administration was nearly doubled between 1865 and 1914, and the proceeds of the taxes of the kind we are now considering was nearly quadrupled—this despite several bad failures of the monsoon in the period and the great fall in the gold value of the rupee. Notwithstanding this reduction in the rate of taxation the amount spent on education and public health steadily grew. The expenditure by the U.P. Government on Education was Rs.133 lakhs in 1885, Rs.177 in 1901, about Rs.300 in 1906, and Rs.614 in 1916. In the United Provinces the number of primary schools rose from 4,758 in 1890 to 8,601 in 1903, and the number of hospitals and dispensaries from 212 to 500. As evidence of the betterment of the condition of the poorest classes it may be noted that in the U.P. between 1880 and 1903 (in which year the salt duty was lowered) the consumption of salt rose from 2.4 to 3.3 seers per head per annum.

Thus Robert Knight's assertion "India does not know what taxation means" was hardly an exaggeration during the period 1860-1916. India, in common with almost every country in the world, suffered financially from the effects of the Great War, but not nearly so severely as many countries. In 1916-7 the Salt Tax was increased from Rs.1 to Rs.1 $\frac{1}{4}$, the import duties raised from 5 per cent. ($3\frac{1}{2}$ in the case of cotton fabrics) to $7\frac{1}{2}$ per cent., the duties on liquor and tobacco were raised, and the Income Tax was increased from 5 to 6 pies in the rupee on incomes from Rs.5,000 to Rs.10,000 per annum, and 9 pies on those from Rs.10,000 to Rs.25,000 and 12 pies on those over Rs.25,000. In 1918 a Super Tax was imposed which was as high as 3 annas in the rupee on incomes in excess of Rs.50,000. Thus, even after the Great War, taxation in India was little, if any, higher than it was in 1865. The great increase in the revenue receipts was, to quote from the Cambridge History of India (Vol. VI, p. 333), "due mainly to the greater wealth and prosperity of the country and the development of the commercial services which accounted for over 25 per cent. of the gross revenues. The unproductive debt which had sunk to the low figure of £3,000,000 in 1915, had risen under the stress of war to £67,000,000; but the greater part of the debt (at the end of 1917-18), viz. £283,000,000 had been incurred on works of a productive character. When the period under review (1858-1918) opened, India was almost unequipped with the public utility services of a modern state, while its finances were liable to be paralysed by the frequent occurrence of disastrous famines. Without its system of railways and canals, the commercial and industrial development of the country, reflected in the increase of its revenues, would have been impossible; and by the protection they ensured, these undertakings had so far mitigated the effects of the uncertainty of the weather that famines in their former severity had become things of the past. The two outstanding achievements of the era were the financing of these great public works during a period of great monetary stress and the stabilising of the currency by the setting up of the gold exchange standard. The latter not only served its immediate purpose by rescuing the finances of the state from the depths of depression into which they had fallen, but, when perfected, permitted of the building up of a substantial gold reserve without trenching on the ordinary income. The best evidence of its success was its wide imitation throughout the East."

During this period of development the Indianisation of all the higher Administrative and Judicial services had been progressing steadily, and my own experience was that the Indian and European members of the services pulled well together in double harness.

Effect of the Montagu-Chelmsford Reforms.

It was recognised before their introduction that the Montagu-Chelmsford Reforms would involve heavy extra expenditure, especially in the Provinces; accordingly a Committee, presided over by Lord Meston, was formed to formulate a plan under which the Provinces were to receive a larger share of the general revenues of India in order that they would have a sufficient surplus to inaugurate the new costly Councils without the necessity of resorting to fresh taxation. Under the Meston scheme it was estimated that the spending power of the Provinces would be increased by Rs.867 lakhs. Despite this at the end of 1921-22, the first complete year under the reforms, the Provincial deficit was Rs.874 lakhs (vide Simon Report, Vol. I (p. 353)), while the deficit of the Government of India was Rs 2,800 lakhs.

Thus at the end of the first year of the Montagu-Chelmsford Reforms the Provincial and the Central Governments found themselves in financial difficulties. Many complaints were made of the Meston distribution of the revenue; how far these were justified I am unable to say, but a great trouble was that the expenditure of the Government's new administration greatly exceeded the revenue.

For the first few years after the reform the financial condition of the provincial Governments was less unfavourable than that of the Central Government because their annual subventions to the latter under the Meston Scheme diminished in each successive year, and, from 1927-28 entirely ceased. In consequence of this and of the increase in taxation immediately after the reforms most of them were able more or less to balance their budgets until the prices of agricultural produce began to fall. In 1929-30 the expenditure of the following Provincial Governments exceeded the revenue:—Bengal, Assam, Bihar and Orissa, Burma, Punjab and the Central Provinces and Berar.

In the year 1930-31 the expenditure of every province exceeded its revenue, the excess ranging from 34½ lakhs in Assam to 181 lakhs in Bombay. Again in 1931-32 the expenditure of all the provinces exceeded revenue, the excess varying from 34 lakhs in the case of Assam to 206½ in that of Bengal (vide Whittaker). I have not seen the final figures for 1932-33, but I understand that nearly all the Provinces spent more than they received in taxes.

As will be seen from the following figures, the revenue of the Provincial Governments has been falling of late years.

It will be noticed that the Punjab is the only Province in which the revenue under these heads did not fall off considerably between 1927-28 and 1931-32, the latest year for which I have been able to obtain the figures. The revenue of the Punjab under these heads did not fall in the period because the opening of new canals increased the land revenue from 316 lakhs in 1927-28 to 371 in 1931-32. In the U.P., where the land is assessed at a high rate, the recent fall in prices rendered it impossible to collect the revenue demand; in consequence a Rent and Revenue Committee was formed to enquire into the matter, and on the recommendation of this Committee it was decided to lower the annual revenue demand by 110 lakhs.

To cope with this fall in revenue, the provinces had to effect further economies.

The Government of the U.P. write (Annual Administration Report, 1930-31): "Owing to a series of misfortunes, chief among which was the fall in prices, provincial expenditure exceeded resources in three out of the last four years, i.e., 1928-29, 1930-31 and in 1931-32."

The report anticipated that the Province will have a deficit of 300 lakhs by the end of 1932-33. This, despite retrenchments, in the last two years to the extent of over 135 lakhs. "Of this the cut in pay has produced 40½ lakhs; the acceptance of various recommendations of the Retrenchment Committee has produced 13 lakhs; while the retrenchment effected by Government and its officers amounts to 82 lakhs. Other savings will be made by executive order or by reduction in demands, amounting to 9 lakhs. Still further measures, such as reduction of pay for new entrants to the services, are under consideration."

In addition to these savings, Government asked in their budget for new taxation to yield 30 lakhs, but even with this a deficit of 30 lakhs in the budget for 1932-33 was anticipated. The Report says, "The financial position of the Province is depressing. . . . It has to adjust itself on the basis of a lower revenue. . . . Government are determined to save as much as possible by means of retrenchment, but additional taxation is essential, and it may be necessary, when the Province has fully exhausted all means of retrenchment, to ask the Government of India to fund so much of the deficit as remains." The Government hoped, however, to reduce by economies and additional taxation the deficit to 100 lakhs in four years time.

Thus, despite the most drastic economies and cutting down of expenditure on roads, etc., and a reduction by 9½ lakhs of its contribution to the District Boards, the U.P. Government is financially in difficulties. The trouble is, of course, not by any means entirely due to the extra cost of the administration owing to the reforms hitherto granted. One cause is the fall in agricultural prices which are 7 per cent. below the 1914 level. On the other hand, India has of recent years been singularly fortunate in that there has not been a serious failure of the monsoon. A failure of the monsoon means a heavy fall in revenue and considerable increase in expenditure. On an average such a failure occurs every seven or eight years, and, during the interval, each Government tries to build up a big famine fund on which to draw when the monsoon fails. So far from being able to do this during the past years of good monsoons, nearly all the Governments are heavily in debt. Should the monsoon fail in the near future their plight will indeed be bad.

The reports of the other Provinces show that the plight of most of them is similar to that of the U.P.

Despite rigid economies, cuts in pay and reduction of staffs, curtailment of expenditure on upkeep of roads and buildings and in grants to local boards, most of the Provinces are not paying their way, and the Central Government has only with the greatest difficulty done so.

The Government of India has had repeatedly to increase its rate of taxation since the introduction of the Montagu Chelmsford Reforms.

The taxes at present levied under the heads we have been considering are:—

Salt Tax is Rs.1½ per maund.

Income Tax as follows on non-agricultural incomes.—

Amount of Annual Income.	Rate of Tax per rupee of income.
	Pres.
Rs.1,000	4
Rs.2,000	7½
Rs.5,000	11½
Rs.10,000	15
Rs.15,000	20
Rs.20,000	23½
Rs.30,000	28½
Rs.40,000	31½
Rs.1,00,000	32½
All incomes of Companies ...	32½

Super Tax as follows:—

On incomes of Hindu undivided families over Rs.75,000 per annum at rates ranging from 18½ pies to 93½ pies per rupee of income.

On incomes over Rs.50,000 per annum of companies at 15 pies per rupee.

On all other incomes in excess of Rs.30,000 at rates from 11½ pies to 93½ pies per rupee.

Customs duties as follows:—

Twenty-five per cent. ad valorem duty on most imports. (A few commodities are less highly taxed, such as cotton twist, yarn and thread on which the import duty is 6½ per cent., and raw hemp, artificial silk yarn and thread, on which the duty is 18½ per cent. Sugar, motor cars and other luxuries pay more than 25 per cent. duty, that on sugar being about 16 per cent. The general import duty on spirits is Rs.37 As.8 per gallon, on motor spirit

As.10 per gallon, and on kerosine As.3 Ps.9, with a like excise on spirits produced in India. The duty on matches is As.14 for 144 boxes of 100.)

Export duties of 5 per cent. ad valorem on raw hides and skins, As.2 pies 3 per maund on rice, Rs.4½ per 400 lbs. on bales of jute, other than cuttings on which the duty is Rs.1½, Rs.32 a ton on hessians and Rs.20 on jute and sacking.

Despite this increase in taxation the revenues of the Central Government have fallen off of late years. In 1928-29 the gross revenue receipts of the Government of India were Rs.12,897 lakhs, in 1930-31 they were Rs.12,459½ lakhs and the estimate for the current years (1933-34) is Rs.12,452 lakhs.

The public debt in India has been greatly increased of late, as will be seen from the following figures which I have taken from Whitaker's Almanack:—

Year.	Amount of India's Public Debt (Central and Provincial). £
1912-3	274,403,000
1926-7	514,290,000
1929-30	711,200,000
1931-2	776,000,000

In April of 1930 the excess of interest-bearing obligations of the Government of India over interest-yielding assets was £133 million; twelve months later it had risen to £162 million. This, despite the fact that of recent years expenditure on capital works has diminished.

That the reforms are largely responsible for the recent increases in expenditure is shown by the fact that the charges under the head of General Administration (including audit) in India rose from Rs.289,20,000 in 1912-4 to Rs.15,15,50,000 in 1930-1, whereas the gross expenditure rose from Rs.125,48,85,000 to Rs.230,42,90,000. In 1908-9 the gross expenditure for the whole of India was Rs.109,24,88,675.

Provincial expenditure tells the same story; the gross expenditure of the U.P. Government rose from Rs.747,46,750 in 1908-9 to Rs.12,03,32,100 in 1931-2, i.e., nearly doubled, while the increase in the General Administration charges rose from Rs.20,82,000 in 1908-9 to Rs.141,13,300 in 1931-2—a sevenfold increase.

In order to obtain some idea of the increase in the cost of administration resulting from the changes in the Government of recent years I visited the India Office and consulted the Civil Lists of the Government of the United Provinces dated 1st July, 1908, and 1st July, 1932, respectively, and discovered that the number of the gazetted officers in the Secretariat (excluding P.W.D. officers) had risen from eight to 41, and the expenditure from Rs.19,283 p.m. to about Rs.74,000 p.m.

It is worthy of notice that (1) the salaries fixed for the four new Members of Council in all exceed those of the Lieutenant Governor and all the Secretaries and Under Secretaries in 1908, i.e., the whole Civil Secretariat just after the Minto-Morley Reforms.

(2) The great increase in the charges of General Administration, in so far as they relate to numbers of employees, appear to be due entirely to the Reforms. The gazetted personnel of the Board of Revenue in the U.P. (which deals with the collection of the Land Revenue) and that of the Public Works Department that deals with the making and upkeep of roads, buildings and canals, is approximately to-day the same as it was in 1908.

The above figures relate only to a part of the extra expense of the Reforms that have so far been effected. Every gazetted officer has from two to six messengers attached to him. Moreover, these extra officials necessarily involve a large increase in the clerical establishment. In addition to these officials, two other new appointments have been made, viz., the Secretary and the Superintendent of the Legislative Council, of which the average monthly salaries are Rs.800 and Rs.550 respectively. Then, all the Members of the Legislative Council are paid travelling allowance and other allowances while attending the Council. These allowances are mixed up with other charges and I have not been able with the material to hand to extract them.

The large addition to the staff has necessitated the erection of new offices, which have to be kept in repair.

In my opinion the present Constitution is considerably more costly than India can comfortably afford, and ought in the interests of the people of that country to be replaced without delay by a less expensive one, such as that which was in operation at the time when Mr. Montagu visited India. The gross revenue of India in 1911-12 was Rs.120 crores and the expenditure on General Administration was Rs.2 crores 63 lakhs. In 1930-31 the revenue was Rs.206 crores 68 lakhs. On this basis the cost of General Administration should have been about Rs.4 crores 53 lakhs, in fact it was Rs.15 crores 12 lakhs. In order once again to make India a comfortable country to live in the cost of General Administration should be reduced by something like 10 crores and so permit the lowering of the rate of taxation. The White Paper proposals, instead of doing this, will add greatly to the present high cost of the administration, indeed, I am very doubtful whether the form of Constitution outlined in the White Paper is practicable under the present financial conditions.

Pension Charges.

Pension charges have risen greatly of recent years, largely owing to the premature retirement on proportionate pensions of those who disliked the Montagu-Chelmsford reforms. The Annual Administration Report of the U.P. Government for 1930-31 shows that 12½ lakhs a year are being paid to those who retired on proportionate pension during the past three years.

A Notification has already been issued giving all existing officials right to retire on the introduction of the new constitution. Probably a considerable number of officers will avail themselves of this offer.

Five hundred and fifty-eight officers have retired on proportionate pensions since the Montagu-Chelmsford reforms and the pensions of these must cost India over one crore of rupees annually.

The following figures show how the expenditure on pensions has increased of late:—

Year.	Expenditure on Superannuation Allowances and Pensions.

1912-13	...	Rs.491,85,000
1927-28	...	Rs.582,90,000
1932-33	...	Rs.767,70,000

No one can foretell to which extent previous payments will increase owing to premature retirements on account of the proposed reforms. But it is likely to be great. During the first year of the Montagu-Chelmsford reforms, which affected comparatively few officers recruited by the Secretary of State for India, 190 officers retired on proportionate pensions; it is therefore not improbable that as the changes now proposed will affect a far greater number of officials, the number of retirements will greatly exceed 190. It may be that the expenditure on pensions will exceed Rs.10 crores during the first year of the proposed constitution. This is expenditure for which the taxpayer gets no kind of return.

7^o November, 1933.]

The large increase in establishment as a result of the Montagu-Chelmsford reforms, which have now been in force for 14 years, will in another 15 years make itself felt in the form of increased pension charges.

These charges will fall upon the Federal and Provincial Governments.

Additional Cost of Audit and Accountancy.

The present system of audit and accountancy is theoretically bad, because the same officer is both accountant and auditor, only payments are audited and these mostly on the certificates of expending officers, and there is, no audit of receipts, the heads of Departments alone being responsible for seeing that the dues of the Government are collected. The present system, despite its theoretical defectiveness, has in practice worked well because of the very high standard of the higher Government Officials and because all auditors and accountants in all the Provinces are controlled and paid for by the Government of India. This system is very economical because one large audit staff for the whole of India can carry on with a proportionately small reserve for leave vacancies and officers under training.

If there is to be real provincial autonomy each Province should have its independent Auditor-General and audit staff and its independent Accountant-General. This will be much more expensive than the existing system, especially in the smaller Provinces, such as Bihar and Orissa, where the Gazetted Accounts and Audit Staff, if my memory be not at fault, is composed of four Officers; in such an establishment it would be necessary to have two extra officers, one to fill leave vacancies and one under training; it takes two or three years to train a new accountant or auditor.

It may be that the audit staff under the new constitution will all be controlled by one Auditor-General who will be an officer of the Federal Government. As most of the Provinces are in debt to the Government of India and this debt will be transferred to the Federal Government, that Government may insist on the Provincial accounts being audited by its auditors. But it is scarcely compatible with autonomy for the Accountants of one Government to be under the control of another Government. This has been foreseen, and by way of an experiment audit was separated from accountancy in the United Provinces. The experiment proved so costly that it was abandoned. The cost of the new Provincial accounts establishment was 9½ lakhs a year, but there were some savings in the audit establishment.

The present system by which only payments are audited and these on certificates, if continued under the proposed constitution, will almost certainly lead to serious financial irregularities and losses. It was found to be ineffective in the case of District and Municipal Boards accounts which are under Indian control, hence these are audited, not on certificate at the headquarters of each Government, but on the spot by a peripatetic audit staff. This system is far more expensive than the present one. Thus the various Governments will be faced with the alternative of spending large additional sums on the audit and accounts staff or losing a not inconsiderable amount of revenue on account of ineffective audit.

The audit regulations are very complicated, and there are several codes of audit rules for each Province. All these will have to be revised if the system of audit and accounts is changed, and this will entail considerable expenditure and require a number of experts to effect the revision. Where all these experts and additional accountants are to come from I know not.

Other items of additional expenditure and loss of revenue owing to the transfer of currency operations to a Reserve Bank, the present opium policy and the separation of Burma are dealt with in my supplementary memo. The proposed changes will increase considerably the cost of administration. At the same time the revenues of the Governments, which have declined of late years, are likely further to decline. The decline of the revenues of India is, I believe, officially attributed to the world wide depression and the fall in prices. These are certainly the main factors, but it may be that the efficiency of the Government has diminished since the Montagu-Chelmsford reforms and this has contributed to the unsatisfactoriness of the revenue returns.

These reforms have led to replacement in some Departments of experienced and trained administrators by inexperienced and untrained ones, to the retirement of 558 experienced officials on proportionate pensions, to a fall in the scholastic standard of the Europeans recruited by the Secretary of State for India and to the accelerated Indianization of the services.

Few will deny that the first three of the above results must have tended to diminished the revenue return, because subordinate officials require strict supervision by experienced superiors if mistakes and carelessness, leading to loss of revenue and defalcations are to be avoided. That the replacement of European by Indian supervision is likely to lead to similar results can I think be demonstrated by such facts as the number of defalcations of Municipal and District Boards funds that come to light and the number of these boards (all of which are under Indian Management) that have to be superseded for mal-administration. Recently such important Municipal Boards as those of Lahore and Patna had to be superseded owing to mismanagement.

Another cause of the falling off in the revenue has been the unsettled condition of India during Lord Irwin's regime. Hartels, disturbances, riots and dacoities tend to harm trade and so lead to a fall in revenue. The latest available Administration Reports of the provinces show that there was a large increase of dacoities in 1931; in the U.P. there were 302 more dacoities in 1931 than in 1930, a rise of 52 per cent. In that Province the total number of prosecutions under the Excise and Opium Acts rose from 3,597 to 4,034, the highest figure hitherto reached in the Province. The increase in the amount of illicit distillation has certainly contributed to the fall in excise revenue already mentioned.

A concrete instance of a fall in revenue due to the increase of lawlessness is afforded by a comparison of the figures for forest revenue in the neighbouring Provinces of Bombay and the C.P. :—

	Revenue for 1929-30.	Revenue for 1930-31.
	Rs.	Rs.
Bombay ...	79,63,000	52,23,000
Central Provinces ...	59,97,000	51,12,000

The reason of the heavy fall in Bombay is, to quote from the A.A. Report of that Government: "Civil disobedience assumed an aggressive and on occasion a violent form in many parts of the Presidency. In some places the mob entered the forests and helped themselves to timber. In two places the police had to fire on the mob and two forest guards were killed."

Under the Constitution adumbrated in the White Paper, all the above factors, except that of the fall in prices, will operate with increased force. In the first year of the Montagu-Chelmsford reforms no fewer than 190 officials retired on proportionate pensions although these reforms affected comparatively few of the officers recruited by the Secretary of State. The changes involved in the proposed constitution will affect almost all such officials. As a recent Notification has given these the right to retire on proportionate pensions it is not improbable that the number of retirements in the first year of the working of the new Constitution will be greatly in excess of 190. The sudden retirement of a large number of officials and the filling of their places by less experienced officers cannot but diminish the efficiency of the administration, and an inevitable consequence of this is a fall in revenue receipts. The less scrupulous of the Government subordinates are quick to take advantage of being supervised by inexperienced officers, and defalcations, irregularities and disregard of rules, resulting in loss of revenue, become numerous. This is demonstrated by the number of such delinquencies that come to light annually in District and Municipal Boards. In this connection the Government of the C.P. remarked (Report on District Board Administration, 1930-31, p. 12) "The recurrence from year to year of financial irregularities is a matter for anxious thought." In that Province local audit brought to light several cases of financial irregularities and 11 cases of embezzlement of District Council Funds in the year under report. In Madras 51 cases of defalcation and 10 of theft were detected during the year 1930-31. The figures for the U.P. were 14 large embezzlements and 11 cases in which disregard for rules resulted in considerable loss of revenue. Nor is the case of Municipal Boards any better. In the Government of Bihar and Orissa Administration Report (p. 37) it is stated: "If it be thought legitimate to expect a higher standard of administration in the towns than in District Boards owing to the presence of a concentrated electorate, more enlightened and more able to make its wishes felt than a scattered rural population, the reverse is the case. . . . Several cases of embezzlement were reported." The Bombay Government said (Report on Working of Municipalities, p. 9): "Government regrets that on the threshold of a further stage in reforms, their verdict on Municipal Administrations generally must be so unfavourable." The C.P. Government record: "The audit report brought to light the usual crop of financial irregularities that have become such a disheartening feature of municipal administration. The persistent disregard by municipal committees of the very fundamentals of sound administration is to be deeply deplored."

A revenue or tax collector in India needs more than honesty and ability if he is to get in all the tax demand; he must have unusual force of character and a thorough knowledge of the rules and regulations and, in the case of a land-revenue collector, be able to appraise the value of a crop.

Another cause of loss of revenue which is likely to operate is that the inauguration of the proposed constitution will be deemed by the criminals and bad characters of the country a favourable occasion on which to commit thefts, burglaries and dacoities; it will also be a time when communal tension is likely to be acute and to lead to serious riots. It may well be that these events may be so numerous that the police are unable to deal with them adequately. Such occurrences will react unfavourably on the revenue receipts.

It is improbable that this loss of revenue will be limited to the first year or two of the new constitution. There are other factors that will tend to cause the revenue receipts to fall.

The prosperity of India depends largely on the calibre of the District Officers (Magistrates and Collectors or Deputy Commissioners). In my opinion it was largely owing to the good work of these officials that India made such progress in the XIX Century without increase in taxation. The majority of I.C.S. of from 10 to 20 years standing are either District Officers or District and Sessions Judges. The duties of the former are strenuous and unending; like the doctor the District Officer is at the beck and call of everyone day and night; the duties of the Judge, on the other hand, are dignified and confined to fixed hours. Some Civil Servants prefer to serve as Judges, others as District Officers and a man usually works best when doing the job he likes. Speaking generally I should say that most Europeans prefer to work as District Officers while most Indians prefer to be Judges. When I was in India, almost all the senior Indian I.C.S. were Judges. It is my belief that the more the I.C.S. becomes Indianised the more difficult it will be to find good District Officers, and this difficulty will result in diminished revenues.

In this connection it is necessary to bear in mind that the average Indian working as a District Officer is at a great disadvantage as compared with an European because, owing to the different points of view of the Hindus and Muhammadans, disputes between the two communities frequently occur in which the District Officer has to act as umpire. The decision of the umpire is usually distasteful to one side, and if the umpire gives a decision in favour of the community to which he belongs, the other side will not abide by it so willingly as they would if he were not of that community.

Another reason why, other things being equal, the European makes a better District Officer than the Indian is that the District Officer is inundated with applications by residents in the district asking him to give vacant posts to their sons or nephews. Outside the official sphere the social intercourse of the European District Officer is confined to his fellow countrymen and brother officials, whereas the Indian would probably have many friends among the Indian residents, at any rate after he had been some time in the district; he would also have friends and relatives in other districts; most of these would have sons, etc. for whom they wanted posts and would put pressure on him to appoint them, irrespective of their qualifications. I, as a European, found it unpleasant to refuse to give appointments to the sons of very worthy men who used to visit me, on the ground that there were candidates in the field having better qualifications. The Indian who resisted such applications would have to be a superman. Thus the replacement of European by Indian District Officers will tend to lower the efficiency of the administration, and this will affect the revenue.

I have deemed it necessary to go into the above details in order the more to emphasise the all-important fact that the proposed Constitution will not only increase expenditure but at the same time entail a fall in revenue, and therefore is to be condemned on financial grounds.

7^o November, 1933.]

Obviously it is impossible to forecast the amount of the fall in revenue, except that it is likely to be considerable—a matter of crores of rupees for the whole of India. Only experience will reveal the extent of this fall.

This is a most cogent reason for going slowly in introducing constitutional changes. The handing over the reserved subjects in the Provinces to Ministers would be a leap in the dark. If, therefore, the proposed constitutional reforms are going to be pushed through, regardless of their costliness and the burden they will impose on the Indian taxpayer, common prudence dictates that the change should be effected piecemeal and gradually. If, as an experiment—as a feeler—complete autonomy were introduced into one Province and the effects of this carefully watched, Parliament would at the end of 12 months or so be in a position to decide whether the experiment should be extended.

Ways and Means.

It is necessary to consider ways and means, how this extra cost of administration under the proposed reforms can be met in view of the revenue figures.

As the changes recommended in the Simon Commission Report would, if adopted, mean additional expenditure, Sir A. W. Layton enquired into the subject of finance and his report forms Part VIII of vol. 2 of the Simon Commission's Report and is very helpful, although, in my opinion, perhaps too optimistic.

The largest Head of revenue is Customs; the figures are given in the Table below.—

Year.	Revenue in Rupees.
1927-28	46,63,50,000
1929-30	51,22,50,000
1930-31	46,80,80,000
1931-32	46,22,55,000
1932-33 (revised) ...	52,28,55,000
1933-34 (budget) ...	51,24,55,000

When Layton reported, the Customs revenue had been rising steadily and he put himself the question: Can we assume that this rise will continue? He pointed out that India had been of late singularly free from monsoon failures, and he thought that there might be set-backs, but he estimated (p. 252) a steady expansion of about $\frac{3}{4}$ crores a year in the Customs receipts, with the qualification that his estimate was contingent on fiscal policy. He was of opinion that the then customs tariff, i.e., 15 per cent. standard rate with higher duties on luxury articles was already high for an agricultural country and should not be raised. In fact it has since been raised to 25 per cent., and the revenue in 1933-34 is likely to be little, if any, higher than in 1929-30.

I find it difficult to believe that the Customs revenue would have been higher had not the duty been raised, and in any case this is not a source that can be relied upon to contribute much towards the additional cost of the new Constitution. As Europeans, other things being equal, use more European articles than Indians do, the exodus of numbers of Europeans must tend to diminish the customs revenue. Any laxity in supervision will lead to loss owing to dishonesty of subordinate officials. Air transport may conceivably lead to extensive evasion. A "don't buy foreign goods" campaign, accompanied by the picketing of shops, might cause the revenue from this head to fall greatly. Indeed, the fact that Customs duties yield $\frac{5}{8}$ ths of the revenue of the Central Government is in my opinion one of the weakest points in the proposed constitution from the financial point of view. As the White Paper proposals do not seem to be acceptable to Congress, if they be given effect to that body might be able to cripple the Central Government financially by a boycott of foreign goods.

The next most important source of Central revenue is Income Tax. The yields from this are:—

Year.	Revenue in Rupees.
1927-28	15,64,62,000
1928-29	17,05,70,000
1929-30	16,60,00,000
1930-31	16,31,00,000
1931-32	17,30,49,000
1932-33 (revised) ...	17,70,00,000
1933-34 (budget) ...	18,23,00,000

It will be seen that the yield has increased and appears to be increasing under the higher rate imposed in 1931-32.

Doubtless extra revenue from this source would be obtainable by raising the present rate, but it may be doubted whether the increase would be very considerable. And we must also bear in mind that it is largely dependent on good trade and settled conditions, and the proposed change in the constitution may, for a time at any rate, lead to unsettled conditions and indifferent trade. Further, Income Tax receipts may be greatly affected by lax supervision of subordinate officials. Moreover, the higher the rate the greater the inducement to evasion.

Layton suggested that the rate of this tax should be raised and extended to smaller incomes. Both these recommendations have been adopted.

Layton also suggested that the Income Tax should be extended to agricultural incomes, and believed that by this means an extra Rs.5 crores could be raised. On the other hand the estimates of the authorities consulted by the Bengal Government varied from 1 to 3 crores.

The recent fall in agricultural prices has hit the agricultural population hard, and the fact that the United Provinces has found it necessary to reduce their land revenue demand by 110 lakhs a year indicates that the present is not the time to impose a tax on agricultural incomes. Finally, the chances of a Legislature composed largely of representatives of agricultural communities taxing agricultural incomes appear to be nil.

The tax on salt is now 1 rupee 112 annas a maund, it has been as high as Rs.2½. The doubling of the rate of this tax would of course yield a large sum. I have not the figures showing the effect of the doubling of the salt tax for the year 1922-23.

This exhausts the possibilities of taxation at the Centre. It seems to me that only by increasing taxation to a most oppressive extent would it be possible to raise sufficient income to meet the demands on Federal exchequer for recurring charges under the proposed constitution, and even so the revenue would be sufficient only if trade were good and the efficiency of supervision were not diminished to any great extent, and, of course, all parties operated to make the new regime a success. Granting such conditions, the Federal Government would still probably find itself in dire straits in the event of a succession of poor monsoons. This is a matter which, in my opinion, requires very careful investigation before any changes are made in the Indian constitution. In my opinion the idea that the Federal Government will be able in a few years to hand over the proceeds of the income tax to the provinces is a mistaken one.

In the revised estimates for 1932-33, only 7 of the 1,770 lakhs of the income tax yield are allotted to the provinces.

As to the Provinces, the land revenue is their main source of revenue, and it is doubtful whether in those in which the land revenue is periodically settled there will be any appreciable increase for many years. The annulment of the Permanent Settlement in Bengal and other areas where this exists, would doubtless result in a higher yield from land revenue, but such annulment would be a breach of contract on the part of the Government. Another possibility of raising a certain amount of extra revenue would be to raise the local cess on land. The revenue on excise as we have seen, is falling and is likely to continue to fall. It may be doubted whether any further raising of the rates of stamp and registration duties would lead to any great increase of income. Heavy initial outlay would, I think, result in a few years in an increase of revenue from forests.

The only other taxes that have so far been suggested are death duties, taxation of tobacco and pan (betel), an excise on matches, and a terminal tax.

Prima facie death duties seem ill adapted to a country in which there are many joint families of which each member is entitled only to maintenance. There would not seem to be much to tax on a death in such a family, and it would not be advisable for India to adopt the bad habit of many Western nations of using capital as revenue by the imposition of such a tax.

Layton estimated that an excise on matches and tobacco would yield Rs.7 or 8 crores after 10 years, and that the immediate yield from the former would be 3 crores. The Bihar Government assert that this last figure would be reached only if the retail price of matches were doubled. They would reduce Layton's estimate of the yield of these suggested taxes by 30 per cent. The proposed excises would yield very little unless they were extended to the Native States. The collection of the tobacco tax would be difficult, if possible, in some provinces, but I read in their Annual Administration Report for 1930-1 that the Government of Bihar and Orissa are exploring the possibilities of such a tax.

Layton also proposed a terminal tax, i.e. a tax on all commodities levied at every railway station. He estimated that such a tax would yield at least Rs.6 crores and might bring in 10 crores.

One great objection to this tax is that in many Municipalities it already exists and forms their main source of revenue. The tax would probably have an adverse effect on railway receipts.

From the foregoing it will be apparent that the possibilities of the expansion of the Provincial sources of revenue are very limited.

Most of the Provincial Governments have been in such financial difficulties of recent years that it may be taken that most possibilities of increasing their revenue have been considered. The Government of the Central Provinces state in their annual report that in June, 1930, a committee composed of members of Government and the legislative council was appointed to overhaul the whole financial machinery and advise Government as to the steps which should be taken to balance its budget. We are told (page 2): "The Committee reviewed in detail every item of revenue and expenditure and though no new means were discovered of adding to the former, its recommendations enabled Government to effect drastic economies in the latter and to adopt measures which, as time goes on and full effect is given to them, will result in a much reduced standard of expenditure under all heads of administration. The adoption of this standard means the sacrifice in great part of the standard which has been accepted hitherto as necessary to secure efficient and impartial administration. Whether the new standard will achieve the same object must be left to time to show."

A perusal of the latest Administration Reports available makes it clear that India's crying need is for a form of Government less costly than the existing one. Taxation has been increased in all directions, and, to use the words of the Punjab Government, "sternest retrenchments" have been made in all departments; nevertheless the expenditure of most of the Provinces in 1932-33 exceed their income.

In my opinion a less opportune time for inaugurating a more costly system of Government could not have been hit upon. To launch the new Governments, Federal and Provincial, in existing conditions seems to me to be on a par with ship owners sending a fleet of over-loaded unseaworthy ships on a long voyage over tempestuous seas.

In my opinion a very grave objection to any sudden great change in the Indian Constitution is the prejudicial effect this would have on the credit of India.

The Government of India has borrowed large sums of money in order to construct railways and canals and for other purposes; about half this has been obtained from England for the excellent reason that money can be borrowed there at a lower rate of interest than in India.

So long as the finances of India are entirely controlled by the British Parliament the credit of India is almost as good as that of Great Britain. In consequence, some Indian loans bear interest as low as 2½ per cent. per annum.

According to Whitaker on March 31st, 1913, the debt of the Government of India was £179,179,000 in sterling and £95,224,000 in rupees at 1s. 4d. On March 31st, 1932, the debt was £379,000,000 in England and Rs.529.4 crores (£397,000,000) in India.

But for the Government of India, owing to British control, being able to obtain all this cheap money in England the Indian systems of railways and canals could not have reached their present dimensions. Nor is the financial benefit of India's association with England confined to the procuring of cheap money in England. Other advantages derived from this connection are:

- (1) the ability to raise loans in India at a rate of interest much lower than that for ordinary business loans;
- (2) the use of currency notes to the face value of about 100 crores over and above the gold and silver backing. This is virtually an interest-free loan;
- (3) the use of money deposited in Post Office Savings Banks and invested in Cash Certificates on which only a low rate of interest is paid.

Now, no matter how much it desires to do so, the British Government cannot transfer its credit to a Government controlled by Indians. Credit, like personal reputation, cannot be passed on.

Any new Government in India, not under British control, will have to build up its own financial reputation, its credit. This may be a slow process. As the changes proposed in the White Paper will involve great initial outlay for which no funds seem to be available, presumably considerable sums will have to be raised by loans. Will it be possible to obtain these loans at the present rate of interest paid by the Government of India? This will depend entirely on the value the public places on the financial safeguards in the White Paper. It seems to me that if the Governor-General has to exercise any of these safeguards they will not be safeguards at all unless there is available a very large sum of money on which he can draw and pay any sums due by the Federal Government which it cannot or will not pay. Let us suppose that the Customs revenue of the Government of India does not come in well, owing to a Congress boycott or any other cause, and a large sum of money has to be paid, let us say at Calcutta, on account of interest due on a Government loan. The official who has to make the payment finds that the funds in his hands are not nearly sufficient to meet the payment. He applies to higher authority to be put in funds, that authority says none are available. The officer in question would then inform the Governor-General that he could not meet the interest demand. What could the Governor-General do in order to have the interest paid on due date unless he had so under his control some fund from which to meet the demand?

The prudent investor who is invited to subscribe to a loan raised in order to inaugurate the new Government of India, is likely to want to know exactly how such a contingency as the above will be dealt with before he decides to take up any of the loan. If he be not satisfied he may refuse to invest, or if only partially satisfied he may demand a higher rate of interest as a return for the risk he runs of default or delay in the payment of interest. Or it may be that the whole of this new loan will have to be raised in India at a still higher rate of interest. The higher the interest the greater the burden on the Indian taxpayer.

Then there is the existing interest-bearing debt of India. Much of this is in sterling at low rates of interest such as 2½, 3 and 3½ per cent. This money was lent to the Government of India with the knowledge that it was under British control and with no prospect of this control being withdrawn. The White Paper proposals mean, if not the actual handing over of this control, the weakening of it. In other words, the nature of the security on the strength of which the money was lent will be changed. In common justice, then, such investors should be given an opportunity of taking back their money before the inauguration of the new Constitution. As many are likely to avail themselves of this offer, this would mean the raising of a fresh loan, even if this were possible, unless sponsors of the White Paper were to come forward and lend money at 2½, 3 and 3½ per cent., the interest to be paid by India would be higher than the present rate and thus further increase the burden on the Indian taxpayer. Parliament stands in the position of a trustee, both for the people who have lent this money and for the Indian taxpayer. If then the White Paper proposals be accepted, unless some good people come forward and put up the new money required at the old rate of interest, Parliament will have no alternative other than to treat badly one or other of the two classes of people for whom it is trustee.

Either it will force the Indians to pay more taxes, or do an act which may well cause loss to the holders of stock. India will, I believe, have the greatest difficulty in making both ends meet under the constitution, nay, will almost certainly not be able to meet all financial obligations. If anyone thinks I have gone too far in making this assertion let him show me the budget estimates of the Federal and the Provincial Governments for their first financial year. Should these indicate that my assertion is not justified, I will gladly withdraw it. Encumbered by such financial difficulties as India is likely to be, it would not be surprising if the Federal Government were unable or refused to meet its interest obligations.

We have now to consider the case of the pensioners of the Governments in India. These pensioners entered into a covenant with the Secretary of State for India, or with the British Raj in India to serve in India on certain conditions, one of which was that they were to obtain a pension after a fixed term of approved service. These entered into these engagements under the impression that their pensions were as safe as the British Government. They have kept their part of the contract and I have no hesitation in saying that it is morally, if not legally incumbent upon Parliament to see that nothing that Parliament does will result in any of these people losing their pensions. The White Paper proposals, in the opinion of many, are such that the new Governments may not be in a position to pay these pensions on account of the costly new Constitution. Therefore it is incumbent upon Parliament before the inauguration of the proposed Constitution, to make some arrangement to secure these pensions, which amount to about Rs.675,00,000 a year. The capitalised value of these pensions would be about £50,000,000. This sum should be placed in the hands of the Secretary of State for India by the Government of India in return for his undertaking to see that all future pension payments are made to the persons affected.

Then the Government of India is considerably in debt to the subscribers of the various Indian family pension funds and the railway and other provident funds. These funds have been subscribed by the Government services in order to provide for their widows and families. The subscriptions have been made compulsorily by deductions from pay. They are at present mixed with the balances of the Government of India, but accounts are kept and interest is allowed on the balance at the credit of each Fund and paid into the Fund, from which pensions to widows and children are met. The amount in the hands of the Government of India held on behalf of the Indian Military Family Pension Fund, is about £6½ million, and that on behalf of the I.C.S. Family Pension Fund about £4 million sterling. There are also other smaller Funds. The owners of these Funds have been asked what they wish to be done with the money when the new constitution becomes operative, the words used in the letter to the I.C.S. are "the impending constitutional changes in India." The subscribers will probably insist on this money being sent to England. This will entail a loan on which India will have to pay interest, whereas at present the annual income received by the Government of India on account of these funds is some hundreds of thousands of pounds in excess of the expenditure. This applies equally to the provident funds.

Part of the annuity paid to retired members of the I.C.S. is on a par with family pension money because from the salaries of these officials a deduction of 4 per cent. was made as a contribution to their annuity of £1,000 a year. This 4 per cent. contribution, paid since 1919, is to be returned with interest on retirement in addition to the £1,000 a year. But the annuities of all I.C.S. who entered service before 1919 have been in part contributed by them. This contribution in the case of those who have served their full time is estimated at about two-fifths of £1,000. Thus, unless all pensions be capitalised as suggested above a sum equal to the capital value of four-fifths of the I.C.S. pensions should in equity be placed in the hands of the Secretary of State for India before the inauguration of the proposed Constitution.

Again, every Indian pensioner has the right to commute for a cash payment one-half of his pension. Hitherto few have availed themselves of this right. If the White Paper proposals go through probably most of the pensioners will do so in order to secure some pension in the event of the new Government of India being unable to meet its obligations, unless, of course, the capital value of these pensions be handed over to the Secretary of State for India.

The Government of India has heavy internal liabilities in the form of Cash Certificates and Post Office Savings Bank deposits, all of which are payable on demand. The amount in the P.O. Savings Bank in March, 1927, was Rs.257,000,000 and the value of Cash Certificates was about Rs.210,000,000.

The Government of India has also a liability in respect of about Rs.100 crores of currency notes in circulation over and above the backing in metals and securities.

The sudden transfer of the control of the Indian Administration to Indians will undoubtedly lead to heavy withdrawals from the Post Office Savings Bank and encashment of currency notes, if these last remain convertible.

I happen to have been Accountant-General and Commissioner of Paper Currency in Bombay in 1914 and from my experience there I am in a position to judge of the effect of giving up British control of the Indian Administration. From August 1st to August 4th, 1914, i.e. before war was actually declared, sovereigns to the value of £1,224,177 were withdrawn from the Currency Offices at Lahore and Karachi, although the 2nd was a Sunday and on the 3rd withdrawals on sums of less than £10,000 were prohibited. On the 5th, which was a Bank Holiday, further issues of sovereigns from Currency Offices were prohibited. This resulted in a rush to encash currency notes which lasted about 15 days in Bombay and two months in the Mofussil. For a few days many people even in Bombay were willing to accept Rs.9-12 for a Rs.10 note. The Victoria Terminus was crowded with people asking for third-class tickets to Masjid Station—fare 6 pies—and tendering Rs.10 notes in payment. Most of these people did not use their railway tickets. They purchased them merely with the object of encashing a Rs.10 note more cheaply than in a shop. In the Mofussil the rates charged by Banias and Marwaries, for cashing currency notes, whilst the panic lasted, varied from 2 annas per cent. at Surat to Rs.2 at Hyderabad Sind. The panic was largely due to the machinations of these gentry who gave it out that the war would cause a depreciation in the value of currency notes. Some persons sent money orders to themselves paying for these in notes and demanding repayment in coin. The panic was checked by the Collectors issuing proclamations by beat of drum that notes would be cashed at full value at any treasury or sub-treasury.

At that time Cash Certificates were not in existence, but there were heavy withdrawals from the Post Office Savings Banks. The amount withdrawn in the Bombay Presidency alone from August to October, 1914, amounted to about Rs.286 lakhs. Similar events occurred in the other Provinces.

When War broke out there were immense stocks of rupees in the Currency Offices and Treasuries in India, so that these were able to meet all demands for coin. When day by day applicants found that rupees were readily paid out the panic gradually subsided.

The introduction of the Federal Government will offer a grand opportunity to those moneylenders, who are not alarmed at the change, to make money. They will almost certainly give out that the New Government will refuse to give coin in exchange for currency notes, and that it may not be able to repay deposits in the P.O. Savings Bank or to encash War Certificates as these mature, and so cause a panic such as that which arose in 1914, and it may well be that the District Officers, many of whom themselves will be very nervous of the financial outcome of the Constitutional changes, may not be able to stay the panic. It may be said that there will be a long notice of the introduction of the new constitution, so that the conditions then will not resemble those in 1914. This is to some extent true. There probably will not be the sudden rush, but there can be no doubt that the effect of the Sahib's handing over control to Indians will be freely discussed in its financial aspects in the towns and villages, and the prudent man will reason thus with himself: "I have placed my money with the Government. There is going to be a change of Government. If I take my money out before the change and bury it, I shall lose a small sum in interest but my capital will be safe. Should the new Government get along well I can at any time redeposit or invest my money. If I leave it with Government and anything goes wrong I may lose everything. I will therefore take my money out and await developments." For these reasons there is likely to be a great demand for silver in exchange for Currency Notes and a heavy encashment of Cash Certificates and withdrawals from the P.O. Savings Bank before the inauguration of the proposed Federal Government. Presumably the Reserve Bank mentioned in the White Paper is to be instituted in order, inter alia, to cope with the demand for coin in exchange for notes. If it is to maintain the convertibility of currency notes, it will require a balance of many crores or to have the money available at call. So far as I can see the only way in which to meet the P.O. Savings Bank withdrawals and the encashment of Cash Certificates will be to have available another large sum of money to serve this purpose. Where is this money to come from?

The White Paper proposals affect directly the welfare of over 350 million people in India and indirectly that of the whole population of the United Kingdom. This being so I respectfully submit that on Parliament lies the grave responsibility of deciding whether those proposals will leave it possible for the Indian Governments on the one hand and the Secretary of State on the other to fulfil their financial and other obligations.

I submit that the facts, figures and estimates set forth above, vague though the last be, because I have seen no official estimates, are sufficient to give some weight to my very earnest request (made on behalf of the people of India among whom I have lived for many years and have made many friends) that your Committee, before making any recommendations regarding constitutional changes in India, obtain the information asked for in my letter to you, dated 30-5-1933, and have the figures most carefully examined and reported on by financial experts acquainted with conditions in India.

I make bold to predict that the report of such experts will not be favourable.

It has been said that the present administration in India cannot remain as it is and that those who do not agree with the White Paper proposals have no alternative to offer. May I say that from the financial point of view the alternative is clearly to introduce a less costly rather than a more costly administration than the present, and it should not be beyond the capacity of statesmanship to devise measures that will at the same time give to India material advance in self-government. In other words, I am unable to understand why the advance of India to self-government as contemplated in the Act of 1919 would necessitate a greatly increased cost of administration.

7^o Novembris, 1933.]

MEMORANDUM 76 (SUPPLEMENTARY) BY DOUGLAS DEWAR.

I desire to submit the following observations on the estimates of the Secretary of State for India in Record of the Joint Committee No. 3 and those of Sir Malcolm Hailey in Record No. 1, which have been published since I forwarded in June the précis of my evidence.

Extra Cost of the New Constitution.

Cost of New and Enlarged Machinery.

Sir Malcolm Hailey estimates this at about Rs.5 crores (p. 8 and p. 20).

The Secretary of State, who gives a few details, puts the figure at Rs.25 crores, but the latter allows nothing for the cost of the Supreme Court, or for enhanced pension payments in consequence of the premature retirement of officers on account of the new Constitution, or for the increased cost of audit and accounting that will have to be incurred in order to avoid increased loss of revenue from defalcations, etc. In this connection I beg leave to quote the following from page 92 of the Annual Administration Report of the Government of the Punjab for 1930-31: "The temporary appointment of two auditors to enquire into the extent of the leakage of stamp revenue produced such satisfactory results that the appointments have been continued and the system extended."

The Secretary of State provides Rs.2.25 lakhs per annum for interest charges on the capital cost of new buildings, etc. Will this suffice to cover both interest on capital and maintenance and renewal charges?

He puts the capital cost at Rs.54 lakhs for the provinces, but makes no allowance for the capital cost of new buildings, such as court houses for the Supreme and Federal courts, although allowance is made for "possible reconstruction of New Delhi for a summer session of the Legislature." The amount viz., Rs.7 lakhs, allowed for new buildings, etc., in Sind would appear to be very low. In this, as in other cases, no details are given. In view of the above considerations, it seems highly improbable that the annual cost of the new machinery would be as low as Rs.2 crores.

Surrender of Revenue under the proposed Constitution.

Contributions of States ...	Rs.1 crore.
Loss of Currency receipts...	„1 „
Separation of Burma ..	„3 „

Should Burma remain attached to India there would still be a loss of about Rs.3 crores, because the temporary emergency surcharges of 25 per cent. are at present yielding about this amount of revenue in Burma. Sir Malcolm Hailey's estimate of the loss of revenue amounting to Rs.13 crores when the surcharges are withdrawn has apparently been made on the assumption that Burma will have been separated. With Burma joined to India the loss on this account would be nearly Rs.16 crores.

Sir Malcolm Hailey makes no allowance for any deterioration of the revenue at the centre or in the provinces in consequence of the administration being less efficient under the new Constitution than it is at present.

Assuming that there will be no such deterioration, the finding of an additional Rs.7 crores of revenue every year would not be a very heavy burden for a country of the size of India if, at the present time, the country were very lightly taxed and living on its revenues without the administration being stinted.

These conditions, however, are not being fulfilled.

Despite very heavy taxation India is living above its income and will in time become insolvent unless either its revenues increase or its expenditure decreases. On 6th July, the Secretary of State said to the Joint Committee: "if the state of the world does not get better, if we still go on with commodity prices either at their present level or actually falling, not only does it make any change almost impossible but it makes the existing system of Indian finances almost equally impossible."

7^o Novembris, 1933]

In my humble opinion the condition of the finances of India is such that, whether commodity prices rise or fall, it is essential for the welfare of the people that the costs of administering the country be lowered by replacing the present form of government by a less costly one.

The financial condition of India becomes apparent on examining (1) the debt of the Government of India and the Provincial Government, and (2) their present budgetary position.

Debt.

Provincial.—The indebtedness of the Provinces in the form of loans raised in the open market appears to amount to about Rs.18 crores. As such debt has been incurred for productive purposes it need not be here considered, but it should be noted that the Government of the United Provinces has applied nearly Rs.2 crores of its 6 per cent. loan to meet current expenses of administration which properly should have been met from revenue.

A very serious matter is the extent to which the Provincial Governments have borrowed from the Government of India in order to balance their budgets. At the time of the Montagu-Chelmsford reforms the Provincial debt amounted to Rs.63.09 crores, all of which was incurred for productive irrigation works. By 31st March, 1933, this debt had risen to Rs.171.79 crores, of which about 31 crores has been borrowed in order to enable the Provinces to meet current unproductive expenditure.

The recently published Report on the Working of the Provincial Loans Account for 1931-32 shows that the Governments of Bombay, Bengal, the Punjab, the Central Provinces and Assam have failed to comply with the terms for the repayment of certain advances made to them to cover their overdrafts. Also that in view, inter alia, of "the unsatisfactory state of the provincial finances" they have been permitted to repay as much of these advances as their financial position may admit during the years 1932-33 and 1933-34, the outstanding balances then being funded.

As regards the other Provincial Governments. The Government of the United Provinces began its career as a separate entity under the Montagu-Chelmsford reforms in 1921-22 with an opening balance of Rs.88,87,000, and despite its having appropriated to ordinary current expenditure from its 6 per cent. Development Loan Rs.1,86,63,000 and from the Famine Insurance Fund Rs 84,69,00, it has now a deficit of Rs.1,74,21,000. In other words since the inauguration of the Reforms its expenditure has exceeded its revenue by Rs.4,66,40,000 despite having on at least two occasions increased taxation, and, of late years, having reduced its expenditure on roads, etc., to an absolute minimum, so that to-day no less than 42 per cent. of its expenditure on Public Works goes to Establishment charges.

The Government of Bihar and Orissa has managed to pay its way hitherto, because, in its own words, "it has preferred to forgo much of the development possible in richer provinces rather than place itself in an unsound financial position. But this cannot go on indefinitely . . . and unless new sources of revenue can be found there is likely to be a marked retrogression in the standard of administration, which is already cut as fine as it can be." Apart from the newly formed N.W.F. Province, Madras is the only one at present which is not in financial difficulties.

Government of India. We have seen that in April, 1932, the interest-bearing obligations of the Government of India exceeded interest-bearing assets by £162 million. On 1st April, 1933, the excess was £183 million.

The total interest-bearing obligations of the Government of India rose from Rs.881.74 crores in April, 1923, to Rs.1212.48 in 1933; in the same period the interest-bearing assets rose from Rs.663.04 to Rs.963.87 crores. These figures show that the Government of India has increased its debt considerably in order to lend money at interest to the Provinces, Railways and Postal Department. Thus the financial position of the Government of India is largely dependent on that of its debtors. We have considered that of the Provinces, to which the Government of India has advanced Rs.172 crores.

The railways owe the Government of India Rs.752 crores. Hitherto they have paid their interest charges punctually, but not wholly out of current profits, having drawn on their reserves to the extent of about Rs.30 crores in the last three years. This cannot go on indefinitely. Unless their financial condition improves the railways will fall into arrears with their interest payments, as the Posts and Telegraph Department has done. This Department, which has borrowed about Rs.20 crores, has been working at a loss since 1927. The interest due to the Government of India is shown as paid in the accounts but this has resulted in a loss on working of Rs.4.37 crores since 1928. In reply to Major Attlee the Secretary of State said that India has repaid £84 million of the £100 million contributed towards the War. This seems to have been accomplished by appropriating to that purpose all the sums provided in the budget under the head "Avoidance and Payment of Debt."

Meanwhile, however, there has been fresh borrowing for non-productive purposes. On March 31st, 1914, India's unproductive debt was £13. If we add £100 million for War debt, and subtract £84 million which has been repaid, the remainder is £29 million. But India's unproductive debt on March 31st, 1933, was £183.

Thus, while paying off £84 million India has borrowed £154 million for unproductive purposes. I fail to see that this is a matter that should excite admiration.

The Secretary of State for India agreed with Major Attlee that the unproductive debt of India is relatively very small and a very exceptional state of affairs. Is this the case? Let us compare India's indebtedness with that of her nearest neighbours that publish figures, namely, Persia and Siam.

Country.	Revenue in millions of pounds.		Debt.
India ...	155	183	(unproductive).
Persia ...	6.7	1.6	(foreign).
Siam ...	9	11	(total).

India's unproductive debt before the War was £13 million; it is now £183 million, assuming that £100 is due to the war, we have an increase of £70 million, i.e., over 500 per cent.

England's debt before the War was £706 million; it is now £7,648; of this some £6,800 is due to the War, deducting this we have an increase of £142 or a 20 per cent. increase. Thus since the War India's unproductive debt has increased 25 times more rapidly than that of England.

To a poor country like India £183 million means far more than it does to England. In the plains of the United Provinces many an agricultural labourer keeps himself and his family on a wage of Rs.8 per mensem or 3 shillings a week. The lowest wage given in the English Mills at Cawnpore is Rs.16 per mensem; in Indian mills I believe the wage is lower. In some District Boards the lowest paid clerks receive only Rs 15 per mensem. In order to compare Indian rates of wages with those in England it is necessary to multiply the former by some factor in the vicinity of 15. If we multiply 183 by 15 we arrive at the figure 2,745. Thus to compare India's unproductive debt with that of England we should deem it to be about £2,745 million or nearly four times as great as that of England before the War.

Budgetary Position.

Provincial Governments.

The following shows for these Governments collectively the extent to which their expenditure exceeds their revenue.

Year.	Amount in crores of rupees by which expenditure exceeded Revenue.
1930-31	4.9
1931-32	4.2
1933-34 (budget estimate)	2.5

The figures for the last three years include savings from the cut in the pay of all Government Servants, which reduced the expenditure by about Re.1 crore in 1931-32, 3 crores in the following year and 1.5 in 1933-34.

Thus, despite these cuts in pay, additional taxation, drastic economies in all directions and curtailing expenditure on the upkeep of roads and buildings, the Provinces, as a whole, are living considerably above their income. They all assert that they have reached the limits of their taxable capacity, so that unless Death Duties be imposed and the capital thus levied be applied to current expenditure, the Provinces will, unless they are to go bankrupt have to be helped by revenue which at present goes to the Government of India. Sir Malcolm Hailey has made this clear in his memorandum.

The Central Government.

The following shows the surplus or deficit of the Central Government:—

Year.	Surplus or deficit in crores of rupees.
1930-31	-11.6
1931-32	-13.7
1932-33	+ 2.7
1933-34 budget ...	+ 2.5

7^o Novembris, 1933]

At first sight the fact that there was a slight surplus last year and one is expected next year seems satisfactory, and the Secretary of State expressed satisfaction, especially as the figures include each year a provision of Rs.6.84 crores for reduction of debt.

A scrutiny of the details, however, puts a very different complexion on the matter. On the revenue side of the 1932-33 budget we find (1) Rs.9.34 crores were withdrawn from the Railway Depreciation Fund to enable the railways to pay interest due from them to the Government of India. (2) Rs.1.15 crores were received on account of salt revenue which would not have been payable until 1933-34 but for the abolition of the credit system. (3) Of the total receipts Rs.18 crores represent the proceeds of the emergency surcharges of 25 per cent. imposed in 1931 on all taxes except export duties.

On the expenditure side of the 1932-33 budget we find (1) a savings of about Rs.5 crores on account of a 10 per cent. cut on all salaries, which is virtually a breach of contract. (2) The expenditure of Rs.46.76 crores on Defence Services is more than Rs.8 crores less than the sum declared by the Government in 1928 to be the minimum for the maintenance of an efficient army. Part of this reduction represents the cut in pay of the officers and a fall in prices of military stores. Taking these facts into consideration, the expenditure of Defence last year seems to have been about Rs.6 crores below the limit of safety. Moreover, severe retrenchments have been made in most branches of the administration.

As regards the budget for 1933-34, the revenue will still be swollen by the 25 per cent. surcharge and it is estimated that Rs.7.7 crores will have to be withdrawn from the Railway Depreciation Fund to meet interest payments; at the same time all new railway development is suspended. The Defence expenditure will be on the same low scale as in last year, and the expenditure on salaries will be Rs.2.5 crores below the normal scale on account of a 5 per cent. cut in all salaries.

Both the Secretary of State and Sir Malcolm Hailey admit that India will not be able to undertake any additional expense on the administration until the various Governments are in a position to frame normal budgets, that is to abolish the emergency tax surcharges and incur the expenditure necessary to administer the country properly.

Loss of revenue when the emergency surcharges are withdrawn.

Sir Malcolm Hailey estimates this at about Rs.13 crores a year. The loss on the basis of the 1933-34 revenue figures would be Rs.15.9, but if Burma be separated the loss will be about Rs.13 crores.

Additional expenditure that will be incurred when normal budgets are framed.

Sir Malcolm Hailey estimates this at Rs.4 crores over the 1933-34 budget on account of the restoration of the 5 per cent. cut in pay of all the Military and Civil and Railway Officers, Imperial and Provincial.

There is, however, other expenditure of which he makes no mention, viz., that on Defence Services and on the ordinary administration.

Defence Services.—I have already commented on the manner in which these are being starved. In this connection the Memo. attached to the 1933-34 budget says: "The figures of reduction in expenditure include about a crore of rupees due to the fall in commodity prices below the level of 1928-29; so that if prices rise again towards that level, so will the Defence budget automatically rise. Moreover, certain of the retrenchment measures . . . have the effect of reducing current expenditure on stores by diminishing the quantities held in stock. This process obviously cannot be continuous, and when surpluses have been consumed current expenditure is bound to rise again. Finally, part of the reduction has been secured by the postponement of building and other programmes . . . Commitments of this kind cannot be indefinitely postponed, for experience has shown that the accumulation of commitments is merely laying up trouble for the future." In view of these considerations the additional annual cost of Defence when normal budgets are resumed cannot well be less than Rs.4 crores.

Civil Charges at the Centre.—Owing to financial stringency it would seem that necessary expenditure which is ordinarily paid out of current revenue is either being postponed or charged to capital account. In 1927-28 Rs.39 lakhs were spent from current revenue on capital outlay on Forests and Salt works; in 1931-32 and 1932-33 such expenditure amounted to Rs.18 and Rs.10 lakhs.

In the course of his budget speech in 1930 Sir George Schuster said, "I doubt whether it is adequately realised to what an extent the gradual development of the present form of constitution has increased work on the shoulders of the Central Government, and I do not think it is an exaggeration to say that there is not a single Department in the Government of India in which those occupying the higher appointments are not at present overworked. Indeed I think it is far more likely that as representative institutions grow and the Sessions of the Legislative Assembly become longer it will be necessary to divide up some of the existing Departments and create new appointments for representation in this Assembly." Nevertheless, the expenditure under the head Civil Administration has been reduced from Rs.13.34 crores in 1930-31 to Rs.9.59 crores in 1933-34. About Rs.1.4 crores of this reduction is due to the temporary cuts in pay and the separation of the N.W.F. Province. Allowing for this, the reduction is Rs.2.3 crores or 20 per cent. Assuming that half this reduction can be continued indefinitely without impairing the efficiency of the administration, the extra cost of Civil Administration in the normal budget will be over Rs.1 crore, and that of the Forest, Salt and Irrigation Departments nearly 30 lakhs, say, Rs.1.5 crores in all.

Civil Charges in the Provinces.

A perusal of the Annual Administration Reports of most of the Provinces conveys some idea of the extent to which the administration is being starved. The Government of the C.P. state that the economies they have had to adopt "mean the sacrifice in great part of the standard which has been accepted hitherto as necessary in order to secure an efficient and impartial administration. Whether the new standard will achieve the same object must be left to time to show."

Some idea of the extent to which the economy campaign is carried may be gathered that the Government of the United Provinces in order to save expense has not printed the report of the Committee appointed to enquire into the conduct of the Benares Municipal Board. He who wishes to study that document has either to repair to the Secretariat or pay to have a copy made.

The following figures speak for themselves:

Head of Expenditure.	Amounts, in crores of rupees, spent in the Provinces in the years
	1927-28.	1932-33.
Public Health ...	168	138
Agriculture ...	214	194
Industries ...	71	65
Civil Works paid for out of revenue ...	943	615
Total	1,396	1,012

Under the above heads the expenditure in 1932-33 was nearly Rs.4 crores less than in 1927-28. Some of the reduction is accounted for by the cut in pay and the fall in prices. This means that the work has been carried out less expensively, but that will not happen when normal conditions return. The above figures show that in the Provinces last year work on roads, public buildings, etc., which would normally have been carried out and paid for out of current revenue at the cost of nearly 3½ crores have been left undone. Apart from leeway that ought to be made up it is difficult to believe that the Provinces can maintain themselves under normal conditions unless they spend annually an additional Rs.2.5 crores.

The Secretary of State for India seems to be of opinion that further retrenchments in the Provinces are possible. Would such retrenchments be true economy? Is it possible to reduce charges substantially without the loss of revenue involved exceeding the expenditure saved?

In 1931-32 the Bengal Government (1) reduced by 15 per cent. the pay of all officiating incumbents of offices and all new entrants, (2) reduced Travelling allowances and motor car and other conveyance allowances.

Further reductions are of course possible, but should such reductions render it difficult for Government Servants to maintain themselves and families the temptation to increase income by illegitimate means would be great. In any case discontented Government Servants are not conducive to high revenue returns.

The foregoing considerations indicate that the problem that would confront the Central Government in the event of effect being given to the White Paper proposals is to find Rs.19 crores of additional income every year after having reduced the existing rate of income tax, salt tax and import duties by 20 per cent. and postage rates by 33 per cent. involving a relinquishment of Rs.13 crores of revenue. Sir Malcolm Hailey states that an excise on matches would yield about Rs.2½ crores per annum. If such be imposed the remaining Rs.29½ crores would have to be derived from increased revenue owing to improved conditions.

The improbability that such betterment will be realised until many years shall have elapsed is indicated by the existence of certain factors tending to check an increase in revenue, viz., the growth of indigenous industries, the condition of the railways and the probable decrease in the efficiency of the administrative machinery.

The growth of indigenous industries. Sir Malcolm Hailey has made (p. 20) the entry "Decline in Customs . . . (?)."

Such a decline is probable, quite apart from any falling off in the efficiency of the Customs administration. In the memo. attached to the budget proposals for 1933-34 the following passage occurs: "It has been found necessary to allow for a reduction of about 1 crore in the customs revenue owing to the rapid increase which is taking place in the Indian production of sugar under the shelter of the protective duty."

The existing Indian tariff affords India a high measure of protection and is doubtless giving, at the consumers' expense, considerable impetus to Indian industrialism. The new indigenous industries which are arising, although a good thing for India, must affect adversely the Customs' revenue in the form of import duties. This should be partly counterbalanced by a higher income tax revenue and might be in part counterbalanced in some cases by an excise. But the net effect is likely to be a fall in Customs revenue. The Customs revenue would be even more adversely affected if the new Government sever the present link between the rupee and sterling, or open the Indian mints to the free coinage of silver. This would have the effect of enhancing greatly the price in India of all imported commodities and might result in the Customs revenue dwindling to a mere fraction of its present figure. In my opinion one of the weakest spots of the White Paper proposals from the financial point of view is that Customs would form the main source of the income of the Federal Government.

The Condition of the State Railways. Between 1924 and 1931 the railways contributed to the revenue nearly Rs.6 crores a year. Since then they have contributed nothing and have been working at a loss. The present economic slump is in part responsible for this, but only in part. The interest payable by the railways on their capital has increased from nearly Rs.24 crores in 1924 to nearly Rs.33 crores without any increase in the gross traffic receipts. The present interest charges are only Rs.6 crores less than the traffic receipts in the best year, viz., 1927-28. The total loss of the railways as the result of the last three years' working is Rs.23½ crores, despite the fact that the expenditure on replacements has been Rs.9 crores below the normal figure and the employees have during half the period been subjected to a 10 per cent. cut in pay. In order to meet the interest payments due to the Government of India during the past three years Rs.16 crores have been withdrawn from the Reserve Fund, of which the balance is now nil, and Rs.13½ from the Depreciation Fund. The balance of this last now amounts to Rs.13 crores.

This is the state of affairs notwithstanding recent increases in fares and rates. In view of the competition of motor vehicles, it is not improbable that in the future the State Railways will be a drain on the State instead of a revenue-yielding asset.

Probable Decrease in the Efficiency of the Administration.

To the facts I have already cited to show that Indranisation of the administration often entails decreased efficiency, I may add the poor percentage of collections of municipal dues and the large sums remitted as irrecoverable. Bihar and Orissa seem to be one of the worst provinces in this respect. For all the Municipalities the current demand on account of taxes for the year 1931-32 was Rs.29 lakhs, the amount in arrear was Rs.8 lakhs and during the year Rs.2 lakhs were written off as irrecoverable.

That economic depression is not the sole cause of these bad results is apparent from the following passages which occur in the Annual Review of the Administration of the Municipalities: "Patna city in the year following its supersession has decreased the percentage of its outstanding balances on current demand from 37 to 23 and the only reason while it still remains on the list

(of Boards of which the arrears are in excess of one-fifth of the demand) is the inevitable delay in realising arrears through the courts and the difficulties due to inaccurate and incorrect registers and defects of procedure on the part of the superseded Board."

"Remissions, as enquiries made during the year under review have amply proved, are made in many of the defaulting municipalities on the recommendation of the tax Daroga without even a petition from the rate-payer and without due verification of the facts.

Two other causes of the falling revenue may be mentioned, the communal question and the liability of acts of executive officers to criticism in the Legislative Assemblies. These are likely to be accentuated under the proposed Constitution.

The Communal Question.—This affects the revenue injuriously in two ways. First, the desire rapidly to Indianise the services may result in the employment of Indians in preference to Europeans having better qualifications. The promise of the Government to Indianise the services at a definite rate has resulted in the appointment of some persons not well qualified for their duties. For example, Mr. Hayman told the Legislative Assembly in 1931 that the Railway authorities had taken into the engineering department Indians lacking the qualifications previously insisted on.

Secondly, the desire to satisfy the minority communities. Various percentages of posts are allotted to members of these communities, irrespective of the relative qualifications of these. Thus in case of appointments filled by competitive examination it may happen that the candidate 50th in order of merit may be appointed in preference to 20 or 30 above him because he happens to belong to a minority community. In 1931 Sir James Crerar told the Legislative Assembly that unqualified Muslims were allowed to hold temporarily posts reserved for Muslims in the Government of India offices until qualified Muslims were available. Recently I saw a letter written by an Englishman in India to his father in which it was stated that in Local Boards in places where the Hindu-Muhammadan feeling ran high, posts had been filled by Indian Christians, or one post was held by two incumbents, a Hindu and a Muhammadan.

Criticism by the Legislative Assembly.—Such criticism, if reasonable and confinned to important matters, is doubtless salutary. At present however the most trivial acts are made the subjects of questions in the various Assemblies with the result that officials are needlessly harassed. Executive officials are already usually overworked; they often have to take action which is necessarily displeasing to some people, if they perform their duties faithfully. If an official is liable to be attacked in the Assembly for every such action, and has to send in a statement of reasons for his act, obviously he will be inclined to shirk his duty, take the line of least resistance, do as little as possible, overlook irregularities, refrain from taking disciplinary action, etc.

Before the introduction of the Montagu-Chelmsford reforms the aim of the average official used to be to administer his office or district as efficiently as possible, now the aim is rather to administer so as to avoid criticism in the Legislature. The less an official does the less the risk of such criticism.

In my opinion part of the recent fall in revenue is due to the lowering of the efficiency of the administration as the result of the Montagu-Chelmsford reforms. What this percentage is, it is obviously impossible to say. It is doubtless greater in some Departments than in others. The railways seem to have suffered considerably. The fact that every year more than two million people are caught travelling without tickets on the main Indian railways show that strict surveillance is necessary to maintain the revenue. Two or three years ago the Managing Director of the Bengal-Nagpur Railway said: "I am of opinion that the present meticulous control is largely due to politics and seriously affects the efficient working of the Indian railways, which should be operated entirely with the object of developing the trade of the country. I feel sure that the present system of control increases the cost of working, reduces the authority of the Agents, and restricts their initiative, and further impairs the loyalty of the employees to their railway."

The present tax revenue of India is about Rs.150 crores and the gross receipts of the State railways about Rs.86 crores. Should further lowering in the efficiency of the administration lead to a 5 per cent. reduction in revenue and railway receipts this would mean a loss of Rs.12 crores to the country.

Mr. DOUGLAS DEWAR

Chairman.] Before I invite my colleagues to put questions to you, Mr. Dewar, I wish to inform the Committee and the Indian Delegates that I have had an intimation from the Secretary of State that he proposes to provide the Committee with a Memorandum which I understand, is to deal with certain of the matters dealt with in Mr. Dewar's Memoranda, and which Memorandum the Secretary of State proposes to ask the Committee to make public. Unfortunately the Secretary of State is not able to be here. Perhaps Mr. Butler could give us some indication of how the position stands.

Mr. Butler.] My Lord Chairman, in view of the complicated nature of a great deal of these two memoranda we thought perhaps it might be helpful to the Committee were they to have a Memorandum dealing with many of the detailed points which arise in Mr. Dewar's submissions. I think perhaps the Committee may agree that it is very difficult to clear up some of these statistical points by the method of question and answer, and we hope that it may be valuable to the Committee to have a Memorandum such as you have described.

Chairman.

15,782. Do you desire to make any corrections or to say anything in extension of these Memoranda at this stage?—I should like, if I may, to bring up to date the figures given in my Memorandum No. 75, in regard to the amount in the Post Office Savings Bank and the outstanding cash certificates. I am afraid they were given from rather old information that I could get at the time, but I gave there the amount in the Savings Bank as Rs. 257,000,000. Now, on the 31st March, 1933, I see they had risen to Rs. 4,250 lakhs and the outstanding cash certificates had risen from Rs. 2,100 lakhs to Rs. 5,458 lakhs on 31st March, 1933.

15,783. Shall we make the appropriate corrections in your memoranda?—If you please, my Lord Chairman.

Sir John Wardlaw-Milne.

15,784. May I suggest that these are not corrections; they are additions?—Of course, the date would have to be altered if you alter the figures. I have given you 1927, it is now 1933; it is a substitution, I would prefer to say.

Marquess of Lothian.

15,785. Mr. Dewar, will you turn to your Memorandum 76: "In my humble opinion the condition of the finances of India is such that, whether commodity prices rise or fall, it is essential for the welfare of the people that the cost of administering the country be lowered by replacing the present form of Government by a less costly one." Have you any suggestions as to what form of Government you have in mind when you say "a less costly one"?—Of course, that is a matter, I should say, for the statesman rather than the financier, but still we had a less costly form of government which acted very well until the Montagu-Chelmsford Reforms were instituted, and there is no reason that I can see personally why that should not go on being Indianised as rapidly as may be. That was an efficient and, in my opinion, inexpensive Government. The taxation was lower in 1914 than it had been in 1858.

15,786. You mean you would go back to the pre-Montagu-Chelmsford Constitution?—I do not say I would go back to it, but that is a suggestion and a feasible Constitution.

Earl Winterton.

15,787. Did you say you would not go back?—No; I only suggested it was a feasible Constitution. We know it has acted in the past, and we are not trying anything new; but I have already said I do not profess to be a statesman.

Marquess of Lothian.

15,788. You recommend it from what I may call the administrative point of view rather than the political point of view?—From the financial point of view I should say it is necessary to cut your coat according to your cloth.

Earl Winterton.

15,789. I still do not catch the witness's answer. Will you allow me to explain to you my difficulty. I understood you to say in the course of your answer "I did not say that I would not go back." Was that so? What did you say?—I did not say that I would offer this definitely as an alternative to the present proposal. But I said it would be a feasible Constitution which would cost far less than the proposed one.

Lord Middleton.

15,790. I understand the whole tenor of your memorandum is that such success as we have met with in looking after India has rested on light taxation. Is that so?—I would say that under light taxation India made wonderful progress.

7^o Novembris, 1933.]

Mr. DOUGLAS DEWAR.

15,791. You rather fear for the future if taxation is increased to any large extent?—I regard the present taxation as simply appalling.

15,792. But at present taxation has not fallen so heavily on agricultural India as on Urban India. Is that so? The income tax, for instance, does not fall on agricultural income?—That is so.

15,793. And the Settlement in Bengal and Bihar has not been tampered with?—No.

15,794. Is that right?—That is right.

15,795. Then supposing that, owing to greatly increased expenditure under Reforms, it were necessary to increase the burden of taxation on agricultural India, what would be your views on that? Would it be fraught with danger?—Knowing the condition of agriculturists in India it would be a most cruel thing to do, knowing how hard they find it to live. I have been a District Officer as well as having been in the Accounts Department, so I know from experience what a struggle these poor men have, to make both ends meet, and any taxation on them I should regard as a most cruel thing.

15,796. They are the majority of the population, are they not?—The vast majority.

15,797. In studying the history of India in the past would you agree with me that heavy taxation on the agricultural population has not met with success and that they have resisted it? Is that so?—I know that when the salt tax was put up there was a good deal of dissatisfaction, but I would not say they went so far as to resist it by force.

15,798. I am going back to the days before the advent of the British rule?—Before the advent of the British rule I think they had to send troops very often to collect the taxes. They lived in forts, and it depended more or less on the power and rapacity of the tax collector. That was the case before we took it over. When we took over Gorakhpur, I think there were 44 forts that were owned by Zamindars there, into which they used to withdraw themselves when the tax collector came along.

15,799. You do think increased taxation in India is a very dangerous thing?—Considering that they have no votes, any Constitution which imposes increased taxation on people who have no votes is not, in my opinion, desirable.

[Lord Rankeillour.] I find great difficulty in putting questions in detail to

Mr. Dewar, especially in view of the Memorandum that is about to be published. I do not know whether after that Memorandum has been circulated there will be an opportunity of seeing Mr. Dewar here again.

[Chairman.] I can only say it is for the Committee to decide.

Lord Rankeillour.

15,800. I want to put one or two general questions to Mr. Dewar. I take it your general position is that in India at present the expenditure is already too high?—I consider that the taxation in India is exceedingly high taxation.

15,801. I think you estimate that these proposals will bring about an increase of, was it 7 crores?—I do not know that I have actually given any figures, because I have to estimate. I cannot tell. They say, it is going to cost, I think, 7 lakhs for Karachi, for instance. I do not know whether they are going to build new offices or what they want in Karachi for a new Government. I have accepted Sir Malcolm Hailey's figures as far as they go.

15,802. On that you think there would be a large increase in the cost of Provincial administration?—I have given the figures under various heads in my Second Memorandum. I have commented on Sir Malcolm Hailey's figures.

15,803. You think that in consequence of that there would be pressure from the Provinces on the Federal Government for more assistance?—I do not see how the Provinces are going to find the money.

15,804. You anticipate there will be strong pressure on Federal Sources of Revenue?—Most assuredly in the case of most Provinces, possibly not Madras and possibly not the Punjab.

15,805. Otherwise there will?—I should certainly think so.

15,806. Would you mind telling us the present method of collection? I understand income tax is collected on a Federal basis and by Federal officers?—I am afraid I am not quite aware of what is done, because it is 10 years since I left India, but in my day I, as collector of revenue, had to collect the income tax. I know they now have an Inspector of Income Tax who is a Provincial officer; at least I think he is Provincial. We had Mr. Gaskell of the United Provinces, and I imagine he is a Provincial officer and not a Federal officer.

7th November, 1933.]

Mr. DOUGLAS DEWAR.

Mr. Butler.

15,807. I think he was a Central officer—I am sorry. As I say, it is 12 years since I was in the United Provinces as a Collector, and things have rather changed since then.

Dr. Shafa'at Ahmad Khan.] Greatly.

Lord Rankeillour.

15,808. Can you tell us what proportion of the total revenue of India is collected and passes through the Central Exchequer?—I take it that all the Customs certainly pass through the Central Exchequer and, presumably, the Income Tax does, but the Opium Revenue, I believe, is collected by the Provincial people and then credit is given to the Government of India afterwards.

15,809. And a proportion of those revenues is passed on to the Provincial Governments?—No; I do not think so.

15,810. What proportion goes through the Central Exchequer and is thence distributed?—I take it the whole of the Customs Duty is entirely Central, the Income Tax I am now told is also Central, but the Opium Revenue, I imagine, is collected by the Provincial officers and it must be passed through the Exchange Account to the Central offices.

15,811. Do you know what the proportion is?—The Opium Revenue is pretty small. I can tell you from Sir Malcolm Hailey's memorandum. Have you got Record No. 1, unrevised? He gives the actual opium only 0.63, and, of course, it is a diminishing revenue because it is going to disappear, and that is, as far as I know, the only Central Revenue that is collected in the Provinces, if I am right in thinking that the Income Tax is now purely Central.

15,812. Have the Central Government at present any power of checking expenditure in the Provinces by withholding some part of the revenue which goes through the Exchequer?—The Central Government would have no power. It is all paid into the local Government.

15,813. It has been suggested that in future they might have such a power?—That could be provided for, but, at the present moment, each Province receives all its own revenue, and the Central Government does not ask any questions.

15,814. Would you see a great difficulty in so arranging matters that a part of the revenue was retained by the Central Government in order to secure some financial control over the Provinces?—In order to do that you would have to have a Central officer collecting the revenue, would not you, because the Provincial officer collects the revenue and sends it to his Treasury; so unless you had a Central officer I do not see how you could retain it. The Accountant-General is a Central officer, and they might direct him to earmark a certain amount of the revenue, but he is not a Treasury officer. The Treasury officer is entirely a Provincial officer.

15,815. The question has arisen whether, in order to have a hold over the efficiency of the Provincial Governments and to see that their officers carried out Federal laws, there might be some financial check of this kind. Would that involve a great change in the machinery of the Central Government?—I think it would because you would have to have Central officers collecting the revenue.

15,816. Do you think it would be an insuperable difficulty?—If you were to make Land Revenue a Central subject of course, that is one of the curious things in this Federal Constitution. As I look at things the King-Emperor owns all the land, and I do not know quite where he comes in in this Federation, but that is another point. I think the oriental theory is that a Rajah, the Mogul, or the King-Emperor owns all the land.

Sir Hari Singh Gour.

15,817. Is that the present theory of the British Government in India?—I say it is the oriental theory.

15,818. Is that the present theory of the British Government in India?—I do not know what the present theory of the Government of India is, but it has been recognised from time immemorial.

15,819. I am speaking of the present British Government in India?—I cannot answer that question.

Sir Akbar Hydari.

15,820. I am not sure whether there has been some misunderstanding about the question in this regard. Is it not, Mr. Dewar, that so far as the Treasury is concerned, there is only one Treasury. There is no difference between Central and Provincial Treasuries where the revenue is actually deposited, but the distinction between the two is more of accounts and books?—It would be certainly. Yes, that is so.

15,821. So that every source of revenue, whether ultimately accounted as Provincial or Central, first goes to one common treasury, and, if it is decided that

7^o Novembris, 1933]

Mr. DOUGLAS DEWAR.

the Imperial Government should have a first charge upon any portion there, it could be effected?—Yes; it could be effected.

Sir Akbar Hydari.] Have I put your question?

Lord Rankeillour.

15,822. I have no doubt from my ignorance I did not use the right expressions, but that is exactly what I was asking. It would be possible?—Yes, if you said so much per cent. is to be earmarked for the Government of India; if the Treasury officer did not carry out that order, I do not know quite what would happen, but presumably he would. He is the servant of the Provincial Government.

15,823. Just for the moment, on the Railway Board, do you think that would make for economy or otherwise?—I am afraid I did not catch your question.

15,824. The working of the Railway Board: Do you approve that from a financial point of view; the proposal to set up a Railway Board?—I am afraid I am not prepared to give an opinion on that.

15,825. Only one other question. I dare say that you have noticed that there has been a good deal of anxiety lest the Statutory charges for pensions and interest and the like should not be punctually paid; that there might be delay in their payment. How do you think it would be possible to provide against that?—If the money is not there, I do not see how you can get it. You mean if the taxes were not sufficient to furnish the revenue necessary to pay these pensions? I do not see how you could pay them.

15,826. To go back to what Sir Akbar Hydari said, if it is always to go through one channel, could not some of it be earmarked as a first charge for Statutory payments?—I suppose it could be earmarked, but could it be carried out in the case of local demands? Would you have the Treasury officer refuse a local demand on the ground that some of the balance was earmarked for the Central Government?

15,827. That is what I am asking?—It is all a question of there being money there. If there is not enough money to go round, somebody has to go short.

15,828. Could not the statutory charges have a first pull on it?—I suppose it would be possible.

15,829. You have not thought a scheme of that sort out?—You could pass a Statute, but how are you going to enforce it? That is what I am not clear about.

15,830. You said just now that it would be possible to arrange for all the money to come through one channel, and could not it be, if necessary, switched off during that process?—You could pass a rule regarding that, but I am not quite certain how you could enforce it. The Treasury officer is a local Government officer, and if the local Government said "you have to pay this bill," he might be rather chary about not doing it. They would say "you have the money there"; he would have to say, "That is earmarked for the Central Government."

15,831. You would have to have Federal officers?—It might put the Treasury officer in a rather difficult position.

15,832. Is there anybody at present in India who corresponds to the Comptroller and Auditor-General here?—There is an Auditor-General in India.

15,833. Are his functions the same as here?—He is rather different because he is an accountant as well. He keeps the account as well as does the audit, and, I believe, in England the Auditor-General only audits.

15,834. Is it his duty to see that the appropriations passed by the Legislature are spent for those purposes for which they are passed?—Yes.

15,835. On whom is he dependent?—In the case of Provincial revenues?

Lord Rankeillour.] No; I am talking of Central revenues.

Mr. Butler.

15,836. I think there is a slight misapprehension. I do not think that is quite the correct explanation of the position of the Auditor-General in India?—He has to issue an Audit Appropriation Account every year, does he not?

Dr. Shafa' at Ahmad Khan.

15,837. Is not the Auditor-General distinct from the Accountant-General?—The Accountant-General is in the Provinces.

Sir Akbar Hydari.

15,838. I think you are not aware of the fact that there has been a recent separation of accounts and audits. Formerly the Accountant-General used to be both Auditor for the Provinces, in subordination to the Comptroller and Auditor-General, and also he used to be the Accountant-General. Now I think they are separating the two?—I only heard it had been tried as an experiment in the United Provinces and had been given up because it was too expensive. That is my information, but I left India some years ago.

7^o Novembris, 1933.]

Mr. DOUGLAS DEWAR.

Lord Rankeillour.

15,839. You know the Comptroller and Auditor-General here is an independent officer, not under any department of Government, who reports whether the money voted by Parliament has been spent for the purposes for which it was voted. Is there anything of that kind at the Centre in India now?—Yes, that is the Auditor-General's duty, to see that the money which is voted is properly appropriated.

15,840. Is he attached to the Finance Department?—No; he is appointed by the Secretary of State. He has a different office altogether. He is supposed to be quite independent of the Government of India.

15,841. Do you think there is anything in these proposals which would affect his position—the White Paper Proposals?—I do not think so necessarily, because, after all, he has only to see that the Statute is carried out, and, whatever the Statute is, I suppose he does that.

15,842. As here, he can only make a post-mortem, as it were?—Yes.

Lieut.-Colonel Sir H. Gidney.

15,843. Will not the post of Auditor-General remain after the new Constitution Act is passed?—I cannot say. I should ask the framers of the Act. I think they said they had to provide for one. As far as my recollection goes the White Paper does not deal with it at all. They are leaving that for the future. But what is in their minds I have not any idea.

Sir Reginald Craddock.

15,844. You made certain remarks about the Land Revenue. The first point I would ask you is that the ordinary cultivator has to pay rent, has he not?—Yes.

15,845. Or Land Revenue in the Ryotwari Provinces?—Yes.

15,846. In the Zamindari Provinces he pays rent to the landlord?—Yes.

15,847. Consequently the burden of Land Revenue does not fall directly upon him. It depends upon what rent he has to pay?—The cultivator is only responsible for paying the rent to his landlord.

15,848. That is what I mean. The Land Revenue might be comparatively moderate, whereas the rents might be on a higher scale?—Undoubtedly it does happen.

15,849. As for example Lord Middleton asked you about the Permanent Settlement. The Permanent Settlement prevents any Land Revenue being increased, but it does not, as such, prevent any rent being increased?—No.

15,850. Therefore, the burden paid by the cultivators of Bengal does not depend on the burden of Land Revenue on the Zamindars?—Not necessarily.

15,851. But upon the rents which the zamindar takes from the cultivator?—That is so.

15,852. The cultivator, likewise, has to pay his share of the Customs on any purchases that he makes of imported sugar or cloth?—Yes, of course he does.

15,853. So that a very high Custom must therefore react very greatly on the whole body of agriculturists? The village dwellers form 90 per cent. and the agriculturists about 72 per cent. of the population?—I quite agree.

15,854. Consequently high Customs, high Excise and general taxation with the exception of Income Tax, fall very hardly upon the agricultural population?—I should say every tax except Income Tax affects them.

15,855. Then the cost of litigation, for example, is a very important item in his budget?—Yes, because he has to litigate even in the case of revenue suits very often; he cannot help himself.

15,856. Then a fall in the value of silver has affected him prejudicially, has it not?—Of course, his prices would fall, I suppose, and he would get less for his produce.

15,857. He may have bought that silver a good many years ago?—In that case if he has to disgorge, of course, he gets less for his silver than he would have got.

15,858. Part of his silver is round his wife's ankle, and they have to part with this silver when times are hard, and therefore he gets a much depreciated sum for that silver?—Undoubtedly. Probably he would lose more than the full depreciation; he would have to pay through the nose even for that.

15,859. Then another thing I should like to point out to you is that for the last forty or fifty years in all temporarily

7^o Novembris, 1933.]

Mr. DOUGLAS DEWAR.

settled tracts, that is excluding the permanent settlement, rents and revenues have been steadily raised on the ground of the rise in prices?—That is so.

15,860. I think your figures will show that the land revenue in your earliest years was very much less than the land revenue just before the war came?—That is so.

15,861. Or even in 1921, it had risen considerably and rose very steadily during that period, but from 1930-31 the land revenue has fallen. Your own figures show that?—Yes, the actual receipts from it, not the assessment, you mean, so much, but the receipts. The actual receipts into the Treasury have certainly fallen.

15,862. Consequently the land revenue which is now collected perhaps with some difficulty cannot be raised so long as this slump continues. Is that the case?—In the case of the United Provinces I think they had to reduce their demand by 110 lakhs three years ago.

15,863. Very likely; they reduced it by 25 per cent., and in all other Provinces I see there has been a fall. That is common to the whole of India—a fall of land revenue in the Provinces?—Except the Punjab, I think. Is not that an exception? There, of course, they are increasing their irrigation which accounts for that.

15,864. That is the point with regard to the Punjab; they are increasing but the price of agricultural produce has been the severest blow to the cultivator?—That is the great complaint one hears.

15,865. It has been tremendous. I put it to you that when you went out to the country the prices were higher than they are now?—Undoubtedly. I believe the United Provinces in their Annual Report said they were 7 per cent. below 1914 prices.

15,866. At all events, the point that I am trying to ascertain your opinion upon is that the land revenue will not be able to be raised beyond what it was a few years ago until the effects of the slump have disappeared?—Most emphatically not.

15,867. I wanted to ask you some questions about the system of accounts regarding which there has been some discussion. It was, at all events until recent changes, fairly correct to say that the Provinces banked with the Government of India?—Yes, I suppose you might well describe it as that.

15,868. That is to say, for convenience sake and to meet all the local demands of expenditure certain balances were kept at certain Treasuries; the control of these balances rested with your Accountant-General or Controller, as he might be called?—Of course, it was his business to keep the Treasuries in funds. They had what they call Deficit Treasuries and Surplus Treasuries, and it was our business to see that the Treasury Officer always had money available to meet demands.

15,869. The District Treasury and so on, the Controller or Accountant-General had to keep watch on?—Yes.

15,870. There was no separate appropriation of Central revenues or Provincial revenues inside the Treasury; there was so much money and afterwards as to whom that should be credited to was purely a question of accounting, was it not?—That is so. The Treasury Officer had to pay all demands that came to him on proper forms.

15,871. And the Controller or Accountant-General had close cognisance of what those demands would be?—Yes.

15,872. There were such matters as Supply Bills and Remittance Transfer Receipts—large items?—Yes.

15,873. You might get in one place large demands of that kind where there was a lot of trade, and it was the business of the Controller or Accountant-General to see that the Treasuries were in adequate funds to meet possible demands upon them?—Yes, that was a most important part of his work.

15,874. And another thing I suppose you did, as our Accountant-General and Controllers in my Province did, was that they kept the Local Government informed from time to time of how the revenue was coming in, and they submitted what they called resource lists. Is that not so?—Yes, that is so.

15,875. That is to say, the various Revenue and Treasury Officers made up their resource lists for their districts and sent them up to the Central Office to the Controller or Accountant-General, and it was on that that he framed his calculations as to where the money was required, where it should be kept, and where it might be transferred from one Treasury to another?—That is so.

15,876. But ultimately there were certain Imperial revenues which were credited to a particular Treasury, and as long as the accounts were properly kept it did not matter to whom the money belonged in the Treasury?—That is so.

7^o Novembris, 1933.]

Mr. DOUGLAS DEWAR.

Dr. Shafa' at Akmad Khan.] Is that pre-1919 or post-1919?

Sir Reginald Craddock.

15,877. It is up to the time I left India anyhow. I cannot say what changes have been made since. (To the Witness): Is it the fact that the Accountant-General of the Province has become or will become a Provincial officer now?—That is a point which I have raised in my evidence. I am not quite clear about it. At the present moment, of course, he is a non-Provincial officer; he is paid by the Government of India, but under Provincial autonomy I presume that that will not be so. But there again I do not know what the White Paper people propose to do; they have not said, so far as I can make out, in what they have published.

Lord Winterton.

15,878. Might I ask, what does the Witness mean by the White Paper people? Does he mean the proposals put forward by His Majesty's Government for the consideration of this Committee?—Should I say the framers of the White Paper?

15,879. We are considering inter alia the proposals put forward by His Majesty's Government. Is that what the Witness is referring to?—I am referring to what is called the White Paper. I should have said, I do not know what His Majesty's Government intend to do with respect to the position of the Accountant-General—whether he is to be a Provincial officer or a Central officer.

Sir Reginald Craddock.

15,880. That is rather important, because the Accountant-General if he is a Provincial officer, is not, as he used to be, a watchdog of the Central Government?—At the present moment, of course, it is the duty of the Accountant-General to act as a watchdog so to speak, over the Local Government—to see that it carries out its functions.

Sir Joseph Nall.

15,881. Are the Treasury Officers to whom you have just referred responsible to the Provincial Governments or to the Central Government?—They are responsible to the Provincial Governments themselves, but they have to carry out the Accountant-General's orders, and if they do not do that he will report them to the Local Government, who will deal with them; but the Treasury officer is a Local Government servant, he is appointed by the Local Government; the Accountant-General has nothing to do with the appointment.

Sir John Wardlaw-Milne.

15,882. Mr. Dewar, would you refer first of all to your Memorandum No. 75, paragraph 3, sub-paragraph (3). You say: "Much of this increase" (referring to the increase in question) "has been the result of recent administrative changes in the Government of India." Have you by any chance compared the increased charges of administration in India in, say the last 15 years with the ratio of increased charges in other countries?—No.

15,883. You are aware, of course, that there has been a very great increase in charges in this and other countries as well as in India?—I believe in this country there has been. I am afraid I am not prepared to speak about other countries.

15,884. You know it is the case in this country?—I agree there is always a tendency for extravagance in government.

15,885. Then I want you to turn to the comparative tables where you use the year 1930-31. May I suggest to you that that is rather an exceptional year from the point of view that the world depression had begun to have or had fully had its effect upon India, at the time these figures were available? Is that not the case?—It is true, of course, that the depression certainly had made itself felt at that time. Those were the latest figures I was able to get hold of; that is why I gave them.

15,886. Are you aware, for example, that in 1929-30, the year before, the figure of total revenue was 227 crores, which is very considerably different from the total of 206 crores which you give in that paragraph?—No, I am not aware of that. I take your word for it, but I am not aware of it.

15,887. These figures are given in the "Moral and Material Progress of India" Report issued in 1932. They give the combined Indian revenue, Provincial and Central, for 1929-30?—Are they both gross figures, or is one net and the other gross?

15,888. I do not think so. I will not pursue it, but perhaps you will care later on to examine the figures. However, you will find if you look at 1929-30 the figure was given as 227 crores, which is

7^o Novembris, 1933.]

Mr. DOUGLAS DEWAR.

rather a different one from the figure of 1930-31. That is perhaps borne out, I suggest for your consideration, by the statement of the Finance Minister, who, dealing with it in his budget speech, referred to the very considerable fall in wholesale prices and the result, of course, upon the revenues of India. He dealt with that in detail. I will not detain the Committee by going into it, but it does have reference to what you say, because in one or two parts or your Memorandum, at the beginning, you rather put the burden as being entirely caused by the increased administration charges, but later on you refer yourself to a series of misfortunes, chief among which was the fall in prices. Do you remember that passage?—Yes.

15,889. But have you taken into consideration, not only that it was the chief one, but that in fact the fall in prices in India was 19 per cent., which was the highest probably of any of the main countries of the world in that year. India was probably more severely affected in the year you have chosen than any other country in the world?—I chose it because it was the latest year one could get figures for, not for any other purpose.

15,890. It would not be unfair to say that it is perhaps for India an unfortunate year, but for the purposes of your comparison rather a fortunate one?—Have matters improved since?

15,891. I do not think there are any figures available since; I am quite sure you would have given them to us if there had been?—But can you give me the figures for the year you mention? I would like to make a note of it if I could. I was not aware of it.

15,892. I have the Report of the "Moral and Material Progress of India" for 1932, page 367?—The total revenue for the year?

15,893. Yes—giving the revenue expenditure. I will not detain the Committee by going into the details of it. Then I want to ask you this, Mr. Dewar. Throughout your Memorandum you speak of the burden of taxation upon India, and to-day I think you have used the phrase that that burden is appalling. Have you worked out what the burden of taxation per head of the population is in India?—No, I have not gone into the figures.

15,894. You are aware that even as compared with some other countries, not dissimilarly situated, the burden of taxation per head is very low?—Of course, you have got to take into consideration the comparative wealth of the nation.

15,895. I quite agree: I was coming to that, but you have not dealt with that aspect of it at all in your Memorandum?—If we take the population of England and our revenue, and the population of India and India's revenue, I think you will find, of course, an enormous difference, but you do not suggest that by raising taxation you could get out of India 30 times the revenue you could get from England, India being a poor country?

15,896. Certainly not; that was why I was careful to say "countries not dissimilarly situated." Equally, I suggest to you that there is a population of 350 millions in India and a population of 46 millions in England, which is also rather a different matter; but I will not bother about that?—My point is that England with her smaller population has a much bigger revenue than India, showing the enormous disparity between the two countries. You cannot suggest that you can get that revenue out of India by taxation.

15,897. Having considered taxation per head of the population now as against the years you put forward, leaving any comparison out, have you any figures of the taxation per head of the population even in the bad year 1930-31 as compared with, say, 1913-14?—We see that, in spite of the increased taxes, there has been a very slight increase in revenue coming in. Although the rates of taxes have been so greatly raised, the amount of revenue coming in is hardly any different; in fact, it is rather tending to fall. If you have the last budget figures for the last 10 years we could see everything in a moment. There is a memorandum attached to Sir George Schuster's budget giving the figures for the last 10 years, and my impression is that the revenue has rather tended to fall. I have got one or two years here showing that taxation has almost reached saturation point.

15,898. I do not in any way wish to argue that with you, but I would ask you: Is it not the fact that in some aspects the taxation was heavier in the days when you were in India than it is to-day: for example, you were in India at the time when the salt tax was 2½ rupees?—I do not think it was ever as much as 2½ rupees in my time. I think it went up to 2 rupees. The salt tax was high then.

15,899. Perhaps, unfortunately, I was putting you rather farther back than

7^o Novembris, 1933]

Mr. DOUGLAS DEWAR.

you ever claimed to be?—In fact, it was at one time 2½ rupees.

15,900. And it is now?—One rupee, 12 annas.

Sir Hari Singh Gour.] One rupee, 4 annas.

Witness.] Is not there a 25 per cent surcharge on it?

Sir Phiroze Sethna.] There is no surcharge on it.

Sir John Wardlaw-Milne.

15,901. Therefore the tax is about half of the highest limit it has been?—Is it not 1 rupee 4 annas, plus the 25 per cent. surcharge?

Mr. A. H. Ghuznavi.] There is no surcharge on the salt tax.

Sir John Wardlaw-Milne.

15,902. It does not materially matter. It is very much less than it was—something like half of what it was at the highest point?—Yes.

15,903. As a matter of taxation—I am quite sure you will not take it that I am recommending that it should be higher—that tax falls as a fact per head of the population very lightly upon the Indian people?—The salt tax, judging by the amount per head is a very tiny sum; the actual number of rupees paid per head would be quite small.

15,904. But that is a tax paid by everybody in the country?—It is paid by everybody in the country, yes.

15,905. And it is a tax which to-day is something like half of what it was at the highest limit?—Yes, provided that the surcharge does not apply to it.

15,906. Have you by any chance in your very interesting figures thought of any possibility of examining the taxation of India in relation to its trade turnover?—No.

15,907. You realise that comparatively the trade turnover of taxation, as compared with other countries, is small? Again, I am not going into the question of whether the people can pay it?—I cannot say I have gone into the relation between the two things.

15,908. Theoretically, is not that the only way in which one can really judge taxation?—I would not say so in an agricultural country like India.

15,909. Then turning to your additional Memorandum No. 76 for a moment, you refer to the appointment of two officers in the case of the Punjab Government, and you rather suggest that as an example of an increased administrative cost, but if the result of the appointment of these two officers was, as you say, to produce satisfactory results in the revenue, the cost was very much more than met?—I think my intention was to show the value of the audit rather. May I just see what I do say here? I say, “or for the increased cost of audit,” which I think will be more under the new system, showing the value of audit. I quote this as an example. The Punjab Government found that these two auditors were valuable. My point was that Sir Malcolm Hailey seems to assume that the audit under the new Constitution is going to cost the same as under the present Constitution, and it seems to me that if that is so there will be a considerable falling off in the revenue. I think I have gone at some length into that in my first Memorandum.

Dr. Shafa' at Ahmad Khan.

15,910. Had the Local Fund Audit been instituted when you were in the United Provinces?—The audit of the Local Fund Accounts, Municipalities, District Boards (County Councils and Urban Councils) that was introduced, I think, about two years before I went to India, as far as I remember.

Sir John Wardlaw-Milne.

15,911. In paragraph 7 of Memorandum 76 you say: “Sir Malcolm Hailey makes no allowance for any deterioration of the revenue at the Centre or in the Provinces in consequence of the administration being less efficient under the new Constitution than it is at present.” It is, of course, merely a matter of opinion whether it would be less efficient or not?—It would be a matter of fact whether it is less efficient or not. Of course, we have an opinion with regard to it, but when it is in force we shall then know whether it is more efficient or not. My point is that with all these people going on proportionate pensions there is likely to be rather a temporary fall in efficiency.

15,912. Then in one or two places, I think principally in this part of your Memorandum, you refer to India's Debt. Speaking very generally, the unproductive debt of India is, you will agree, for the size of the country and its trade, at a very small figure compared with other countries?—Not if you consider its relative wealth. I do not consider it small. Its proportion is as big as England's was before the war broke out.

7^o Novembris, 1933.]

Mr. DOUGLAS DEWAR.

when you consider the relative wealth of the two countries.

15,913. You say that on March 31st, 1931, it had an unproductive debt of 183 millions. Comparing it again with the unfortunate position of most of the other countries of the world, do you consider that a large debt for a country with a revenue of 227 crores?—A very large unproductive debt, yes.

15,914. Compared with other countries, you would agree it is a small one, would you not?—I do not know whether other countries distinguish between their unproductive debt and their productive debt as India does. This is the unproductive debt, not for railways and canals and that sort of thing; this unproductive debt is for borrowing chiefly and for meeting overdrafts and things.

Mr. N. M. Joshi.

15,915. Is not a large part of that unproductive debt the world contribution of India to Great Britain of about 100 crores?—Yes, certainly. Of course, that is part of it.

Mr. A. Butler.

15,916. Might I ask Mr. Dewar what his definition of "unproductive debt" is. What does he include under that heading?—Any debt that is incurred for something that brings in no return by way of revenue, such as railways and irrigation.

15,917. May I take it you mean it to be the excess of interest-bearing obligations over interest-yielding assets?—I think that would probably be what it would amount to.

15,918. That would be the very highest figure you could find for it?—Of course, anything that yields interest must be a productive debt. That is quite clear, is it not? I call any money that you borrow and get some return in the form of income productive.

15,919. I just wanted to know what definition you applied to the term?—I am only taking it from the figures given in Whitaker and so on, and what the "Economist" says is an unproductive debt. I do not know what their definition exactly is, but that is what I take it to be.

Earl Peel.

15,920. Do you include in your reference to these unproductive liabilities such things as liabilities under the Post Office, Post Office Deposits and things of that sort?—I imagine that that must be included in it; it is shown as an outstanding debt; it must be included in it

15,921. You would include that? Would you include those on both sides to get the figure of 183 millions?—Perhaps I should say that it depends upon what they use the Post Office Savings Bank money for. If it was used for railway construction, for instance, then it would be a productive debt. It must depend upon the use the money is put to, I take it.

15,922. Then you would divide the liabilities upon the Post Office according as to the investment of the money; is that so?—For the purpose of classifying the debt of India as unproductive or productive, I would apply the test of interest, and if the Post Office Savings Bank money is used to pay off a debt I would say it is an unproductive debt, but if it was used to finance a railway I would call it productive.

15,923. You are not sure whether the 183 millions includes both these classes of funds?—I think that 183 millions would not bring this in at all. This money does not appear, so to speak; it is all used up in the Government funds as such, and then when you have used this money up you have to see what your total debt is and you divide it up into productive and unproductive debt.

Sir John Wardlaw-Milne.

15,924. Would you be surprised to know that other authorities would not put your figure of unproductive debt as high as the figure you have put in your Memorandum?—That is taken from the "Economist."

Lord Winterton.

15,925. Might I just ask, arising out of that, does the Witness say the actual figure of 183 millions and the term used, that is to say, unproductive debt, are taken from the "Economist"?—Yes, they are taken from the "Economist."

Sir John Wardlaw-Milne.

15,926. In your Memoranda you refer to one of the weakest spots of the White Paper being the effect on the main sources of the income of the Federal Government, and the new Customs revenue as affected by the proposed changes, and you refer to what has happened in the possible opening of the Indian mints to the free coinage of silver. Are you aware that as against the advantages, which I do not in any way

7^o Novembris, 1933.]

Mr. DOUGLAS DEWAR.

dispute, that you have referred to here, there is the fact that the present basis of exchange in India has tended to keep the products of the Indian agriculturists at a very low level?—Yes.

15,927. You would agree with that?—Yes.

15,928. You would agree that a change in the ratio value of the rupee would immediately change the position of the Indian producer in that respect?—It would, of course, make his goods cheaper for the foreigner or the Englishman.

15,929. You refer to the difficulties under the proposals which might emerge from the considerations of this Committee of the White Paper proposals if they were accepted in anything like their present form—the difficulties that would exist in the way of appointments, Indian Ministers being induced to give appointments to those connected with them, and so on. You remember your reference to that?—No; would you refer me to it?

15,930. I think it is in Memorandum No. 75 somewhere that you refer to the difficulties that will arise from pressure being brought to bear upon Ministers?—Indian collectors, was it? I do not think I mentioned Ministers.

15,931. The main point I wanted to ask you was this: It is quite clear that whether that exists to-day or not, or whether it will exist in the future or not, if Indians are to administer departments in India that is bound to be met with some day?—Yes; you have to make the appointments.

15,931A. You do not suggest any means by which that could be obviated or avoided altogether? If the pressure is going to exist it is bound to exist some day?—There might be methods of meeting it. I think they try to do it in some of the Provinces. They have a Public Services Commission in some of the Provinces, which makes the appointments.

15,932. If any extension of self government in the past has led to that, it is an inevitable consequence, is it not?—It does not refer to any system. My people used to come to me and worry me to give them, or their sons, appointments. It applies to any unfortunate officer who has the gift of appointments. He is apt to be pestered by people who wish to get them.

15,933. I did not follow what bearing that had?—Would you refer me to the passage?

Mr. Butler.] It is in Memorandum No. 75.

Sir John Wardlaw-Milne.

15,934. The reference under the heading of "Other Items of Additional Expenditure"—"another cause of loss of revenue which is likely to operate is that the inauguration of the proposed Constitution will be deemed by the criminals and bad characters of the country a favourable occasion on which to commit thefts"?—Yes.

15,935. Do you seriously suggest that this change is likely to bring about an immediate influx of bad characters designing to commit thefts?—I know the Indian bad character is always ready to take advantage of any change of Government or any time like that, or any crisis.

15,936. What in the White Paper leads you to think definitely that this would be the result if the Committee did accept any such scheme as is there set out?—If you are going to introduce suddenly an entirely new form of Government in India I think it would, quite likely, lead to disturbances, and both people on the frontier and internal criminals would think this a very good opportunity to pursue their desires.

15,937. In connection with pensions, to which you referred a few moments ago, I understood you to say you had not any proposal to put forward as to how pensions should be secured, but, if pensions and similar charges are, in fact, a first charge on the revenues of India, and the Governor-General has the authority and duty of ensuring their payment, you do not suggest that the revenues of India will, at any date, not be able to produce sufficient money for the Service of the Debt?—I suggest the Governor-General might have difficulty in getting the money if the bulk of the people were hostile. I do not know quite how he would get the money.

15,938. If it were a first charge, that would mean, perfectly plainly, that nothing else would be done before the payment of these things. You do not suggest there would not be the money there?—I do not suggest there would be no revenue coming in. If they were a first charge there would be enough revenue coming in, in any circumstances, I should think, to pay them; but whether the Governor-General would be able to get the money is another matter. It is one thing to put on paper that it is to be a first charge and another thing to carry it into effect.

7^o Novembris, 1933.]

Mr. DOUGLAS DEWAR.

15,939. You do visualise the possibility of sufficient trouble caused by a new Constitution in India which would make it impossible to raise enough revenue even to pay these charges?—No; I did not say that.

15,940. I could not have understood your answer. I asked if you did envisage such a possibility?—There might be a conflict between the Governor-General and his Ministers, and the Governor-General might decline, we will say, to sanction legislation which they considered essential. Then the Finance Minister might turn round and say: "Then I cannot get the money in for you."

15,941. In a case of that kind, would not that be a complete breakdown of the Constitution, in which case, the Governor-General would take charge?—If the Finance Minister said "If you do not allow this Measure to go through, I fear I cannot get in enough taxes to pay for the demands of the Army, Pensions, and so on," what would the Governor-General do? Would he wait and see, or would he act as if it was a breakdown of the Constitution?

15,942. I am asking if you have examined the White Paper Proposals from that point of view?—I have, but the White Paper says he should use his endeavours to get it, but how is he going to do it in practice? It is all very well on paper to say, "Tell the Governor-General to get this money and send it to England," but I do not see how he is to do it.

15,943. The Governor-General has the power to take complete charge?—He is empowered to do it. He might find great practical difficulty. It is easy to say, "You go and collect that"; it is not quite so easy to get it.

Sir John Wardlaw-Milne.] You envisage the possibility of not being able to raise even that amount of money?

Lord Eustace Percy.

15,944. I understand your Memorandum No. 76 was written after you had been able to consult Sir Malcolm Hailey's Memorandum?—Yes. Having seen that then I put in my Second Memorandum.

15,945. If you will allow me I will confine my examination of you to that Memorandum. In the first place, will you refer to that Memorandum where you say that the repayment of £84,000,000 of the £100,000,000 contributed towards the War seems to have been accomplished by appropriating to that purpose all the sums provided in the Budget under the head "Avoidance and Payment of Debt"?—Yes.

15,946. Do you believe that that is the fact?—That is the only thing shown in the Budgets of the payments made, therefore, I infer it is that.

15,947. Are not you aware that, I think, more than £75,000,000 out of that £100,000,000 was paid by loans raised by the Government of India? Are not you aware that it is only the balance on which Sinking Fund and Interest Payments have been made out of the Funds for "avoidance and payment of debt"?—If you call it paying off a debt to borrow money you are robbing Peter to pay Paul, in other words.

15,948. I am not asking what I call it, but you have suggested in this Memorandum that a certain course has in fact been taken by the Government of India?—I put it in this way: The unproductive debt of India has risen from £13,000,000—

15,949. I will examine you on that in a moment, but I am asking at the moment whether it is a fact, as you have stated, that the repayment of £84,000,000 to this country has absorbed the whole Budget provision for the avoidance and payment of debt?—I should think it would, because I think the actual figures were about six crores a year, and that is all that is shown in your Budget.

Mr. Butler.

15,950. The actual provision in this year's Budget is 78·4 lakhs?—We will call it eight crores, shall we?

Mr. Butler.] No, 78 lakhs.

Lord Eustace Percy.

15,951. May I suggest to you that the statement in your Memorandum is wrong, that £75,000,000 of this £100,000,000 has been repaid out of capital raised by the Government of India and that only a fraction of the Budget provision for the avoidance and payment of debt has been used for this purpose?—If you say so, I will take it at that.

15,952. It is on the published records; it has been announced to Parliament; it has been laid before Parliament. There is no mystery about it?—I will take it from you.

15,953. May I come to the second point in the next paragraph. You say that the unproductive debt of India has increased from £13,000,000 in 1914 to £183,000,000 in 1933?—Yes.

7^o Novembris, 1933.]

Mr. DOUGLAS DEWAR.

15,954. You were asked a moment ago whether you regarded Provident Funds, Post Office Savings Bank and Reserves as unproductive debt. Where are those in these comparative figures?—I do not think they appear anywhere, because that money is not lying idle. That has been used in some way, it is merged in the Government Accounts.

15,955. Would you be surprised to know that you have left it completely out of the 1914 figure, and you have included it in the unproductive debt of the 1933 figure?—One is taken from the "Economist" and the other is taken from the Encyclopædia Britannica, Lord Meston's article.

15,956. May I suggest to you that that is no way to compare figures?—Unproductive debt is unproductive debt.

15,957. Would it surprise you to know that in your second figure of £183,000,000 you have included a sum of £147,000,000 Post Office Savings, and so on, which you have left completely out of your previous figure, so that, as a matter of fact, the comparative figures are not £13,000,000 and £183,000,000, but £13,000,000 and £36,000,000?—I do not think you would find all that difference between the two. I do not mind. My point is that your unproductive debt has increased. It does not matter whether it is in the Post Office Savings Bank; you do admit £13,000,000 in 1914.

Lord Eustace Percy.] No.

Earl Winterton.] On a point of order, I think we should get clear what the position of the witness is. Does the witness make himself responsible for these figures, or not? I gather from his last answer that he does not. He has taken them from the "Encyclopædia Britannica" and the "Economist." I do not see how the Committee can usefully examine any witness who does not take responsibility for the figures in his Memorandum. I raise it as a point of order.

Lord Eustace Percy.

15,958. I was not trying to shake the credit of the witness. I was only trying to find out what the basis of his figures was. Either his £13,000,000 or his £183,000,000 is wrong. He has left out of the first something which is included in the second, therefore, the comparison is an increase of £13,000,000 to £36,000,000 and not an increase of £13,000,000 to £183,000,000. Perhaps we may leave it there; perhaps the witness will verify his figures?—If you are going to leave out your Post Office liabilities, are you not going to count that as a debt at all?

15,959. I have no objection to putting in the Post Office liabilities in 1933 if you will put them in in 1914, but you have left them out in 1914?—Thank you for pointing that out. I will find the correct figures.

15,960. Perhaps you will revise your figures. Perhaps you will tell me what the precise points of your comparison are with Persia and Siam. They seem to show that India's unproductive debt is only 18 per cent. in excess of her annual revenue, and that Siam's is 22 per cent. What was the point of comparison?—Because it was suggested that the state of India was quite unique in the smallness of her debt, and I do not see that it is unique—that is the only point—comparing it with other countries round about.

15,961. You do not argue that the position of Siam is better?—I simply give the figures. One is total debt. They do not give unproductive and otherwise.

15,962. We will not delay over that any longer. I am also rather puzzled, if I might jump on a little to finish up this debt question, by your comparison of England and India. Do not you regard War Debt as unproductive debt?—War Debt is certainly unproductive debt.

15,963. Then why do you carefully eliminate War Debt before comparing the unproductive debts of the two countries?—Where do I eliminate it?

15,964. In paragraph 26?—Before the War I give it. England's War expenditure was out of all proportion. My point is that India now is in much the same position as England was before the War. That is the point I am trying to make.

15,965. You think the comparison of India after the War with England before the War is a fair one?—Yes.

15,966. You have not taken in the per capita weight of the debt in the two countries?—No; I have not done that.

15,967. Have you worked that out at all?—I have not divided the debt by the population or the population by the debt.

15,968. Does it not strike you that, on the argument in your last paragraph, that would be the natural thing to do. What is the unproductive debt of India per head of population?—It will not take very long to work it out.

15,969. Is it about 13s. 4d.?—The population is—

7^o Novembris, 1933.]

Mr. DOUGLAS DEWAR.

Lieut.-Col. Sir H. Gidney.

15,970. 360,000,000?—I should take British India only.

Lord Eustace Percy.

15,971. It is about 13s. 4d. Perhaps you will work it out. With regard to revenue and expenditure may I ask you to refer to your Memorandum, paragraph 51, where you say the foregoing considerations indicate that the problem that would confront the Central Government is to find Rs 19 Crores after sacrificing Rs.13 Crores of Revenue. Your 13 crores of revenue you take straight from Sir Malcolm Hailey, I gather?—Yes.

15,972. How do you get your 19 crores, because I fail to work it out?—It will take me a little time.

15,973. Surely you can tell me. Does it include any revenue which is being handed over to the Provinces?—Yes.

15,974. It does?—Of course it includes that.

15,975. So that is not extra expenditure in India as a whole?—It has got to hand over its salt tax, has it not?

15,976. I beg your pardon?—It will have to hand over the Income Tax or part of it.

15,977. How much Income Tax is taken into consideration in the 19 crores?—I am afraid if you challenge the figures I must ask for time to explain how I got those 19 crores out.

15,978. Then perhaps we may take some of your figures seriatim because, although they do not add up to 19 crores, I shall be anxious to know how you arrived at them. You have, in paragraph 8, a sum of 7 crores which is taken from Sir Malcolm Hailey's Memorandum plus some addition of about 75 lakhs because you think Sir Malcolm Hailey's estimate is an under-estimate. Is that right?—Deterioration of revenue. I say, "Assuming that there will be no such deterioration, the finding of an additional Rs.7 crores of revenue every year would not be a very heavy burden."

15,979. But that 7 crores, I gather, is an addition of the sums in the preceding paragraphs, is it not?—Yes.

15,980. Two crores, which you think is extra expenditure?—Yes.

15,981. One crore which is not extra expenditure, but which is tributes not collected from the States?—Loss of revenue, in other words.

15,982. It is loss of revenue; it is not extra expenditure?—No.

15,983. Loss of currency receipts?—Yes.

15,984. That is a non-recurring item, is it not?—No; it is a recurrent item, until you get profits from the Reserve Bank.

15,985. It is an expense incident to the establishment of the Reserve Bank?—To handing over control of the currency, but I do not say it is non-recurring at all, for the moment. I should say it is recurring for some time.

15,986. And 3 crores for the separation of Burma, which is again loss of revenue?—Yes; I call it surrender of revenue in my Memorandum, under the proposed Constitution.

15,987. Your 7 crores is composed partly of extra expenditure and partly of surrender of revenue. It is a mixed figure, is it not?—Yes. The Government will have to find that sum, but for Budget purposes it does not matter whether you surrender Revenue or spend more.

15,988. Later in your Memorandum, at the point I originally referred to, paragraph 51, you make a distinction between finding additional revenue and relinquishing 13 crores of revenue, so you do not seem to have quite kept that distinction there?—That is taking off these extra taxes when I say "relinquishing" 13 crores. It is not the same thing as surrendering revenue from the States and so on.

15,989. There is a possible distinction. In paragraph 41, you have 4 crores extra on the Military Budget?—Yes.

15,990. How did you arrive at that sum of 4 crores?—As a very conservative estimate to restore the Army to the minimum given by Sir Basil Blackett in 1928. He said 55 crores was the very minimum. I have his very words.

15,991. I am quite aware of his words? Some of that is due to the cheaper prices and so on, so I put a very minimum of 4 crores.

15,992. Have you consulted the Report of the Federal Finance Committee of 1932, if you will excuse my asking you?—I am not sure that I have seen that. I have seen a good many documents. If I saw it I might be able to recognise it.

15,993. I do not want to claim any particular paternity, but then you possibly have not studied the paragraph at the bottom of page 47 of that Report on the Military Budget. May I read it to you: "Our estimate" (That is the estimate of the Committee) "of 47 crores for the Army Budget of the future is based on the 1932-33 Budget figure, allowance being made for restoration of pay-cuts, resumption of normal building and stores programmes, and the separation of Burma. No provision has been made for non-recurrent expenditure on the completion of the special re-equipment programme, the cost of which would be about 3 crores"—3 crores of non-recurrent expenditure over 47 crores?—May I refer you to Sir George Schuster's Budget Statement of 1933-34, the Memorandum attached thereto by the Military authorities. I was basing my figures on that.

Mr. DOUGLAS DEWAR.

15,994. They gave no figures, did they? Will you refer me to the actual words?—It is attached to the Budget Statement, a Military Memorandum.

15,995. You say you base yourself on these words. What are the words that you base yourself on? Are you quoting the words that you yourself quote in paragraph 43 of your Memorandum?—No. The words I have here, from this Memorandum published by the Military authorities attached to the Budget.

15,996. Yes?—Sir George Schuster said in 1931: "The gross expenditure on the purchase of ordnance stores in a normal year is estimated at Rs.254 lakhs as against only Rs.189.23 lakhs required during the year 1931-32. The difference of Rs.64.77 lakhs represents the extent to which in 1931-32 the Army will still be living on stocks surplus to requirements. The gross expenditure on provision for clothing in a normal year is estimated at Rs.106 lakhs as against only Rs.76.80 lakhs required during the year 1931-32. The difference of Rs.29.20 lakhs represents the extent to which in 1931-32 the Army will still be living on stock."

15,997. Is that what you rely on?—In the Appendix to the 1933-34 Budget the words occur "in 1931-32 the financial crisis led to a still more intensive campaign of economy and retrenchment. In this campaign the Military authorities worked in close collaboration with the Army Retrenchment Sub-Committee, and as a result of their joint efforts His Excellency, the Commander-in-Chief was able to accept for 1932 a Budget allotment of Rs.46.74 crores. This included a saving of Rs.105 lakhs in temporary cuts in pay. The search for economies did not cease with the acceptance of the 1932-33 Budget, previous lines of retrenchment were further worked out and new schemes were taken in hand estimated to produce a saving in 1933-34 of Rs.70 lakhs. They include a reorganisation of pioneers", etc. I think somewhere I have quoted here where it says they cannot go on living on their stocks as they have been doing.

15,998. Yes, but the extracts you have read indicate that they are living on their stocks to the extent of about one crore per annum; but one crore is not four crores?—No. They are not doing any new buildings, all their schemes have been held up; everything has been held up. You remember that Lord Rawlinson protested very much when it was reduced from 68 to 56 crores.

15,999. But after all those were days before the fall in prices. Mr. Dewar, may I cut this short by suggesting that you have left another thing out of account, which is the separation of Burma? What is the effect of the separation of Burma on the cost of the Army?—I have not studied that at all on the cost of the Army.

16,000. Is it not possible, then, that the estimate made by the Federal Finance Committee, which you have heard apparently for the first time to-day, of 47 crores may be nearer the truth than your estimate?—If Burma were left out I should think it probably would be.

16,001. This in any case will have reduced your 19 crores a little, but as you cannot tell me how those 19 crores are made up I am not quite certain what has happened to them. May I finally direct your attention to one rather different subject in your paragraph on railway finance? May I read what you have said. "The interest payable by the railways on their capital has increased from nearly Rs.24 crores in 1924 to nearly Rs.33 crores without any increase in the gross traffic receipts. The present interest charges are only Rs.6 crores less than the traffic receipts in the best year." Do you mean gross traffic or net traffic?—I think I mean gross traffic.

16,002. I do not think you do, Mr. Dewar. I think if you look at the figures it is net traffic?—I took the figures from the Railway Budget Statement. I have got a copy of it here.

16,003. I will consult that?—You will find a Statement attached to the Railway Budget giving all the receipts and payments for the last 10 years.

16,004. May I ask whether you got this from the Railway Budget Statement "The total loss of the railways as the result of the last three years' working is Rs.23½ crores, despite the fact that the expenditure on replacements has been Rs.9 crores below the normal figure." I do not understand that. What is the meaning of it?—This is again taken from the Railway Depreciation Reserve Fund. It is given in Appendix V to the Statement. We have each year appropriations to the fund and withdrawals to meet the cost of renewals and replacements. In 1924-25 the appropriation was 10 35 crores, and it has been 10-67, 10-89, 11-38, 12-59 and 13-75. Now the withdrawals in 1924-25 were 7.29.

Mr. DOUGLAS DEWAR.

16,005. Withdrawals from what?—From this fund. They pay in and pay out. They have to pay in so much and they withdraw in order to make replacements. The withdrawals, for instance, in 1928-29 were 9-60, in 1929-30 11 76, in 1930-31 11-39, in 1931-32 8 26, in 1932-33 5-60.

16,006. As an accountant, you will agree with me that the statement that the result of three years' working total loss is 23 crores—what has been spent on renewals during that year—has nothing to do with that statement?—I do not say it has.

16,007. What I am getting at is this. Do you mean that that Rs.23½ crores include 9 crores and no more which have been spent on renewals?—No, it does not include the renewals figure at all. I am taking the money they have withdrawn first for their Railway Reserve Fund.

16,008. What did they withdraw for their Railway Reserve Fund? Mr. Dewar, may I bring it to a point like this: Is it not true that in the year you mention the total loss of the railways as the result of the last three years' working is 23½ crores; that that loss is arrived at after debiting no less than 26 crores, not 9 crores, but no less than 26 crores, to depreciation? It is perfectly true that only 9 crores were spent on renewals in that period?—They place into the Depreciation Fund so much and then they withdraw so much, and they have withdrawn in 1931-32 4-25.

16,009. It is not a question of what they withdrew but what they put in. The point is that you have given the impression in your Memorandum that a loss on the railways was incurred, although the provision for depreciation, obsolescence and renewals was very much reduced—reduced to 9 crores. As a matter of fact the sum provided for those purposes was no less than 26 crores, although only 9 crores were spent out of that fund during that period?—Let us take the year 1932-33; the ordinary working expenses are given as 49-10 crores, interest 32-94, miscellaneous expenses -05, replacements 5-60; that equals 87-69, gross traffic receipts 86-50; loss on that 1-19. Then add the money that should have been spent on replacements.

16,010. What do you mean by "should have been spent on replacements"?—If you do not spend it on replacements you are using your capital. You cannot go on for ever not replacing your rolling stock.

16,011. What do you mean in your accounts by referring to what ought to have been spent on replacements?—If you are not replacing you are drawing on your capital to that extent.

16,012. May I suggest to you, Mr. Dewar, that you are reading figures which do not show the amount put to depreciation at all?—I am reading figures. I do not think the amount that should be placed to depreciation comes in here at all. I am now going to give you the amount that was actually spent and ought to have been spent in order to keep the rolling stock up to its proper standard.

16,013. I think you are confusing the charge for depreciation which constitutes a reserve and the amount which is spent out of that reserve in any one year, and I think if you look further into the railway accounts what you have said here gives a totally false impression of railway finance, bad as the railway position in India is at the present moment?—I am afraid I am not prepared to accept that.

Sir Joseph Nall.

16,014. Does that mean on the figures that Mr. Dewar was just reading that if a provision of 26 crores ought to have been made for depreciation the loss would have been very much greater than he has endeavoured to show?—What I mean is that if they had paid what should have been paid to keep the stock up to standard they would have shown more expenditure and the loss would have been greater, and the fact that they have not paid that from an accountant's point of view is shown as so much loss, so to speak.

16,015. Is your figure of loss after providing for depreciation or not?—I am providing for what they actually did spend on depreciation. They are supposed to spend and they ought to spend something like 11 crores a year to keep the thing up to standard. They have been spending nearly 6 crores instead of that, and I have shown the difference between what they ought to have spent and what they have spent in order to get a proper account of the state of the railways. Of course, if you spend no money for two or three years on repairs you can probably show a profit for those particular years.

Mr. DOUGLAS DEWAR.

Lord Eustace Percy.] May I just say in reply to Sir Joseph Nall's question that my understanding of the position is that the figures that Mr Dewar has quoted, although I think he does not realise it, show a loss of 23½ crores after providing 26 crores for depreciation.

Sir Joseph Nall] That is what I understood.

Mr. R A Butler.] That is as appears in the Railway Budget.

Witness] They spent quite a lot on depreciation. They spent, according to me, about 20 crores on replacements.

Lord Eustace Percy.

16,016. That is their withdrawal on their Depreciation Fund. It is not what they have put into the Depreciation Fund, Mr. Dewar. But perhaps we may wait for the Government's Memorandum upon these points?—In spite of all these enormous sums they have put in, there are only 13 crores in the Depreciation Fund to-day, I understand. Though they have put in all these sums on paper there are only 13 crores in it, I understand, to-day

Lieut.-Colonel Sir H. Gidney.

16,017. Is there such a thing as a Depreciation Fund there or is in the general revenue? It is only an imaginary fund?—It is a book transaction, I suppose, but they actually allocate the money to this.

16,018. Is it allocated specifically to railway expenditure?—Yes; under the Statute they have to put a certain portion of capital apart from depreciation.

16,019. Could you give a rough estimate of what is the annual amount spent on renewals? While I agree with you entirely that there are lakhs and crores standing completely at a standstill in India to-day and no renewals, what do you put down as your annual estimate for renewals? Have you any idea of what the estimates are per year?—I have got the actual figures for renewals, to meet the cost of renewals and replacements each year.

16,020. It is a good few crores, I know?—Shall I take 1927-1928?

Mr. R. A. Butler.

16,021. May I suggest, my Lord Chairman, that it is all set out in the Railway Budget?—It is all set out in the Railway Budget; I am simply taking my figures from this.

Sir Manubhai N. Mehta.

16,022. In your Memorandum 75, Mr. Dewar, you make a very sweeping generalisation that on account of rapid Indianisation there have been wholesale frauds and defalcations. You say "that the replacement of European by Indian supervision is likely to lead to similar results can, I think, be demonstrated by such facts as the number of defalcations of municipal and district boards funds that come to light." May I inquire if you were in India at the time of the Bombay Development frauds?—Can you give me the year of those frauds? I certainly was not Accountant-General at the time in Bombay.

16,023. When did you return from India?—In 1922, I think it was.

16,024. So you may not be aware of them?—There were no frauds in my time as far as I know.

16,025. So you could not have heard of the Bombay Development frauds or the Improvement Trust defalcations?—No, I am afraid I have not heard of those.

16,026. And you could not have heard of the Crawford Commission frauds?—No.

Dr. Shafa'at Ahmad Khan.

16,027. Mr. Dewar, in your Memorandum 75 you make the following statement: "Much of this increase is the result of the recent administrative changes in the Government of India." You follow up this statement with three tables, comparing the expenditure in 1864-65, 1911-12 and 1930-31?—Yes.

16,028. We need not concern ourselves with the year 1864. Let us take the years 1911 and 1930. According to your figures which you have supplied there was an increase of 112 crores between 1911 and 1930. I am quoting that from your figures?—Yes.

16,029. You will notice that the Army expenditure increased by 27 crores between 1911 and 1930?—Yes.

16,030. Do you attribute this increase to administrative changes due to the Reforms?—No, I understand it was due to the organisation of the Army expenditure—the military expenditure.

16,031. So they are not due to the Reforms?—No, not at all.

16,032. Again, take railway expenditure, which has increased by over 15 crores: surely, Mr. Dewar, you do not mean to suggest that this increase is also due to the Reforms?—No.

7^o Novembris, 1933.]

MR. DOUGLAS DEWAR.

16,033. You do not suggest that?—No.

16,034. You will observe that the railway receipts have also gone up by 15 crores. I am again quoting from your figures?—Yes. May I say that the words I use are "much of this increase," not "all of this increase"?

16,035. Let us take another big item of increase. Interest charges, which have increased from two crores in 1911-12 to 20 crores in 1930-31?—Yes.

16,036. I presume you are aware why India's debt has increased since 1912?—It has increased for many reasons, of course: new works and things have been undertaking, and a certain amount of borrowing for unproductive expenditure.

16,037. Do you know that India paid altogether over Rs.300 crores directly and indirectly towards Great Britain's war expenditure?—I take your word for it, but I did not know it.

16,038. And that a good portion of this sum was found by borrowing?—So I have been just told. I suggested, you know, that it was met by these appropriations, but I am told it was met by borrowing.

16,039. Then I do not suppose you will dispute that most of this increase was not due to the Reforms?—Most of the increase you have mentioned certainly was not due to the Reforms. I use the word "much," not "most."

16,040. Let me pursue this line of argument. Take another big item, Civil Administration, the expenditure on which has increased by a very large sum?—That is a big proportionate increase.

16,041. I am coming to that. You know that on account of the enormous increase in prices the salaries of the I.C.S. and other All-India Services and also of the Subordinate Services were increased substantially?—Not the salaries of the I.C.S., I am afraid. We were rather sore about it, you know. I had to write to some of the gentlemen and tell them they lost pay under the new scheme.

16,042. I am talking of 1925?—Of course, I am only speaking of my time.

16,043. This increase, I take it, was not due to the Reforms?—I do not know, as I say, that it was due to the Reforms, but I think the increase of pay of the Lieutenant Governor was due to the Reforms. I should call that due to the Reforms, for example.

16,044. But the other increases I have mentioned were not due to the Reforms, were they?—If they simply increased the scale I would not say they were. It depends upon whether you change the name of a man's appointment and give him different pay.

16,045. Now, Mr. Dewar, what are the increases that are the result of the Reforms: Are not they, in the first place, salaries of Ministers and Executive Councillors; in the second place, the cost of legislative bodies, including the cost of elections; and in the third place, the cost of the headquarters secretariat establishment, though in this case the increase is partly due to the increased development of the nation-building departments?—Is not that the direct result of the Reforms?

16,046. I have admitted that. I have had the total figures for these three items compared and I find that the increase was only a little over a crore—not more than the cost of the concessions given to the All-India Services by the Lee Commission. The cost of the increase which I have just mentioned was a little over a crore?—Are you dealing with the Provinces or with the Government of India?

16,047. With the Provinces, of course; there are no Ministers in the Government of India. You will also notice that the bulk of the increase is under District administration?—Yes.

16,048. Now, I sum up the result of these various items: The Reforms are responsible for less than 1 per cent. of the total increase. Do you agree that your statement that much of the increase is due to the administrative changes consequent upon the Reforms is, if I may say so, inaccurate?—If your figures are right, but there are probably other items we have not considered, of course.

Mr. R. A. Butler.] Would Dr. Shafa' at Ahmad Khan excuse me for a moment, because there are some figures in paragraph 5 of your Memorandum in which you use this phrase: "That the Reforms are largely responsible for the recent increases in the expenditure, is shown by the fact that the charges under the head of General Administration (including audit) in India rose," and then you proceed to quote some figures.

Dr. Shafa' at Ahmad Khan.] I am coming to that. I shall deal with it separately.

Mr. R. A. Butler.] If you please.

Dr. Shafa' at Ahmad Khan.

16,049. Would you turn over to the page of your Memorandum headed

7^o November, 1933.]

Mr. DOUGLAS DEWAR.

Table IV, Mr. Dewar? On this page you quote approvingly a statement by Mr. Trevelyan made nearly 70 years ago, about the Income Tax?—Yes.

16,050. I presume you consider this a bad tax?—Yes, I consider Income Tax a bad tax.

16,051. Is your opinion supported by any modern economist or financier, either here or anywhere else, that Income Tax is a very bad tax?—I do not know. It is a bad tax, especially for a country like India, where it is so hard to get at the people's income.

16,052. Has not the graduated Income Tax been regarded in modern conditions as the ideal tax, though opinions have, of course, been divergent as to the advisability of a very high rate of tax?—I say it is a very bad tax because it is easy to increase and it leads to extravagance. It is so easy to put on so many annas in the rupee and become extravagant. That is why I think it is a bad tax.

16,053. Would you turn to pages 9 and 10 of your Memorandum No. 75? On page 9 you give certain statistics regarding the increase in the number of educational and medical institutions in the pre-Reform period?—Yes.

16,054. And on page 10 you quote a passage from paragraph 400, Volume I, of the Simon Commission Report, that, owing to the financial embarrassments of the Provincial Governments during the first three years of the Montagu-Chelmsford Reforms, the expenditure on the Transferred Departments in 1923-24 was actually less than it was in the year 1921-22?—Yes.

16,055. I do not know what inference you want the Committee to draw from this, but may I draw your attention to the preceding paragraph in the Simon Commission Report, paragraph 399, Volume I? Have you got that with you?—No.

16,056. In the paragraphs these financial embarrassments are explained. One of the principal causes why there was no money for development of education and sanitation was because the salaries of the All-India Services and Subordinate Services had to be increased on account of the rise in prices after the War. That was one of the principal causes. You do not object to these increases in salaries, Mr. Dewar, do you?—No, not if they are justified, because I think, if necessary, you must do so. It is unfortunate for the taxpayer, of course, with whom I sympathise, but if they are necessary, they must be made.

16,057. Then as regards expenditure on education, medical relief, and public health, may I draw your attention to the statement at the end of paragraph 261 of Volume II of the Simon Commission Report, in which Sir Walter Layton gives figures showing the enormous increase in the expenditure upon these services between the years 1922 and 1930? You have not consulted those figures?—No.

15,058. Would you now turn to pages 11 and 13 of your Memorandum? On these pages you have given a lot of statistics showing the deterioration of the financial position of the Provinces?—Showing the fall in revenues, yes.

16,059. The financial position?—Yes.

16,060. These statistics are very interesting and we are much obliged to you for collecting them, but what I want to know is this: What inference do you desire the Committee to draw from them, because you say in the middle of page 13 that the trouble is not by any means due to the Reforms. What is the object in giving these statistics?—My contention is that the White Paper proposals are going to be a very great financial burden to India and you have got to consider, not only the extra cost, but what I consider more important, a fall in revenue, which is likely to follow in the case of administration. You might say you had an administration of experts who had been trained from boyhood and you are more or less going to pass the work to amateurs less experienced, and I feel that that will inevitably lead to a fall in revenue. I think since the Montagu-Chelmsford Reforms there has been a fall in revenue, partly owing to the new administration being on the whole less efficient than the older one. It is very difficult to prove that you are going to have a fall in revenue or when there has been a fall in revenue, and it is very difficult to prove to what it is due; but in my belief there is likely to be a falling-off in the efficiency of administration under the new Constitution, at any rate, in the preliminary stages, especially when you get all these senior officers retiring suddenly on proportionate pensions as happened in the case of Ceylon the other day and as happened under the Montagu-Chelmsford Reforms. You get these experienced officers leaving and being replaced by junior men. That I think you will find is partly the cause of the fall in revenue—not the whole cause, of course, because we have seen the economic slump which has taken place.

7^o Novembris, 1933.]

Mr. DOUGLAS DEWAR.

Lord Eustace Percy.

16,061. Might I just ask Mr. Dewar this. What puzzles me on page 12 is that it appears to me the fall in Land Revenue is considerably greater than the fall in the other source of revenue, or at least comparable to the fall in any other source of revenue?—There, again, it is a question of the remissions and things and the revenue falling off. It is a question of remission on account of hailstorms and drought, and if you have not got an experienced Revenue Officer to check a claim for remission you may get undue remissions coming in.

16,062. Land Revenue is not a Transferred Department, is it?—No, but the unfortunate overworked collector might easily not be able to give sufficient time to his remission work.

16,063. You mean that the deterioration is as much in the reserved as in the transferred departments?—I do not say that at all; I have not gone into that question.

Dr. Shafa'at Ahmad Khan.

16,064. In your Memorandum No. 75 you comment on the increase in India's public debt between 1913 and 1931?—Yes.

16,065. Have you analysed the causes of this increase? What are the causes of this increase?—The cause is borrowing. You say what is the cause of borrowing? That is a very big question. I simply point to that fact that the debt has increased.

16,066. Do you know, out of the increase of £500,000,000, over £110,000,000 was due to India's gifts to Great Britain for War Expenditure?—I was told £100,000,000.

16,067. In the next place nearly £100,000,000 was due to Budgetary deficits due to Frontier Wars and increases of salaries?—We had all these difficulties beforehand, yet the debt did not rise. We had famines, and all these Wars and things in the old days.

16,068. I am talking of the period mentioned. Lastly, another £200,000,000 was due to the construction of new railways?—Yes.

16,069. This is how we account for £500,000,000. Do you object to any of these, or do you suggest that the increases are due to the reforms?—No; I do not think I have hinted that anywhere. The debt has risen; the only bad thing would have been the unproductive debt.

16,070. I may have been mistaken, but I thought the whole of the drift of your Memorandum was that the increase was due to the Reforms?—I do not think so.

16,071. May I ask you to go a little farther on in the Memorandum?—Yes.

16,072. I have already dealt with the statement that the Reforms are largely responsible for the recent increases in expenditure. You state that 558 officers have retired on proportionate pensions since the Reforms, and these have cost over 1 crore of rupees annually. Am I correct?—"Must cost," I said.

16,073. The highest pension (with the exception of a few persons such as High Court Judges) admissible is £1,000 in the case of the Indian Civil Service?—Yes.

16,074. You agree with me there?—Yes.

16,075. The Members of the other Services get very much less comparatively?—Yes.

16,076. And persons who retired prematurely did not get their maximum pension?—No; that is so.

16,077. How did you get this estimate?—I thought about £500 a year each. I cannot tell you what figure I worked it out at. I probably worked it out at £500 a year as an average. I think I probably took an average of £500 a year for these.

Sir Phiroze Sethna.] Your average works out at £1,130. You say 558 officers retired, and that the extra pension costs a crore. A crore divided by 558 means Rs.17,000 a year or £1,130. I think you are very far out there, more than double.

Dr. Shafa'at Ahmad Khan.] I will not pursue this any further.

Sir Hari Singh Gour.

16,078. I should like to ask you a few questions, Mr. Dewar. You have said that you stand for cheap administration?—I do not know that I used those words, but still I think the cheaper the administration if it is efficient the better, certainly.

16,079. I thought the whole of your argument was that you stand for cheap administration. Can you suggest to me how you are going to get cheap administration? Do you think the Civil Service is a cheap administration?—I think as India was run before the Montagu-Chelmsford Reforms it was a cheap administration, because you had a comparatively few well-paid officers that controlled, more or less efficiently, a large staff of lowly paid people, so the result was that you got a cheap administration.

Mr. DOUGLAS DEWAR.

16,080. But it has been pointed out to you that since the Montagu-Chelmsford Reforms, there has been only an addition of a crore of rupees in the cost?—That is what is said.

16,081. Do you complain of the additional burden of 1 crore of rupees?—I think there are many other items included there. You see increased pensions for all these people and things like that; no word has been said of that. If you increase your establishment charges your pension charges pari passu go up. I have taken this gentleman's statement that it only works out at a crore and a fraction, but you have the extra buildings to house more people, and so on, as you increase your establishments.

16,082. Can you give us a figure showing the increase of expenditure directly due to the Reforms?—I should think that is quite impossible.

16,083. Therefore it must be a matter of guesswork as to how much it is?—Yes.

16,084. If there has been this increase of expenditure, can you tell us whether that increase of expenditure could have been avoided, and was that increase of expenditure inconsistent with the natural development of the country?—Inconsistent with it?

16,085. Can you tell me that that natural increase of expenditure, since the Montagu-Chelmsford Reforms, could have been avoided if there had been no Reforms?—You certainly would not have this enormous secretariat you have now. In my Province, the United Provinces, you would still have had a secretariat of, say not more than 10 men instead of 40 men.

16,086. I put the previous question to you, namely, that we will assume that the total expenditure due to the Reforms would be, say, according to Dr. Shafa'at Ahmad Khan, about a crore of rupees. According to you, it may be two crores?—I will not even admit that it is as small as that.

16,087. We do not know what would be the amount and, unless we know the actual amount of expenditure, we are not in a position to say as to how it compares with the total increase of expenditure in India?—No; that is so.

16,088. Apart from the Reforms, has not the Revenue of India gone down on account of the opium policy of the Government?—Yes.

16,089. Which was dictated by Parliament here, by the House of Commons?—It was certainly from England.

16,090. The doctrinaires in England forced upon India the policy of abandoning their income of 9 crores of rupees?—India had no say in the matter.

16,091. Do not you think the Indian has a grievance that he has to sacrifice 9 crores of revenue? You would give India a voice. Would not that be a casus belli? Would not India expect to be heard because her revenue has been seriously sacrificed by the House of Commons behind her back and without hearing her?—I certainly think India should be heard on that point.

Sir Hari Singh Gour.] That is exactly what the reformers try to do.

Sir Joseph Nall.] Does Sir Hari Singh Gour suggest the opium traffic should be revived for the purpose of increasing the revenue?

Sir Hari Singh Gour.] I was dealing with an illustrative case and, if the question had required it, I would have turned to the Military policy, which comes from this side of the waters and, if time had permitted, I would have given you a number of instances of how India's interests have been sacrificed by your House from time immemorial, and which, according to the witness, testifies to the measure of the larger introduction of reforms in which the Indian taxpayer should have a voice. On that point, the witness and I now agree.

Sir Pheroze Sethna.

16,092. Mr. Dewar, you seem to be emphatic in your opinion that the payment of proportionate pensions is a heavy drain on the Government of India?—I think it is rather rough on the taxpayer to have to pay for people like this.

16,093. Your contention is that it would cost more to the Government of India?—Certainly it is an extra cost from which the taxpayer, in my opinion, gets no quid pro quo.

16,094. I know you have been Accountant-General, but I would like to put some figures before you, and I would like you to correct me if I am wrong, because I contend the payment of proportionate pensions is a gain to the country. A man retires on pension after

Mr. DOUGLAS DEWAR.

putting in 25 years' total service, or 21 years' active service. Take the case of a collector. Suppose he retires after 19 years' active service, and has reached his full time limit in point of pay, which is Rs.2,600 a month, because he retires after 19 years he will not get his £1,000 as pension, but will only get about £900?—Yes.

16,095. £900 works out at Rs.1,000 per mensem, therefore the Government is saving a salary of Rs.2,600 but pay a pension of Rs.1,000 per mensem; therefore, it is a saving of Rs.1,600 per mensem. The Government have to put in a new recruit who starts at Rs.600 a month. The Government have to advance another collector to the top position and would have to pay him about Rs.300 a month more?—Yes.

16,096. Which would mean against the Rs.1,600 the Government will have to pay Rs.600 plus Rs.300, Rs.900, and yet there would be a saving of Rs.700 a month for the Government. I know the recruit will not be stationary at Rs.600, but he will go on getting more. The retiring officer, had he stayed out his full time, in another 4 years would be entitled to his full pension?—Yes.

16,097. Whilst the recruit might not have reached Rs.1,000, therefore, on the whole, this is a saving. I would like you to correct me if I am wrong?—May I put it in this way? If you are right, if India was to retire everybody tomorrow on proportionate pension, India would gain by it, on your showing.

16,098. I have not been an Accountant-General, but these are figures as I have worked them out and I would like you to check them and let me know if I am wrong?—The gentleman you talk about would get his £1,000 a year pension. He might have died next year, and the Government of India would have to pay him nothing, and the longer he stays on the worse his health is. There are many other factors.

Sir Phiroze Sethna.] That would not enter into the question at all?

Lieut.-Colonel Sir H. Gidney.] There is the average duration of life.

Mr. N. M. Joshi.

16,099. One question on Memorandum No. 76. You suggest that under the reforms there would be an increased cost of audit?—Yes.

16,100. Under that paragraph, you have shown that if there is more money spent on audit there is more money obtained?—I would not say more revenue. There is less chance of leakage of revenue; I would put it that way.

16,101. You yourself said "The temporary appointment of two auditors to enquire into the extent of the leakage of stamp revenue"?—Leakage.

16,102. The Government got more revenue by appointing more auditors?—I wish, as an audit officer, I could make more revenue. All we can do is to prevent leakage of revenue by the audit.

16,103. If there were two more auditors appointed, they would bring in more money?—It depends on the amount of leakage. If there was no leakage, they would bring in no money. Auditors cannot make money, unfortunately.

Mr. Butler.

16,104. There is an important point on Memorandum No. 75 arising out of the point raised by Dr. Shafa'at Ahmad Khan; you state that the reforms are largely responsible for the recent increase in expenditure. Dr. Shafa'at Ahmad Khan has already given us some reasons why he disagrees with you. May I put to you that your thesis is that you would expect the costs of general administration to rise approximately with the total expenditure, and that, since the total expenditure has approximately doubled, you would expect the cost of general administration approximately to double in the period of years which you take?—That would not be unreasonable, I think.

16,105. You accept that?—Yes.

16,106. And in these figures as quoted in the fifth paragraph it is seen that the cost of administration has increased five-fold in the last year you mention—1930-31. May I put it to you that in 1921 there was an alteration in the grouping of the accounts. This change was made with the "general charges of District administration," which had previously been entered partly as expenses of collecting Land Revenue and partly under Law and Justice, "were included under the head of General Administration," and the effect of that is that your figures are, therefore, for these two sets of years, not comparable, because there has been a change in the grouping of the accounts?—I was not aware of that fact, and, of course, audit comes in as well. Audit used to be included. From year to year they make changes in the accounting, and I had not got access to any India Office figures. I had to do the best I could without any figures.

7^o Novembris, 1933.]

Mr. DOUGLAS DEWAR.

16,107. I quite appreciate your difficulty, that the fact of altering the charges of District administration and entering them up on the same basis on the two years you take would result in a completely different finding from that which you include in your Memorandum, and the thesis which I put to you at the beginning would in fact prevail. I have the actual figures here. The charges for general administration amount approximately to 922 lakhs and if you subtract that you get a figure of 593 lakhs, as compared with 289 lakhs in 1913-14, and that is approximately in the ratio of two to one instead of being in the ratio of five to one as included in your Memorandum?—That is quite against the Secretariat figures—the increase in the number of officials in the Secretariat.

16,108. I put it to you that the difficulty into which you have fallen arises out of a change of the grouping of accounts which took place in 1921, and therefore makes these two figures you put here non-comparable, and the general deduction you seek to draw therefore does not prevail?—If the figures are changed, of course the deduction is changed likewise.

Chairman.] Thank you, Mr. Dewar. We are greatly obliged to you for having prepared these Memoranda and having come to give evidence to-day.

MEMORANDUM 73 BY LIEUT.-COLONEL SIR HENRY GIDNEY, M.L.A., I.M.S. (RETD.) ON BEHALF OF THE ANGLO-INDIAN AND DOMICILED EUROPEAN ASSOCIATION OF INDIA.

A.—INTRODUCTION.

The history of the Anglo-Indian and Domiciled European Community forms one of the brightest and, at the same time, one of the most tragic pages in the history of the British Empire. It is the brightest in regard to its record of untarnished loyalty and patriotism and its devotion to duty to the King and Empire, no matter when the call was made and its services in the establishment of British rule and administration in India and its revenues. It is the saddest in that, in spite of these services, it finds itself, as the result of political and administrative changes in India and the demands of more powerful and clamant communities, in the unenviable position of being crushed out of existence by deprivation of employment, between the upper millstone of official expediency and policy and the nether millstone of Indianisation of the Services. To-day, it is the "not wanted" of both the European and the Indian. Its economic position is unprotected and uncertain, and its future is becoming increasingly perilous, to the extent that it is being deprived of the right to live in India, the country it has served so steadfastly and so well. Indeed, the insistent demands of some of the majority communities, accompanied with threats of strikes and reprisals in their refusal to co-operate with the Legislatures during the Budget Demands for Grants, have had so irresistible and compelling an effect on the Government and its officials, that the community, which is not only numerically weak, but is very inadequately represented on the Legislatures, has been and is being used by Government as its common sacrifice on the altar of political expediency, in its efforts to satisfy the demands of other more powerful communities and so secure their support in the administration.

The cumulative effect of this policy has been that, while in 1921, before the Montagu-Chelmsford Reforms began to operate, there were less than 1,000 unemployed Anglo-Indians and Domiciled Europeans in India, to-day, after a decade of the operation of the Reforms and the introduction of Indianisation of the Services, nearly 20,000 or more than one-third of the total able-bodied men of the Community are unemployed, the majority of them being homeless and in rags, roaming the streets in quest of food. Thousands of Anglo-Indians, including many with a fine record of military service, are dependent on charity for the very means of keeping body and soul together.

The most distressing feature of our economic tragedy is to be seen in the hundreds of young men (and women), descendents of the pioneer Britisher, who are annually leaving our excellent Public Schools in India, well educated, with a higher percentage of graduates per ratio of population, than any other community, well developed, loyal to the core and keen sportsmen (it was men of this type who formed three-quarters of the first and one-half of the second Hockey teams who beat the rest of the world at Olympia) unable to secure employment anywhere, except at a wage on which they cannot possibly exist, but which many have been forced to accept rather than starve—e.g., Anglo-Indian and Domiciled European young men, whose education cost their parents on an average over Rs.50/- per mensem, are, to-day, told they can only be engaged in the Loco. Department of the Railways, on a pittance of Rs.10/- p.m. or about 5d. per diem; this, because the Indian can subsist on this wage and we are told to take it or leave it, as there are thousands of Indians ready to accept such appointments. And, yet, it is from this Community alone that Government compels enlistment in a Voluntary Force—the Indian Defence Force—as a condition precedent to Railway employment, while no such term is demanded from an Indian employee. This is the toll that one decade of the Reforms and Indianisation of the Services has exacted from the Community.

It is true that in numbers we are one of the smallest of the Indian minorities represented here to-day, but our stake in India, our interest in her future destiny and the part played by us in her defence, development and past fortunes, and to be played by us in the future, are in no way commensurate with the mere numbers of the community.

In the first place, we represent in our very bodies a synthesis of India and Britain as no other people do or can do, a fusion of East and West, which in other Indians or Britons, can exist only as a fusion of interests in politics and economics. Moreover, we are the sons of the soil, a people whose roots are deep, not only in the soil, history and traditions of India, where we live, work and die in the pursuit of our daily avocations, but in the soil and history of this great country—England—to whom we make this appeal, not as beggars, but as suitors in a just cause; a community devoted to India—our Motherland—and anxious for her advancement, but it must be admitted under some suspicion because of our unflinching loyalty and devotion to our Fatherland—England. Whatever may be the case with other communities, our loyalty is to both these great countries; in the connection between them we find our truest welfare, and in the growth of affection, trust and union between them we find our highest happiness and contentment. Indeed, we are your joint responsibility and neither party can disclaim its honourable obligation to protect us.

Moreover, small as our community is, it has played a mighty part in the making of British India.

Modern India has been truly described as a country of communications and we claim that the Community has played a leading part in making and working these communications which are the framework of the nervous system of modern India. We go further and say that, without the community, these communications would not have been developed as early or as completely as they now are. We appeal confidently to the history of India to prove this. In an India there will not be found any community more steadfastly loyal, more industrious, more law-abiding and, in a word, more fully possessed of the virtues of good citizenship, than the Anglo-Indian community, and in pleading the cause of the Community, we would most earnestly ask our kinsmen on this Committee, British and Indian, to try to appreciate the value to the future India of such a body of citizens as is represented by the members of the Anglo-Indian and Domiciled European Community. In this Memorandum, the community asks for economic protection for at least 30 years, after which, it asks for adequate representation in all Government Departments, both Central and Provincial. During this short period, it merely asks that the number of posts it occupies to-day in the various Services be not reduced. Surely this demand is not excessive when one considers the great economic, military and administrative services rendered by it to India and the British Empire. If this protection is refused, we sink; if it is granted, we swim, and shall, without doubt, play as great a part in the future as we have already done in the past India. Indeed, we respectfully desire to impress on the Committee that the decision they will make on our economic protection are matters of life and death, literally life and death, for us.

If our experience of the past few years is to continue, then indeed, we can see no hope for us. And there is another thing we want to say with all the seriousness and emphasis at our command; it is this. the treatment accorded to the Anglo-Indian community, small as it is, but with an unparalleled record of consistent and devoted loyalty to India and Great Britain, will be the touchstone by which the quality of Indian and British statesmanship and equity as represented in this Joint Committee will be judged in the future. We can be dispossessed of all that we have and truly ruined and dispersed as a community; that can be done quite easily. But if it is done, it will be done to the everlasting discredit of the two countries to which we belong. We do not want to make a begging appeal to retain as privileges the Government posts and other benefits which we have enjoyed in the past by virtue of service, tradition and fitness; rather we want to ask if it is not possible to embody in the new Constitution Act, a declaration with all the authority of India and Great Britain behind it, to the effect that we shall not be expropriated from our employments and the other positions which we have created by our labour and our service, merely because, in our origin, we are partly Indian and partly European. In short, we want to ensure that a progressive India will not result in a retrogressive Anglo-India.

It is said that the Reforms were given to India as a reward for her services during the Great War. We ask: is expropriation of our employment and the refusal of the right to live in our country, India, to be the only reward for our unparalleled services to the past and present India, especially during the past Great War, when we gave 80 per cent. of our manhood? Is India's gain to be our loss? Does India's construction connote our destruction and does the regeneration of India mean the degeneration of Anglo-Indians? Surely, no one desires this and, yet, this is exactly what will happen to the Community, unless its economic future is adequately and statutorily protected and executive power be given to put this into practical effect.

It is in the realisation of these facts and the desire to remedy them before it is too late, that we, on behalf of the Community, appeal to the Joint Parliamentary Committee, representative as it is of the British nation which we have served so nobly, so loyally and so well, as also to our brother Delegates from India—the British India Delegation—who are well aware of the economic tragedy facing the Community, both of whom we look upon as our Co-Trustees and to whom we are a joint responsibility, as also to the British Parliament, to save a race whom they have jointly brought into being from this terrible disaster, by statutorily protecting our economic future in the New Constitution Act.

In support of this demand, we respectfully submit this Memorandum for the sympathetic consideration of the Joint Parliamentary Committee.

The main object of this Memorandum is to place before the Committee a short review of some of the services rendered to the Empire in general and to India in particular by the Domiciled community in India; to summarise, by a comparison with the past, the present position the Community occupies in the various Government of India services, with a view to safeguarding its future position, and to ask that the Community be given statutory economic protection for a sufficient period to enable it adequately to adjust itself to the altered conditions in India, especially as will obtain after the operation of the New Constitution Act.

But we feel that no account of our present disabilities and expectations would be complete without some reference to the varying fortunes of the Community, which go far to explain the position it occupies to-day in the eyes of the Government and the people and the curious and conflicting views which prevail as to its quality and calibre. Before dealing with the many points on which this Memorandum is based, it is necessary to make a few general observations, all of which have a direct and important bearing on the economic protection of the community and the demands contained therein.

B.—THE ASSOCIATION.

The Anglo-India and Domiciled European Association of All-India is an organisation of the domiciled community in the country, with Branches in over 70 different stations in India and with a membership of many thousands. It is, together with the Anglo-Indian and Domiciled European Association of Southern India, the only body recognised by Government as voicing the authoritative views of the Community.

It was founded about 60 years ago and is registered under the Indian Companies Act of 1913. The administration and management of the Association are vested in the Governing Body, which is appointed annually and is representative of every Province throughout India. The vast majority of its members are employed in the All-India Government Services and a few in the Provincial Governments.

C.—THE COMMUNITY.

The Community is, to-day, composed both of Anglo-Indians, being persons of mixed parentage of European descent in the male line (mainly the third and fourth generations of such unions) and all Europeans born or domiciled in India and not “established for temporary purposes only.” Together, they are known as the Domiciled Community of India.

Despite their economic difficulties which will be set forth later in this Memorandum, they continue to maintain the religion, mode of living, social habits and ideals of their European ancestors. They are a cent-per-cent. literate community in a country where about 8 per cent. are literate, and, since their political and economic interests are identical, they are more markedly homogeneous than any other community in India.

As far as occupations are concerned, the Community which is largely urban, has a special aptitude for technical and industrial pursuits and by their courage, initiative and reliability its members have proved themselves eminently suitable for employment in the Railways, Telegraphs, Customs, Police, Indian Medical Department and other allied Services. About 85 per cent. of its working members are employed in the Central Government of India Services. Anglo-Indian women have, for years, formed the mainstay of the nursing staffs of the Hospitals and are employed in large numbers in European schools and Missions, as also in the Mercantile offices and shops. The Community has always been a source of strength to the Government and can be made a very valuable asset to the country.

D.—HISTORY.

(1) Past History—Amidst the congeries of races which comprise the peoples of the vast sub-continent of India, the Anglo-Indian community, which has its own individual racial characteristics, is one of the very few that can lay claim to Indian birthright. Although its inception dates from the very early years of contact between Europe and India, the Community began to play a part in the history of the country nearly 400 years ago, a time which synchronises with the Portuguese settlements on the Malabar coast of India. But the descendants of the inter-marriage between these settlers and the peoples of India, have by now lost all trace of their European identity and, with very few exceptions, no longer exist nor form part of the present community. It was, however, in the year 1684 that the Directors of John Company wrote to their representatives in India, as follows:—

“The soldiers wives shall come to their husbands, if they can find means to satisfy, or pay, the owners for their passages, and for such soldiers as are single men, if you can prudently induce them to marry Ghentuese, in imitation of ye olde Dutch politiks and raise from them a stock of protestant Mestizees (Eurasians).”

So great was this union of European and Asiatic races that the offspring of such alliances came to be known as “Eurasians,” a name which was officially changed in 1911 to that of “Anglo-Indians,” during Lord Hardinge’s régime as Viceroy, and to whom the Community owes a deep and abiding debt of gratitude.

Time was when the British in India and England were only too willing to recognise the importance and utility of the Anglo-Indian community; indeed, they made themselves directly responsible for the results of the deliberate policy of bringing into being a mixed population and we respectfully submit to the present Government, who are the successors of the East India Co., that they cannot, under any circumstances, repudiate the claims of the Anglo-Indian community to legislation that will actually guarantee their future in the

In the early days of the establishment of British power in India, the Community filled most of the posts of responsibility and fought and perished by the side of their British fathers and other relatives on many a field of battle. During this early period the Community “born amidst the clash of arms, played an important part in the consolidation of the British Indian Empire.” It looked upon itself and was recognised as an inherent part of the European community in India—there was then no need or desire to classify them as Statutory Indians—and, side by side with its forbears, in whose religion, manners and customs it was born, grew up and laboured, it helped to lay the foundation on which eventually was built the great British Empire in India as we see it to-day. Indeed, “it mightily truly he said that during that long period of perpetual warfare the builders, everyone had his sword girded by his side and so builded.” The time came, however, when the Community outnumbered the British in India and the Directors of the East India Company, perhaps mindful of the expulsion of the French and Spanish from Hayti by the Mulattoes of San Domingo, began to look upon it as an element of potential danger. The result was the crushing and cruel order issued by the Directors of the East India Company in 1791.

“That no Person, the son of a native Indian, shall henceforth be appointed by this Court to appointments of Civil, Military or Marine services of the country.”

This was the first step in the gradual degradation of the Anglo-Indian and his relegation to a position of inferiority. For, in its application, this decree closed to the Community, not only all covenanted appointments which they were at that time holding, but also many of the subordinate positions in Government Services and it was only many years afterwards that this ban was removed. But rather than submit to this unmerited injustice the Community, expelled from the service of John Company, sought and secured employment in large numbers in the services of the Indian States, in which many of them rose to the highest offices of trust and responsibility.

But time has its revenges and perhaps no better instance of the irony of history can be found than the events which followed the report of Lord Valentia to the East India Co. in 1806 on the Anglo-Indian menace (sic).

"Their increase in India," he remarked, "is beyond calculation, and, though, possibly there will be nothing to fear from the sloth of the Hindus and the rapidly declining consequences of Mussilmans, yet, it may be justly apprehended that this tribe may hereafter become too powerful to control . . . With numbers in their favour . . . what may not in future time be dreaded from them?"

The Sepoy Mutiny of 1857 proved how much was "to be dreaded from them," for, in response to the Nation's call to arms, he it said to the eternal credit and glory of the community employed in Indian States, that every one of them responded and joined up, and many of them gladly gave their lives for England.

The official records of the pre-Mutiny period, the Mysore, Mahratta, Sikh and other Wars, reveal the almost forgotten acts of heroism performed by the Anglo-Indian Community throughout that period. During the Mutiny, it was Brendish, the Anglo-Indian telegraphist, who, after his colleagues had been killed by the Mutineers, heroically stood at his post of duty at Delhi and by signalling his memorable telegram to Umballa, saved the Punjab; Hearsay saved Calcutta; Forgett saved Bombay; the Martinieri College boys defended the Lucknow Residency; the Madras Fusiliers (Anglo-Indians) covered themselves with glory; the Anglo-Indian Bengal Yeomanry saved the Britishers who were surrounded by mutineers at Arrah. The military annals of the British occupation of India abound with Anglo-Indian names known to fame, and their glorious deeds are writ indelibly on the pages of Indian history — Skinner, Hearsay, Rivett—Carnac, Foster, Palmer, Willcocks, to mention but a few. During the Great War, it was Lieut. Robinson, V.C., a member of the Domiciled Community, who brought down the first German Zeppelin in England, and Lieut. Warneford, V.C., another member of the Community, who brought down the first German Zeppelin in France. Indeed, there is abundant proof to establish the claim that, during the dark and stormy days of the Mutiny and before that period, when England was beset with enemies, it was the descendants of the pioneer Englishmen—the Anglo-Indian community—who remained steadfastly loyal and helped England to retain India.

We submit that the military services rendered by the Community during this period should alone entitle it to-day, to special consideration and protection. It is a debt which England owes to the Community and which cannot be over-estimated, evaded, or forgotten. Indeed at that time, the Metropolitan of India, Bishop Cotton, in his sermon in St. Paul's Cathedral, Calcutta, on 28/7/1860, recommended that "public thanksgiving to Almighty God for deliverance from the Sepoy revolt, should take expression in the form of schools for the children of the Community, that has stood so nobly by England in her hour of need, and who had shed their blood for their kinsmen across the seas."

In this, Lord Canning, the then Viceroy, joined con amore.

Coming to the last great extension of the British domain in India, the history of Upper Burma and its development, is one largely associated with the services rendered by the Anglo-Indian and Domiciled European Community in all Government Services.

(ii) Present History.—Subsequent to the Mutiny, when the attention and energies of the Government were devoted to the development of trade and commerce and to the stabilisation of the Civil administration of India, it was, again, the Anglo-Indian Community that came to its assistance and continued, as in pre-Mutiny days, to aid British administrators to build up, step by step, the most important revenue building departments of to-day to which separate sections of this Memorandum are devoted in the following pages. No one will deny that it was Anglo-Indian workers who helped to bring the Customs Department to its present-day high revenue value and who helped to develop roads, railways, river-transport and the telegraph system. The Community, along with the British, can also claim to have developed other Departments such as the Provincial Civil Service, Judiciary, Police, Excise, Salt, Opium, Forests, Survey and the Government of India and Provincial Government Secretariats, from all of which it has been or is being eliminated to-day. After the Mutiny, when the Volunteer Corps was re-organised, members of the Domiciled Community formed the major portion of it. In fact, so great was the enthusiasm and so spontaneous the enlistment on the formation of the Indian Defence Force during the past Great War, that elimination parades had to be held to bring the Force down to manageable dimensions. The Community, however, formed the bulk of it, even after thousands of Anglo-Indians had already enlisted in the British Army. The Community also contributed many hundreds of men to the Indian Army as Officers, many of whom were afterwards drafted to the standing Army. A number of them received Military decorations and more were mentioned in despatches. The Indian Medical Department, which is entirely composed of Anglo-Indians and Domiciled Europeans and which, for nearly a century, has attended to the medical needs of the British Army in India and on almost every battlefield in Europe and abroad, bears a record of war and professional service which any Community would be proud to possess. In addition, large numbers of our women were employed as Army nurses, while others helped to form working clubs where comforts were prepared for the use of our Forces. Almost 80 per cent. of the male adult members of the Community were engaged in every theatre of the Great War, and those that were not so utilised for services abroad, were enlisted in the Indian Defence Force and helped to maintain law and order in India at a time when the regular British troops were withdrawn for active service outside the country. This percentage, we submit, is unparalleled in any part of the Empire.

Turning our attention to the immediate past few years, during the Moplah rebellion, the 1919 Punjab and North-West Frontier unrest, the Civil Disobedience movement and the many economic and railway crises, the Community, which to-day, forms three-fourths of the Indian Auxiliary Force, the second line of defence of the British Army in India, has helped largely to maintain the peace and order of the country. It was a common sight, during the recent acute period of Civil Disobedience, to find at every railway station a lonely Anglo-Indian member of the Auxiliary Force standing, with his rifle in hand, behind sand-bags, protecting the lives and property of both Europeans and Indians, and, as members of this Force, Anglo-Indians have frequently been called upon to quell riots in the cities and also to protect the lives and property of the various railway administrations in India. And yet, to-day, the Anglo-Indian is denied admission into the British Army on account of his origin, although during the past Great War, thousands of our men were freely enlisted in the British Army and even to-day there are about 1,000 of them still serving. Indeed, there was a time quite recently, when about 30 per cent. of the British Officers serving in the Indian Army were second, third or fourth generations of Anglo-Indian families. The community is also denied admission into the Indian Army lest it disturb the class homogeneity of that Force. But the most cruel and unjustifiable policy on the part of the Army authorities in India is their refusal, to-day, to recognise the Community as one of the "martial classes" of India, and we are told that the chief practical difficulty which prevents the Army authorities from creating an Anglo-Indian Unit or Battery of Artillery is that the Anglo-Indian cannot exist on the same pay as the Indian Sepoy, and, therefore, it would create an anomaly necessitating the introduction of a third-rate of military pay, to which the Government of India thinks there would be serious objections from the Indians, obviously forgetful of the fact that the White Paper is a bundle of anomalies. But if it be the intention of the Government to reduce the present strength of the British Army in India, we respectfully suggest it would afford an ideal opportunity for the creation of either an Anglo-Indian Unit or some Anglo-Indian Batteries of Artillery, and thus give the Community an honoured position in the defence of its own country.

Many promises were held out by the Government to those who went to the Front, but very few materialised, and although land was given as a reward to various Indians who served during the War, we do not know of a single instance in which an Anglo-Indian, who answered the call of his King and Country, has been so rewarded. Meanwhile, Government continues to draw upon our loyalty as a source of strength and stability. Repeatedly we have been placed to our detriment, as evidenced to-day, in the unfortunate position of open economic and political antagonism to our Indian brothers, especially that vast majority of our Community who are employed in the Indian Railways. It may, indeed, be said that our present insecure position and the manifest hostility with which we are regarded by a section of disaffected Indians, who look upon us in regard to employment as aliens, the same as they do Europeans, is in consequence of our share in the maintenance of law and order, and we fear, especially if this section of Indians gets into power, it may still further recoil on our descendants.

(iii) Civil Services.—There is no doubt that the Anglo-Indian community has materially helped to lay the foundations, and to build, maintain and develop to their present states of efficiency, the various utility and revenue bearing Services of the Government of India and the Provincial Governments. The privations endured and the dangers to which these pioneer workers exposed themselves in the early days of Indian industrialism, when very few loyal and efficient workers were available, form a chapter in the history of India which must be read to be fully appreciated and, if possible, properly assessed at the present time when our need is so urgent and our reward has been fully earned. We feel we would not be exaggerating the case if we were to state that, had it not been for these pioneer Anglo-Indian workers and their loyal and steadfast services in those days, as also in the immediate present, when Government has been faced with many economic and railway crises, the revenues from trade and industries would not be at the high level which they are to-day. Indeed, with justifiable pride, we lay claim to be reckoned as one of the Empire Builders in India. We go further and affirm that, not only the revenues which the Government of India receives from the Customs, but also the immunity which the country has enjoyed from the chaos and dangers associated with the promiscuous importation of arms and ammunition, especially during the North-West Frontier Wars and Civil Disobedience Movement, has largely been due to the loyal, honest and efficient services of the Anglo-Indian community employed in the Preventive Customs Service. The same may be said with equal force and value in regard to the services rendered by the Community to the Railways, Posts and Telegraphs, and Police.

Subsequent chapters of this Memorandum will give detailed references to the three Services, Railways, Telegraphs and Customs in which the Community finds its chief avenues of employment and in which it has played such a valuable and abiding part.

It is said that the Imperial Services have made India. This, no doubt, is true, but we feel sure that not a single Imperial Service Officer will deny that his success has, in an appreciable measure, been due to the loyal support of his subordinates, the majority of whom were, until lately, Anglo-Indians and Domiciled Europeans and who, therefore, can rightly claim to have materially helped in the foundation of the Government Services.

Such, briefly, has been our record of service and, in view of the part we have played in the building up and development of the India of the past and of to-day, we feel we have a special claim on the Joint Parliamentary Committee, the British Parliament and Nation, to statutory protection of our economic interests.

E.—STATUS.

There can be no doubt that our main difficulty and disability lies in the extraordinary status we occupy in India to-day. Indeed, it may truly be said that we have a trinity of existence, e.g., for occupational purposes, we are classed as "Statutory Natives of India"; for Defence purposes we are called "European British Subjects," and for social, political and legislative purposes we are called "Anglo-Indians," and, as such, we have been and are to-day used for the convenience of Government in any of these categories as they desire and to suit the exigency of the occasion and demand.

It is well known that by the Indian Councils Act of 1870, 33 Vic. Chapter III—the community is given the position of "Natives of India by Statute," and, as such, it has an equal claim with other communities for employment in all Government Services. The Community has been urged to admit, recognise and demand this status in all avenues of employment. But, in accepting our position as Statutory Natives of India, we do not consider we are called upon to abandon our individuality as a Community. It is, however, one thing to ask and another thing to receive, for, whenever we have demanded our economic rights in the Legislative Assembly as "Natives of India by Statute," the Opposition Benches of the House have denied us our claim as such, and have endeavoured to make the Community clearly to understand that it is not included in the term Indianisation. In this connection we would refer to Earl Winterton's definition of our status. In the House of Commons in December, 1925, in answer to questions he said:

"For purposes of employment under Government and inclusion in schemes of Indianisation, members of the Anglo-Indian and Domiciled European Community are Statutory Natives of India. For purposes of education and internal security, their status, in so far as it admits of definition, approximates to that of 'European British subjects.' "

But there is an unfortunate tendency at present for both Europeans and Indians to reverse the application and disown and disinherit the Anglo-Indian. For example, as members of the Auxiliary Force, we share the task of internal defence with the British Army, but when it comes to the question of admission into the Army, we are asked to accept the conditions and pay of service of an Indian Sepoy. Again, to all intents and purposes, we are ineligible for appointments reserved for the European and yet, under the scheme of Indianisation, the Indian refuses to recognise or accept us as Statutory Natives of India, as is evidenced from the numerous interpellations by Indians in the various Legislatures. For example, in a recent debate on the Railway "Demands for Grants" one of the members of the Legislative Assembly, in a speech asking for Indianisation of the Services, remarked that he wanted "pure-blooded Indians," that is, Indian-Indians for the Railways, not Anglo-Indians," and, as the Indian refuses to accept us as Statutory Indians, it is idle for anyone to say "The Anglo-Indian must once and for all decide whether he is a European or an Indian."

It will, therefore, be apparent that the Legislatures refuse to recognise our status as Statutory Indians and so our future is rendered most insecure.

Our position has gradually been going from bad to worse and our complete economic disaster has, hitherto, been avoided only by the exercise of special favours from the Government in the shape of confidential orders to officials, to safeguard, as far as possible, our interests and by the benevolence of some sympathetic officials. But of late, the cry of Indianisation has been so loud and so insistent that even these marks of favour are being denied the Community. We go further and assert that with the present retrenchment and economy that is being practised in every Government Department—when no new appointments are being created—it is an undeniable fact that every additional appointment given to-day to an Indian is taken away

—indeed it must be so—from either a European or an Anglo-Indian and so, in this way, the Community will, within a few decades, be deprived of the right to live unless it is statutorily protected.

In this connection, we would particularly draw the Committee's attention to pages 42, 43, 44 and 45, paragraphs 59, 60, 61, 62 and 63 of Volume I of the Indian Statutory Commission Report.

F.—EFFECTS OF INDIANISATION OF THE SERVICES.

Time was when the Anglo-Indian and Domiciled European Community was liberally employed in all Departments of Government, but during recent years they have been steadily replaced by Indians. To the policy of Indianisation itself and the aspirations of Indians to a larger share in the administration of and recruitment into Government Services, the Anglo-Indian Community "Statutory Natives of India," have never been and can never be inimical. As one of the permanent communities in India, we wish to affirm our loyal acceptance of and support to the Reforms as adumbrated in the White Paper, and to express our full sympathy with the progressive aims and realisations of a system of self-Government on well measured lines for India within the Empire. But as a people who have built up and worked the various Departments of Government, and who, we consider, have deserved consideration from the Government of India, we respectfully protest against the manner in which the policy of Indianisation has been and is being manipulated to our serious disadvantage. The effect of this policy has been to gradually, but surely, squeeze out the Community from these Services, while in some Departments, not a single Anglo-Indian is to be found to-day. This is exemplified in the constant changes which have been made in the system of recruitment into the Provincial and some of the higher Services. We realise that the political influence of about 200,000 Anglo-Indians and Domiciled Europeans, obviously cannot be compared with that of the hundreds of millions of Indians, but "the cause of the Anglo-Indian discontent lies deeper than that for, since nomination has been superseded by examination, Indians have had an advantage over us, because their educational facilities are far cheaper and more ubiquitous than ours. Indeed, the educational syllabus imposed by Government on European schools until recently was not designed to lead up to Indian Universities, but was devised to meet the requirements of Governments under old conditions, i.e., as subordinates in their Service, and, we submit, that our system of education needs radical adjustment to adapt itself to the changing circumstances of present-day India. The Community, relying in the past so largely on Government employment, has neither sought an opening nor created a need for its services outside of official life, although a large number of Anglo-Indians are graduating to-day and rendering a good account of themselves in open competition with Indians. The above difficulties are enhanced by the standard of living adopted by the Community, which is based on Western standards. This standard prohibits competition with the Indian artisan and shop-keeper and from recruitment in the ranks of the Indian fighting Forces. In addition emigration to other parts of the Empire is more or less closed to us on account of the colour bar, while the poverty of the Community prevents it from settling on the land.

We give below figures to show how the Community has been replaced by Indians in Government Secretarial Departments, particularly in the higher Provincial Services.

CLERKS IN THE INDIAN AND BENGAL OFFICES IN CALCUTTA, FROM 1840-1890.

PROVINCIAL SERVICES OF BENGAL.

Number of Anglo-Indians	...	75
Number of Indians	...	3,030
Percentage of Anglo-Indians	...	2.5
Percentage of Indians	...	97.5

These figures approach the time when Indianisation of the Services was brought into active operation and conclusively prove how, after having played our part, we have been replaced, and we assert, that, if statistics were obtained to-day, it would be found that our position is much worse.

In this connection we would add that not many years ago the Community filled most of the posts of Deputy Collectors, Extra Assistant Commissioners, and other Provincial Executive Officers in the old Assam Commission, Sind Commission, Punjab Commission, Burma Commission, etc., but in these posts (now called the Provincial Civil Service of India), very few Anglo-Indians and Domiciled Europeans are to be found to-day.

In contrast to the above figures, we append below a statement showing what a serious effect recent retrenchments carried out by the Government of India, have had on the Anglo-Indian and Domiciled European Community employed in the Government of India Secretariat, from the grades of Assistant-Secretary down to the subordinate in the Central Secretariat Services. These figures will show that even within recent years, the Community has had to bear the brunt of such retrenchments, indeed, except for retrenched Europeans (which no doubt includes many Domiciled Europeans), the Anglo-Indian Community has suffered a loss of 26 out of 117 appointments, i.e., 22 per cent. of the total number of appointments held prior to retrenchment. Here also, most of the Anglo-Indians still employed are over 40 years of age and within a few years will be superannuated, thus rendering our position still more deplorable. In this connection we would add that this marked reduction in our appointments in the Government of India Secretariat is contrary to the Home Department's orders regarding retrenchment which, we believe, stipulated that the communal percentage of employment should be the same after as before retrenchment was effected. The tragic aspect of our position in this Department is that our present number represents less than 9 per cent. of the whole. The Community has been practically eliminated from Provincial Government Secretariats, and unless our present position is remedied, we fear the same fate awaits us in the Government of India Secretariat and, yet, the Secretary of State for India has ruled that such replacement, as far as the Anglo-Indian Community is concerned, should be gradually undertaken.

So rapidly has this displacement proceeded during the past decade of the Reforms, that in the Postal Department, the Judicial Services and in some of the Provincial Services, very few Anglo-Indians are to be found to-day. In the Government of India and Provincial Secretariats, Forest, Salt, Survey and Excise Departments an almost similar state of affairs exist, with the result that numbers of the Community have been forced to seek subordinate employment in the Railways, Posts and Telegraphs and Customs. But even here, we feel that, under the stress and misapplication of Indianisation, we are gradually being pushed out. The Community was certainly not prepared for the introduction of the Montagu-Chelmsford Reforms, for none of us foresaw the sweeping changes that were implied in these Reforms and we believed that any changes which might be introduced, would be gradual and would allow us time to prepare ourselves to run a level race with the Indian, as is demanded of us by Government to-day.

It is obvious that, if ever we are to succeed in our struggle against such stupendous odds, we must have every facility for equipping ourselves educationally to meet the situation. We are grateful for the educational protection granted to us by the Irwin Report, but the Community must be protected from further displacement in the Services, for we maintain that the education of the child is mainly dependent on the economic security of the parent and we submit that the British Government owes this economic protection, as a debt of honour to a people for whose presence they are responsible and who have rendered them loyal and invaluable service in the past. The right thinking Indian, also, will not deny the Anglo-Indian this moral claim to protection against such rapid changes, in order that he may bring himself into line with the other peoples of India and so continue to be as valuable an asset in the coming "National India" as he has been under the old regime, which is now passing.

In subsequent chapters we hope to show by facts and figures the effect Indianisation has had on the three important services—Railways, Telegraphs, and Customs—in which nearly three-fourths of the Anglo-Indian community are employed and which, to-day, constitutes their only means of livelihood.

We would, however, here refer to the action taken by some Provincial Governments, who, in recent circulars—for example, “Recruitment Rules for Bengal Services for 1928,” issued by the Bengal Government—clearly demonstrate that their chief desire is to satisfy the demands of Hindus and Muslims for certain fixed percentages in all Departments, unmindful, except as an unimportant after-thought, of the interests of the Domiciled Community who helped to build most of these Departments. Indeed, the many decisions of communal percentages for employment in Government Services seem to be the outcome of pacts between the Government on the one hand and Hindus and Muslims on the other, with little or no consideration for the Domiciled Community. Again, in all arrangements between Indian political parties, it is always a question of Hindu versus Muslim, the Anglo-Indian and Domiciled European being regarded as an alien and apparently outside the pale of their consideration. This exclusion is due, no doubt, to the fact (as detailed in the Chapter on Railways) that percentages of employment are calculated on the basis of population. We submit that this is incorrect as it is not the entire Indian population which is in competition with Anglo-Indians for the 25,000 appointments they hold to-day in all Government services, but merely the literate sections who possess a secondary or higher English education. It is, therefore, necessary that the system of calculating percentages should be revised. Consideration should also be given to the fact that, in India, where every employment tends to develop into a caste, certain communities have grouped themselves for generations into particular Services, thereby acquiring a special aptitude in these Departments—e.g., Madrasis in Finance, Sikhs and Gurkhas in the Army, Bengalis in clerical offices, and Anglo-Indians in Railways, Customs and Telegraphs and, we further submit, it is to the advantage of Government that communities should continue to be employed in those Services for which they are best fitted.

Moreover, we need some protection in the Provinces because from every Province comes the demand for exclusive indigenous employment and the incessant cry one hears to-day of “Behar for the Beharis,” “Punjab for the Punjabis,” “Bengal for the Bengalis,” etc., while it benefits the Indians, it sounds the death knell of the Anglo-Indian, who, being, as it were, nobody’s child, is in consequence the chief sufferer, by being denied the right to earn his livelihood in his own country.

G.—PREVIOUS REPRESENTATIONS MADE BY THE COMMUNITY.

It was the realisation of this relegation to position of inferiority and degradation that prompted the Community in India to send a well-known Anglo-Indian, Mr. Ricketts (the orphan son of Ensign John Ricketts of the Bengal Engineers, who had fallen at the siege of Seringapatam), a member of the Board of Customs, Salt and Revenue Department, to England in 1829, over 100 years ago, to present a petition to the Houses of Parliament for the protection and upliftment of the Community. This petition was presented to the House of Commons by the Right Honourable Mr. C. W. William Wynn and by the Earl of Carlyle before the House of Lords, and Ricketts was examined by a Select Committee of the House of Lords on 31/3/1830 and by the House of Commons on 21st or 24th June, 1830. But his mission was fruitless, as the nation was then too occupied with her own affairs and, except for expressions of sympathy and kindness, Ricketts returned empty-handed to India.

In 1923 representatives of our community were received in deputation by the then Secretary of State for India and set forth our grievances. But, as we received no redress and because the powers given to the authorities in the Instrument of Instructions had not been exercised to safeguard our interests, the Community in India sent a deputation to England in 1925, which was received by the late Lord Birkenhead. When it is borne in mind that, notwithstanding all these statutory safeguards, the economic interests of the Community have been prejudicially affected by the Reforms already granted, it cannot be denied that we have some justification for viewing the future with grave apprehension. In this assertion, we have no desire to oppose the progressive realisation of Self-Government in India; on the contrary, we whole-heartedly support it, but we desire to point out that Indianisation is proceeding at a rate and in a manner which is prejudicial to the interests of the Anglo-Indian Community, which, more than any other, has a claim to consideration equally on historical, moral and economic grounds.

How great a menace displacement from the Services is to the Community will be appreciated when it is pointed out that these are its main avenues of livelihood, and if they are closed no others are open to it. The community, being accustomed to European modes of living, has an economic standard much above that of the Indian, which makes competition with the Indian entirely impossible. The Anglo-Indian cannot take to menial or agrarian occupation.

The first admission and recommendation for protection appeared in the Montagu-Chelmsford Report, para. 346, which reads:—

"Some reference is needed also to the case of the large Anglo-Indian or Eurasian community which on historic grounds has a strong claim on the consideration of the British Government. It is not easy for them, occupying as they do, an intermediate position between the races of the East and West, to win for themselves by their own unaided enterprise, a secure position in the economy of India. They have been hitherto to a great extent in political and economic dependence on the Government; and they would not be strong enough to withstand the effect of changes which omitted to take account of their peculiar situation. We think the Government must acknowledge and must be given effective power to discharge the obligation to see that their 'interests are not prejudicially affected.'"

The Community next presented a Memorandum to the Indian Statutory Commission, and we would respectfully draw the attention of the Committee to those parts of the Report of this Commission that refer to the Anglo-Indian Community.

Volume I., Part 1, Chapter 5, para. 60:—

"... the Community has played an honourable part in developing the country and in supporting the forces of order. These avenues of employment are the more important to it, since Anglo-Indians are not cultivators and few of them hold commanding positions in the world of commerce. It is, generally speaking, a poor community; the standards of life it endeavours to maintain, make this poverty still more severely felt; it is domiciled in India, and must make India its home; and it now finds itself, largely as the result of the Reforms and Indianisation, exposed to the danger of falling between two stools.

"Some 1,500 Anglo-Indian women are in the nursing profession. They have given of their best to the tending of the sick of all races, and have thus done something towards meeting one of the foremost and most urgent needs of Indian society."

Volume I., Chapter 5, para. 62:—

"Employment of Anglo-Indians in Public Services.—As we have said, a very large proportion of Anglo-Indian adults are employed in the Public services. Almost all of these are connected with Central departments. The deputation to which we have referred informed us that about 14,000 Anglo-Indians, together with 3,000 Domiciled Europeans, are engaged on the Railways, and that substantial numbers of the Community hold posts in the Telegraphs, Customs, Post Office, Survey and Indian Medical Department. Very few members of the Community appear to be employed in the Provincial Services, though some of them find work in the Education Departments.

"We were told that during the last two years, the proportion of Anglo-Indians employed on the Railways has tended to fall, while the number of Indian employees has increased. Improved education and lower wages, make the latter formidable competitors. To take another example, in the Indian Telegraph Department (which up to 1878 was entirely staffed by Anglo-Indians and Domiciled Europeans) the percentage of such employees is stated to have fallen from 66 per cent. in 1902 to 40 per cent. in 1928. In other Departments, the change is equally marked. The reduction in the public employment of Anglo-Indians may be partly explained by the inclusion of a University degree among the qualifications required of a candidate for a wide range of posts to which Anglo-Indians were formerly admitted without it. But the real cause is to be found in the working out of the policy of increasing Indianisation of the Services. Even though Anglo-Indians may be included in schemes of Indianisation the pressure from more powerful and numerous Indian communities is such that there is an increasing danger of Anglo-Indians being squeezed out."

10^o November, 1933.]

Volume I., Chapter 5, para. 63 —

"... Nobody can consider the difficulties which are inherent in the position of Anglo-Indians without desiring to do the utmost for them. As we have said, their difficulties are economic and social rather than constitutional and nothing can prevent old traditions being affected by changing circumstances."

Volume II., Part IX., para. 340:—

"We have one observation to make in regard to recruitment by the Central Government. In our first volume we have described the peculiar position of the Anglo-Indian Community and its economic difficulties. Its dependence upon employment under the Central Government is due not only to its aptitude and capacity, but to the policy of Government in the past. We suggest, therefore, that some special consideration should be given to community in recruiting for the Central Services with which it has a traditional connection."

H.—THE EFFECT OF OUR REPRESENTATIONS.

Although the Montagu-Chelmsford and Simon Commission Reports recognised the claims of other Communities in India, they gave the Anglo-Indian community nothing but pious expressions of sympathy and goodwill regarding its future, leaving it to the benevolence of the various Governments and their Ministers. Notwithstanding the fact that the Instrument of Instructions contained in the Government of India Act of 1919 gave special powers to Governors to protect the interests of Minorities, on rare occasions has this power been exercised, although the Community has frequently presented its grievances to the various Governments. A reference to the Simon Commission Report will show that while it recognised our disabilities, it afforded no practical solution.

But so great has been the reaction of these changes on the employment of the Community that the Government of India, to whom we are grateful, have been compelled to admit the fact that they are, to-day, wholly unable to guarantee any further economic protection to the Community, especially to those employed in the Railways. This admission is to be found on page 169 of the Government of India's Dispatch on Constitutional Reforms, September, 1930.

We would draw the Committee's special attention to para. 192 of this Report, which reads as follows:—

"Purposes for which Parliament must retain control."

"The purposes in which Parliament must, we think, continue to be interested so far as the Railways are concerned falls under the heads of Defence, Finances, the Services and the Anglo-Indian Community."

"The Anglo-Indian Community."

"The Anglo-Indian Community has in the past rendered very important services to the Railways and still holds a large number of posts in particular branches of railway work. The economic life of the community is indeed to a large extent dependent on the opportunities of employment which the railways offer, and its members are gravely apprehensive of what may occur, if and when any change does take place in the present system of administration and control. In view of the history of the community, a special obligation we think, rests upon Parliament, before relaxing its own control, to ensure, as far as may be practical, that the interests of the Anglo-Indian community are protected."

We would now refer to the report of the Services Sub-Committee of the First Round Table Conference, which, in a manner, also recognised our apprehensions and admitted the special position in which the Anglo-Indian Community was placed in regard to employment in Government Services and recommended that special consideration be given to our claims. The resolution was as follows:—

"The Sub-Committee recognises the special position of the Anglo-Indian Community in respect of public employment and recommends that special consideration should be given to their claims for employment in the Services."

This resolution, which was unanimously passed by a Committee largely composed of Indian Delegates, is a most significant admission and recommendation. It may be said this recommendation is nothing more than a pious resolution, but we submit it has the official seal of recognition of a special Committee of the Round Table Conference and as such, cannot easily be overlooked either by this Committee or Parliament. We, therefore, submit that if the Indian Delegates were prepared unanimously to offer us special protection, there should be no difficulty in the drafting out and incorporating into the Constitution Act, a special clause granting us the protection we seek.

10^o Novembris, 1933]

Lastly, we take the liberty of quoting the assurance given to the Community, by H.R.H. the Prince of Wales, in his reply to an Anglo-Indian Deputation that welcomed him when he visited India in 1922.

"Gentlemen, you may rest assured that I now understand the conditions under which you live in India and the useful and honoured place which you fill as citizens of the Indian Empire. Your aims and aspirations have my sympathy. Your devotion to the cause of India, the land in which you live, and your desire to maintain an honoured place for her within the Empire, do you credit. I shall watch the progress of your community with the closest attention. You may be confident that Great Britain and the Empire, will not forget your Community, who are so united in their devotion to the King-Emperor and who gave such unmistakable tokens of their attachment to the Empire by their sacrifices in the War"

I.—COMPARISONS.

During the Three Round Table Conferences, the various Communities which go to form India have each, in turn, presented its demands for consideration, with the result that the Muslims have rightly been given about 33½ per cent. of the seats in the Central Legislatures and adequate weightage in other Provincial Legislatures, communal electorates and with an almost statutory majority in the Provinces of Punjab and Bengal. The Depressed Classes have been given almost all they desired and Government has accepted the Pact recently entered into between them and Mr. Gandhi, which has given them twice the number of seats in the Legislature as was allotted to them in the Prime Minister's Communal Award. The women of India have rightly been given extended franchise, and special representation in the Legislatures, as also special electoral qualifications.

Labour has been given additional representation in the Central Legislatures and special constituencies. The demands of the Landlords and Universities have, in the main, also been satisfied. Other sections of the people have been granted their requests—e.g., the creation of the North-West Frontier Province, the separation of Sind, and Orissa. Europeans have not only been given to understand that their commercial and trade interests will be protected but also their Jury and other rights. The Superior Services under the Secretary of State have been guaranteed adequate protection. The Liberal and Moderate Parties have not only been promised that Indians will be given a large share of responsibility in the Centre, but a closer association in Defence. These have been detailed, not in the nature of a complaint, but as a comparison, and we feel bound to ask: Against all these concessions given to other communities, what have the three Round Table Conferences done to satisfy the demands made by the Anglo-Indian Community, who to-day, stand more in need of statutory protection than any other community in India? It cannot be denied that, except for pious expressions of sympathy and good will, nothing material has been done for it, though in making this statement, we feel we must admit with gratitude, particularly to the Indian Delegates, the acceptance by the Round Table Conference of the Irwin Report on Anglo-Indian Education, but in doing so, we cannot help but add: Of what value is this concession to the education of our children if their parents are deprived of their employment and the right to live, because it cannot be denied that the education of the child is entirely dependent on the economic security of the parent?

J.—PROTECTION CLAIMED.

We are admittedly a small and poor community, with no strong voice in the Legislatures of the Country, but apart from the fact that we are descendants of those Britishers who built up the British Indian Empire, we feel we can, with confidence and justifiable pride, present our past history, our great services and our loyalty to the Empire, in support of and as our chief assets in this our appeal for Statutory protection.

And it is with this object in view* that we have detailed these indisputable facts in the preceding pages and in our detailed references to the Services in which we have been largely employed.

Under these circumstances, and since the Government of India admits its inability to protect us any further, we are compelled to appeal to the Joint Parliamentary Committee and through it, to the British Parliament, for protection.

We feel that the powers that have been given to the Governor-General and Governors to protect our interests have been used very sparingly. The Community also feels that if these powers are merely to be repeated in the Instrument of Instructions, they will be of very little material value, because, with the grant of Provincial autonomy and responsibility in the Centre, the Departments in which the Anglo-Indian Community is employed will be placed under the complete control of the various Ministers and it will be against the principles underlying Provincial Autonomy and Responsibility in the Centre, for either the Governor-General or the Governors to interfere with the day-to-day administration of any of the Services and this is precisely what will, at first, have to be done if the few thousands of appointments to-day held by the Community are to be statutorily protected. After all, we are not asking for the impossible. We only want the Community to be safeguarded in these 25,000 odd appointments, as compared with the hundreds of thousands held by Indians. But, small as it is, this concession would save us from becoming a Depressed Class.

We look upon the economic future of the Community as a joint responsibility of every Englishman and every Indian who, in turn, are the co-trustees of that responsibility and we seek statutory protection not only of our economic interests, but also of our opportunities to serve the future India as loyally, as efficiently and as conscientiously as we have laboured for the past India.

We claim

From the date on which the New Constitution Act becomes operative, that the number of appointments in the various Government Services to-day held by the Anglo-Indian and Domiciled European Community, be not reduced for a period of at least thirty years and after that, we be given adequate recruitment in all Government Services and that this be incorporated in the New Constitution Act.

Failing this and in consideration of the assurances of economic protection given to the Community by the Government of India and Parliament, which have been so many as to have assumed the force and value which is rightly attached to a Treaty Obligation, and which, in our opinion, amounts to honourable pledges, but which we very respectfully submit have not been fulfilled, we feel, especially in view of the definite assurance given us by H.R.H. The Prince of Wales, when he said:

"You may be confident that Great Britain and the Empire will not forget your Community, who are so united in their devotion to the King-Emperor and who gave such unmistakable tokens of their attachment to the Empire by their sacrifice in the War."

that we are entitled to place our claim on a higher plane—that of a moral and honourable obligation on the British people, who called us into being, on Parliament and the Crown, whom we have served for centuries with a sense of loyalty, of patriotism and efficiency, without parallel in the British Empire.

K.—RAILWAYS.

We would draw the special attention of the Committee to the position the Domiciled Community occupies on Railways, for it is one of the most important matters dealt with in this Memorandum. We emphasise this aspect of our economic life, because it affords employment to-day to about 13,500 Anglo-Indians and about 3,000 Domiciled Europeans, who, together with their wives, families and dependents, form a total of nearly 100,000 men, women and children—i.e., two-thirds of the entire community—who are either employed or dependent upon Railways for their daily bread.

History.—It is an undisputed fact that it was with British captial that the pioneer Britisher and his offspring—the early Anglo-Indians—helped to lay the first railway sleepers in India nearly a century ago. These pioneer workers are, to-day, represented on the Railways by their third and fourth generations. Famine, small-pox, cholera, malaria and other diseases took their daily toll from among these early workers who were scattered, like a gipsy community, over the length and breadth of India, living in the jungles with no social amenities and, at times, far removed from medical aid which, in itself, was then in a primitive state. They toiled on from day to day and year to year, sustained by their loyalty to the country and the Government. In these early days, their salaries were mere pittances as compared with the present day more attractive rates of pay and the risks and privations then attendant on railway work and the smallness of the salaries did not make this Service sufficiently attractive to most educated Indians. It was not many years ago when almost every Engine-driver, Guard, and Station Staff subordinate was either a European or an Anglo-Indian and many of them rose to the highest positions, some eventually becoming successful Agents and General Traffic Managers, and, on some Railways, about 50 per cent. of the officials were promoted from Anglo-Indian subordinate ranks. As time went on the railways became a steady source of revenue to the Government of India and, equally with the British commercial firms who are to-day claiming protection of British commercial interests in India, we feel that the Anglo-Indian community is fully entitled to similar protection in return for their share in the development of trade and commerce of the country, as also the transportation troops during the various Wars, a service which, to-day, cannot be denied or adequately valued in terms of rupees, annas and pies. That in the past we have enjoyed a liberal percentage of certain small sections of subordinate appointments, particularly in the Operative Department of the Railways, and even, to-day, hold a fair number of these posts, is due, in the first place, to the fact that, until quite recently, there was no competition from other communities and no demand was then made for graduate education or competitive examinations, as constitutes a precedent to such employment to-day; secondly, to our past continuous service, trustworthiness and loyalty to our employers, and, thirdly, to the fact that these incumbents are senior men who have worked their way up after years of proved service.

As a result of continuous and more or less hereditary employment, the Anglo-Indian community became an integral part of the Indian Railways and our economic welfare has been and still is so intimately welded and linked up with the prosperity of the railways that it has become, more or less, a "caste" employment. While so employed we served with the old Volunteer Force—the Indian Defence Force—and, in course of time, compulsory enlistment into the Auxiliary Force became a rigid condition of Anglo-Indian and Domiciled European employment on the Railways; indeed, we are the only community from whom such military services are demanded as precedent to employment. To-day, the Railway Battalions form the backbone of the Auxiliary Force and are frequently called upon to protect Railway property and quell strikes, thus playing an important part in the internal defence of India. The Community is very proud of the honoured place it occupies in this Force and would be the last to suggest any alteration. But it respectfully submits that such employment, in a measure, augments its claim for special protection in a Department it has not only built up, but in which it can always be depended on during strikes and other crises. The various Railway Mechanical and Carriage and Wagon Workshops were at one time also almost entirely manned by the Community, and, as the need for importing costly covenanted employees, such as British Foremen, Drivers, Guards, Firemen, and others, in large numbers from England gradually decreased, their places were filled by Anglo-Indians.

It was in this atmosphere of economic contentment and apparent security of employment that the Reforms commenced to operate in 1920. Neither official nor subordinate received any hint from the Government as to the far-reaching changes that were to follow. Under the stress of clamorous demands made by certain Indian members of the Legislatures, who early showed hostility to the position occupied by the Community on Railways and demanded such a speedy rate of Indianisation that, if granted, would only result in throwing out of employment large numbers of the Community, the Government showed unmistakable signs of yielding. And it is this hesitating policy on the part of Government that is causing us such grave apprehension in a field of employment in which we have sown but are to-day being denied the reaping. If Government are in favour of the retention of a large proportion of Anglo-Indians in "certain sections" of railway employment, in consideration of their past services, their loyalty and devotion to duty, it would be to the interests of all concerned, if they openly admitted it, but it seems as if Government, faced with the pressure of other more powerful communities, is evading the many questions on Anglo-Indian Railway employment that are daily asked in the Legislative Assembly, and, though they realise that our community furnish reliable, if slightly more expensive railway workers, they seem to hesitate to say so. In their anxiety to conciliate certain Indian communities they overlook the fact that, for employment purposes, Anglo-Indians are "Statutory Natives of India" and that a Service manned by "Statutory Indians" cannot possibly be more Indianised, and thereby expose themselves to the charge of perpetuating a difference between Anglo-Indian and Indian employees on Railways. Their answers, hitherto, seem to convey the impression that the Community is being retained on Railways, not for its intrinsic worth, which has been abundantly proved, but by favour of the European official who, himself, is being pressed by Government to put into rapid affects its policy of Indianisation. Although Agents state they cannot run their Railways without Anglo-Indian and Domiciled European workers, Government insist, not only on the appointment of a larger number of Indians, but on their rapid promotion to the upper subordinate grades, apparently to show in each year's Railway Budget a marked increase in Indianisation, possibly with a view to winning over the extremist Indian opposition to their Demands for Grants. There are numerous instances in the Legislative Assembly where certain Indian Members have moved large cuts in the Budgets on the plea that Indianisation of the Services is not being given effect to; their attacks being directed at Anglo-Indians.

In support of our plea that certain Indians resent our employment on Railways, we would quote from a speech delivered by Mr. K. C. Neogy on the 24th February, 1928, when, in discussing the Railway Demands for Grants, said that he spoke for "the pure-blooded Indians—Indian-Indians" and not for those who claim an admixture of other blood—i.e., Anglo-Indians. These facts go to prove that a certain section of Indians resent the present employment of Anglo-Indians and Domiciled Europeans on Railways and, while avowing that they do not wish to oust us, they are anxious to get rid of us as soon as they can and, that by Indianisation, they practically mean Anti-Anglo-Indianisation.

The records of Railway administration will show to what extent the Government has, and does even to-day, rely on Anglo-Indian loyalty in the administration of its Railways, for, whenever certain sections of Indian workmen go on strike, as evidenced by the 1928 East India Railway strike, the Bengal-Nagpur Railway strike of 1927, the East India Railway and the North Western Railway strikes of 1920 and 1925, the Anglo-Indian community has always come to the assistance of Government, but the tragedy of such loyal service is the fact that, after we have broken these strikes and restored traffic, the Indian strikers, in response to pressure brought to bear on the Legislative Assembly by their representatives, are re-engaged and our services are dispensed with. That the Government of India are appreciative of our services and have been fully alive to their responsibilities on our behalf has been more than once clearly enunciated by the official spokesmen of the Legislative Assembly. In March, 1928, the Hon. Sir George Rainy, Commerce Member in the course of the Railway Budget debate, remarked:—

"The point I want to make plain, if I can is this. There are certain things that we cannot do. For one thing, we could not oust Anglo-Indians from the appointments the individuals actually hold, in order to replace them by Indians. There is also another aspect of the case to which I think it is necessary to refer here. When, as a matter of history, members of a particular community have held a very large number of appointments of a particular class, inevitably the whole economic organisation of the community becomes involved with that fact. That is a point that the Government of India cannot possibly ignore and to take measures which would summarily involve a sudden violent dislocation of the economic resistance of an important community would clearly be a matter in which the Government of India ought to proceed very cautiously. I want to give that warning."

Assurances of protection have, it is true, from time to time, been given to the Community by various Commerce Members and even by the Right Honourable The Secretary of State for India, and the Government of India have, we sincerely believe, made a genuine endeavour to carry them out, but their resistance seems to have proved unequal to the yearly increasing pressure for Indianisation. To-day, although we still enjoy a favourable percentage of certain appointments on the Railways, our future position is anything but assured. Indeed, we consider it is in grave jeopardy and, unless protection is afforded us in the shape of a definite enactment, it will not be long before we suffer the same fate in the Railways as we have met in other Government Departments. It is not only the present that we fear, but the future, and, while we are grateful to Government for the protection hitherto afforded to present employees, the assurances given us carry no permanent protection or safeguards, even for a stated period; on the contrary they not only imply that more Indians will be employed in the future, a claim we do not and cannot dispute, but also that, in the policy of Indianisation of Railways, the Community apparently occupies the position of a "separate class" apart from all other Indian communities. But, we ask, "how can Anglo-Indians, who are 'Statutory Natives of India,' be replaced by other Natives of India, i.e., Indian-Indians?" Surely Indianisation does not imply Anti-Anglo-Indianisation?

There is no doubt that the political pressure which has been brought to bear on Government for the past decade of the Reforms and the insistent demands for Indianisation of the Services, has, at last, influenced it to practically admit its inability to protect our interests any further, and, in support of this, we take the liberty of again quoting from the "Government of India's Despatch on Proposals for Constitutional Reform, September, 1930."

In this report it states, pages 168 and 169, paragraph 192:—

"Purposes for which Parliament must retain control.—The purposes in which Parliament must, we think, continue to be interested so far as the railways are concerned fall under the heads of Defence, Finance, the Services and the Anglo-Indian Community."

"The Anglo-Indian Community.—The Anglo-Indian community has in the past, rendered very important services to the Railways and still holds a large number of posts in particular branches of Railway work. The economic life of the community is indeed, to a large extent dependent on the opportunities of employment which the Railways offer, and its members are gravely apprehensive of what may occur, if and when, any change takes place in the present system of administration and control. In view of the history of the community, a special obligation, we think, rests upon Parliament, before relaxing its own control, to ensure, as far as may be practicable, that the interests of the Anglo-Indian community are protected."

This recommendation proves beyond doubt that the Government to-day find themselves incapable of protecting any further the interests of the Community employed on the Railways and recommends that the obligation should, in future, rest on Parliament. This not only explains the position the Community occupies to-day in this sphere of labour, but supports our demand for statutory protection from the Joint Parliamentary Committee, which is representative of the Houses of Parliament. In further support of our demand, we would draw the attention of the Committee to the following paragraphs from the Indian Statutory Commission Report which are reproduced in full on pages 11 and 12 of this Memorandum. Volume I, Part I, Chapter 5. Paragraphs 59, 60, 61, 62 and 63, and Volume II, Part IX. Paragraph 340.

We would again draw the special attention of the Committee to the Services Sub-Committee Report of the First Round Table Conference, which resolved:—

Sub-Committee VIII (Services) Paragraph 5, Sub-paragraph (4).

"The Sub-Committee recognise the special position of the Anglo-Indian community in respect of public employment and recommend that special consideration should be given to their claims for employment in the Services."

In this connection we would point out that we are entirely employed as upper and lower subordinates and not in the inferior or menial positions. It may be argued that the community still holds a fair proportion of subordinate appointments in certain sections of Railway Departments, carrying salaries rising to Rs. 250/- p.m. and over, but most of these appointments are, to-day, held by senior men, who, after years of devoted and steady service have, by sheer merit, risen to these positions. In other words, this does not refer to recent recruitment which is very small to-day.

We would also like to mention that the Government of India now demands a university degree for entrance into the superior Railway services, and a severe competitive entrance examination. We respectfully submit that Government is not entirely blameless for the unfortunate position the Anglo-Indian and Domiciled Community occupies as subordinates in the Railway Service, and its present state of unpreparedness adequately to compete equally with the higher educated Indians, even for subordinate appointments.

Time was when Government looked to loyalty and steadfastness as the chief requirements for this service and, as it was sure of such qualities in the community, it employed it in large numbers in Railways, Telegraphs and Customs. Indeed, we affirm that Government went so far as to restrict and retard the education of the children of its Anglo-Indian and Domiciled European Railway employees. In support, we would quote from a Government of India Resolution, issued on the 19th August, 1878, which reads as follows:—

“At all Railway Schools where higher education is attempted, such education should, as far as possible, be of a technical character and too much money and effort should not be spent in raising the pupils to any particular university or any other intellectual standards.”

We would here add that when the question of communal percentage of employment in the various sections of the Railway Departments was discussed in the Legislative Assembly in 1933, prominence was given to the large number of Anglo-Indians employed as upper subordinates, but very little was said that these Anglo-Indians were very senior men with long records of service to their credit or of those many sections of Railway employment—we refer to the Ministerial appointments, Clerical staffs, Finance and Audit—in which Anglo-Indians have a decimal percentage of employment, and in which certain classes of Indians have a preponderating percentage (in some sections about 90 per cent.). We mention this, not as a complaint, but to impress the fact that it is only in certain avenues of Railway employment, such as the Transport and Operating Staffs—for example, Station Masters, Engine Drivers and Guards—in which Anglo-Indians and Domiciled Europeans are mainly employed. But when all is said and done, the bald fact remains that out of nearly 800,000 railway employees, Anglo-Indians and Domiciled Europeans occupy only about 16,500 appointments and it is these appointments that we wish to protect and retain. We respectfully ask, is it right, is it just, because, for nearly a century, we have been the drawers of water and the hewers of wood for Government, we should, to-day, to satisfy a policy, be deprived of our undeniable claim for adequate protection?

Criticism has often been made and the belief is widely current that, on a total population ratio, the Domiciled community hold too high a percentage of appointments in Railways. This, we submit is a fallacy, because, to take one aspect of the matter, it must not be forgotten that the entire population of India is not in open competition with Anglo-Indians for the class of appointments they seek, and to-day hold, but only those Indians who are educated in English up to the secondary standard and upwards. Moreover, it is a well known fact, that in many Government Departments, for example, the Army, Audit and Accounts, Finance, Clerical staffs, Postal, Excise, Revenue, Forest, Irrigation, Port Trusts, Salt, Income Tax and many quasi-Government Departments throughout the country, very few, if any Anglo-Indians are to-day to be found.

It is universally accepted that efficiency should be the only test for employment, especially in subordinate appointments carrying salaries from Rs. 30/- to Rs. 250/- p.m. and over, and as efficiency to-day means—as it must mean—a working knowledge of English up to the secondary standard, it is interesting to note that out of about 2,000,000 of the population above the age of 15 years, who are literate in English, about 1,000,000 only are educated up to the secondary standard. Against this figure we have about 85,000 Anglo-Indians who are so educated. It, therefore, follows that, for all subordinate Government appointments which run into hundreds of thousands, the competitors are not the total population of India, as is so often advanced, but only 1,000,000 of the population including 85,000 of the Domiciled Community, which means that the community should be given 8.5 per cent. of all such appointments. But, as a matter of history and of fact, out of the many hundreds of thousands of subordinate appointments, there are only about 25,000 Anglo-Indians and Domiciled Europeans so employed in all Government Services, including Railways. In other words, we do not receive anything like the number which would come our way if appointments were distributed according to the above ratios of candidates with secondary education qualifications.

We desire to elaborate this point in regard to Railway employment.

The Railways employ about 800,000 persons, out of which about 175,000 can be classed as subordinates and officials.

Service on Railways can be divided into three main categories.

(a) Menials.—Anglo-Indians are not employed as such and Indian communal representation could and ought to be based on a population ratio.

(b) Officials—for which a degree is to-day demanded, has also a severe open competitive examination, which is almost closed to the Community owing to its unpreparedness in higher education.

(c) Subordinates (upper and lower).—It is in this class of employees, drawing salaries from Rs.80/- to Rs.250/- p.m. and over, in which Anglo-Indians and Domiciled Europeans are largely employed. There are about 175,000 such appointments on all Railways, for which about 915,000 educated Indians (minus the larger number who are employed in other Government Services) and 85,000 Anglo-Indians (excluding the few thousands who are employed in other Government Departments) are in open competition with each other and this is an important factor which should be considered when determining communal percentages in such Railway and other Government employment. There are to-day, a little over 13,000 Anglo-Indians as Railway subordinates and officials, which, in our opinion, is not an undue proportion, because, according to the English-education efficiency test of 8.5 per cent., we should receive a larger number of appointments on Railways. But it must not be forgotten that very few Anglo-Indians and Domiciled Europeans are employed in other Departments of Government, and we, therefore, claim that we are entitled to our present numbers.

If, on the other hand (taking English as the efficiency test) the Community were given its 8.5 per cent. quota of such appointments in all Government Services and these were universally distributed, we should be quite content. It is because we are not so employed and that these appointments are more or less closed to us, that we feel we have a claim to service in a Department such as the Railways, for which we have shown such marked aptitudinal qualities; the same as the Sikhs, Gurkhas, Jats, Punjabi-Muslims, etc., have shown and, for which reason, are exclusively employed in the Indian Army.

We do not contend that this is the only criterion on which communal employment in Government Services should be calculated, but it is a factor which cannot be overlooked. It is possible that a settlement for communal employment in all Government subordinate appointments might be arrived at on the basis of communal legislative representation in the Lower Federal Chamber, and Provincial Legislatures, e.g., it might be apportioned between the three main Communities, Hindus, Muslims and Europeans-cum-Anglo-Indians. We offer this for the consideration of the Committee.

For ready reference we append below a copy of the Railway Board's Circular, No. 2395-E, dated 23rd May, 1929, regarding the employment of Anglo-Indians on Railways and which the statistics given abundantly prove is not being carried out.

“The application of these principles to the Anglo-Indian community present peculiar difficulties. Owing partly to reasons which are a matter of history and partly to the special aptitude displayed by members of the community for certain Branches of Railway work, a very high proportion of the appointments in these Branches have for a number of years been filled by Anglo-Indians. It appeared to the Government of India that this was a case which called for special treatment. The principles which, in their opinion must be followed are these:—

“(1) In those branches of the Service in which a preponderant share of the appointments has fallen to Anglo-Indians in the past, opportunities must be given to members of other communities to show their fitness.

"(2) Whatever the qualifications considered necessary in order to justify the appointment of a candidate to a particular branch of the service may be, they must be the same for all.

"(3) No step should be taken which would produce a sudden and violent dislocation in the economic life of the Anglo-Indian community, and,

"(4) In order to avert this danger, care must be taken, in the preparation of schemes for recruitment to the subordinate Railway services not to impose conditions which would, in effect, seriously restrict the opportunities of employment on the Indian Railways which Anglo-Indians at present enjoy.

" It is inevitable that, as time goes on, a larger number of members of other communities should be admitted to those branches of the Service which have hitherto been manned mainly by Anglo-Indians, and the Government of India desire that steps should be taken to give members of other communities a chance of showing their fitness. But the change should be brought about gradually and slowly."

It is, therefore, our submission that, despite the many assurances given by the Government of India, as also the Secretary of State in reply to the Anglo-Indian Deputations of 1923 and 1925, our opportunities of employment in the subordinate Railway Service, are not being reduced "gradually and slowly" but rapidly.

We take the liberty of attaching certain statistics which conclusively prove the prejudicial effect Indianisation of the Services has had on Anglo-Indians employed on the Railways during the past decade of the operation of the Reforms, and we would add that, if this is to be our fate for the services we have rendered to this branch of Government, at a time when British administration is paramount and British officials still occupy most of the important appointments, we hesitate to think what will be our fate within the next ten or twenty years, especially if the Extremist Indians are returned in a majority to the Federal Legislatures. We would ask members of the Committee carefully to study these figures, for then only will they fully appreciate how we have suffered and are suffering, and be able to realise the gravity of our apprehension and the urgent need for statutory protection. We would further ask the Committee to bear with us when we state how impossible it is for Anglo-Indian lads, reared in Western standards of living, to accept appointments, as is being offered to us to-day, of Railway Engine cleaners at a pittance of Rs.10/- per mensem or 5d. per day.

The figures quoted in the appended statistics have been obtained from Government of India's Reports of the Railway Board on Indian Railways and may, therefore, be accepted, in the main, as authentic. They clearly prove our statement which forms the basis of our submission and the reason for our demand for Statutory protection, because, we feel, as was stated in Paragraph 346 of the Montagu-Chelmsford Report, that, as a minority community, we are not strong enough, unaided by some protective measure, to withstand the effect of changes which omit to take into account our peculiar situation, and "that Government must acknowledge and must be given effective power to discharge the obligation to see that our interests are not prejudicially affected."

In Statement A, it will be found that, within two years 1929-30 when there were 14,453 Anglo-Indian employees and the year 1931-32 when there were 13,365 Anglo-Indians employed, the community was deprived of 1,088 appointments, that is to say, nearly 14 per cent. The seriousness of this will be realised when we state that these employees with their wives, families and dependants, a total of about 6,000 persons, are to-day, unemployed and homeless. In this connection, we would further like to emphasise the fact that of these remaining 13,365 employees nearly 50 per cent. are senior men, i.e., between the ages of 40 and 55, who will be superannuated within the next 10 to 15 years. This, together with the undeniable fact that few Anglo-Indians are, to-day, being recruited into the Railways means that, within the next 20 years there will be very few Anglo-Indians employed on Railways and we tremble to think what will be the fate of the community with such an enormous addition to the ranks of its already large army of unemployed.

A reference to Statement B, which shows the numbers of Subordinates whose salaries rise to Rs.250/- per mensem and over, will reveal that during the quinquennium 1925-26 to 1929-30, out of a total of 1,003 new appointments, only 77 or 7.4 per cent. of the whole were given to Anglo-Indians, as against 658 or 63.7 per cent. to Hindus, 102 or 9.9 per cent. to Muslims, 314 or 30.4 per cent. to "Other Classes," and a reduction of 11.4 per cent. to Europeans. It will also expose the still more significant fact that, during the years 1930-31 to 1931-32, the position of Hindus, Muslims and "Other Classes" was more than 30 per cent. better than obtained in 1925-26, whereas, that of Europeans and Anglo-Indians (in spite of the latter being Statutory Indians) became much worse. This clearly indicates, in our opinion, that every new appointment created to-day, is given to an Indian and that it is taken away from either the European or the Anglo-Indian—Indeed it must be so.

Statement C refers to the effect recent retrenchments have had on Anglo-Indians employed on the Railways and reveals the fact that, when it is a question of giving new appointments, the Anglo-Indians' share was only 7.6 per cent. and that during this short period of two years, the Anglo-Indian community has been forced to bear nearly 40 per cent. of the number of upper subordinate appointments retrenched, indeed the total number of Europeans and Anglo-Indians retrenched is 410 out of 655, i.e., about 60 per cent. of the total retrenched.

In Statement D (I) will be found a reference to the position of the community in the ranks of Gazetted Railway Officers and shows that, within the period of 1925-26 to 1929-30, the number of Anglo-Indian Officers was reduced from 182 in 1927 to 154 in 1930. The significance of this decrease is accentuated when it is noticed that it synchronises with an increase of (40, 5 and 16), 61 appointments among other communities, and we would add that this has taken place during a period in which the total number of Railway officers of all grades, owing to retrenchments, was reduced from 2,196 to 2,134.

Statement D (II) which also refers to Gazetted Officers, relates to a period between the years 1927-28 and 1931-32 and shows a further drop of Anglo-Indians in the official grades from 154 in 1929-30 to 130 in 1931-32, a fall of 15.6 per cent. During this quinquennium it will also be seen the highest percentage of retrenchments, viz., 28.5 per cent. was among officers of the Anglo-Indian community. In contrasting these figures with the position of other communities (except Europeans) it will be found that they have not only not been affected by this retrenchment, but have been given increased employment, particularly in the major communities.

Protection Claimed.—We submit that in consideration of the services rendered to the Railways and the oft-repeated assurances given to the Community by the Government of India and various Secretaries of State for India, on behalf of the British Parliament and the disastrous effect Indianisation has had on the Community, we are entitled to claim statutory protection as a well-earned and just reward, and, equally with the demands made by other Services, we have every reason to view our employment on Railways as our just due, the protection of which we submit is an honourable obligation on the part of the British Parliament. Furthermore, in view of the fact that our total number of employed is only 16,500, as compared with about 800,000 Indians, we fervently hope that our Indian brothers of the British Indian Delegation will not deny us our claim.

We also wish to state that the Community is prepared to serve the future Indian Railways as honestly, as diligently, as loyally and as efficiently, as they have served in the past.

Claim.—We, therefore, claim that a clause be incorporated in the New Constitution Act to the effect that the present number of Anglo-Indians and Domiciled Europeans, both lower and upper subordinates and officials, be not reduced for a further period of at least 30 years from the day the Act is put into operation, and, after that period, provision be made that an adequate number of Anglo-Indians and Domiciled Europeans be annually recruited into the Railways.

STATEMENT A.

The Statistics are obtained from the Reports of the Railway Board on Indian Railways.
NUMERICAL STATEMENT OF ALL CLASSES AND GRADES OF EMPLOYEES ON CLASS I RAILWAYS

1930-31 ...	4,635	14,058	524,620	168,285	35,181	746,779

Note I.—The reduction of Anglo-Indians was heavier (pro rata) in appointments carrying salaries rising to 250 p.m. and over than in lower ratings. The object of the majority communities is to secure the upper appointments in the Non-Gazetted Services as well as in the Gazetted Services.

Note II.—It will also be observed that, notwithstanding the circular issued by the Railway Board No. 2395-E. dated 23/5/29, regarding its policy of employment of Anglo-Indians on the Railways, a comparison between the total of Anglo-Indians employed in 1929/30, i.e., 14,453 and in 1931-32, i.e., a total of 13,365, shows a decrease of 1,088 approximately and we would add that at least 50 per cent. of these remaining employees are between the ages of 40 and 53, who will be superannuated within the next 10 to 15 years, thus decreasing the total employment by this amount.

This total of 1,088, together with their wives and families would come to about 5,500 Anglo-Indians who are, to-day, unemployed and without a home, and surely this is not in accordance with the Railway Board's circular and which was the outcome of the 1925 Deputation to the Secretary of State, in which it says "no step should be taken which would produce a sudden and violent dislocation in the economic life of the Anglo-Indian community"; nor does it comply with the orders from the Secretary of State, that a reduction in our employment should be brought about "gradually and slowly."

Note II.—During the quinquennium 1925–26 to 1929–30, out of a total of 1,003 new appointments, only 77 or 7·4 per cent. of the whole were given to Anglo-Indians as against 658 or 63·7 per cent. to Hindus, 102 or 9·9 per cent. to Muslims, 314 or 30·4 per cent. to other classes and a reduction of 11·4 per cent. to Europeans.

Note III.—It will be seen from Columns 5, 6, 7 and 8, that even after the phenomenal reduction of subordinates of the European and Anglo-Indian classes during the two years ending 31st March, 1932, the position of Hindus, Muslims and other classes was more than 30 per cent. better than it was in 1925–26, whereas that of Europeans and Anglo-Indians (in spite of the latter being Statutory Indians) became much worse. The present policy is clearly set out to improve the position of the major communities at the expense of the Anglo-Indians, a policy which, if continued, will gradually eliminate the community from Railway employment.

STATEMENT C.

RETRENCHMENT between the years 1929–30 to 1931–32.

Whereas the community has been given only 77 appointments, out of a total of 1,003, created between the years 1925–26 to 1929–30, i.e., 7·6 per cent., it will be noted that during the two years of retrenchment, i.e., 1930–31 and 1931–32, the community was deprived of 257 appointments out of a total of 655 appointments retrenched, from all communities which works out as follows :—

	Number reduced between 1929–30 and 1931–32.	Percentage on actual reduction during 1929–30 to 1931–32.
Europeans	— 153	— 23·3%
Hindus	— 171	— 26·1%
Muslims	— 14	— 2·1%
Other classes	— 60	— 9·2%
Anglo-Indians	— 257	— 39·3%

This shows when it is a question of giving new appointments, the Anglo-Indians' share was only 7·6 per cent. for a period of five years, but during a period of two years of retrenchment the community has been forced to bear nearly 40 per cent. of the total number of upper subordinate appointments retrenched, indeed the total number of Europeans and Anglo-Indians retrenched during this period is 410 out of 655, i.e., about 65 per cent.

Note I.—The number of Anglo-Indians in the official grade which stood at the maximum figure of 182 in 1927–28 (during the quinquennium 1925–26 to 1929–30) fell to 154 in 1930, the last year of the quinquennium which was a period of great prosperity.

Note II.—It will be seen that a fall of 95 and 28 appointments in the European and Anglo-Indian communities respectively, synchronised with a rise of (40, 5 and 16) 61 appointments among other communities, and this took place during a period in which the total number of officers of all grades, owing to retrenchment, was reduced from 2,196 to 2,134.

Note.—There was a further drop of Anglo-Indians in the official grade from 154 in 1929–30 to 130 in 1931–32, a fall of 28·5 per cent. in the quinquennium ending 31st March, 1932.

The two years ending March, 1932, were characterised by heavy retrenchments of officials. The above statement, however, shows that the highest percentage of retrenchments, viz., 28·5 per cent. was among officers of the Anglo-Indian community. Conversely, the position of all other communities, except the European, was not only not affected by the retrenchment, but shows an increase.

L.—INDIAN TELEGRAPH DEPARTMENT.

The Indian Telegraph Department is yet another instance of a Service in which the Anglo-Indian and Domiciled European Community has, in the rôle of pioneer workers, performed the spade work. In the early days of this Service, it faced the dangers of isolated existence spent in the jungles, exposed to various diseases and after continuous labour and energy, developed it, step by step, to such a condition of utility and perfection, that, with the improved status and enhanced salary it now commands for its employees, it began to attract Indians to its ranks, and with the rapid progress of Indianisation that is taking place, it seems certain that, within a very short time, the Anglo-Indian will be displaced in this Service also.

History.—It is an irrefutable fact that the foundations of the Indian Telegraph Department were laid and the traditions built up almost exclusively by Anglo-Indians and Domiciled Europeans. On the mountain tops of Kashmir at Minimarg, over 14,000 feet above the sea-level, on the plateaux of Tibet and Sikkim, over the rocky passes of the Hindu Kush and Sulaiman ranges, across the precipitous valleys of the Himalayas and other mountain ranges of India, on the frontiers of Baluchistan, Afghanistan, Tibet, China and Siam, through the forests of India, on the desert sands of Seistan, Sind and Rajputana, at the frontier outposts of Parachinar, Razmak and Chaman, by river course and mountain torrent, in the malaria stricken and reptile infested jungles of the Terai and Chittagong Hill Tracts, across the mangrove swamps of the Arakan coast in Burma and the bamboo jungles of the Yoma mountains (where airmen were lost and could not be found), on the crest of the hill and in the trough of the valley, on the beds of rivers and the bottom of the sea—everywhere, the telegraph and telephone lines and cables have been laid in the past and are still being laid by members of the Community. Spreading out from a few miles of wire carrying a few telegrams in the service of the State in 1854–55, this huge network of wires now aggregates considerably over half a million miles and carries telegrams across distances frequently exceeding 2,000 miles, which involve more than 83 million operations per annum. It was under such conditions that the work of construction and maintenance has proceeded day in and day out, accounting for many valuable Anglo-Indian lives during the past eighty years, until the diffusion of the lines of communication is so wide and so complete that, to-day, scarcely a hamlet exists in British India which is more than a few miles away from a Telegraph Office of some kind. This huge diffusion of lines over the vastness of the sub-continent of India, which is one of the miracles of the modern world, has been effected, we are proud to say, almost entirely under the supervision of Anglo-Indian Engineering Supervisors and Deputy Assistant Engineers of the Posts and Telegraphs Department, who form the backbone of the outdoor service of Engineers and are the real builders of the Telegraph and Telephone systems. These pioneer workers and their successors in this Branch of the Service, have, by unstinted application, untiring effort and devotion to duty, built up within the community, an aptitude and fitness for outdoor telegraph engineering work which has been carried from generation to generation during the past almost 100 years. Very many of these pioneer workers, sons of Britishers mainly of the British Army domiciled in India, were recruited from the military schools at Mount Abu, Sanawar and Ootacamund and have transmitted the best traditions of the Service to their descendants who are to be seen, to-day, employed in the third and fourth generations. We have but to take our memories back to the 1857 Mutiny to appreciate the great part played by the Department. Had it not been for the Indian Telegraph Department, it is quite likely that the history of India would have been a very different one. Apart from the services rendered to the Government by this Department as a whole, the annals of the Indian Mutiny afford ample evidence of the heroic conduct of many Anglo-Indians and Domiciled European Telegraphists, among whom the name of Brendish stands immortalised. It was in memory of his brave deed that the late Lord Curzon, when Viceroy of India, unveiled a monument in the Imperial City of Delhi which will live for ever as a lasting tribute to a hero who, despite the massacre of his comrades while on duty, displayed the greatest presence of mind and courage by standing at his post and, after many fruitless efforts, succeeded in sending that memorable message across the telegraph wires to Umballa, which not only arrested the advance of the Mutineers, but enabled the British troops to take prompt and effective action and so saved the whole of the Punjab for England, or, as Sir Robert Montgomery put it, "the Electric Telegraphs saved India." These words were repeated by Lord Curzon at the unveiling ceremony of the Brendish memorial. This alone, we respectfully submit, should entitle the Community to adequate protection to-day. Again, it was Scott, another Anglo-Indian, who was carried away to death by an avalanche while restoring communications in the mountains of Kashmir and it was Stow, another brilliant Anglo-India Engineer and Officer, who died on duty of heart failure, while climbing the Garo hills in Assam. O'Brian was killed by rebels when he attempted to restore communications in Manipur. We could recite many similar heroic deeds. The names of these heroes are enshrined in our memories and their deeds redound to the credit of the Community. The glories of these men are entombed in the history of British India for nearly a century and their descendants and successors in office are, to-day, rendering equally good service.

From the Mutiny to the recent Great War and even to-day the Indian Telegraph Department has played a great part in all campaigns in India and not only has it responded to the stress of its daily life, performed at times under harassing and harrowing climatic conditions, but its Anglo-Indian members have freely volunteered for active service, very many of whom were mentioned in despatches and received honours. Moreover, the Anglo-Indian and Domiciled European members of this Department supplied a large contingent to the old Volunteer Force and the Indian Defence Force, and to-day, as members of the Indian Auxiliary Force, form a defence protecting, in times of need, the Telegraph office and their lines of communication. It is well known that Anglo-Indians and Domiciled Europeans of the Telegraph Department, were almost exclusively employed in the various Frontier outposts in the various Frontier Expeditions, notably the Chen Lushi and Chen Hills expeditions, the Burma War of 1886 and were specially requisitioned for service during the Punjab and Frontier revolt of 1919.

Effects of Indianisation.—Till 1878, the Telegraphist Branch of this Department was entirely manned by Anglo-Indians and Domiciled Europeans, and, although, in subsequent years, Indians were gradually recruited into it, the Government of India found it necessary, as recently as 1902-3, to make a definite pronouncement that the number of Anglo-Indians and Domiciled Europeans in certain sections of the Department, should not fall below 66 $\frac{2}{3}$ per cent. This percentage was steadily maintained until about 1916, after which and, notwithstanding the orders of the Government of India, more Indians entered and the percentage of Anglo-Indians correspondingly dropped to about 50 per cent. in 1920. It was mainly during this period 1916-20, on forcible representations being made, that Government realising its obligation to the Community, raised their salaries, status and prospects. It was in this much improved condition that the Reforms began to operate in the Department, but since the year 1920, notwithstanding the promises of protection which have been given, the percentage of Anglo-Indians has steadily decreased until, to-day, it has fallen to less than 40 per cent. in certain sections of the Department in which it was formerly employed. We are, therefore, naturally apprehensive that the present advance in Reforms will still further reduce, indeed exclude us altogether from this employment unless adequate and statutory protection is given.

We submit there never has been any reason why our members who are employed in such small numbers in the Posts and Telegraphs Department, should not be privileged to continue in the Telegraph Department for which they are particularly suited. It is, however, significant to note that the process of Indianisation of the Engineering branch has been so rapid that out of 45 Engineering Supervisors recruited for the Telegraph and Telephone systems during the two years ending March, 1932, only four appointments were allotted to Anglo-Indians. We have grave apprehensions that the continuance of this policy will soon shut out the Anglo-Indian from a Service that he and his ancestors have built up, and we plead that instructions be issued that adequate provision be made in the recruitment rules for a suitable number of the available appointments to be made to the Community until they are able to open out for themselves a wider range of employment.

In other Branches of the Service (Commercial)—Telegraph Offices—there has been a rapid diminution in recruitment of suitable Anglo-Indian and Domiciled European candidates from the best schools and a great increase of appointments of Indians in what is known as the "Station Service" which is particularly suitable for them, as they are not liable to transfer from their own Station. Indeed, the recent Retrenchment Committee on Posts and Telegraphs recommended the abolition of the "General Service" of Telegraphists in which a large number of the Community were employed, to be substituted by the "Station Service," in which a large number of Indians are employed. This recommendation, which we understand the Government of India has accepted, will have a disastrous effect on the economic future of the community, for it must be remembered that, as Telegraphists in the "General Service," the Anglo-Indian members have always gladly served in any part of India and Burma, which has meant that they have never been able to make settled homes, on account of the exigencies of their service and, in consequence, many of their children have suffered from education disabilities due to the change of residence from Province to Province, indeed the Anglo-Indian Telegraphists may rightly be called, the gipsy community of the Indian Services.

Statistics.—In support of our statement, we desire to quote figures of Anglo-Indian and Indian employees from the largest Presidency Telegraph Office in India—Calcutta.

1913-1918.
Anglo-Indians	..	.	329
Indians	99
1918-1923.
Anglo-Indians	252
			(decrease 77)
Indians	178
			(increase 75)
1923-1928.
Anglo-Indians	166
			(decrease 86)
Indians	242

These figures, which cover a period up to 1928, show a decrease of about 50 per cent. within a short space of 15 years, and may be taken as applicable to the Department in general. It is true that, to-day, the Community enjoys a fair share in certain sections of the superior appointments reserved for subordinates of the Service, as also the superior traffic service appointments and in the upper subordinate grades. But this is not only departmentally justifiable, but naturally right, as being the just reward to subordinates who, after long and continuous years of service, by sheer merit and ability, have advanced step by step to some of the higher posts. But the distressing feature of these appointments is the fact that most of the incumbents are between the years of 40 and 55, who, within the next 10 to 15 years, will be superannuated and will have entirely disappeared from the Service. This together with the small number of Anglo-Indians recruited to-day, gives rise to grave apprehension of our future in our promotion to these appointments, because in the lower subordinate grades, i.e., "Telegraphists," there is a steady increase in the appointment of Indians, a class of employee who, in time, will occupy the upper superior posts. The competitive examination now in force for entrance into the Department of Telegraphists, while it has opened the door wide to Indians, has considerably narrowed it to Anglo-Indians. We would also like to state that, as a result of a reduction of 25 per cent. of Home recruitment in the superior Telegraph Service, these appointments are, to-day, being recruited by open competition in India, for which a University Degree is demanded, which still further narrows the door of entrance to such appointments to members of the Community. The late Lord Birkenhead, Secretary of State for India, when he received the Anglo-Indian Deputation in 1925, acknowledged the great services rendered by the Community to the Empire in the Telegraph Department; indeed, one of the ablest Director-Generals of this Department, Sir Geoffrey Clark, I.C.S., frequently stated in public that, but for the Anglo-Indian and Domiciled European Community, the Telegraph Department could not have been administered as efficiently as it was during his Directorship. We have no desire, indeed we would not refute the right of other Indian communities to enter and be given appointments in the Telegraph Department, but we feel we have a strong claim on the Government to protect the positions of Anglo-Indians in this Service, for it is our prerogative as "Statutory Natives of India" (if this term has any practical meaning at all) to share in the full benefits of Indianisation and an adequate percentage of appointments in this Department in which we have, for generations, shown particular aptitude and ability and with which our economic interests are so intimately welded. The displacement of our employment as being witnessed to-day, as we hope to show in the attached statistics, is bound to react on and seriously disturb the domestic economy of a large section of the Community, because it must be remembered that there are to-day about 2,500 Anglo-Indian and Domiciled European employees in this Department, who, with their wives, children and dependents, constitute a total of about 15,000 members of the Community employed in or dependent on the Posts and Telegraphs Departments.

Out of a total of about 130,500 employees in the Posts and Telegraphs, about 2,500 only, or less than 2 per cent. are Anglo-Indians and Domiciled Europeans. With such a small percentage of employment in this Department, we submit there should be no difficulty to provide for the majority communities and others, without effecting any reduction in our numbers in these Branches and unless some adequate provision is made to protect us—the builders and maintainers of one of the most efficient systems of communication in the world—we will soon be dispossessed of what we rightly hold to-day.

Note.—Statistics classified by communities prior to 1928-29 and subsequent to 1931-32 are not available. The following figures in Statements B and C show recruitment by Communities during the 4 years ending 31st March, 1932, and clearly illustrate how rapidly Anglo-Indians and Domiciled Europeans are being displaced. These figures show a reduction of 13·6 per cent. in the number of Anglo-Indians and Domiciled Europeans within the 3 years ending 31/3/32, but we are convinced that when the figures of 1932-33 are available, they will show a reduction within 4 years of more than 20 per cent.

STATEMENT SHOWING RECRUITMENT BY COMMUNITIES DURING THE FOUR YEARS ENDING 31ST MARCH, 1932.

Note.—These figures show that, during the years 1923-29 to 1931-32, only 293 or 4·7 per cent. out of a total of 6,236 appointments were allotted to Anglo-Indians and Domiciled Europeans, but it further shows the startling fact that, within the two years 1930-32, only 79 or 3·2 per cent. of a total of 2,135 appointments were given to Anglo-Indians and Domiciled Europeans. There has been no recruitment during 1932-33 and no statistics are available for this period, but a considerable amount of retrenchment has been effected which we feel sure has operated chiefly against members of the Anglo-Indian and Domiciled Community in these Non-Gazetted ranks of the Department.

From the foregoing statistics it will be seen that in 1928-29, there were 2,700 Anglo-Indians and Domiciled Europeans or 6·5 per cent. of the total of Non-Gazetted employees in the Posts and Telegraphs (excluding Line, Delivery and Menials). Small as this percentage was, it has been reduced by 368, that is by 13·6 per cent. of its numbers within a short period of three years. This rapid decimation in the service of the Community will mean, in a few years, their complete elimination. There has been no recruitment during the past two years and when the result of the retrenchments effected in 1932-33 are published, it will be found that nearly 10 per cent. more of Anglo-Indians and Domiciled Europeans have been eliminated, bringing the total almost to about 70 per cent. of what they were in 1928-29.

We respectfully submit that in no Service can any Community stand a reduction of over 20 per cent. of its numbers within a short period of four years, without suffering great economic loss and without feeling a serious set-back in its social and domestic standards and still less can the Anglo-Indian and Domiciled Community, whose entire economic life, by tradition and necessity has been, hitherto, intimately connected with this Service, stand such a great strain. We submit that this process of rapid reduction is not in keeping with the honourable promise given to us by the Government of India, in its reply to the 1925 Deputation to the Secretary of State, vide Home Department letter F. 164-28 Establishments, dated 11th September, 1928, wherein it is stated that the Government “see no reason to anticipate that the number of Anglo-Indian recruits will decrease to any marked extent in the near future providing that their calibre is maintained and they believe that, in any event such reduction will be gradual.”

The calibre of the Anglo-Indian Community has not only been maintained but has considerably improved. The majority of our men who are offering themselves to-day for service in the “Telegraphists” ranks of the Telegraph Department are of the Matriculation or Senior Cambridge educational standards. It is, nevertheless, significant that in spite of these facts and in response to the demands and political pressure from other more powerful Indian communities, recruitment in this Department from the best European Public Schools in India, as formerly obtained, and from which the best class of boys were drawn, has been recently discontinued to the consternation of the Community. We are disappointed to find that the promises given by the Government of India have not been fulfilled and we apprehend that the position will be worse in the future if adequate provision is not made to prevent a marked reduction in the number of the Community employed in this Department; for we submit, that, unless such protection is given, it will result in a large number of our Community sliding down to a lower social status, driving them to the ranks, not only of the unemployed, but of the Depressed Classes.

10² November, 1933.]

Claim.—We, therefore, claim that we be given statutory protection in this Department and that the number of appointments we hold to-day be not reduced for at least another thirty years and that, subsequent to this period, adequate protection should be made for a sufficient number of Anglo-Indians to be annually recruited into the Telegraphist Branch of this Service, and in this connection we would suggest that at least fifty Anglo-Indians be recruited every year into this Branch.

We make this demand in the full confidence that the Joint Parliamentary Committee will grant us this protection in return for the unparalleled services which the Community has rendered to this Department from the pre-Mutiny and Mutiny periods to the present day and for the special aptitude it has shown and which we claim has become more or less hereditary in character.

Note.—I have just received a cable from the Anglo-Indian and Domiciled European Association in India, which reads as follows —

“On grounds of economy the Varma Committee recommend replacement of portion of Telegraph Masters and Telegraphists by cheap clerical and postal staff, which means the removal of forty per cent. Anglo-Indians as inevitable and so causing ruination to six hundred families stop. The implications involve a rapid extinction of Anglo-Indians from this Department stop. Telegraph Department of Britain has never been a revenue earning department, as Parliament has always voted its deficit for fifty years, therefore, why expect differently from India.”

and I take the liberty of making the following personal additional observations.

In 1932, the Retrenchment Committee on the Posts and Telegraphs Department (to which I was denied co-option), submitted a report which has, in the main, been accepted by the Government of India. This report seriously affected the position of the Community employed in the Indian Telegraph Department, especially the Telegraph Master and Deputy Superintendent classes. Later on, the Government of India appointed another Committee, called the “Varma Committee” which has since submitted its report and it is on the findings of this Committee that this cable is based. Bad as is the present position of the community in the Indian Telegraph Department, the recommendation of the “Varma” Report, if accepted, will make things much worse, for it indicates an additional reduction of 40 per cent. of Anglo-Indians and Domiciled Europeans employed in the Service. This means that economic ruin and starvation will face nearly 600 Anglo-Indian and Domiciled European families (a total of about 2,500 of the community) which will render our position in the Department much worse, indeed, it practically means a shattering of our economic position in the Telegraph Department. It, therefore, follows, that this reduction of 40 per cent. of our employment in the Indian Telegraph Department, should be added to the already disastrous effect that Indianisation has already had on the Community, because very few, if any, Anglo-Indians and Domiciled Europeans are, to-day, to be found in the lower clerical and Postal Staffs, which means that Anglo-Indian Telegraphists will be replaced by Indians under the cloak of economy and Indianisation of the Service.

In this connection, I would draw attention to the Chapter in this Memorandum on the Postal Service to show how few Anglo-Indians are employed in it.

I beg to offer my emphatic protest against such treatment and would respectfully ask the Joint Parliamentary Committee to read the chapter on the Telegraph Department in conjunction with this, my personal note.

M.—POSTAL SERVICE.

Indianisation has practically shut out the Community from the upper and lower subordinate grades of this service (excluding Telegraphs), in both of which, at one time, it held many appointments. This exclusion has been the development of many years. A reference to the statistics given, which refer to 1928, will support this statement and we are convinced that the position is much worse to-day. We have, hitherto, made no complaint against the lower subordinate appointments, especially in the moffussil, because, the standard of living and habits of Anglo-Indians and Domiciled Europeans are such, as to preclude them from living in Indian villages, but even these hardships we are prepared to undergo, faced as we are to-day with the ghastly spectre of unemployment, with its attendant misery and suffering.

10° Novembris, 1933.]

We admit we have, to-day, a fair number of appointments in the higher paid upper subordinates and subordinates promoted to the official grades, but these are very senior men, who, years ago, started as subordinates and are, to-day, reaping the benefits of their earlier labours, but we would add that most of them are nearing the age of superannuation and will soon disappear from these appointments.

We append statistics for the Provinces of Bengal and Assam, which show that in 1928, in the lower grade of Postmasters carrying salaries from Rs.160/- to Rs.250/- per mensem, the effects of Indianisation are very pronounced, for there are 123 Indians and only 5 Anglo-Indians. Again, in the grade of Inspectors of Post Offices, on Rs.160/- to Rs.250/- per mensem, all the appointments, 89 in number, are held by Indians and none by Anglo-Indians and Domiciled Europeans. As regards the moffussil appointments, there are 1,851 Indians employed but not a single Anglo-Indian. Items 3 and 4 of the statistics given add further testimony to the fact that the Community is all but excluded from these grades, there being 1,186 Indians employed as against 10 Anglo-Indians. It seems that in this Service there is no room for further Indianisation, as a certain section of Indians interpret this term. These figures show that in 1928 out of a total of 3,264 such appointments in one Postal Circle (Bengal and Assam) 3,249 are held by Indians, and only 15 by Anglo-Indians and Domiciled Europeans, i.e. about 0.5 per cent., a condition which we believe obtains in other Provinces.

N.—CUSTOMS.

The present insecure position of Anglo-Indians and Domiciled Europeans in the Customs Department in India, is a source of grave anxiety to us. Broadly speaking, this Service is divided into three main Departments:—the Preventive Branch, Appraisers Branch and the Clerical or Ministerial Branch.

(a) Preventive Department.—The Preventive Branch of the Service in Calcutta (of which station alone accurate data is available), since its inception in 1852, till the introduction of the Reforms in 1920, was entirely staffed by the Anglo-Indian and Domiciled European Community. To-day, after a decade of the operation of the Montagu-Chelmsford Reforms, the Community has been deprived of 25 per cent. of its strength and, if recent figures are taken since the present retrenchment policy has operated, it would be found that this percentage has been augmented, and we have every reason to state that the same condition obtains in the other great ports of India, namely, Bombay,

Karachi, Madras, Rangoon and Chittagong. At this rate, within a few years, the pressure of Indianisation will have squeezed the Community entirely out of the Preventive Department. The exclusive employment of Anglo-Indians in the Preventive Branch in pre-Reform days was undoubtedly due to their peculiar suitability for the work, and to their honesty and reliability. Apart from the responsibility of preventing contraband articles from entering or leaving the country, there was the very important duty of preventing the smuggling of arms and ammunition into India, and the realisation of the Community's inherent loyalty to the Government was indisputably the factor which influenced the Government to staff this important Branch of the Service entirely with members of the Domiciled community. For nearly a century these conditions prevailed. What the loyalty and devoted work of the community during this long period has meant to Government and to India, not only on account of the enormous revenue the negligible economic importance to Indians, whereas it means the uplift and salvation of a large number of the Community.

(b) Appraisers Department.—The above remarks apply mutatis mutandis to this Branch of the Service. Till 1909, Europeans and Anglo-Indians entirely staffed this Department, but since the Reforms of 1920, the progress of Indianisation has been so accelerated that, between the years 1920 and 1927, employment of the Community in this Department has been reduced by nearly 60 per cent. We submit, that if Indianisation of this Department proceeds at this rate, within 20 years, Europeans and Anglo-Indians will be entirely supplanted by Indians.

(1) The abnormal number of appointments held by Indians in outdoor and indoor Ministerial service, and for which the Anglo-Indian does not compete and in which he is employed in infinitesimal numbers.

(2) The absence of Anglo-Indians in the superior branches of the Service which have been largely Indianised, and

(3) Legitimate reward for the efficient building up and maintenance of the Preventive and Appraisers' Branches of the Service, extending to almost a century.

We append below figures which show the position the Community occupied in this Department in the year 1928, but we have no hesitation in stating that the percentage of Anglo-Indians and Domiciled Europeans employed in these two Services to-day, owing to the acceleration of Indianisation, as also the retrenchment policy recently adopted, has markedly reduced our numbers and the most serious aspect of our present day position is that at least 50 per cent. of the Community employed to-day in this Service are between the ages of 40 and 55. This means that, in addition to a considerable reduction in recruitment of new entrants and which will have its reaction within a few years this 50 per cent. of senior men, who will be superannuated within 10 to 15 years, will still further reduce our present percentage to about 25 per cent. of the Service.

Our demand therefore is, that our present number employed in these two Departments of the Customs (Preventive and Appraisers) be not reduced to less than 50 per cent. for the next 30 years.

O.—THE ARMY.

Our allegiance and our loyalty to all that is British has been our creed ever, and certainly needs no reaffirmation on our part, but now that Government has stressed the Parliamentary Statute, calling us "Statutory Natives of India" for occupational purposes, we are confronted with the problem of our future position in the military organisation and defence of India and cannot allow the fact to be overlooked that, while for defence of Empire purposes, i.e. in the Auxiliary Force, we are classed as "European British subjects," we are to-day refused admission into the ranks of the Indian army except as Indians and although our standard of living is higher, we are asked to accept an Indian Sepoy's wages.

The bulk of the old Volunteer Force from which, during the Great War, evolved the Indian Defence Force and which, in its turn, became the present Auxiliary Force, was and is still to-day, mainly composed of Anglo-Indians and Domiciled Europeans. This Force, which is an effective second line of defence, auxiliary to the standing British Army, means an annual saving to-day of a considerable sum of money to the Indian Exchequer. We have already detailed our past Military services to the Empire, but, as a further instance of our fitness for military service, we would refer to the record of the Indian Medical Department, an integral part of the British Army in India and a Department exclusively reserved for members of the Domiciled community, but who, though gazetted along with other British Departmental Officers and Warrant Officers are, on account of their birth and domicile in India, treated as inferior to the other Ancillary Branches of the Army, recruited from the rank and file of the British Army.

It was only during the War, however, and when England had need of more men and women, that all ranks of the British Army and its Ancillary Branches, such as the Indian Army Service Corps, the Indian Ordnance Corps, and the Military Nursing Service for Women, etc., were thrown open to us and we were freely enlisted and treated on terms of equality with the British officer and soldier. When peace was declared the doors were closed again, and to-day, we find ourselves in precisely the same position, as far as the Army is concerned, as we occupied in 1830 when Mr. Ricketts, the Anglo-Indian Representative, submitted his petition to the Houses of Parliament on behalf of the Community. As in 1830 so in 1933—a period of over 100 years—all avenues of employment in the British Army except during crises, are closed to us, unless we deny our birthright. Except for the very few Anglo-Indians who have entered Sandhurst in England and later in India, by open competition with Indians, it is to-day, denied the privilege and honour, as loyal citizens of the Empire, of serving as regular soldiers in the Army, except on Indian wages; even then we are told that the enlistment of Anglo-Indians into the rank and file of the Indian Army, which is more or less a Caste Army, would disturb its caste homogeneity.

Many representations have been made in vain to Government and the Indian Army authorities for the community to be allowed to form an Anglo-Indian Regiment or Battery, or to enter the various Ancillary Branches. After frequent representations in the Legislative Assembly, the Army Department in India in 1930, submitted a scheme to the Secretary of State for India for the formation, on a small scale, of an Anglo-Indian Signal Company. It received his sanction and was on the point of being gazetted when the recent Military Retrenchment Committee in India recommended its abolition and we were again denied this small chance to share in the defence of the country.

We are also told that if such a Unit were formed it would not attract a good class of the community. This might have been true a decade ago, when unemployment was almost unknown in our ranks, but it does not obtain to-day, because, with all our former avenues of employment being closed to us and Government powerless to help us in this direction, there are hundreds of our fine manly lads, well developed and loyal, annually leaving our Public Schools in quest of employment, who would gladly accept Military Service and we are sure would, as in the past, prove themselves as good soldiers as are to be found in any parts of the British Empire. We ask, is this a fair and a just reward to a community possessing such fine military traditions and loyalty. Surely, it is not the intention of the Government to render our economic position worse and drive us into a Depressed Class, by refusing such excellent material an honourable place in the defence of its own country, while other communities, some with no military records or traditions, are being given every opportunity to join the Indian Army.

We feel we can confidently appeal to the Joint Parliamentary Committee to remedy this gross injustice. We have never failed India or England and all we ask is to be given a chance to prove our worth in the future, as we have abundantly done in the past.

We desire that:—

(a) We be allowed to form an Anglo-Indian Unit, or Battery of Artillery or a Signal Corps.

(b) We be allowed to enlist in all the Ancillary Branches of the Army, such as the Indian Army Service Corps, the Indian Army Ordnance Corps, Military Works' Service, Military Nurses Service in the British Army in India, as also the R.A.M.C. (Ranks), etc., etc., which we submit would lead to great economy in the Military Estimates with no loss in efficiency.

(c) We be given a larger number of Commissions in the Auxiliary Force. In this connection we would point out that, though we form the major part of this Force, we have few Anglo-Indian and Domiciled European Officers in it. The Army authorities have definitely refused our request for more officers and placed the responsibility of making such appointments in the hands of Officers Commanding Battalions.

When we turn to the Indian Territorial Force, we see quite a different picture, for almost every officer in this Corps, except perhaps, the Commandant and the Adjutant is, or has to be an Indian, with the same status, etc., as an officer of the Indian Auxiliary Force, and yet, it must not be forgotten that the Indian Territorial Force is the second line of defence of the Indian Army and is liable for service abroad. When this demand was pressed from all sides in the Legislative Assembly and in Committee on behalf of Indian Officers, and violent attacks were made on Government in connection with the Sandhurst Committee, the Army Department did not hide behind the Officers Commanding, but readily yielded to pressure and consented to the Indian Territorial Force being officered by Indians with equal status and a larger percentage of Indians being admitted into Sandhurst. But now consider the case of the Anglo-Indians. Here you have a community whose record of Military service is undeniable and, though it supplies the bulk of the Auxiliary Force, is denied an adequate share in the officering of this Unit. We are, in a large measure, silenced into accepting this position by the pressure of conscription on the large numbers of Anglo-Indians in the Auxiliary Force (approximating to 14,000) for whom employment on the Railways is conditional on enlistment.

To-day, in response to powerful and incessant political clamour and pressure from other communities, the Government is rapidly Indianising the Indian Army and replacing British Officers by Indians. We have no complaint against this policy, but we submit that, equally with the other Indian communities, we have every right to officering a Force mainly composed of Anglo-Indian and Domiciled Europeans and whose traditions and record of service we have materially helped to build up and maintain.

This treatment is one more illustration of our peculiar difficulties, placed as we are, midway between the European and the Indian, actually of neither, with our very existence threatened in the land of our birth, for which we have given our best for almost four centuries. We therefore feel we are entitled to demand that we be given a larger number of Officers in the Indian Auxiliary Force.

P.—JURY RIGHTS.

Under the Criminal Procedure Code "Indian British Subjects," "European British Subjects" and "Americans" are given certain jury rights, but proof of legitimate descent is neither asked for nor needed from the Indian and rarely asked for from the European—his colour seems to be the deciding factor in such cases. We feel, therefore, as a bare measure of justice, the words by "legitimate descent" should either be deleted from this Section or that every member of every class which is accorded special jury privilege under the Code should, likewise, be called upon to prove that he is of legitimate descent. To demand proof of legitimacy and lineage as a passport to justice is, we submit, not only a relic of barbarism and un-British, but unknown in any other part of the British Empire, indeed the world, and we claim that this demand should be deleted from the Criminal Procedure Code.

We have no desire to question the principle underlying these provisions, for it is but right that the Indian should be tried by a jury the majority of whom are Indians and the European by a majority who are Europeans; but, it is quite possible also that an Indian may, in certain cases, prefer to be tried by a jury, the majority of whom are Europeans and vice versa; indeed, we know of no law which prevents an Indian demanding a European majority jury for, with him, legitimacy is not a sine qua non.

We wish here to state that it is not with any feelings of mistrust towards our Indian brethren that we make this claim; our only desire is to place ourselves on a level with both Indians and Europeans and to obtain equal jury rights.

We feel that if every accused were given given a choice as to whether he preferred to be tried by a jury with an Indian or a European majority, it would eliminate all racial discrimination and while it would not, in any way, prejudice the legal rights of anyone, it would, at the same time, give the Anglo-Indian and Domiciled European community the equal right of a choice of a jury, a majority of whom shall be Europeans or Indians. In order to equalise our position and place the Anglo-Indian on the same footing as other communities in India, as also to afford protection to Indians, placed in positions of difficulty, we would suggest that the words "or Europeans as he may desire" be added to clause (i) of section 275 and clause (i) of Section 284 (a) of the Criminal Procedure Code.

In these circumstances we ask that—

(i) the words by "legitimate descent" in section 4, Clause (i) Sub-clause (ii) Criminal Procedure Code be deleted.

(ii) to sections 275 clause (i) and section 284 (a) clause (i) Criminal Procedure Code, the following words be added "or Europeans as he may desire."

We are prepared to elaborate this claim when giving evidence.

Q.—CONSTITUTION.

1. Cabinets:—

It is an admitted fact that to introduce Communalism into any Constitution controlling the various Cabinets, Public Services Commissions and even the Statutory Railway Board, etc., would be contrary to the principles underlying real democracy, which is our ideal and would be the direct negation of Nationalism. But so far as India is concerned, we must face facts and the numerous anomalies that are to be found in the White Paper, and, to add one more, we submit, would not alter the position very much.

For instance, it will not be denied that in all such bodies of the Government of the New India, there will be—indeed, there must be—adequate communal representation of the major communities. We submit that, though this is necessary and inevitable, its introduction into the various Cabinets, in practice, admits communalism and, as such, we ask what representation will be given to the other Minorities, who, together, have a total population of nearly 60 millions? We submit that their interests and safeguards must not only be suitably represented, but that adequate and definite executive power should be embodied in the New Constitution Act which would enable these safeguards to be put into practical effect. The White Paper, in a measure, admits this necessity, but does not outline how it is to be given. Further we contend, that for the first decade of the operation of the New Constitution Act, the economic protection of the various minorities will form one of the most important and difficult problems, if not the most important, that will need constant enquiry and adjustment.

Holding these views, we suggest:

(a) That in all Cabinets, Federal and Provincial, as also in all Public Service Commissions, etc., there should be at least one member to represent and protect the interests of all the smaller minority communities.

10^o Novembris, 1933.]

(b) Also, we suggest that to one of the three Councillors suggested for the Governor-General, should be given the special portfolio of safeguarding the interests of all the smaller Minorities in the Federal Services.

(c) We also suggest that (a) and (b) be incorporated in the New Constitution Act.

We submit, that to make the fulfilment of these safeguards justiciable, would not meet the requirements of Minorities—we speak particularly of the Domiciled Community—for no Courts of Law could possibly protect them against any acts of injustice in the day-to-day administration of Departments, and it is in the adjustment of such matters, when they affect the Community as a whole and which (as judged by the prejudicial effect Indianisation of the Services has already had on the Anglo-Indian Domiciled European Community) we fear they will, that we seek this representation.

(d) In regard to the Public Service Commissions, we submit that paragraph 5, sub-paragraphs 1, 2 and 3, of the Services Sub-Committee Report No. viii. should be incorporated in the New Constitution Act.

2. Franchise.—Representation in the Lower Federal Chamber.

We desire that the four seats which have been allotted to the Community in this Chamber should not be rigidly confined to the four Provinces of Bengal, Bombay, Madras and the United Provinces, as adumbrated in the White Paper. We submit that this would exclude many important Provinces where large numbers of intelligent members of the Community reside, i.e., in the Central Provinces, Bihar and Orissa, Punjab, Assam, Baluchistan, Central India, and Bangalore, and other such seceded territorial areas. We, therefore, suggest that these four seats should be distributed over four distinct electoral areas, namely, North, South, East and West of India, so as to give every Province an opportunity of recording a vote and offering a candidate and, to this end, we would suggest the following:—

To Bengal should be added the Provinces of Assam and Bihar and Orissa; to the United Provinces should be added Punjab, Rajputana, N.W.F.P. and Delhi; to the Bombay Province should be added Central Provinces, Central

India, and Sind, and to the Madras Provinces should be added Bangalore and other seceded areas in South India.

3. Electorates and definition of Anglo-Indian Electors.

As an electorate we claim to be classed separately from the European British Community. We admit that the interests of the two Communities are, in many points, similar, but unlike the European our residence is permanent and we are sons of the soil and citizens of India. While in the past, by our origin, tradition, culture, education and training, we have worthily upheld British traditions and ideals which form the chief characteristics of the community and will continue to do so in the future, we claim, in clear and unequivocal language, to be one of the communities of India whose interests and aspirations are inextricably bound up with those of the rest of India.

We find that one of the chief factors which influenced the Franchise Committee of 1918-19 in advocating our representation in the Provincial Councils and the Legislative Assembly by nomination was the smallness of our population and the consequent difficulty of creating large enough constituencies. The Anglo-Indian Association drew the pointed attention of that Committee to the reasons which led to this state of affairs and laid emphasis on the need for a clear definition of the two communities—"Anglo-Indian" and "European." We give below the definitions as accepted by the 1918-19 Committee.

1. "European."

"Every person of European descent in the male line, being a British subject and resident in British India, who either was born in or has a domicile in the British Isles, Canada, Newfoundland, Australia, New Zealand or the Union of South Africa or whose father was so born or has or had, up to the date of the birth of the person seeking registration as an elector, such a domicile."

2. "Anglo-Indian."

"Every person being a British subject and resident in British India, of (a) European descent in the male line who is not comprised in the above definition, or (b) mixed Asiatic and non-Asiatic descent whose father, grandfather or more remote ancestor in the male line was born in the Continent of Europe,

10^o Novembris, 1933.]

Canada, Newfoundland, Australia, New Zealand, the Union of South Africa or the United States of America and who is not entered in the European electoral roll."

"Note.—In applying the above definitions, it is proposed that the declaration of an elector that he is a European or an Anglo-Indian shall be accepted by the Officer charged with the preparation of the electoral roll, unless he is satisfied that the declaration is not made in good faith, in which case, the officer shall record in writing his reasons for refusing to accept the declaration of the elector."

We submit that these definitions are not only most unsatisfactory, but wholly misleading, and tend to and do lower the numbers of Anglo-Indian electors and swell the European electoral rolls. In the statistics supplied to the Franchise Committee of 1918-19, and incorporated in the Committee's Report, "Europeans" are classified as "European British Subjects" and "Anglo-Indians" as "Anglo-Indians." The term "European British Subject," has evidently been borrowed from the Indian Criminal Procedure Code. It includes every person of mixed legitimate descent who is of European parentage on the paternal side, as is almost every Anglo-Indian. The use of the words "European British Subject" for electoral purposes has been injurious enough, but this has been accentuated by its effect on the Anglo-Indian Census. Every Anglo-Indian member of the Auxiliary Force is a "European British Subject" on which status alone he is enrolled in the Force. There are about 25,000 persons of mixed origin, i.e., Anglo-Indians who are members of the Auxiliary Force to-day, and every one of these can and many do enrol themselves in the European electoral roll as "European British Subjects." The perpetuation of this ambiguity will continue to give a fictitious strength to the European population and electorate to the definite loss of the Anglo-Indian population and electorate. We, therefore, submit it is essential to draw up clear-cut definitions of "Europeans" and "Anglo-Indians" and so remove the ambiguity that obtains in the definition accepted by the Franchise Committee of 1918-19. We would, therefore, suggest for the consideration and acceptance of the Joint Parliamentary Committee, the following definitions:—

"European."—Every person of pure European descent on both sides and who is not a Statutory Native of India (vide Indian Councils Act, 1870—33 Vict., Chapter 3).

"Anglo-Indian"—Every person whose father, grandfather, or other progenitor in the male line was a European and who is a Statutory Native of India. (Vide Indian Councils Act, 1870—33 Vict., Chapter 3); and further, that these two communities be classified as "Europeans" and "Anglo-Indians" instead of "European British Subjects" and "Anglo-Indians."

We feel it would not be irrelevant if we here refer to the fact that our population, as given in the Census of 1921, was inaccurate as has been admitted by the Census Commissioner in his Report. For various advantages, mainly economic and social, many Anglo-Indians elect to declare themselves Europeans, both for Census and electoral purposes. Realising this, the Anglo-Indian and Domiciled European Association offered its assistance to the Census Commissioner in the compilation of the 1931 Census returns and we are given to understand that in the 1931 Census there has been an addition of 22,000 Anglo-Indians to our 1921 Census totals. We regret to state that we cannot accept, as accurate, the census of the Community as given in the 1931 Census report, a fact which we communicated to the Lothian Committee, Government of India, and the Census Commissioner. Indeed, we feel that at least 20,000 and more of our community are included in the European Census returns. The Census Commissioner, himself, accepts the likelihood that some 10,000 Anglo-Indians have elected to return themselves as Europeans and in a speech he delivered in London stated that 175,000 would more correctly represent the total of our population in India and Burma.

Our detailed reference to this matter may appear to be a small one, but we respectfully submit it plays a most important part in the size of the Anglo-Indian electorates, because, on these figures must depend ultimately the strength of the community's representation on the various Provincial and Central Legislatures. It is for this reason that we request the Committee clearly to define a "European" and an "Anglo-Indian." We further submit that our present electorates in the various

Provinces do not by any means afford correct estimates of our voting strength and that our claim for greater representation in the Legislatures on an electoral basis should not be assessed on the present strength as given in the 1931 Census report or in the electoral rolls in the Provinces.

R—SUMMARY.

I. Nature of our Demand.—We desire to stress that, measured by their effect on the interests of the millions of India, our demands are negligible in extent and, yet, are of such consequence to our Community as to safeguard it from extinction. Because of our precarious position in India as a numerically insignificant community, surrounded by teeming millions, sections of whom, have in the past, shown a marked hostility towards us, a claim for permanent protection, perhaps, would be as warranted as it would be justified by our past loyalty and service to Government and India. Nevertheless, we have endeavoured to approach our difficulties from a broader national outlook and have merely asked for a short period of protection to correct the disabilities which Indianisation of the Services has imposed on us and so to equip ourselves to take our place on equal terms with the other communities in India, till we can stand on our own feet.

II. Status.—We accept and endorse the status that has been accorded to us of "Statutory Natives of India"; but, at the same time, we wish to be protected against the dangers of our indefinite position, which renders us liable to disinheritance on the score of being non-Indians for the purposes of Indianisation of the Services, and of being Indians for the purposes of enlistment into the Army.

III. Protection.—In view of the fact that the economic position of the Community has been very seriously and prejudicially affected by the introduction of the Reforms and the progress of and misapplication of the policy of Indianisation and, in view of the proposed advance in the Reforms to India, we urge that adequate safeguards be provided, by statutory enactment in the New Constitution Act, for a stated period in the Provincial Civil Services, Provincial Judicial Service, Government of India and Provincial Government Secretariats, Salt, Forest, Survey, Police and other such Services.

We consider, moreover, that we have an indisputable and unchallengeable claim for many years to come on the Government, whatever form of constitution it may take, with regard to the Railways, Telegraphs and Customs, in view of the fact that these Departments have been practically built up and maintained since their inception by us, and because, with the large number of our people employed in these Services, their displacement, while it would not very materially benefit the Indians, would seriously upset the whole economic organisation of the Community and relegate it to the position of a Depressed Class. We desire that adequate safeguards be provided in these Services and that it be enacted in specific terms in the New Constitution Act.

IV.—We give below some of the specific claims in relation to the principal Services, in which we are mainly employed.

(a) Railways.—We request that the present number of Anglo-Indians and Domiciled Europeans, lower and upper subordinates and officials in Railway employment, be not reduced for a period of at least 30 years from the date on which the New Constitution Act commences to operate and, after that period, provision be made that an adequate number of the Community be employed.

That this protection be specifically embodied in the New Constitution Act and that adequate executive power be given to ensure it being put into effect.

(b) Telegraphs.—We desire that the present number of Anglo-Indians and Domiciled Europeans employed in certain sections of this Department, be not reduced for at least 30 years and, subsequent to this period, at least 50 Anglo-Indians and Domiciled Europeans be annually recruited into the Telegraphist section of this Department.

That this protection be specifically embodied in the New Constitution Act and that adequate executive power be given to ensure it being put into effect.

(c) Postal Service.—That we be adequately employed in all branches of this Service.

(d) Customs.—That at least 50 per cent. of appointments be reserved for Anglo-Indians and Domiciled Europeans in the Preventive and Appraisers Sections of this Service for a period of at least 30 years and, that subsequent to this, an adequate number of Anglo-Indians and Domiciled Europeans be recruited.

10^o Novembris, 1933.]

That this protection be specifically embodied in the New Constitution Act and that adequate executive power be given to ensure it being put into effect.

As an alternative to our demands for Railways, Telegraphs and Customs, we suggest that communal employment in all Government Subordinate appointments might be estimated on communal legislative representation in the Lower Federal Chamber, to be apportioned between the three main communities: Hindus, Muslims and Europeans-cum-Anglo-Indians, as detailed on page 17, Chapter on Railways.

(e) Provincial Services.—In view of the almost entire exclusion of the Community from the Provincial Government Services, as will be amply proved by reference to official records, we demand that in future recruitment to Provincially controlled public services, our just claims to representation should be adequately met.

(f) Army.—(i) That the formation of an Anglo-Indian Unit, Battery or Signal Corps be sanctioned.

(ii) That all Ancillary Branches of the Army be thrown open to the Community.

(iii) That we be granted a larger number of commissions in the Auxiliary Force.

(iv) That the present disabilities and differential treatment under which the I.M.D. suffer, should be rectified.

(g) New Services.—The progress of scientific invention, the political, social and economic development of India and other fundamental causes of change, will inevitably extend the sphere of governmental activity and control in India in the future. This means that new services will arise which we can hardly foresee at present. We, who represent the Anglo-Indian Association, demand that in all such Services, as they are created, the gate of entry shall be open to Anglo-Indians and that, furthermore, they shall be specifically guaranteed an equitable representation by the Government authority concerned.

(h) Jury Rights.—That every European or Indian British subject should have the right to choose whether he will be tried by a European or an Indian jury and that the law be altered accordingly.

(1) Constitution.

(i) Franchise.—That a clear definition of an "Anglo-Indian" be embodied in the electoral rules as enunciated in this Memorandum.

(ii) Electorate.—That the four seats allotted to the Community in the Lower Federal Chamber be not restricted to the Community residing in the Provinces of Bombay, Bengal, Madras and United Provinces, but that to each of these Provinces be added the neighbouring Provinces, so that the electorate will embrace the entire Community in India, both British and Feudatory, and so encourage in the Community a sense of corporate and political responsibility.

(iii) Cabinets and Public Services Commissions.—That the smaller Minority communities be collectively represented by at least one member in all Cabinets and Public Service Commissions and that one of the Councillors of the Governor-General should hold the portfolio to ensure the protection and putting into effect of all Minority interests and safeguards.

S.—CONCLUSION.

Before concluding, we take this final opportunity of briefly reviewing the tragic and chequered story of our community in the fervent hope that the facts which we have detailed in this Memorandum will not be overlooked and that our claims will be acceded to when the Joint Parliamentary Committee is called upon to decide our destiny in the New Constitution Act for India.

In the days when our forefathers insecurely owned but a few acres of Indian soil, we stood by them in the hour of storm and stress. We took our place at their side when they were defending themselves behind mud walls which weakly protected their warehouses and settlements. We fought for them against Indian Chiefs and ambitious rivals. We contributed to their victories. We shared in their disasters. When European wars on the Continent claimed every available recruit for the Home forces, we augmented their depleted armies in India. We explored the markets which swelled their trade and expanded their commerce. When they entered upon the consolidation of their Empire in India, we formed the wheels, the cranks, the levers of their machinery* for government. Through our agency revenue and settlement operations, land-surveys and road-making became possible. But for us the telegraph and postal systems, river navigation and railway construction would not have been feasible. We were the first missionaries of the Christian religion, the earliest teachers in Indian schools, the pioneers of Western arts, industries, and sciences. In truth, we took a leading part in every project that tended to advance the moral, material, and intellectual prosperity of the land—our land—and its peoples.

And yet we are of those who have come out of great tribulation. We have trod the thorny path of repression. We have struggled through wrongs sufficient to crush out of existence most races. That we to-day retain the essential traits, instincts and culture of our forefathers is remarkable testimony to the virility of the British nation. If England is the land of our fathers, India is the land of our mothers. If to us England is a hallowed memory, India is a living verity. If England is the land of our pilgrimage, India is the land of our homes. If England is dear as a land of inspiring traditions, India is loved for all that she means to us in our daily life. Although perhaps we seldom realise it, we have relations in India as well as in England. Only we have lost sight of both. If we lean so heavily to our fathers' side, it is because the creeds and customs of our mothers' people so ordained it. Themselves the victims of a tyrannical caste system and religious orthodoxy, as they have in the present, so they had in the past, no option but to repudiate our consanguinity. On the other hand, the British have always claimed us as kinsfolk. We have our immediate interests vested in India, and we naturally identify ourselves with the social, economic, and political development and aspirations of our mother-country. We would live amicably and on terms of mutual trust and respect with our Indian fellow-countrymen, and we would have them reciprocate our sentiments. Sir Campbell Rhodes recently reminded the Indian Legislative Assembly that its Indian and European Members are the joint trustees of Anglo-Indians inasmuch as these are the blood-relatives of both Europeans and Indians. In truth we are England's Hostages to India, and they who give and they who receive hostages are bound to regard them as a trust. If Indians only realised this, our economic and political position would not seem to us so desperate as it now appears. If the 350 million Indians acknowledged us, a macroscopic minority of 150,000 souls, as a trust held by them as well as by the British, we would not dread, as we now do, the gift of a large instalment of Responsible Government to India. But so long as Indians identify us with the British, the question for every Briton to ask himself is—"WHEN FULL MEASURE OF SELF-GOVERNMENT IS GIVEN TO INDIA, WHAT WILL BE THE FATE OF OUR DESCENDANTS AND KINSMEN IN THAT LAND?" In the circumstance we must look to the British Parliament to safeguard our interests—our religion, our education, our admission into the public services. If India is to have Dominion Status, England must demand, and India must guarantee, that we are effectively protected as Citizens of India. We do not seek preferential treatment. We aspire to equal partnership, and for this reason we must not be called upon to sacrifice anything which our Indian fellow-countrymen retain. We cannot give up our Christian Faith, our British ideals, our Western culture. Ask the devout Hindu to exchange his ancestral caste for secular advantage. Ask the pious Musalman to abandon his holy creed for temporal gain. Ask us to sell our British heritage for a mess of political pottage. In every case the answer is instant and clear. Ours speaks in the heart of each of us. It throbs in the blood that mingles with our breath. It leaps to our lips in the soul-stirring appeal—

"O ENGLAND! WHO ARE THESE IF NOT THY SONS?"

16,111. Do you desire to make any statement at this stage, or to amplify the Memorandum?—My Lord Chairman, with your kind permission, I would rather make a short statement after I have given my evidence, if you will grant me just ten minutes before we rise today. [See Appendix D.]

10^o Novembri, 1933.]Lieut.-Colonel Sir HENRY GIDNEY,

Chairman.] If you please. Sir Henry Gidney, having had the advantage of hearing your views, and also, to some extent, of knowing your mind on these important matters as the result of hearing you examine witnesses, and finding the Memorandum, as I do, in itself a very clear statement of your views, I have no questions to put to you at this stage. With the Committee's approval I would ask Lord Lothian to open the examination of this witness, as, in his capacity as Chairman of the Franchise Committee, I know he has one or two matters which he would like to put to the witness, and I think if those were put first it might assist the Committee as a whole

Marquess of Lothian.

16,112. Sir Henry, may I, first of all, refresh my memory and possibly get some information from you for the benefit of the Committee? My recollection is that the Anglo-Indian community exercises its vote by post. Is that correct?—No, Lord Lothian. Today the representatives of the Anglo-Indian community, except in Bengal and Madras, where it has two seats and one seat respectively, are nominated members. In Bengal it is by election in the ordinary way, and in Madras it is by post.

16,113. In Madras it is by post?—Yes.

16,114. Have you formed any estimate of what proportion of your community will get on the electoral roll under the Franchise proposal for the Provinces?—It all depends on what the qualifications will be.

16,115. I am thinking of the qualifications as set forth in the White Paper?—If property or taxation or education are alternative qualifications, then a large number, indeed, all of them, will be on the electoral roll.

16,116. What proportion of your community, for instance, attains the upper primary standard?—Almost every one.

16,117. Therefore, if that is retained, it will secure the enfranchisement of a great majority of your community?—If that is in itself a qualification.

16,118. When I was in India we heard a good deal of evidence on the question which you raise here of the definition of the term "Anglo-Indian". I see that in the All-India statistics for 1931 the number of your community is given as 98,000. We were told on the Franchise Committee repeatedly in India that a large number of persons who were really Anglo-Indians registered themselves as Europeans?—That is so.

16,119. And that there was a considerable number of people lost to your community for that reason?—A large number.

16,120. You have no idea of what sort of number?—I should put it, with a fair degree of accuracy, as 30,000.

Marquess of Reading.

16,121. 30,000 in addition to the 90,000?—Yes. I think that 90,000 only relates to British India.

Marquess of Lothian.

16,122. That is correct. We were also told by one or two witnesses that one of the great difficulties of your community was that you lost so much natural leadership for that reason?—Yes.

16,123. And that your community was in a sense in this very difficult position, that it was neither wholly Indian nor wholly European, yet many of its leaders were always passing out of the Anglo-Indian community into the European community?—Lord Reading when he was kind enough once to give me an interview during his Viceroyalty, said to me, in very true words, that if more members of my community who had succeeded in life had joined me we would be a very powerful community. That was some years ago, Lord Reading.

16,124. You propose an alteration of the definition of "European" and "Anglo-Indian"?—Yes.

16,125. You propose that the definition of "European" should be "every person of pure European descent on both sides and who is not a statutory native of India"?—Yes.

16,126. I suppose you want to have the words commonly used "being a British subject and resident in India"?—For a temporary purpose.

Sir Hari Singh Gour.

16,127. Resident or domiciled?—No.

Marquess of Lothian.

16,128. You want, in other words, "European" to be confined to people who are of European descent and British subjects on both sides?—Yes.

16,129. And that everybody else should be classed as Anglo-Indians?—No, I go further. The Indian Councils Act of 1870, 33 Victoria, chapter 3, calls everybody in India, even though of pure European descent on both sides, natives of India by Statute. At present the destructive practice of dividing the Anglo-Indian community into the domiciled European and the Anglo-Indian has done neither community any good. They are both for occupational purposes called natives of India by Statute vide the Indian Councils Act, and you cannot differentiate between the economic classification of a community so intermixed and its political definition, because the political status of that community controls its economic needs, at least to my mind. Therefore, representing, as I do, the Anglo-Indian and domiciled European (and that is to me a very indefinite term "domiciled European") it is our desire that those who come within this Councils Act should come within the definition "Anglo-Indian".

M.L.A., I.M.S. (Retired).

16,130. Turning to your definition of "Anglo-Indian" you say "Every person whose father, grandfather, or other progenitor in the male line was a European, and who is a statutory native of India." Could you tell me why you confine it to the male line?—A child takes the nationality of his father, at least I believe the international law of legitimate marriage is that the child takes the nationality of his father. That is the only reason. I may be wrong.

Mr M. R. Jayaker.

16,131. Do you want to take the nationality of an Englishman?—I say I take it according to law.

16,132. According to law you want that your community should take the nationality of the European?—I have not said that at all. I was asked a question as to why I confine it to the male. I only demand what the law says. I do not say that that is my desire at all and entitles me to.

Marquess of Lothian.

16,133. In any event you are citizens of India?—Yes, we are.

16,134. This is the definition by which a citizen of India is grouped in one community or another in India?—Yes.

16,135. And the broad basis of the Anglo-Indian community is that there is mixed blood?—Yes.

16,136. Why do you confine the Anglo-Indian only to people of mixed parentage who are in the male line, and not also in the female line?—I have only taken it from the legal definition of the two communities.

Marquess of Salisbury.

16,137. I only wanted to know the importance of the question. The question I was going to put is. Does it make a great deal of difference in the numbers even if you include the other category?—It would add to our numbers because there are a large number of English ladies marrying Indian gentlemen to-day.

Marquess of Reading.

16,138. What is the term that is applied to the offspring of an Indian and a European, that is to say, an Indian father and a European mother? What is the term?—Lord Reading, I could not tell you what term is applied, but I do know what the result is.

16,139. I have given you that already?—What I really mean is this, that the children of that marriage if the father is Hindu generally take the religion of the Brahmo Somaj, or, in the Muhammadan case, according to Muslim marriage, the child takes the father's religion.

16,140. I am not asking about religion. I am trying to find out what your view is. I know there has been a good deal of discussion about it. What term is applied? An Anglo-Indian is, as you tell us quite properly, a person whose father is a European and whose mother is an Indian. What we do not know, and what we want to know from you, is what is the term applied; never mind the law. I know there is no statute on the subject. What term is applied in India?—No term at all.

16,141. Generally speaking, I have always heard them referred to as Anglo-Indians?—I assure you it is not so, although myself I would welcome it.

16,142. What is the term?—They do not take any term.

16,143. It is not Indian?—Yes, generally they take the father's nationality.

Marquess of Salisbury.

16,144. They call themselves Indians?—Yes.

Sir Hari Singh Gour.

16,145. And do not they object to being called Anglo-Indians?—That I do not know. I have never asked them. I do believe that Sir Hari Singh Gour was right when he said that they do not want to be called Anglo-Indians.

10^o Novembris, 1933.]Lieut.-Colonel Sir HENRY GIDNEY,
M.L.A., I.M.S. (Retired).

Sir Hari Singh Gour.] That is a fact.
Earl Winterton.] We had a witness before the Committee who was of that birth, Mr. Waris Ameer Ali, and he always described himself as an Indian.

Marquess of Lothian.

16,145a. On the question of franchise you propose that the four seats which have been allotted to the Anglo-Indian community in the Lower Federal Chamber should not be confined to the four Provinces of Bombay, Madras, Bengal and the United Provinces as proposed in the White Paper. Could you explain a little more why you want that?—Lord Lothian, the four Provinces to which are allotted these four seats do not represent the Anglo-Indian community in its entirety. There is a very large area of India which will be disenfranchised if you confine your four seats to these four Provinces. It is my desire, and the desire of the Association, to encourage a political education and a political conscience in the whole community and, by allotting your four seats to four Provinces, you absolutely prevent any political education in the other Provinces, where a large proportion of the Anglo-Indians reside.

16,146. How would you propose that they should vote because the constituency would obviously be gigantic?—I would suggest what I have done in paragraph Q. "Constitution" of my Memorandum, that to Bengal should be added the Provinces of Assam, Bihar and Orissa—one seat in the Federal Chamber.

16,147. That was not my question. I said how would you propose that they should actually vote?—It is suggested in the White Paper that the post should be used as a method of voting. I myself think that the postal system is pregnant with a lot of danger, especially for malpractices, but I think that the postal system would be the only means by which you could get a truly representative vote of the community, for this reason, that if the election were confined to one day, 50 per cent. of the community would be on the railway lines, telegraphs and other Departments, and would not be able to vote. If it were done by post these people would have their chance of submitting their vote for a member.

16,148. In your experience how does the postal system work in Madras?—I have no personal experience of it, but I have heard varying reports about it, some to the good and some to the bad; but I would ask, if the postal system were accepted, to see that all such malpractices were guarded against.

16,149. What sort of malpractices have you got in mind, Sir Henry?—I think there will be charges made in the postal system in that the letters have been delayed intentionally. The postman has been tapped and the letters have been delayed until the election was over, and no votes were sent. I do not say that that was so, but I believe so.

16,150. Have you any proposals as to how the Federal seats reserved to the Anglo-Indian Community in the Provinces should be distributed? There are three Provinces in which there are more than one, I think?—My idea is that it should be divided roughly into rural and urban constituencies. For instance, take Bengal, where the largest number of seats has been allocated, that is four. The capital town of Bengal, Calcutta, might be given two seats, and the rural area of Bengal might be given two.

Mr. Zafrrulla Khan.

16,151. Do you consider the whole of Bengal outside Calcutta as rural?—No.

Sir Hari Singh Gour.

16,152. Non-metropolitan area?—Exactly those are the words. What I meant was that in Calcutta itself there was a big collection of the community all together, like the Parsees are in Bombay, and in the outside places they are found in the railway centres, around the stations. They are smaller stations in comparison and I use the words "rural" and "urban" in a comparative sense.

Mr. R. A. Butler.

16,153. One of those seats would be a woman's seat. How would that fit in with your plan,—I think that could be arranged quite conveniently.

16,154. In the urban area?—Yes, in the urban area, I think, but I do not know that I should insist on that. One of any of these four seats could be reserved for a woman. I am not particular whether you confine it to the rural area or the urban area.

Mr. M. R. Jayaker.

16,155. What electorate would you suggest for filling in a woman's seat?—The whole constituency.

16,156. Both men and women?—Yes.

10th Novembris, 1933.]Lieut.-Colonel Sir HENRY GIDNEY,
M.L.A., I.M.S. (Retired).

Marquess of Lothian.

16,157. And one of the four reserved for a woman?—Yes

16,158. Can you tell the Committee the geographical distribution of your community? As I understand it, it is partly in one or two large cities like Calcutta and Bombay, and for the rest it is distributed widely over India, on the railways, the telegraphs, and so on. Is that correct?—The geographical distribution of the community is peculiar. The community has a peculiar setting over India which is not to be found in any other community. It is scattered in little places from one or twenty to 100 or 200, up to 10,000. That is the peculiarity of it. It can claim no Province as its own; and when you hear the cry: "Bengal for the Bengalis," or "Bihar for the Biharis," you cannot say: "Anglo-India for the Anglo-Indians," because the community can claim no Province of its own. The largest number of the community is to be found in Madras Presidency, the second largest in Bengal; then, in order of numbers, Bombay, then the United Provinces, then the Punjab.

Sir Hari Singh Gour.

16,159. Why not raise a cry: "India for Anglo-Indians"?—Yes; I will take suggestion.

Marques of Lothian

16,160. What are the occupations in which your community are engaged apart from federal employments, like posts, railways and telegraphs and so on?—At one time they held many appointments in the Provincial Government; at one time nearly 96 per cent. of the officers in Bengal were occupied by Anglo-Indians. To-day there are not five per cent.—indeed, not three per cent. The result is that they have very few employments outside the Federal services.

16,161. They are mainly in Official employment?—I would say almost entirely.

Earl Peel.

16,162. I wanted to ask only one question, arising out of Provincial Services under (e) in the Summary at the end of your Memorandum: "In view of the almost entire exclusion of the Community from the Provincial Government Services, as will be amply proved by reference to official records, we demand that in future recruitment," etc.—what do you mean by that; can you amplify that? Has there been in any sense a deliberate attempt to exclude the community from the Provincial Government Services? Have qualified men applied and been refused; can you tell us what has happened?—There have been many factors operating steadily and insidiously, operating in a manner which often one could only observe or detect if he noticed the day to day administration of a Department in any Provincial Government. I would cite the Provincial Secretariat or the Provincial Civil Service or the Provincial Judiciary as instances. It has been, first of all, the introduction of a high standard of education, secondly, it has been the introduction of a graduate education; and, thirdly, it has been the introduction of a competitive system of entrance into these Services. The Anglo-Indian Community has found itself outnumbered, outclassed, and for very many reasons not prepared, from an educational point of view. Moreover, there are other forces that operate which everyone who is familiar with Indian administration will support: appointments that are superintended by a certain community are not advertised, and these appointments are generally given to the relations of those communities. The Anglo-Indian, not being there, does not have the ghost of a chance. The result is that in the Postal Department, where we once formed a large percentage, we only form 0.5 per cent. to-day.

16,163. The Postal Department is a Central Service, is it not?—Yes; it is in a Province. I am talking only of one Province. If you take the Secretariat at Bengal you will find that among old people who have been in India years ago, the proportion of Anglo-Indians, which could be counted in three figures, is to-day, I think, only seven in the whole of the Bengal Provincial Secretariat. Similarly, I think Sir Reginald Craddock, who was in the Central Provinces at one time, would bear me out when I say there was a large number of Anglo-Indians in the Central Provinces Secretariat. To-day you can count them on your finger tips. In Bombay it is the same. This is the way in which the Anglo-Indian has been gradually, slowly but surely, replaced.

Lord Eustace Percy.

16,164. May I intervene with a question. Do you mean that these appointments in the Secretariats are patronage appointments and are not approached by competitive examination?—I think that

10^o Novembris, 1933.]Lieut.-Colonel Sir HENRY GIDNEY,
M.L.A., I.M.S. (Retired).

has been the universal condemnation of the subordinate services of Government of to-day, that they have been more in the hands of the superintendents of the Departments. To-day they have insisted on selection committees.

Mr. Zafrulla Khan.

16,165 Is that the answer to Lord Eustace Percy's question? I think the question was: Are these appointments in the Secretariat patronage appointments or are they the result of a competitive system, or educational standards, or what?—I beg your pardon, Lord Percy. I did not quite understand your question. Recently these appointments have been made open to competitive examination.

Mr. A. H. Ghuznavi.

16,166. Since when?—Quite recently. Certain Provincial Governments have demanded that a certain percentage of the Committee should be represented.

Lord Eustace Percy.

16,167. That is another point?—I am sorry.

16,168. The answer to Lord Peel I thought was that, in addition to your disadvantages in competitive examination, there was a large number of services to which appointments were made by personal selection and patronage?—Yes.

16,169. And that the Anglo-Indians were left out, and you gave us an instance of that—the Secretariat?—Yes.

16,170. That is what surprised me?—Might I amplify my answer to your question? I am talking of the process that has for years till quite recently been the means of eliminating the Anglo-Indian. To-day (and I am talking of quite recently), many years after the Montagu-Chelmsford Reforms began to operate, competitive examinations are being used in certain Departments, but not in all, not in all Government Secretariat Departments.

Earl Peel.

16,171. You gave us as one of the reasons for the disability of your community the fact that higher standards were being introduced into the examinations?—Yes.

16,172. I understand that your community is of a high average intelligence and education?—Lord Peel, possibly that statement cannot be reconciled with what you are thinking, but may I try to explain? When I say that the community is a hundred per cent. educated, if I may use that term, I mean by that to a certain standard of literacy required for electoral purposes. But when I come to the higher standards to-day you will be surprised to know that the driver of a railway engine is required to be a graduate; you have to matriculate to be a ticket collector; you have to matriculate to send telegraph messages. Now when these processes of competition were introduced they left the Anglo-Indian standing because his education is too expensive, his numbers are small, and his education has not been up to this standard.

Sir Joseph Nall.

16,173. Just to be clear on that, do I understand that matriculation is a necessary qualification for a ticket collector?—Yes.

16,174. And the recruitment of engine drivers must be from graduates?—Not necessarily. They say that a graduate is preferred.

Mr. M. R. Jayaker.

16,175. Can Sir Henry point out any departmental rule which requires that a graduate alone shall be selected or preferred for an Indian railway driver's post or a matriculate preferred for a ticket collector's post?—Yes; there is a Railway Board Instruction.

Earl Winterton.

16,176. Could you clear this up a little, Sir Henry? Your reply has been received with some astonishment by me. I have no doubt it is accurate. Do you not mean a man who has taken some form of degree in engineering? You do not mean a literary graduate, but a man who has had a course in engineering?—To be an engine driver you must not have an engineering qualification. There may be some confusion in this, but I may tell you this frankly, because I am very familiar with the rules pertaining to competition on the railways. A man has to be a matriculate to get into the Traffic Department.

Earl Peel.

16,177. Sir Henry, just passing from these excessively high standards, may I ask you this. We were discussing the Provincial Services and the Provincial Secretariats and so on. Then I think some of your answers rather went off to the Central Services. I was going to ask you about the Central Services where your community is largely represented. These disabilities to which you have been alluding in the Provincial Services and the Secretariats do not apply, do they, so much to the Central Services, because there your community holds a large number of posts? You have not suffered there so much as in the Provincial Secretariats and so on and some of these subordinate Services in the Provinces?—That is so in a comparative sense; but may I amplify that by saying that at least 50 per cent. of those employees are to-day between the ages of forty and fifty-five, for they were recruited in these Services years ago; and so a large number of them are approaching the period of superannuation.

10th November, 1933.]Lieut.-Colonel Sir HENRY GIDNEY,
M.L.A., I.M.S. (Retired).

Marquess of Salisbury.

16,178. So that you anticipate that in a short time the proportion will be very much smaller?—Very much, because recruitment is so small to-day.

Lord Hardinge of Penshurst.

16,179. I propose to ask quite a different category of questions. In your Memorandum, Sir Henry, in paragraph 3, under "Railways," you state that your community has been deprived of over a thousand appointments within two or three years; that is to say, 7 per cent. of your community employed on the railways. Are these figures official?—They are official, Lord Hardinge.

16,180. You have also referred to railway strikes in which your community played a great part. To which railway strikes do you refer?—Two or three railway strikes during the past five years on the Bengal Nagpur Railway; to two strikes on the East India Railway, one when His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales was in India, and our schoolboys and schoolgirls came and cleared the railway stations and cleaned the carriages; to two strikes on the North-West Railway: those are the strikes that come to my memory within the past decade.

Mr. Zafrulla Khan.

16,181. The last and the worst of the two strikes on the North-West Railway was organised by an Anglo-Indian, Mr. Miller?—Mr. Miller was a member of the Indian Railway Union; he was never recognised as a member of the Anglo-Indian Association.

16,182. Was he or was he not an Anglo-Indian?—No; he was an European.

16,183. Then it was organised by a European and was put an end to with the help of Anglo-Indians?—Forgive me, I must clear that statement if it is a stigma upon the community. Mr. Miller was a European and, I believe, an ex-soldier. Mr. Miller helped the Indian Union of which he was Secretary to come through a tremendous strike. Mr. Miller was then, I believe, prosecuted. I believe he was finally dismissed, and I think he was re-engaged afterwards. Mr. Miller was not a member of the Anglo-Indian community and he was not in any way touched by the Anglo-Indians, because we have never been at variance with our Indian employees.

Sir Hari Singh Gour.

16,184. Was he not what we call a domiciled European?—No, he was a European.

Mr. N. M. Joshi.

16,185. Was there no strike of the Anglo-Indians at all?—Not so far as I remember.

16,186. I mean before the Indians formed their trade unions and when there were strikes?—I do not know of any strikes. There was I believe a strike long ago when everyone struck; even the Commander-in-Chief struck; that was when everyone joined.

Lord Hardinge of Penshurst.

16,187. Is it a fact that in the troubles in 1919 men of your community had to be drafted on to the railways?—I believe, Lord Hardinge, that in 1919 it was in the Telegraphs, when Sir Michael O'Dwyer was Lieutenant-Governor, that he asked for Anglo-Indian employees; but I think he said that in his evidence.

16,188. I understand that your community has recently lost appointments in the Telegraphs, Customs, Police and Indian Medical Department. Would you say that this is in any way due to the satisfaction of the political demands of more powerful communities or on the grounds of political expediency?—I would say it is due to the satisfaction of political expediency, the outcome of a demand by other communities. I do not say that the communities have the right—it would be far from my mind to say that—but there is no doubt that the Government each year weakens my interpretation of the strength in the protection of the community that has served it in response to demands from the larger communities, and rather than face the refusal of a demand for a grant in the Budget there has always been a compromise arrived at between the Government and the Member who has presented the demand. It has been a means to an end, and it has been a means to an end that I should resort to probably.

10^o Novêmbreis, 1933.]Lieut.-Colonel Sir HENRY GIDNEY,
M.L.A., I.M.S. (Retired).

16,189. I understand that during the late War your community rendered conspicuous services, amongst whom, as you state, were Lieutenant Robinson and Lieutenant Warneford, who both brought down German Zeppelins and earned the V.C. Have you any idea what percentage of your small community fought in the Great War in its various centres?—The community can, with great pride, claim that it supplied 80 per cent. of its manhood during the past Great War, excluding that large number of noble Anglo-Indian women who were freely enlisted in the hospitals as nurses and excluding that still larger number of Anglo-Indian ladies and girls who, under the directions of the wives of the various Governors, helped to make comforts for the troops. 80 per cent. of our manhood were employed in all theatres of the War. Those who were not at the Front were engaged in the Indian Defence Force, which was a compulsory force during the War. When this force was formed it was necessary for the Army authorities to have elimination parades, so great was the enthusiasm to join this force to help the country. Indeed most of our public schools in India to-day are second to none, either to Eton or Harrow, in the number of tablets and memorials which are erected there in memory of the brave dead, young men from those schools who died in every theatre of the Great War.

16,190. In the Montagu-Chelmsford Report, the Report of the Statutory Commission, in the Government of India Despatch of September, 1930, as well as in the Recommendation unanimously passed by the Services Sub-Committee of the Round Table Conference, the necessity for special consideration of the interests of your community has been repeatedly emphasised. In what way are you of opinion that such steps should be taken?—That, of course, Lord Hardinge, would be the business of the Joint Select Committee, but from these various acceptances that were given by the Services Sub-Committee there is no doubt that some clearcut scheme must be evolved by which the community will be saved in the various Services. Unless some such scheme is evolved and executive power is given to the Governors and the Governor-General that it be carried out, the next twenty years will see the extinction of the Anglo-Indian community in most Services.

16,191. In the event of your not securing adequate economic protection, what would be the effect in the future on your community in India?—They will sink to a worse position than the Depressed Classes. They will be a community which have been brought up from their birth with British ideals and British culture. They will be in a land where they will not have any moneyed jobs, and they must in comparison be worse off than a community that has been brought up under different standards. That is why I say they will sink to a worse position than the Depressed Classes unless statutorily protected.

Mr. M. R. Jayaker.

16,192. Is it not a fact, Sir Henry, that according to the recommendation of the Round Table Conference your community had the benefit of a very generous and exceptional scheme of education?—Yes. I offer my deep thanks and gratitude for that scheme of education, in which Mr. Jayaker played such a leading, generous and great part, and in and out I have always said it was Mr. Jayaker who is the best friend to my community; but it is no use giving any community any concession of education when you deprive the parents of employment, because the education of a child is entirely dependent upon the economic protection of the parents.

Lord Hardinge of Penshurst.] I should like just to express my own views to a certain extent upon this very important question.

Earl Winterton.

16,193. But before my noble friend does that, will he allow me to ask a question arising out of the Witness's last answer. Sir Henry, would you not agree generally that the question of providing employment for the educated Anglo-Indian, or rather the difficulty of providing employment for educated Anglo-Indians, is a universal difficulty which is being found in all countries to-day, and especially in countries like India—finding employment, owing to world conditions, for educated people?—That may apply to-day, Lord Winterton—to the immediate day—but it does not apply to that slow

10^o Novembris, 1935]Lieut.-Colonel Sir HENRY GIDNEY,
M.L.A., I.M.S. (Retired).

and sure process of elimination which from a cumulative point of view has been the raison d'être of our present bad position in the Services.

16,194. What you mean by that is that up to now the Anglo-Indian community has largely relied for its employment upon State employment, and that that State employment is no longer open to them; but it means, though, that quite a large number of Anglo-Indians in the past have worked in industrial employment, and that employment is not open to them to the extent that it was owing to the generally bad economic conditions. Is that not so?—I do not think so.

Lord Hardinge of Penshurst.

16,195. I should like to ask Sir Henry whether he agrees with this: The Anglo-Indian and domiciled community in India is a small community in numbers but it has a fine record and has been a source of strength in the past. Now it is being slowly but surely sacrificed on the altar of political expediency, and unless special measures are taken for the protection of their economic future they must necessarily disappear; but it is to be hoped that Parliament will not repeat the error made in Ireland in regard to the Irish Loyalists in the South. What is needed is that their representation in the various Government Departments, both Central and Provincial, should be guaranteed to them for a certain number of years, and in view of their great services to India in the past this does not appear to be an exaggerated demand. It should, if possible, be part of the Constitution of India. I wish to know whether Sir Henry agrees with that statement?—Entirely.

Marquess of Reading.] I do not quite understand, if Lord Hardinge will forgive me, the last part of the question. Did you say, "It should be part of the Constitution of India"?

Lord Hardinge of Penshurst.] I should say it should if possible be part of the Constitution of India—the reservation of a certain number of posts.

Earl Peel.] Do you mean a percentage?

Lord Hardinge of Penshurst.] Yes.

Earl Peel.] A percentage of posts in these different Central Services should be retained for a certain number of years as open to members of that community.

Lord Hardinge of Penshurst.] I agree.

Mr. Butler.

16,196. May I supplement one or two figures on this matter put by Lord Winterton in his question to Sir Henry Gidney. Taking the third paragraph, which was raised by Lord Hardinge, reference was made to the figures. I only want to ask one or two questions with reference to the figures in your Memorandum, Sir Henry. We have worked out these figures, and we find that the proportion in the third line of that paragraph should be 7 per cent. and not 14 per cent.?—Yes, quite right; that is a clerical error.

Lord Hardinge of Penshurst.] That is what I said.

Mr. Butler.

16,197. I was leading up to another question, Lord Hardinge. Would you agree that in the same period the Hindus lost approximately 58,900 posts, or 10.6 per cent., and the Muslims lost 24,300 posts, or approximately 13.6 per cent.—in the same period to which you refer?—I have the figures here. During the period of 1919, 1930, 1931 and 1932, the Hindus—I do not like making a comparison of communities, but even if I say the Hindus had 550,000 in 1929-30, and they had 491,000 in 1931-32. It does not come up to the percentage Mr. Butler has given.

16,198. I think it approximates to my figures. I know we had great difficulty over the accuracy of the figures, and I fully sympathise with your difficulty as well as ours. These are the official figures as far as we can make out, and I was only putting a question upon what Lord Winterton said, that owing to the economic depression there have been retrenchments all round and that your community has not been the only one to suffer?—I have never said that in the recent retrenchment in economy; that has been a compulsory activity. But what I have said is that the few appointments that the Anglo-Indian community holds—that is 13,000 or 14,000 as compared with half a million—it has suffered 7 per cent. of a loss, and those appointments are appointments generally of people who cannot live in the same way as a percentage of the Hindus live who have been unemployed and who go back to the fields and work as cultivators.

Earl Winterton.

16,199. I really think we must clear up this point. Surely the only point at issue is whether the percentage loss is greater in the case of one community than in others. Cannot you answer that question? It is really the question Mr.

10^o Novembris, 1933.] Lieut.-Colonel Sir HENRY GIDNEY,
M.L.A., I.M.S. (Retired).

Butler has put to you?—I will take down and work out the percentage. In 1929-30 does Mr. Butler's figure agree with mine—550,000?

Mr. Butler.

16,200. I am working out the actual loss, which amounted in the case of the Hindus to 58,500 and in the case of the Muslims to 24,300?—Yes.

Mr. Butler.] The percentages in each case being 10.6 and 13.6, which I think bears out the question that Lord Winter-ton put to you—that there has been a general loss of posts in all the Services.

Marquess of Reading.

16,201. The point has been made. The exact percentages and figures do not matter so long as we get them approximately?—Although these figures might be quoted to detract from the percentages I have given, there is a very important aspect which the Committee must bear in mind. This reduction in the Hindus and Muslims which has been the result of retrenchment and economy has mainly arisen out of the stoppage of all construction on the railways, and refers mainly to menial labour. The menial labourer gets from 10 to 15 rupees a month.

Mr. Zafrulla Khan.

16,202. The menial labourer is never shown on the staff of any railway. He is employed by the contractor as and when the contractor may require him for the purpose of carrying out his contract. Even the contractor is never shown on the staff of the railway. It is no use making allegations which can be controverted immediately?—May I reply to Mr. Zafrulla Khan and say that the total employees of every railway include its permanent railway staff, including the permanent way staff, which are mainly Coolie gangs.

16,203. But that is nothing to do with the construction and menial labour?—That is the construction labour.

16,204. Certainly not; that is the maintenance labour?—I beg your pardon; I mean the maintenance labour.

Lord Eustace Percy.

16,205. In any case, Sir Henry, you would agree that on those figures the safeguard that you want to propose in the Constitution would not have prevented these reductions, because your percentage remains?—No.

Marquess of Reading.

16,206. I understand Sir Henry does not agree with that?—No, I do not agree with it.

Lord Eustace Percy.

16,207. Well, I do not understand. He has proposed that there should be inserted in the Constitution a guarantee of a certain percentage for Anglo-Indians?—Yes.

16,208. As a matter of fact, on these figures the Anglo-Indian percentage in the Services so far from having decreased has slightly increased?—Yes.

16,209. Therefore whatever may be the special hardship entailed on the Anglo-Indian community by these reductions, which I quite appreciate, the safeguard proposed by Lord Hardinge would have been no safeguard against those losses?—My reply to Lord Eustace Percy is this: The present slight increase, as Lord Eustace Percy says, can easily be accounted for by the fact, that during the last ten years railways have increased enormously in route mileage. The total population employed on railways has increased, and pari passu with that all communities employed have increased in number, but what I want to impress upon the Committee is this, that 50 per cent. of the Anglo-Indian employees to-day are those who were employed before the reforms started, and they will be superannuated within the next few years, and no recruitment has been taking place of late years.

Earl Peel.

16,210. Sir Henry, might I ask you this general question? As regards retrenchments which, unfortunately, have taken place, as we know, for economic reasons, do you suggest that there has been an unfair proportionate reduction in the numbers of the Anglo-Indian community through those retrenchments?—Yes.

Mr. Butler.

16,211. Sir Henry, would it not be fair to you to say that your losses have been chiefly in the higher grades and that that is your difficulty?—Yes, that is true.

16,212. Referring to your last paragraph, when you refer to the total of 800,000 railway appointments and quote the numbers that the Anglo-Indians have secured of those appointments, in reality you are not interested in the whole number of those appointments but only in approximately 175,000 of them; that is, those whose rates of pay suit the members of your community?—That is true.

16,213. I think that clears up that point?—The figures bear out what you say, Mr. Butler.

Earl Winterton.

16,214. May I refer to your Memorandum under the heading of "N—Customs," where you make reference to the valuable services that your community rendered in the Preventive Branch Service and where you refer to the reduction that has taken place in the numbers of your community. I gather that your argument is that the numbers of your community in this Service in the past has been a very valuable thing for India. Has there been within your knowledge as a Member of the Assembly an increase in recent years of the smuggling of such things as arms in India?—I believe the newspapers of Calcutta are very agitated as to the increase of terrorism and as to how arms and ammunition have come into India. There are two sources; one is in the North-West Frontier and the other is in the sea ports. I believe that cases of arms and ammunition at the sea ports have been traced.

16,215. Under the heading of "O—Army" in your Memorandum you refer to the Army, and you show that a proposal which was put forward and apparently accepted in high quarters for an Anglo-Indian Unit was not carried out owing to retrenchment. Can you suggest any other means by which Anglo-Indians could be employed in the Army in a unit, of course making full allowance for their higher standard of living than would be the case with Indians? I am referring to the rank and file?—To-day the Anglo-Indian so far as the defence of India is concerned has no position whatever except as a member of the Auxiliary Force. He cannot enter the Indian Army for the practical reason that he cannot live on the pay of a Sepoy, and the official reason given is that being a caste army only he cannot upset the caste homogeneity of that army; he is denied admission into the British Army because of his nationality. The result is that he can enter into the rank and file of neither unless on the one hand he denies his birthright and says he is a European—and there are many thousands of them to-day in the British Army—or he enters the Indian Army willing to accept the small pay that a Sepoy gets. Now it is necessary that the Anglo-Indian should be given a place in the defence of India, and the only way it can be given is in these specialised units such as the Signal Corps, the Coastal Defence, the Army Service Corps, the Transport Corps, and in such Corps which allow a little larger salaries. Realising this, the Secretary of State sanctioned the formation of a Signal Corps for the Anglo-Indian community. It was being gazetted in India, when suddenly the retrenchment committee on the Army in India recommended that it should be abolished and one of the little openings that were offered to the community was again closed to it, and to-day the Anglo-Indian community has no position in the Defence of India, except, as I say, as a member of the auxiliary force, the second line of defence.

16,216. That was not my question. You deal very fully in your Memorandum with what you have just told us. Can you suggest any means by which what one may call the legitimate demands of your community in this respect could be satisfied by the formation of small units? Would your suggestion be to revert to the proposal that was turned down?—I would refer Lord Winterton to certain suggestions which I submitted to the Indian Military Retrenchment Committee which offer a very large field for the employment of Anglo-Indians: (1) There is a corps called the R.A.M.C., which consists of British soldiers trained as nurses. There is a large body of Anglo-Indian lads and Domiciled Europeans who would make excellent nurses; (2) There is a large corps of nurses called the Queen Alexandra's Nursing Service. I have the greatest admiration for that service, but that service goes to India on a pay even larger than that of an assistant engineer. There is a large body of Anglo-Indians and Domiciled European women who can be employed as nurses. They can be given some position in the Defence of India and be satisfied.

16,217. If I may put this question: You would therefore be grateful if some of us in the House of Commons, on the Army Estimates, raised the question and put before the authorities the possibility of carrying out some of the proposals which you make for the substitution of

10^o Novembris, 1933.]Lieut.-Colonel Sir HENRY GIDNEY,
M.L.A., I.M.S. (Retired).

Anglo-Indian rank-and-file for British rank-and-file?—Yes.

16,218. Would not it be better to do it that way than to put it in the Constitution Act?—I am not suggesting that that should be put in the Constitution Act; I am suggesting that in the Defences of India the Anglo-Indian Community should be given some opportunities, and I press this claim to the same extent as the Depressed Classes have pressed their claim. At present they are excluded from the Army.

16,219. I understand that you take exception to the present Jury Law in India. As you are aware, it was the result of a compromise between Europeans and Indians in the Racial Distinctions Committee of 1923-24?—Yes.

16,220. Could you tell us, quite shortly, what is the objection that your community takes to that arrangement?—I was a Member of that Committee.

16,221. I know?—And I am familiar with its findings. I take no objection to it, except that I say that if you are going to give jury rights to two different nationals, that is to say, the Indian and the European, you should demand that they fulfil the same conditions. The Indian is not called upon to prove his legitimacy or his origin; with regard to the European the law says he must but he seldom does; and it is only from the Anglo-Indian that you insist on him proving his legitimacy and his paternal origin. Then you turn round and say the European can take a European majority jury; the Indian can take an Indian majority jury. There is a difference created at once, but that was a compromise. What I am asking so as not to raise any racial issue is let the accused, be he either European, Indian or Anglo-Indian, have the right of selecting whatever majority he wants: either European or Indian or Anglo-Indian. It is not an objection. It is a suggestion to bring everyone on an equality so far as Jury Law is concerned. I look on it as a relic of barbarism. Is a man to be denied the right to select a majority jury because his grandfather when he went out to India did not take his baptismal certificate but took his matchlock?

Mr. Zafrulla Khan.

16,222. Can you point to any provision of the Criminal Procedure Code which makes that distinction which you have put forward?—I am not a lawyer, nor would I like to cross swords with you on a law point.

16,223. I am not crossing swords with you. Is it your impression that the Criminal Procedure Code makes that distinction?—The Criminal Procedure Code does not, to my knowledge, demand from any Indian the proof of legitimacy.

16,224. The difference you have made between the European accused and the Anglo-Indian accused is that from one proof of legitimacy is demanded and from the other it is not. Is there anything in law that makes that distinction?—I have not said that.

16,225. If that is not in the Code what can the Joint Select Committee do about it?—I have not said that. I have said when a European accused comes into the box (I am not talking with any disparagement at all) the Judge looks at him; he sees that he is a European from his complexion. His Counsel demands a European jury. It is seldom that he is asked: "Prove your legitimacy." Indeed, if he were asked he would not have a baptismal certificate probably. But he is accepted as a European. When an Anglo-Indian with any little colour in him stands in the witness box what is demanded from him is proof of his legitimacy.

Sir Hari Singh Gour.

16,226. You want to control judicial discretion?—No; I want equality for all classes.

Mr. M. R. Jayaker.

16,227. Does not the trouble arise when members of your community claim to be Europeans for the purpose of the jury?—I should let them have the right of selecting whichever jury they wanted.

16,228. That trouble would not arise if your community decided to call itself Indian. The trouble arises because you have not decided whether to call yourselves Indian or European. Some of you call yourselves Indians and get tried as Indians; some of you call yourselves Europeans and when you do that you have to prove your legitimacy. Is not that the position?—No, that is not the position at all. The position is one that does not at all concern whether you call yourself a European or an Indian. The position is this. A jury system, I believe, has been inaugurated to give the accused the benefit of a body of people who are

10^o Novembris, 1933.]Lieut.-Colonel SIR HENRY GIDNEY,
M.L.A., I.M.S. (Retired).

familiar with his ways, manners and customs.

Sir Hari Singh Gour.] This involves the consideration and amendment of the Statute known as the Criminal Procedure Code, and I do not think the Committee have anything to do with the amendment of that Criminal Procedure Code.

Mr. Zafrulla Khan

16,229. May I put this to you. The present position is that the Code makes an exception in favour of Europeans and I believe Americans; and the Code says this: A European or an American accused person can demand a jury of a certain composition, and the procedure is this: When any person whatsoever is brought before the Court as an accused person and makes a demand under those particular sections that he should have a jury of that particular complexion, then it is open to the prosecution (it is nothing to do with the Court) to challenge that demand on the ground that the person does not fall within the category of persons in whose favour that exception has been made, and once that challenge is made by the prosecution that person, it does not matter what his complexion may be, has got to prove that he does come within the category of those persons. What I should like to know from you is: What amendment to this procedure do you suggest?—I have suggested, Mr. Zafrulla Khan, a very simple amendment, and that is to Section 255, clause (1), and Section 284 (a) (i) of the Criminal Procedure Code, the following words be added: "or Europeans as he may desire." Let the accused have the right to claim a jury, the majority of whom may be Indians or Europeans. What harm is there in doing that?

Sir Hari Singh Gour.] Why do not you introduce a Bill in the Legislative Assembly of which you are a Member?

Sir Hubert Carr.

16,230. There is a question I would like to ask: Sir Henry, in your Memorandum under the heading "K-Railways," you put forward certain claims regarding railway employment. What I want to get clear is this: Is that going to settle your difficulties? May I explain my question in this way: You have put forward, as I understand it, that your community, in effect, is likely always to be a poor one because your successful Members leave the community, and really it is for the large part only the unsuccessful ones who remain?—I hope I am not in that category.

16,231. For the large part is not that so? And, consequently, they will always require some protection and help. If that is a fair looking forward, do you consider that the numbers to be helped will grow and increase during the next 30 years, which I think you indicate as the period of protection?—The last census gave an increase of over 20 per cent. in the population; indeed, since 1881, the community has doubled itself.

16,232. Then can you explain how this matter is going to settle your difficulties—this claim which you have made—if your population is all the time increasing?—One cannot ask for protection in perpetuity as some demands are made in the White Paper. I will not be so ridiculous as to do so. I might amplify that demand by saying that together with this protection I should like associated with it that the protection should remain so long as employment is made on communal proportions.

16,233. The question as I see it is at the present time, for instance, that there are unquestionably a large number of English girls who marry Indian men. Do you anticipate that they are going to add to the numbers of your community, or will the offspring take on the parentage of the fathers?—Yes, they are doing that.

16,234. So that the proposals which have been put forward by the Associated Chambers of Commerce which are in your hands are proposals which are based upon a protection for a community approximately of the present size?—Yes.

16,235. Do you think they will be sufficient to enable your people to get that education which will enable them, after a period of time, to stand on their own feet and compete with all other members of the Indian Provinces and Federation for the official appointments?—Sir Hubert Carr, that is exactly what would meet my situation. All I ask is for protection for a few years until we get on our feet. We have been caught napping. We have been sitting in the lap of Government as its servant for all these years. Sir John Simon has said we have formed the policy of Government, and to that is attributed our present tragic position.

Marquess of Salisbury.] What is the Memorandum of the Associated Chambers of Commerce?

10^o Novembris, 1933.] Lieut.-Colonel Sir HENRY GIDNEY,
M.L.A., I.M.S. (Retired).

Sir Hubert Carr.] It has been circulated to the Committee.

Marquess of Salisbury.] It is in our hands, is it?

Sir Hubert Carr.] It is in our hands.

Witness.] Is this what you refer to: "We request that the present number of Anglo-Indians and Domiciled Europeans, lower and upper subordinates and officials in Railway employment, be not reduced for a period of at least 30 years from the date on which the new Constitution Act commences to operate."

16,236. I have not read it because it is set forth in the Memorandum, and it is only wasting the time of the Committee to read it?—That is the position; and I assure you that we do not want to be spoon-fed for more than a time to enable us to get on our feet and be level with the rest of India. Then we will sink or swim.

16,237. I am not suggesting that it is a matter of the community being caught. At the present time there is a strong demand for the communal division of appointments?—A very strong demand.

16,238. I suppose it is your idea that the communal side of that demand will die out in the course of 30 years or so?—I hope so.

16,239. And then your people, granted reasonable facilities for education, will be able and will be happy to compete with other members of the Federation?—That is what my position is.

Mr. Butler.

16,240. Did I understand you to say that if there was some sort of agreement on the communal distribution of the Services, you would waive your demand for statutory protection?—It all depends whether that is incorporated in the Instrument of Instructions. I believe that if there was an agreed communal proportion, taking into very serious consideration the position of the Anglo-Indian community and its Services (because we are all indenting on the past in our demands in this White Paper) taking that into consideration, and that we are given a certain percentage, I am prepared to waive this demand.

Dr. B. R. Ambedkar.

16,241. I realise from your Memorandum that you are very apprehensive of what may happen to your community under the new Constitution. I believe your apprehensions are shared by many other minorities. Therefore, the question I want to put to you is this:

Would it serve any purpose which you have in view if a provision was made in the Constitution that there should be some officer or some Department in the future Central Government of India which was charged with the statutory duty of presenting to Parliament annually a Report on the moral and material condition of the various communities in India? Do you think that proposal would be of any use to your community in drawing the attention of Parliament to anything that may have occurred in the course of the administration of various provinces affecting your material interests?—That proposal meets with my entire approval as the ultima thule of what would be the protection of minorities, but, as a preliminary canter to that, the minorities, in my humble submission, demand protection not in so far as someone who can report to the Houses of Parliament annually, but a practical protection.

16,242. Let me make myself clear. What I am suggesting is not in substitution of what you are asking; it may be supplemental to what you are asking?—Yes.

16,243. Do you agree with me that this opportunity, or this method of exposing possible abuses of power in itself serve as a check against any possible abuse?—I certainly think it would be a means of bringing to the Houses of Parliament anything in the way of a prejudicial effect on minority communities.

16,244. Not merely yours, but of many others?—Of all minorities.

Mr. Zafulla Khan.] What would Parliament be expected to do thereupon?

Dr. B. R. Ambedkar.] It would lie there. Parliament would take note of the various Governments. Not only should the Governor-General know, but Parliament should know how the various Governments are executing their responsibilities to the various minorities which are placed under their charge.

Sir Hari Singh Gour.] And you would call that provincial autonomy?

Dr. B. R. Ambedkar.] Yes; I certainly would.

Mr. M. R. Jayaker.

16,245. Is it not a fact, Sir Henry, that most of your social and economic trouble has arisen from the fact that your community taken as an entity has not been able to decide yet whether they would regard themselves as Indians and throw in their lot with Indians, or

10^c Novembris, 1933]Lieut.-Colonel Sir HENRY GIDNEY,
M.L.A., I.M.S. (Retired).

whether they would regard themselves as Europeans?—I am very glad that Mr. Jayaker has raised that issue, because it is very fundamental and very germane to my demand. With all respect to Mr. Jayaker, for whom I have a great regard, and I know he is a wellwisher of my community, I cannot accept that position. The position is this: The Anglo-Indian community has been advised time after time, and the last time was in the despatch issued by the Secretary of State to the Government of India in September, 1928, as a result of a deputation that I led before Lord Birkenhead in 1925. They were advised to accept the position of the statutory natives of India. We have always accepted that position. It is no use saying "call yourself an Indian," or "call yourself a European," when the Government itself has placed me in this very invidious position. For defence purposes the moment I don my khaki and my Sam Browne belt I am a European. When I am working with my brother in the workshop I am a statutory Indian, and I can change from one to the other from day to day. It is no use saying "Be an Indian out and out and have done with it." I have done so, and I have records here in which members of the Legislative Assembly have got up and said "We do not want anything but pure-blooded Indians, not Anglo-Indians."

Mr. A. H. Ghuznavi.

16,246. Who said that?—Mr. Neogy. Mr. Jayaker has raised a very important point. I have in and out of the Assembly claimed my position as a statutory Indian. In and out of the Assembly certain sections of Indians have refused that status. They have put me on the side of the Britisher the whole time. I am not against it. I am friends with the Britisher. I belong to both countries, but it is no use telling me "Call yourself an Indian and you will get this; call yourself a European, and you will get that," because when I have called myself an Indian, and have taken it on that plank I have been refused it in the Legislative Assembly by certain sections of Indians.

Mr. M. R. Jayaker.

16,247. I do not wish to cause any offence to you and your community; it is merely a question of economic and social status. Do you not think that this process to which you have referred, and cited the remarks of Mr. Neogy, is very much helped by the attitude of a very large number of the members of your community?—Not to-day.

16,248. Take what Mr. Zafrulla Khan referred to? When an Anglo-Indian accused is tried is it not a fact that in most cases (I will not give you the percentage) he claims to be tried as a European?—Yes, you are quite right.

16,249. That is exactly the point I am bringing out. Therefore, is it not a fact that this process goes on in your community (correct me if I am wrong) that when a member of your community goes beyond a certain status, or measure of affluence, he begins calling himself a European, and this process goes on so as to deprive your community of that social influence which a community is entitled to get by reason of its members rising from poverty to affluence. Is it not a fact that this process goes on?—I am sorry, but I cannot agree with you at all. When you use the word "European" I think it would have been better if you had said a European British subject.

16,250. I am speaking of that expression?—A European British subject is an entity which has a legal significance, and a man who has European parentage on the paternal side. It is that claim that the Anglo-Indian has put in for his trial in criminal cases, and he has had his reasons for it. I could cite a most terrible case which happened in Calcutta, where a Bengali barrister brought me the case and an Anglo-Indian was tried and denied the right of a European jury, although his father was in the Black Watch and fought in the Mutiny. He was convicted and sentenced to 10 years' imprisonment. I brought it before the High Court, and he was honourably acquitted. We claim to be tried by a jury that knows our manners, customs and ways the same as Europeans, and it is not a question of affluence for a man to claim his right of origin.

16,251. You have not applied your mind to the question. Does not this social depletion go on, if I may call it so, that as soon as members of your community get rich they practically go out of your community and call themselves by a different denomination, namely, European subjects?—No; Europeans.

10^o Novembris, 1933.] Lieut.-Colonel Sir HENRY GIDNEY,
M.L.A., I.M.S. (Retired).

16,252. So long as that goes on your community is bound to remain poor economically?—That is quite right.

16,253. And no amount of protection is going to make you rich so long as you allow this sort of social depletion to go on. That is what I am putting to you?—The same colour prejudice exists in India (it is a colour prejudice); it is nothing else but that.

16,254-5. I have not been able to see what is the status your community claims even in this Memorandum. Look at the last page. You have an extraordinarily worded statement. May I ask your attention to the last few lines. "Ask the devout Hindu to exchange his ancestral caste for secular advantage. Ask the pious Musalman to abandon his holy creed for temporal gain. Ask us to sell" (this is the point) "our British heritage for a mess of political pottage. In every case the answer is instant and clear. Ours speaks in the heart of each of us. It throbs in the blood that mingles with our breath. It leaps to our lips in the soul-stirring appeal—'O, England! Who are these if not thy sons?' " Turn from this to the heading "R. Summary," paragraph 1, "Nature of our demand," and take the last line: "equip ourselves to take our place on equal terms with the other communities in India, till we can stand on our feet." Do you not think that there is a conflict between these two sentiments?—No.

16,256. In one case you are claiming privileges as the descendants of the British. In the other case, you are claiming privileges on equal terms with other communities in India. If, therefore, a critic said to you: "Your attitude is to have the best of the two worlds," would he be very far wrong?—Absolutely wrong, because my appeal is made as the son of the English pioneers who went to India. I am not making an appeal for any special treatment. I simply appeal to the Joint Select Committee that, if they look upon me as anything, they must look upon me as one of their sons; the same as the Parsee is the son of the Persian. I say I want equal treatment for my community.

16,257. What Parsee calls himself a Persian? However, we will leave it there for the moment. Then you talk of political expediency having been the cause of the deterioration of your community in the Services. What do you mean by that? Lord Hardinge put it to you and one or two other questioners also put it to you. What do you mean by political expediency?—I mean the policy of the Government of India.

16,258. What is that policy—to penalise your community in particular?—It certainly has been sacrificed; the community has been sacrificed.

16,259. But is it not a fact that at one time you had the monopoly of the Government Services in certain Departments?—Yes.

16,260. And in the advance of education you have not been able to keep pace with the education tests and standards and you have lost. Is not that a fact?—Yes.

16,261. Then why do you say the Government have particularly sacrificed your community?—They certainly have. At one time we had nominations; at another time we had a certain community percentage. To-day they have overlooked all that in the demand of the larger communities in the Legislative Assembly.

16,262. The fact is, if I may put it to you, that all that monopoly, which you at one time enjoyed when education had not advanced, is now being reduced, but can you say that even your present proportion in the Services is not a great deal in excess of your population basis?—I do not understand what you mean by "in excess of population basis".

16,263. Take your population basis as 130,000. Those who class themselves as Europeans make it 128,000?—Actually it comes to about 150,000.

16,264. Take 150,000 and find out the ratio between 150,000 and the population of British India. Take the ratio. Do not you admit that even your present proportion in the Services is greatly in excess of that ratio?—Not if you compare other communities for other Services.

Mr. M. R. Jayaker.] I am not speaking of other Services. If you take the ratio between your total population and the total population of British India, do you not admit that, even now, with all the complaints which you make, with some of which I sympathise, your present ratio is in excess of your population basis?

Sir Hubert Carr.

16,265. Before Sir Henry answers that, might I interpose one question? Are you comparing the educated population of India or the total population?—That is what I was going to ask Mr. Jayaker.

10th November, 1933.]Lieut.-Colonel Sir HENRY GIDNEY,
M.L.A., I.M.S. (Retired).

Mr. M. R. Jayaker.

16,266. I am only putting it on the community basis which you claim here, namely, that your proportion in the Services should be guaranteed, and the only basis you can claim is the population basis?—With all respect, I do not agree with that, because these 250,000 or 500,000 jobs which are open to educated Indians and educated Anglo-Indians, are only open to the aggregate number of Indians.

16,267. May I ask you on what basis you justify this statement. "(d) Customs?"—"That at least 50 per cent. of appointments be reserved for Anglo-Indians and domiciled Europeans" in the particular Service that you refer to there. What is the justification for asking for 50 per cent. of those appointments except this basis that at one time you had 100 per cent. of those appointments which you have lost; and therefore you say: "Give us 50 per cent." Is not that the only basis?—That is not the basis that I ask for. I ask for the basis I have indicated in my memorandum, because the Customs is a Service that Indians are not likely to enter because it is not devoid of the hardships that the Anglo-Indian is so enured to. The Customs is a Department that has been entirely built up by the Anglo-Indian community, and it is a Department that serves a very useful purpose, especially in Bengal.

16,268. Then necessarily your claim must be that this 50 per cent. of appointments must be reserved as qua Anglo-Indians irrespective of any qualifications or efficiency?—No, they are efficient and they are qualified, too.

16,269. There is to be a different test for your own community?—No.

16,270. The same test?—The same test.

16,271. The same test is to be applied?—Yes.

16,272. Then why do you want 50 per cent. reservation? How is it going to work out?—Because there is the same demand made for other communities to-day.

16,273. I am speaking of your community. *Supposing there is a competitive examination and, say, 100 boys get through: as I understand your test, it is: reserve 50 per cent. of these?—But there is no competitive examination for the Customs.

16,274. Then how would you fill up these posts in the Customs?—They are all done by nomination.

16,275. And you want 50 per cent. to be done by nomination?—Yes. To-day you have 75 per cent.; I have come down to 50 per cent.

16,276. Your claim has nothing to do with the population basis or the educational test?—Yes.

16,277. Your grievance is, if I may say so: "At one time we had so many appointments. Now we want so many of them." You compare the present with the past?—Yes.

16,278. That is the only basis of your complaint?—That is the only criterion for the future.

16,279. Then there is one more point. On the question of the railways, paragraph (iv), you say: "We request that the present number of Anglo-Indians and domiciled Europeans, lower and upper subordinates and officials in railway employment, be not reduced for a period of at least 30 years." Do you think that is a reasonable demand, that your present proportion may be maintained for 30 years, even if other communities make an advance and get better qualifications?—I am not talking of railway engineering.

16,280. I am talking of railways. There is nothing to exclude the railway engineering Service from that?—There are all subordinate Departments.

16,281. You do not say that, Sir Henry. You say. "We desire that the present number of Anglo-Indians and domiciled Europeans be not reduced for at least 30 years." I am asking you whether you think that this principle should be maintained irrespective of the advance made by other communities?—I am asking that the present number be retained for a limited period of years and I do so because out of nearly 700,000 appointments, the Anglo-Indian community has only 13,000 now, so that is not going to kill any other community.

16,282. The same in the case with Telegraphs?—In the case of Telegraphs, out of 130,000 we have got 2,300. That is not going to kill any other community, but it means the life and death of my community.

16,283. I understand your point. I do not want to worry you too much. You say in paragraph (iii), under the heading of "Cabinets and Public Services Commissions"—"That the smaller minority communities be collectively represented by at least one member in all Cabinets and Public Services Commissions and that

10² Novembris, 1933.]Lieut.-Colonel Sir HENRY GIDNEY,
M.L.A., I.M.S. (Retired).

one of the Councillors"—you mean "Counsellors"—not "Councillors"?—Yes, that is only a clerical error.

16,284. "and that one of the Counsellors of the Governor-General should hold a portfolio to ensure the protection and putting into effect of all Minority interests." Whom do you mean in that clause by "smaller Minority communities"?—The Minorities can roughly be divided into one big powerful community. The Muslims, who will look after themselves—I know they will—and the other Minorities.

16,285. Whom do you mean by the "smaller Minority communities"?—The Sikhs, the Indian Christians, the Depressed Classes, the Anglo-Indians and the Europeans.

16,286. Then your proposal, if I may say so, is the same as Dr. Ambedkar put to you a few moments ago?—I have always suggested that.

16,287. Then would you have any objection if this portfolio were to be held by one of the Ministers?—Provided he is a member of one of the Minority communities.

16,288. I see. But this Counsellor is not going to be a member of the Minority community?—Mr. Jayaker, I think we are at variance.

16,289. Have I made my question clear to you?—No.

16,290. You say the Minister must be a member of the Minority community, and only then you will trust him. May I ask you: Is this Counsellor to be a member of the Minority community?—No, I am not saying that at all. I do not mean that, Mr. Jayaker. I mean this, if I may put it in a few words, I have always maintained that, in all Cabinets, whether you like it or not, communal representation will be observed, because no Cabinet in India will be formed without a certain number. With that, the Cabinet will have communalism introduced into it, but the White Paper says the more important Minorities, and the more important Minorities include ipso facto, the Depressed Classes, Anglo-Indians, Europeans, Indian Christians and Sikhs. I say let all these Minorities be represented by one representative in the Cabinet or let one of the Counsellors attached to the Viceroy be responsible for that portfolio, that is, to bring to the notice of His Excellency the Governor anything connected with the special protection of the Minorities.

16,291. I follow that. My question is very simple. In the case of a Minister you would make it a necessary condition before you give the portfolio to him that he must be drawn from one of the Minority communities?—Yes.

16,292. Would you make such a limitation in the case of a Governor's Counsellor?—No, I would not.

16,293. Why?—I do not see any reason for that. The Governor can select from whomever he wants.

16,294. In both cases the Governor has a special responsibility?—One is a responsibility; the other is the execution of that responsibility.

Mr. M. R. Jayaker.] That is all I ask you, Sir Henry; thank you very much.

Sir Hari Singh Gour.

16,295. Sir Henry, you said that your community is denuded at the top by a large number of your members classing themselves as Europeans. Is it not a fact that there is also an accession to your community at the bottom by a large number of Indian Christians calling themselves Anglo-Indians?—Very few to-day.

16,296. How many?—I do not think there are any to-day, because Indianisation has killed that. You get a job more as an Indian to-day than as an Anglo-Indian.

16,297. When the Anglo-Indians were a sheltered community a very large number of Indian Christians used to pass as Anglo-Indians?—Not a very large number.

16,298. What percentage?—I could not say. But there are some, the same as Anglo-Indians have posed as Europeans.

16,299. So you are suffering from denudation at the top and also an accession from the bottom?—Not to-day.

16,300. But you used to?—Yes.

16,301. Now you have said that you have a higher standard of living?—Yes.

16,302. And you are not able to compete on economic terms with an Indian employee?—Yes.

16,303. Take, for example, the railways: you would demand that members of your community doing the same work as an Indian should be paid higher wages?—No.

16,304. Then what do you want?—I demand nothing of that kind, and, Sir Hari Singh Gour, I would like to tell you that there is a new standard rate of pay

10^o Novembris, 1933.]Lieut-Colonel Sir HENRY GIDNEY,
M.L.A., I.M.S. (Retired).

in the Railways to all communities, there is no difference in pay at all to Anglo-Indians, Europeans or others.

16,305. You have said under Head (g) —“Previous Representations made by the Community”—that “the community, being accustomed to the European modes of living, has an economic standard much above that of the Indian, which makes competition with the Indian entirely impossible”?—Yes.

16,306. Take for example the railways. Do you want to have the reservation of places in the railways on the same footing as Indians or upon better pay?—No, the same footing.

16,307. Therefore, you want that there should be reservation in the higher ranks of the railway service, because when it comes down to the level where you cannot compete with the Indian, you want no competition at all?—I am not competing with the Indian for at least 700,000 of the jobs in the railways.

16,308. You do not compete because you cannot compete?—I am not competing.

16,309. Because you cannot compete?—Yes.

16,310. Then you want that out of the better paid jobs you should get a share?—Out of the jobs that demand a certain efficiency.

16,311. In that intermediate region where you want reservation of posts, are not those posts filled either by promotion from the lower ranks or by competition?—To-day the lower posts are filled by nomination by Selection Committees.

16,312. With due reserve to the claims of all communities?—Yes.

16,313. You know that the Legislative Assembly at the time you were a member passed a resolution for the commercialisation of the Railways and Posts and Telegraphs?—Yes.

16,314. And, consequently, these three Departments of Government must be run on a strictly commercial basis, which implies that they must employ the cheapest agency to do the work for which the employees are employed; is not that so?—I suppose that is so.

16,315. Now you say that you have 85 per cent. of your community employed in Government Services?—Yes.

16,316. Do you know that there is a very large number of European firms in India trading in jute, cotton, tea, and various other industries?—Yes, in Calcutta.

16,317. What percentage of your community is employed by those European firms?—Very small.

16,318. Is it not a fact that they are not employed because the European firms find it cheaper to employ Indians?—For their menial labour, yes; but for their staff they get them mainly from England.

16,319. Therefore, they do not employ members of your community, and yet their protagonist who sits behind me wants your community to be employed by Government?—Yes. May I amplify that by saying that the European firms in India are certainly making every endeavour to recruit Anglo-Indians in their staffs, owing to the lower salaries, and most of their stenographers and typists are Anglo-Indian women.

16,320. That is a very insignificantly small number compared to what they might employ?—That is right, because many hundreds of Anglo-Indian ladies are employed in offices; but there is one thing I may say, that there are very few, if any, Indian firms who employ Anglo-Indians.

16,321. The Indian firms and the European firms both err on the same side by not employing Anglo-Indians to the extent that you would wish them to employ them?—Yes.

16,322. You want the Government to reserve for thirty years certain appointments. You have said that your number is 90,000, and it would be 150,000 if you include men and women and children, and all old men; that is the aggregate. Is it not so?—Yes.

16,323. Out of that we will cut about 50 per cent. as children and old men and old women?—No, not a bit.

16,324. What percentage would you suggest?—50 per cent. of the old women?

16,325. No; children below the age of 15?—43,000 children below the age of 15. I have erred on the side of exaggeration; that includes European children. I should say 35,000.

16,326. From the 150,000 we deduct 35,000. They cannot be employed because they are of school-going age, and the superannuated members of your community?—I could not give you that figure.

16,327. We will say roughly 100,000 of adult men of working age?—I would say well over 100,000.

16,328. How many persons were employed ten years ago in all the Government Services, Railways, Posts, Tele-

10^o Novembris, 1933.]Lieut.-Colonel Sir HENRY GIDNEY,
M.L.A., I.M.S. (Retired).

graphs and Customs? What was the aggregate number of Anglo-Indians employed ten years back?—I can only give you that information in a very positive statement to this effect, that ten years ago, when the census was taken in India, there were not a thousand Anglo-Indians unemployed; to-day there are over 20,000.

16,329. Your case is, therefore, that ten years ago, roughly speaking, every one of the adult members of your community was employed by Government?—Or by various other employers. When Sir Hari Singh Gour says "employed by Government," those are not my words. There were other employments very largely resorted to by the Anglo-Indian community some years ago which they have not to-day on account of their poverty.

16,330. They have been thrown out of employment now to what extent?—Nearly 20,000 of them to-day are unemployed.

16,331. One-fifth of them have lost their jobs?—Yes; and, what is more, the boys and girls who are coming out of our splendid Anglo-Indian schools to-day are finding it impossible to get employment.

16,332. What percentage of educated Indians ten years ago had employment under State service, and what percentage are employed to-day?—That I could not tell you.

16,333. Therefore you are not in a position to compare how in the economic world your community has suffered vis-à-vis the other communities of India?—I can now.

16,334. Then tell us?—In a certain way.

Sir Hari Singh Gour.] Not in a certain way; in my way; I want these figures.

Chairman.

16,335. Let us hear the way?—I do not know Sir Hari Singh Gour's way, but may I tell your Lordship that when he asks me that question it is impossible for me to carry figures for the whole of India in my head. I can only make this inference, that, according to the educated population of India, there are only one million educated Indians who have taken a secondary standard in English, and there are nearly 700,000 jobs I am talking of. There are one million Indians as competitors for 700,000 jobs in which I am in competition with 85,000 of my people who are educated. Here are 150,000 jobs facing them. On the other hand, you have a million Indians educated in English; you have 85,000 Anglo-Indians; the percentage is 8.5.

Sir Hari Singh Gour.

16,336. You state, Sir Henry, under Head "G" of your Memorandum, that your community sent a mission in 1829, over 100 years ago, to present a Petition to the Houses of Parliament for the protection and uplifting of your community, and that that mission returned empty-handed?—Yes.

16,337. And since then you have been sending mission after mission, with the same result. Why did that mission return empty-handed 100 years ago?—That is very ancient history.

16,338. But you have given the ancient history?—I will give it to you. I will tell you, Sir Hari Singh Gour, if you will allow me to, that nearly 100 years ago, when Mr. Ricketts came to this country and presented a Petition to the House of Commons, this country was then embroiled in its own election, in civic disturbance and in certain other things, and beyond the presentation of the Petition to the House of Lords and the House of Commons, no action whatever was taken. The reason why no action was taken was because the country was embroiled in its own troubles.

16,339. You have further said that the Montagu-Chelmsford and Simon Commissions Reports have only given expression to pious words of sympathy and goodwill, but have made no suggestion whatever to improve your community?—Yes.

16,340. Therefore, your position is that for the last 100 years your case has been before Parliament and before the various responsible Commissions and Committees and they have not yet given you practical support to your demands?—I have not said anything of the kind.

16,341. Is not that the net result of what you have said in your Memorandum under that heading?—No. In one part of my Memorandum I have said that time was when most of these appointments were held by Anglo-Indians. Only recently, especially since the introduction of the Reforms, has the community been prejudicially affected.

Dr. Shafa'at Ahmad Khan.

16,342. Sir Henry, the chief reason, I suppose, why you desire the reservation

10^o Novembris, 1933.]Lieut.-Colonel Sir HENRY GIDNEY,
M.L.A., I.M.S. (Retired).

of posts for your community is that your community has been traditionally connected with the Services?—Yes.

16,343. And if there is a general clearance, if I may say so, of your community from these Services, it will not have any other source of livelihood?—That is right.

16,344. Therefore, you desire that the Constitution Act should lay down the exact percentage and proportion in all the Central Services in which you have specialised, so that, for the future, your community may be safeguarded?—Yes.

Dr. Shafa'at Ahmad Khan.] Do you think it is fair to other communities to have the exact percentage detailed and embodied in the Constitution?

Sir Hubert Carr.

16,345 About 33½ per cent.?—It may not be fair; it may introduce an anomaly; but the White Paper is full of anomalies, and one more anomaly will not worsen it.

16,346. So you admit it is an anomaly?—I would not say that. I will tell you why, Dr. Shafa'at Ahmad Khan, because the communal percentage of a definite character is to-day being operated by the Government of India. I will not go into which community it is because all Delegates are familiar with it, and rightly so. It has been operated in favour of a community which has been absolutely ignored in the past. Why should one community be singled out? I make this positive statement that, with retrenchment and economy being the order of the day, no new appointments are being created, but every appointment that is given to an Indian is taken from a European, or an Anglo-India. That is a positive fact which no one can deny. I do not say it is wrong. They must get their appointments.

Sardar Buta Singh.

16,347. Thank you?—But it is going on every day, and within the last few years I have been deprived of over 1,000 of my appointments; 7 per cent. of my appointments.

Dr. Shafa'at Ahmad Khan.

16,348. I am not against percentages for various communities in the Services, but I am against percentages in the Constitution Act. Do you insist on a specific percentage being laid down in the Constitution Act for your community? That is my point?—My Memorandum demands that this protection should find a place in the Constitution Act. Whether it finds a place in the Constitution itself, or in the Instrument of Instructions, which I understand will be on a statutory basis, is not very material, provided the protection is supplied and power is given to the Governor-General or the Governors, or the Public Service Commission, that that should be put into effect.

16,349. So far as the question of protection of Anglo-Indians is concerned, you probably know the United Provinces Simon Committee was the first Committee which recommended certain safeguards for your community in certain Services?—I remember it, and I remember it with great gratitude to you, for you were largely instrumental in bringing it about.

Mr. Butler.

16,350. You said the Instrument of Instructions would be on a statutory basis. Is that your conception of the Instrument of Instructions?—I believe Sir Samuel Hoare has informed us so.

16,351. I do not think that is the description of the Instrument of Instructions which the Secretary of State has given, and I would refer you to his statement on that subject for the correct interpretation of the basis of the Instrument of Instructions?—If it is not to be on a statutory basis, the Instrument of Instructions will be as useless to the community as the present Instrument of Instructions is. It has never been operated.

Lord Rankeillour.

16,352. Is it not a fact that one of the clauses in the White Paper says that the Instrument of Instructions will contain certain provisions. Those, presumably, in the Act will be repeated, and those, therein set forth will be statutory. It will be mandatory on the Instrument of Instructions to contain those provisions?—What Lord Rankeillour says is right. I thank him for it. If that is right it would be ample for me. If it is of a mandatory character it is equal in practice to a statute.

Sir Hari Singh Gour.] It is the other way about, because if they became subject to a statute they would be subject to interpretation by the Federal or Provincial Courts, and, if I remember rightly, the Secretary of State said that should be avoided.

10^o Novembris, 1933.]Lieut.-Colonel Sir HENRY GIDNEY,
M.L.A., I.M.S. (Retired).

Marquess of Reading.] I understood the Secretary of State on the last occasion we discussed this to say that, according to his last statement that no longer applied in the strict sense. There was no question of making it part of the Schedule, or anything of that character, but what he would say was that he undertook to lay a draft of the Instrument of Instructions before the Committee, so that they would see it.

Sir Hari Singh Gour.

16,353. That is so?—If that is so, I stand corrected, and I hold to the demand, with all humility, that it should be incorporated in the Statute.

Lord Rankeillour.

16,354. Would it not be the fact that if the Constitution Act contained a section embodying Proposal 21, it would be necessary under the statute to put those provisions in the Instrument of Instructions, and they would thereby become statutory?—I thank you for that advice. If proposal 21 is embodied and it is to become statutory I would be satisfied if it were in the Instrument of Instructions. If not, I demand, with all humility, that it should be incorporated in the Statute in some way or other.

Lord Eustace Percy.] It was on that very point that I put a question to the Secretary of State for the purpose of eliciting what the intention of the Government was, and he stated quite clearly that it was not the intention of the Government that the Instrument of Instructions should be so referred to in the Constitution Act as to make it interpretable by the Courts.

Marquess of Reading.] That is right.

Lord Eustace Percy.] That being the case, I will leave it there.

Dr. Shafa'at Ahmad Khan.

16,355. I thought, Sir Henry Gidney, in reply to a former question put by Mr. Jayaker, you agreed that if the Governor is given power to safeguard your interests, and if a clause to that effect is inserted in the Instrument of Instructions, you would probably be satisfied?—If it is of a statutory character.

16,356. But if it is not of a statutory character you would like it put in the Statute itself?—Yes. I have very great reasons for it, because, although it is there in large letters in the Instrument of Instructions to-day, it has never been put into operation and, with all respect to Ministers attached to various Provincial Governments, the non-observance has been due to the influence some of them have brought to bear, rightly so, on behalf of their community. The Governor has never operated that Instrument of Instructions which it was specifically stated by the Montagu-Chelmsford Report should apply to the Anglo-Indian community.

Mr. N. M. Joshi.

16,357. There is no Instrument of Instructions to the Ministers?—I am not talking of the Ministers. I am saying the Governors have been influenced by the Ministers.

Dr. Shafa'at Ahmad Khan.

16,358. All the contentions you have put forward concerning various Services will have to be embodied in the Constitution Act?—If the Instrument of Instructions is not capable of embodying them to our satisfaction.

16,359. Supposing it is not possible to embody them on a satisfactory basis all the claims you put forward, a very large number, you will admit, must be incorporated in the Constitution Act?—I am not a draftsman, but I would suggest the insertion of such a clause that the interests of the Anglo-Indian and domiciled European community should be amply safeguarded, and that the details of those will be found in the detailed instructions for the Governor and Governor-General.

Mr. Butler.

16,360. Under the White Paper proposals the Governor-General will have a special responsibility for the interests of the minority communities?—I know that, but I form such a speck in the minority community. 33½ per cent. of the appointments to-day are given to minorities. I come nowhere in that.

16,361. Do you say you receive none of the appointments given to the minority communities? You are not included in the 33½ per cent.?—Very few.

16,362. That is not a correct interpretation of the position as it exists at present?—If you look at the official figures in the Postal Department, out of 47 appointments given for the Engineer's Department of the Telegraphs, only four have been given to us. Out of 19 in a certain Section of the Postal Department none have been given to us in certain Departments. We have been excluded because the other Indians have been taken in.

10² Novembris, 1933.] Lieut.-Colonel SIR HENRY GIDNEY,
M.L.A., I.M.S. (Retired).

Mr. Zafrulla Khan.

16,363. Four out of 47 would be slightly over 8 per cent. of the total?—Mr. Zafrulla Khan, I mentioned that for this reason: The Engineer's Department of the Telegraphs was built from the beginning to to-day by Anglo-Indians and we have a special claim on this Branch.

Mr. M. R. Jayaker.

16,364. That is the main grievance of your community that what you were in the past you are not now?—I indent on my bank of the past, and I am in good company when I do that, when I look at my friend Sardar Buta Singh. He claims privileged treatment for his Military Service in the past. I base my claim on that. The great community to which my friend, Dr. Shafa'at Ahmad Khan, belongs base their claim on the fact that his community has had nothing to do in the past with subversive movements in India. I base my claim on that. Then there is my friend, Sir Hubert Carr. He bases his claim for Commercial Safeguards on the amount of money that has been sunk in India in the past. Again I base my claim on the 300 years of service we have rendered to the country in the past.

Sir Hari Singh Gour.

16,365. You must apply to Parliament for a political pension?—When Sir Hari Singh Gour becomes Prime Minister I shall apply.

Dr. Shafa'at Ahmad Khan.

16,366. Personally I feel considerable difficulty in commenting upon the proposal you have made, and I think that it would be really impracticable. Would not you be satisfied if a general provision is incorporated in the Instrument of Instructions requiring the Governor or the Governor-General to protect the interests of minorities in Public Services?—I am very sorry, Dr Shafa'at Ahmad Khan, because I know how difficult it is for you, having regard to the opinions you have already expressed, and also the great part you took on the Services Sub-Committee, but a general provision like that would not satisfy my community. I want a specific reference to it.

Mr. Butler.

16,367. If it were based on the general agreement as to communal proportions, would that satisfy you?—Yes.

Dr. Shafa'at Ahmad Khan.

16,368. That would?—Yes. I would suggest that there should be a representative in the Lower Federal House.

Mr. Zafrulla Khan.

16,369. I want to put one or two questions to you in order to understand your proposals with regard to some matters you have put forward. I have no desire to argue the merits of your proposals. With regard to this grievance that you have as to juries, is your position this that any accused person, it does not matter what he may be, European, Anglo-Indian or Indian, when he is brought before the Court in a case where there is to be a jury trial should have the right to demand any kind of jury that he prefers—wholly European, partly European and partly Indian, or entirely Indian. Is that your position?—Mr. Zafrulla Khan, correct me if I am wrong, I am not a lawyer, but I do not think anyone can demand a jury wholly European—a majority.

16,370. I am not asking what the position is now. I am asking you what you wish the position to be?—That is exactly what it is. Every man should have the right.

16,371. To have any kind of jury he likes?—Yes.

Mr. Zafrulla Khan.] Supposing every man brought to trial demanded a European jury, or a European majority, there would not be enough Europeans in India to serve on these juries even if they served all their time on the juries.

Sir Hubert Carr.] Is not that applicable only to inter-racial cases? It is not where a European is against a European.

Mr. Zafrulla Khan.] Where there is a European alone, he can have an entire European jury.

Sir Hari Singh Gour.] No, not an entire European jury, a majority.

Mr. Zafrulla Khan.

16,372. Not an entire European jury, a majority. I ask Sir Henry Gidney what he desires. Let us say he desired that every accused person should be entitled to have a jury of the complexion he likes. How would it work out in practice if every Anglo-Indian desired a jury with a European majority, as he says, every Anglo-Indian should be entitled to desire?—That is the problem that faced the Racial Committee under Sir William Vincent. If I remember rightly, it was on that very point that

10^o Novèmbris, 1933.]Lieut.-Colonel Sir HENRY GIDNEY,
M.L.A., I.M.S. (Retired).

the compromise was arrived at. I know that was discussed. I do not think the objection is so formidable as my friend Mr. Zafrulla Khan has stated, because the cases are few and far between, and these cases are taken to different Courts, or different States, where a European or an Indian jury is always easily obtainable.

16,373. You would not make any distinction with a European and an Anglo-Indian: You would not say you would wish to add that category to the European so that they would be able to demand a particular jury?—I am not going to introduce a racial distinction. Whether he is Anglo-Indian, European, or Indian, let him get the jury he wants. Why should you confine it to one, and claim legitimacy proof from one and not from the other?

16,374. The moment you had a definition whoever came under that definition could be challenged, and would have to prove it, and, if you want to get out of the difficulty of having to prove any particular definition as applicable to you, you would have to accept the position that any accused person could have the right to select a jury, provided it was a jury trial. I understand your position?—No difficulty is so great as to prevent the administration of justice.

16,375. True. With regard to the privileges of various kinds you have been asking for, whatever may eventually emerge with regard to that, surely you would admit that the children of all marriages between Indians and Europeans and their descendants (it does not matter whether the father is an Indian and the mother is a European) would be entitled to claim the benefit of that?—Yes.

16,376. And you would not keep them out?—No.

16,377. So that if the proportions which might be fixed for you were filled with some of those who are commonly known as Anglo-Indians, and the rest from the class of Muslim or Hindu children of European and Indian marriages, you would have no objection to that being done?—No.

16,378. One thing I want to clear up is with regard to the numbers that you have been mentioning in the course of your evidence. I understand the total number of persons at present classified as Anglo-Indians is about 98,000 in British India—say, 100,000 roughly?—No, Mr.

Zafrulla Khan. I might tell you that this has been a matter on which the Census Commissioner has himself had to write a subsidiary note in which he said it has been under-estimated.

16,379. What is your estimate?—175,000 at least.

Sir Hari Singh Gour.

16,380. It was five minutes ago 150,000. Have you gone up to 175,000 since?—My Lord Chairman, Sir Hari Singh Gour should not put words or meanings into my mouth that I do not intend to convey. When I said 150,000 I quoted his statement. I have repeated in this room that the total population of my community is a varying one. To my mind it is about 175,000.

Mr. Zafrulla Khan.

16,381. Very good. In that 175,000 you are including the 30,000 odd who rank as Europeans?—Yes.

16,382. Therefore, in your estimates on the other side, as to how many are employed and how many are unemployed, you were excluding that 30,000?—Yes.

16,383. Consequently your 175,000 must be considerably reduced for the purpose of considering how many of you are employed or are unemployed?—Yes.

16,384. Therefore, would 100,000 or 120,000 be a fair figure according to you?—Yes, about 135,000.

16,385. That includes women and children, does it not?—Yes.

16,386. When employment is considered, particularly in India, in the Railway Department, the Telegraph Department, and so on, it is only adult men who are kept in view because no women are employed on the railways?—Yes.

16,387. Therefore, out of the 135,000 half would be women, roughly?—That is right.

16,388. That would give us about 67,000, would it not?—Yes.

16,389. And out of those 67,000, roughly again, only half would be over 21?—I should say more than that because you have excluded the children.

16,390. No, I have not yet excluded the children. I have said out of the 135,000 half are women?—Yes.

16,391. That gives us 67,000 males, including children?—Yes.

16,392. I should say certainly not more than half would be over 21?—Of males?

16,393. Males?—Yes.

16th November, 1933.] Lieut.-Colonel Sir HENRY GIDNEY,
M.L.A., I.M.S. (Retired).

16,394. That gives us roughly 33,000, the figure to be considered for the purposes of employment. You say 25,000 odd jobs are held by your community. Yet you say there is a figure of 20,000 representing unemployment. How do you reconcile those figures?—Not a bit. If you have brought me to that calculation I will have to take my calculation now. When I put down the 25,000 I included the Domiciled Europeans.

16,395. The 25,000 odd jobs include the Domiciled Europeans?—Yes.

16,396. You want reservation of how many out of these 25,000? How many of these 25,000 are held by the Anglo-Indians?—I am more familiar with the railways. There are 13,600 Anglo-Indians on the railways and about 2,800 Domiciled Europeans—roughly 16,000.

16,397. My question is: How many Anglo-Indians are employed in railways and other Government Departments altogether in India?—I could not tell you in all other Departments, but I could tell you with some accuracy in the railways.

16,398. So really you could not tell us how many posts altogether you want reserved?—I can. I have said about 25,000.

16,399. I shall not pursue that further, because we cannot deal with the confusion between the Anglo-Indian and the European on this point?—The domiciled European.

16,400. Very good. Would you kindly look at the paragraph of your Memorandum dealing with the numbers of subordinates whose salaries rise to 250 rupees per mensem? Here you put forward some figures and presumably make a complaint that the recruitment of Anglo-Indians to these 1,003 new appointments was much less than you would have desired it to be, and you say you obtained only 7.4 per cent. of these 1,003 new appointments?—Yes.

16,401. You also say that the Muslims obtained 9.9 per cent. Considering that you are one to seven hundred Muslims in India, do you think you have a peculiar grievance in this matter?—I think myself, Mr. Zafrulla Khan, that the Mohammedans and the Muslims have a more serious grievance than any other community in India. I was responsible for bringing to the notice of the Muslim community that they should fight for a larger representation, as to which up to now they had remained quiet. I submit that the Muslims have been poorly represented in the railways, and they deserve more attention than any of the other communities.

Sardar Buta Singh.

16,402. I wish to put one or two questions to Sir Henry, with your permission, my Lord Chairman. Sir Henry, I must thank you for the replies that you have given to one of my colleagues. It appears that you have got a soft heart with regard to my community?—Very.

16,403. Then I will refer you to page 71 of the Proceedings of the Second Round Table Conference, Appendix IV. There there is a statement from the Simon Commission Report to this effect "It is a striking circumstance that this small community" (that is the Sikh community, my community) "contributed no less than 80,000 men to serve in the Great War—a larger proportion than any other community in India"?—Yes.

16,404. Do you agree with the statement, "than any other community in India"?—In total figures.

16,405. Yes?—But not per capita of the population.

16,406. No. I want to ask you another question. I should like to call your attention to the fact that the people of my community rendered very distinguished and conspicuous service on all the fronts at different stages of the war?—I agree with you entirely.

16,407. Then I would draw your kind attention to page 66 of the same Report, Appendix III: "Provisions for a Settlement of the Communal Problem, put forward jointly by Muslims, Depressed Classes, Indian Christians, Anglo-Indians and Europeans"?—Yes.

16,408. A Minority Pact was formed and you were one of its distinguished members?—I started it.

16,409. Thank you all the same. There were other very distinguished members?—Sir Hubert Carr was one of them.

16,410. Members of the Round Table Conference such as His Highness The Aga Khan, Dr. Ambedkar, Sir Hubert Carr, and another Christian gentleman, Rao Bahadur Pannir Selvam?—Yes.

16,411. And there, although my Sikh predecessors sat round the Round Table Conference, they did not take part in the deliberations carried out by this Minority Pact, but still a certain percentage of seats were allotted to my community. I would draw your attention again to page 70 of the same Report. You see there that out of 100, 20 per cent. of the total strength of members of that Punjab Legislature were allotted to the Sikhs. Is that true?—Yes.

16,412. And in the Central Legislature out of 200 my community were allotted six seats; that is on page 69?—Yes, six in the Upper House and 10 in the Lower House.

16,413 Then I think you would agree with me that my community in the Punjab is a very important minority?—Very important.

16,414. And they have got all their interests in the Punjab; their religious shrines and institutions and everything in the Province?—Yes.

16,415. Not only that, but you know that they pay a very large amount of land revenue—much beyond their population basis?—Yes, I believe so.

16,416 And you are aware that in the Communal Award which was given by the Premier we were given a less proportion than I have just referred to?—That is so.

16,417. Only one other question. Are you aware, Sir Henry Gidney, that every year hundreds and thousands of graduates graduate from the different Universities of India?—Yes, I am aware of that.

16,418. Are you also aware that they are roaming about the streets without getting any employment?—No, I am not aware of that.

16,419. This you would admit, that the proportion of the posts is very much limited in accordance with the number which is turned out every year from these Universities; the prospect of getting posts is very limited?—I believe the supply is greater than the demand.

16,420. And on account of this retrenchment the number of unemployed is much more increased?—Yes.

Marquess of Salisbury.

16,421. Sir Henry Gidney, I understand from your evidence that apart from all these questions of percentages you anticipate that in a short time if nothing is done Anglo-Indians will lose all or practically all public employment?—I am as certain of that, Lord Salisbury, as that night follows the day

16,422. Apart from any question of percentage that is what will happen, and you consider that whatever is the Government of India at that time will be presented with this problem of how to deal with this community which has lost its employment?—That is so 16,423. You consider that a great obligation rests upon the British Government and on Parliament to protect the Anglo-Indian community in case such a contingency should happen?—That is not only my opinion but it is the opinion of the Government of India, who in their Despatch on Constitutional Reform reply on the railways said that the future of the Anglo-Indian community is a responsibility upon Parliament.

16,424. Having studied the White Paper, you do not find in the White Paper any provisions which would ensure that protection?—None at all.

16,425 And you think that some such protection ought to be inserted in the White Paper?—I do.

16,426. You have been asked whether it would be sufficient if it were in the Instrument of Instructions or in the Statute and you were not able to accept the Instrument of Instructions alone?—No.

16,427. But probably you would admit that if there were some provision put in the Instrument of Instructions it would be of assistance to you?—I would reply very hesitatingly to that.

Major Cadogan.

16,428. Might I refer to what you say in your Memorandum on that subject under the heading, "J—Protection Claimed". "The community also feels that if these powers are merely to be repeated in the Instrument of Instructions, they will be of very little material value." Then you give reasons?—Yes.

Marquess of Salisbury.

16,429. At any rate, you think that some protection should be provided in the White Paper and you do not find it there?—I do not find it at all.

16,430. You think it is partly the duty of His Majesty's Government and those who are responsible for the White Paper to provide some protection?—I look upon it as a moral duty of the British nation.

Lord Middleton.

16,431. Sir Henry, in Chapter K of your Memorandum dealing with "Railways," you mention that your community is entitled to employment on the railways, and you make a special reference to "the transportation of troops during

10^o Novembris, 1933.]Lieut.-Colonel Sir HENRY GIDNEY,
M.L.A., I.M.S. (Retired).

the various wars, a service which cannot be demed or adequately valued in terms of rupees, annas and pies." What exactly do you imply by that?—It is a matter which one hesitates to emphasise, but one has to face the position. There is not the faintest doubt, Lord Middleton, that the community has been the backbone of the railways in all strikes, especially strikes which have happened during unrests. Indeed so great has been this backbone and so strong has been the stability that when the Labour Commission came out to India one of the chief Labour exponents on that Commission called me a blackleg because I was loyal to the Government during the strike. I am speaking with all respect to the views that the Labour Member held. We have been the backbone of the Government, and the Government has always been able to depend upon us in all railway strikes. I go further, Lord Middleton. If I were in a position to make a Pact with the Indian members of the railway—and I am not saying all Indian members are disloyal—not at all, but to-day the Indian Labour Union on the Railways is run by political people and any political demand is always reperculated in a Labour upheaval on the railways. If we were to be inclined to join with them the railways in India would be paralysed and the Government would have to give in to our terms.

Mr. N. M. Joshi.

16,432. Are you not President of the National Union in which there is a large number of Anglo-Indians?—I am admittedly President of the National Union of Railwaymen, which is one of the best Unions in the whole of India.

16,433. Are you a politician?—I try to be one.

16,434. Therefore why do you blame Indian Unions for having politicians?—That Labour Union has been the means of stability in the whole of the G.I.P. Railway, and it has been recognised by the Government as such because it has Anglo-Indians on it.

Lord Middleton

16,435. With regard to franchise, you asked that membership of the Auxiliary Force should be a qualification of enfranchisement. Is it correct that only Europeans and Anglo-Indians are enlisted in this Force, and in what way are members of your community con-scribed into a voluntary force?—Lord Middleton, the employment of an Anglo-Indian on every railway in India has as a term precedent to employment a condition that he must serve as an active member of the Auxiliary Force, which is the second line of defence of the British Army. In the agreement that every railwayman signs there is a certain clause which says, "Will you serve in the Auxiliary Force?" or words to that effect, and he has to say, "Yes." If he says, "No," he is not employed.

16,436. Is it a grievance that other races do not have to fulfil those conditions?—It is not a grievance to me. I am proud of being a member of that community; but it is preferential treatment that the Government has introduced. On the other hand when I say, "Give me some statutory protection in the White Paper," you say, "I cannot do it."

Marquess of Zetland.

16,437. I should like, if I might, to try to clear up one question about which I am completely in the dark, and that is with regard to the actual numbers of your community. Let me put my difficulty. In the Report of the Franchise Committee the male population of your community is put at just over 50,000?—Do you mean in the last Census Report, Lord Zetland?

16,438. No; these are the figures given in the Report of the Franchise Committee?—Yes.

16,439. In which they say that the male population of your community is 50,000?—Yes.

16,440. Now what proportion of that would be adults?—Lord Zetland, might I correct that? That only refers to British India. It does not refer to Indian India, in which one-third of my community exists, or Burma.

16,441. That figure only refers to the Provinces of British India?—That is so, and even then that was corrected by the Commissioners' note that a certain percentage should be added.

16,442. That clears up that difficulty; thank you. Then your main remark with regard to employment in the future is to be found under the heading "I.—Comparisons," in my copy of your Memorandum, in which you ask that for a period of 30 years 25,000 appointments should be statutorily reserved for you—at least that is how I understand it. Is not that so?—Yes.

10^o Novembris, 1933.]Lieut.-Colonel Sir HENRY GIDNEY,
M.L.A., I.M.S. (Retired).

16,443. 'Are those 25,000 appointments spread over the whole of India in Central Services and Provincial Services?—Yes.

16,444. The whole of your State employment?—Yes.

16,445. And you say that at the end of those 30 years you want a statutory guarantee that adequate employment should be secured to your community. What do you mean by a statutory guarantee of adequate employment?—Lord Zetland, I would, with the Lord Chairman's permission, like to supplement or rather implement it in this way: I do not ask for a statutory guarantee, because I do not see how you can guarantee in perpetuity, but that an adequate number of Anglo-Indians and domiciled Europeans will be employed so long as recruitment to the Services is based upon communal representation.

16,446. But what do you mean by adequate?—"Adequate" is a very elastic and convenient term.

16,447. That is why I wanted to know what you mean by it. At any rate, I understand what you mean is a certain proportional representation in the different Services. You cannot put it more precisely than that?—There are various ways in which this adequacy can be gained or assessed. There is one way that I would bring before the Committee, and that is really a practical way. For these appointments a certain knowledge of English is required, and in the whole of India there are a million Indians who are educated as I have just said, and then against that there are 85,000 Anglo-Indians and domiciled Europeans who are adequately educated; that gives you 8.5 per cent. of those appointments straight off, or 8 per cent., but if you gave me 8 per cent. of those appointments I would not have enough men to get those jobs. The result is that I have not got that. That is one way in which it can be adequate.

16,448. There is one other question I want to ask you, because it is not quite clear to me. Is the recruitment for the 25,000 appointments referred to in your Memorandum mainly by competitive examination or mainly by selection after a qualifying examination?—Mainly by selection; there is no qualifying examination.

16,449. No qualifying examination at all?—No. For instance, I take the railways; twice a week there is a Selection Committee sits consisting of a certain number of officials, and before them come, say, 50 to 100 candidates, and they just go through the line and select their candidates.

16,450. But do those 100 candidates not have to have any educational qualification at all?—Yes, they are supposed to have an educational qualification.

16,451. That is what I meant by a qualifying examination?—Yes, I beg your pardon. But there is no examination there; they have to possess a certain standard of education.

16,452. But the curriculum in the Anglo-Indian schools surely differs from the curriculum in the ordinary English schools and colleges?—Markedly. It brings the Anglo-Indian lad two years later almost than the Indian lad into the market for employment.

16,453. But how is the standard of the two different curricula brought together for the purposes of recruitment?—The Senior Cambridge and the Matriculation are brought on a par. The Matriculation is passed as a rule at a very much earlier age by the Indians than by the Anglo-Indians.

16,454. What did you say the corresponding qualification was in the case of the Anglo-Indian? Is it the Cambridge Local?—No, the Senior Cambridge, which is a very much higher examination than Matriculation.

Lord Rankeillour.

16,455. Sir Henry, in spite of what has fallen from Lord Reading, would you think it worth while to put an amendment such as you desire into Proposal 21, because, although it might not be enforceable by the Court, it will be the duty of the Secretary of State and ultimately the responsibility of this Parliament to enforce it. I mean a mention in the Instrument of Instructions. Do you think it is worth while?—If that is going to enhance the protection, I would accept it.

16,456. Has this same problem arisen with your community in the Protectorates of foreign countries, say, in Goa or Pondicherry?—Goa is Portuguese.

16,457. Yes, I know?—Goa is mainly an agricultural country.

16,458. What about Pondicherry?—I do not think there is any community there.

16,459. There is nothing to be learned from there?—No. The comparison I would make of preferential treatment is the Dutch Indies. In the Dutch Indies

10² Novembris, 1933.] Lieut.-Colonel Sir HENRY GIDNEY,
M.L.A., I.M.S. (Retired)

the Dutch Javanese have all the appointments the mixed races have all the appointments.

16,460. You referred at the beginning to certain appointments in the Postal Department. I did not quite understand that. You said they were not advertised and were distributed by way of patronage. To what appointments do you refer there?—When I referred to the Post Office I referred to it as an instance of a Department in which the Anglo-Indian was to-day almost extinct, although but a few years ago he played a large part.

16,461. What were these appointments which you said were not advertised and were made privately so that the members of your community could not get a chance of applying for them?—Mainly clerical appointments.

16,462. Who made them?—The Superintendent of the Office.

16,463. He has power to make these appointments?—He generally brings it to the ear of the head of the office, and the practice has been admitted by Government in the Despatch on the Representation of Muslims on the Railway. Mr. Hussan made that charge against those who got their brethren into offices.

16,464. And you support that?—I support that. That has been the curse of the whole thing.

16,465. Does that apply to original appointments?—Original appointments.

16,466. And promotions?—Promotions depend on so many factors.

16,467. You are talking of original appointments?—Yes.

16,468. You remember Sir Edward Benthall of the Chambers of Commerce accepted the suggestion that he should make some definite proposals in his report on the Railway Board. Do you know when we are likely to get that report?—I think it is out. It has been submitted to the Joint Parliamentary Committee in which they wholeheartedly support my view. I refer to the Memorandum submitted by them to this committee.

Major Cadogan.

16,469. I should like to ask Sir Henry a question on his paragraph which is headed "Protection claimed" where he deals with the claim for economic protection, heading "J." Supposing it was proved to be not feasible to incorporate any such guarantees as Lord Hardinge and other Members of the Committee have dealt with in the Statute, and supposing equally it proved to be not feasible to insert any such assistance as you require in the Instrument of Instructions or provision for such assistance, have you any other suggestion to make as to how Government could assist you?—Of course, as I have already said, Major Cadogan, the incorporation in the Statute is my first demand with all humility and respect. Since these Instruments of Instructions do not carry equal weight it will be of very little use to me except, as Lord Rankeillour has just said, a certain additional power. If neither of these is capable of being done then the future of my communities will be bankruptcy. Then I place my demand on a higher plane, that of moral responsibility of the British nation and Parliament, and in support of it, I have His Royal Highness's assurance to me that England will not forget this community. I mention that in my paper. Apart from that, the only other solution is that Government will do as they have done in Palestine with the Syrians—give us national homes; give us landed areas so that Anglo-Indians can go there.

Sir Hari Singh Gour.] You were given national homes.

Major Cadogan.

16,470. Is that what you suggest?—Sir Hari Singh, Gour has interfered on a matter of which, I am sorry to say, he knows nothing. I have never had a national home except India. Twelve unemployed ex-soldiers were sent for 12 months to the Andamans. That is not a national home.

16,471. You refer to what you call a Treaty obligation on the part of the Government in connection with your community—vested interests. You say: "Failing this and in consideration of the assurances of economic protection given to the Community by the Government of India and Parliament, which have been so many as to have assumed the force and value which is rightly attached to a Treaty Obligation"—what do you mean by that. Can you amplify it?—Yes, Major Cadogan. I look upon it in this way. I say that, considering the services the community has rendered to this Empire, considering the assurances given to us by the Secretary of State, by the various Governors, and by His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales, and considering the fact that England is responsible for this community, these various

10^o Novembris, 1933.]Lieut.-Colonel SIR HENRY GIDNEY,
M.L.A., I.M.S. (Retired).

assurances, if not a moral obligation—these various assurances and promises—are tantamount to vested interests. Indeed, I think they have a stronger claim to be called vested interests than many vested interests that have been put forward in the White Paper. I go further and say that it is a claim on the British nation, because the British nation, together with the Indian nation, called us into existence, and I put that down on a higher plane. It is a vested interest. It is practically a sacred obligation on the part of England.

Sir Reginald Craddock.

16,472 Most of the questions I was going to ask have been covered already, but there are just one or two points I wanted to elucidate further from Sir Henry Gidney. He has told us he is most acquainted with the railways as an occupation for Anglo-Indians. How long is it since the pay of an Anglo-Indian guard or driver was higher than the pay of an Indian guard or driver?—Only quite recently.

16,473. What were those pays?—The pay was much more for an Anglo-Indian or a European guard—at least one-third more.

16,474. You cannot give the figures, can you?—I can give you figures for certain appointments. An Anglo-Indian or a European railway guard were on two different scales. There was a difference between the European and Anglo-Indian. If the European got Rs.200, the Anglo-Indian got Rs.150, and the Indian got Rs.100.

16,475. As a guard?—That is about roughly the division.

16,476. That is what it was formerly. What is it now?—The rates have been standardized and I have not got the rates of pay.

16,477. What is the figure?—On an average the subordinate departments of the railways have been reduced 30 per cent. on all rates of pay.

16,478. When an Anglo-Indian wants to be a guard what is the pay at which he has to start?—To-day he starts at about 35 to 40 rupees.

16,479. And the same with the Indian?—And the same with the Indian.

16,480. But formerly he would get more?—He got much more. He got about 65 rupees.

16,481. Therefore, of course, there has been a temptation to the railways, on the ground of economy, to employ more Indians as guards than Anglo-Indians?—In a measure, but they have been following the policy of the Government.

16,482. But the present Governors' Instruments of Instructions require them to look after the interests of minorities, including Anglo-Indians?—Yes.

16,483. It is your opinion that that power has not been effective?—Yes.

16,484. You put it on the ground of political pressure?—Yes.

16,485. But there is another difficulty, is not there, that, short of the Governor or the Governor-General ordering railways to take such-and-such a proportion of Anglo-Indians, he has to leave these things to the ordinary constitutional and administrative methods?—Yes.

16,486. Therefore, he has failed, not through any lack of good will, but because the various intermediary authorities through whom these things go are not, as it were, directly under the orders of the Governor or the Governor-General?—The Governor has nothing to do with the railways. The Governor-General has indirectly, although it has not been a special responsibility of his hitherto.

16,487. What I mean is that under the present Constitution at the Centre all these matters are regulated by the Governor-General in Council?—It is not regulated so much by him as by the Member in charge of Railways.

16,488. He is a Member of the Council?—Yes.

16,489. And he might have to overrule his Council?—Yes.

16,490. Which he could only do on the ground of the safety of the realm, so to speak?—Yes.

16,491. That is under the present Constitution?—Yes.

16,492. Therefore it is hardly feasible for a Governor-General or a Governor to interfere at so low a stage as the appointment of guards, for example?—He would not do it.

16,493. He would not strictly have any power to do it, except through his Council?—That is so.

16,494. So therefore it is rather not through any lack of will to help your community in accordance with the Instrument of Instructions, but because the means of exercising that power are almost non-existent?—That is so.

16,495. Therefore, you want, if you are going to have Instruments of Instructions upon which your community will depend for their protection, to give to

10^o November, 1933.]Lieut.-Colonel Sir HENRY GIDNEY,
M L.A., I.M.S. (Retired).

the Governor-General or the Governor, as the case may be, powers which he can put into effect under the Constitution?—Yes, that is so.

Mr. M. R. Jayaker.

16,496. That is power to look into the appointment of servants like guards?—No, I do not say it is looking to the appointment of servants like guards, but it is just this day to day administration that has affected the community so seriously.

Mr. Butler.

16,497. Is it not a matter for administrative agreement, Sir Henry, since it is a question largely of administration? It is a question of agreement for settling the communal proportions?—It all depends upon what standard you set for your communal proportions, if it is on per capita, education or legislative representation. I have dealt with all of those three systems in my memorandum.

Dr. Shafa'at Ahmad Khan.

16,498. If the communal proportions are settled, some effective machinery will have to be provided to see that they are implemented?—Yes.

Miss Pickford.

16,499. In reply to Lord Lothian on the question of the franchise, you said that if property, payment of taxes and education were alternative qualifications, all your community would be enfranchised?—Yes.

16,500. Is it not the case that a very large number of women would only be enfranchised on the education qualification, as they would not hold property or pay taxes?—Quite right.

16,501. Are you aware that the White Paper proposes that for the provincial franchise, that in Bombay, Bengal, Bihar and Orissa and the Central Provinces, the educational qualification for both men and women will be matriculation or the school leaving certificate?—Yes.

16,502. Would that exclude a number of the girls of your community?—A large number.

16,503. And would you therefore desire a lower educational qualification?—Yes.

16,504. Then you were not quite accurate, were you, in saying that all your community would be enfranchised under the White Paper proposals?—I was referring mainly to the understanding that I had in mind that there were alternative qualifications such as property, payment of taxes and a lower educational standard, but I was not aware of the fact that matriculation was to be demanded as a standard for the Provincial Electors.

16,505. But if the matriculation standard were a qualification in those provinces, it would exclude a number of your community?—Do I understand you to refer to the Federal Electorate or to the Provincial Electorate, Miss Pickford?

16,506. To the Provincial Electorate?—It would exclude a large number.

Mr. M. R. Jayaker.

16,507. You would prefer a mere literacy qualification which would bring in all your women?—If literacy is to be understood as far as we have applied it to the Depressed Classes and other Classes, our women's literacy is cent. per cent. in my community.

16,508. What I say is that literacy would bring in a larger number of your women than a matriculation standard would?—Yes.

Miss Pickford.

16,509. The matriculation standard would exclude some of your women and the literacy qualification would admit them all?—The matriculation standard would exclude a large number of my women and literacy would include them all.

16,510. Now is it a fact that the trained nurses in India who the Simon Commission say have performed one of the foremost and most urgent needs of Indian society have been up to date drawn almost exclusively from the Anglo-Indian community?—Almost the entire nursing staff of every hospital in India, and Burma has been drawn from the Anglo-Indian community for many decades.

16,511. Is that still the case?—No; it has been the case up to now. Indeed, they were the pioneer nurses, there, with the help of some British nurses. To-day there have been serious efforts made to displace them. I will give you in particular the efforts made this year at Lahore. The Lahore municipality and other such bodies have lowered the rates of pay of the Anglo-Indian nurses to the level of the Indian nurses. In other words, the Anglo-Indian nurse, if she wants to live there, has to become a vegetarian. If she does not want to she can go. If these nurses are not reduced, certain municipalities like the Calcutta Corporation have threatened to cut their grant to the Medical College Hospital. I want the Indian women to be trained as nurses, but in doing that, why inflict this penalty upon the Anglo-Indian women who have rendered such great service in the hospitals.

16,512. Your position would be that you would wish all nurses to receive the same rate of pay but that rate of pay should not be reduced below the level at which your community can live?—Or compromised at a level at which they can live such as the railways have done.

16,513. And if a municipality required a hospital to dismiss Anglo-Indians and employed Indians as a condition of receiving grant, would not that be a discriminatory action against a community?—Very marked, particularly to the community whose women did such a great service in the nursing department.

16,514. Is it a fact that nurses from the Anglo-Indian community will perform all the necessary service for the sick, whatever their race or religion may be?—Absolutely.

16,515. And that some Indian nurses would be precluded by rules of religion and custom from performing all those services for all races?—You have really mentioned a very important point, Miss Pickford, because to-day the Indian nurses are largely recruited from those who do not observe caste; otherwise they would never enter a hospital. Indeed, there are delicate matters which one need not refer to here which the Indian nurse will not undertake, and the Anglo-Indian nurse does undertake.

16,516. So it is in the interests of the sick generally that the Anglo-Indian nurses, who will perform all services, should be continued in the hospitals?—Certainly.

Mr. M. R. Jayaker.

16,517. Do you suggest that the Indian nurses who are employed at the present moment do not perform all services for their patients?—No.

Sir Hari Singh Gour.

16,518. Do you suggest that Anglo-Indian nurses should be employed to minister to the wants of Indian women?—They do it.

16,519. You suggest that?—They do it; no one else does it but the Anglo-Indian nurses in hospitals to-day.

16,520. And yet the Europeans complain that they want European doctors for their wives and children?—I have never supported that idea.

Miss Pickford.

16,521. Just one final question. You have referred also in your examination, Sir Henry, to the services that the Anglo-Indian women had done as nurses during the War. Are Anglo-Indian women recruited as nurses for the British Army in India?—No. During the War when the call came, hundreds of Anglo-Indian nurses were freely enlisted in the British Army and went to all theatres of war; many of them getting honours. The moment the War was over the door was closed and they were demobbed. To-day the rules prevent an Anglo-Indian nurse being employed by the British Army although I was glad to be the means of getting a few of them into the Indian Army—into the Indian Military Nursing Service, a very few of them and on almost half the pay of what the nurses get who belong to the Queen Alexandra Nursing Service.

16,522. You would like to see that service opened to Anglo-Indian women duly qualified?—That is one of the greatest things that this Committee could do for the women of my community, because they know the country, they know the diseases, they know the languages, and they are really born nurses.

Sir Hari Singh Gour.

16,523. Would you exclude Indians from that service?—There is a large field for Indian nurses in the Indian Army.

16,524. Would you exclude Indians from the Queen Alexandra Nursing Service?—No, I would not make any exclusion, but I am talking of the Anglo-Indian community only.

Mr. J. C. FRENCH and Mr. S. H. H. MILLS are called in and examined as follows.

Chairman.

16,525. Mr. French, you entered the Indian Civil Service in 1906; you acted as District Magistrate in various districts in Bengal, including Midapore, Mymensingh and Tipperah; you were a nominated member of the Legislative Assembly from 1929 to 1932, and you retired in April, 1932?—(Mr. French.) Yes, my Lord.

16,526. Mr. Mills, you joined the Indian Police Service in 1914; you were Deputy Commissioner of Police, Special Branch, Calcutta, in 1924-25; in 1925-26 you were Personal Assistant to the Director of the Intelligence Bureau, Government of India; you were again Deputy Commissioner of Police, Special Branch, Calcutta, 1927-28 and 1930-32; and you retired in February of this year; that is, of this year, 1933?—(Mr. Mills.) Yes, that is correct.

16,527. You gentlemen have each been good enough to prepare a Memorandum of the evidence which you wish to give before the Joint Select Committee. Mr. French, your Memorandum is numbered 89, and, Mr. Mills, yours is numbered 90?—(Mr. French.) Yes. They are as follows:—

MEMORANDUM 89 BY MR. J. C. FRENCH.

SERVICE.

I commenced to serve in the Indian Civil Service in December, 1906. Most of this service was spent in the executive branch, and during it I acted as District Magistrate of the following districts in Bengal, Bankura, Barisal, Bogra, Jalpaiguri, Jessore, Khulna, Midnapore, Murshidabad, Mymensingh, Tipperah.

From November, 1928, to January, 1929, I was placed on special duty to write the Bengal Annual Administration Report. From 1929 to 1932 I was a nominated member of the Legislative Assembly. I retired from the Indian Civil Service on April 17th, 1932, and left India on August 6th, 1932, to return to this country.

EVIDENCE.

The maintenance of law and order in India is a matter of vital importance. Responsibility for it rests with the District Magistrate. This has been the case from the very beginning of our Empire in India, and the position remains unchanged to-day.

The reference to this vital question in para. 317, Volume 1 of the Report of the Simon Commission needs amplification. After the words "In effect, therefore, the two officers work together" should come the words "Subject to the Primary responsibility of the District Magistrate." After the final sentence of this paragraph should come the sentence "But should the justice or expediency of the notice afterwards be called in question the responsibility for the answer would rest with the District Magistrate alone."

Police Regulations, Bengal, Volume 1, Chapter III, Rule 27 (a) Page 24, state . . . "As the District Magistrate is ultimately responsible for the criminal administration of the district, he may employ the police as he thinks best for the maintenance of law and order and the detection and suppression of crime."

Sections (d) and (e) of the same rule on Page 25, state . . . "The Superintendent of the Police, as the local head of the police under the District Magistrate, is bound to carry out his orders except in regard to the internal economy, organisation, and discipline of the force, and matters of a purely departmental nature.

(e) Should any difference of opinion on any question relating to the police administration arise between the Superintendent of the Police and the District Magistrate, it is the duty of the Superintendent of the Police to carry out the Magistrate's instructions"

These rules express both the responsibilities of the District Magistrate and his relations with the police in his district.

In calling attention to these facts I have not the slightest wish to depreciate or belittle the enormous importance in an Indian district of the work of the Superintendent of Police and his men. The Superintendent of Police is entirely responsible for the maintenance, discipline, and training of his police, and with all this the District Magistrate has nothing whatever to do. The credit for the existence of the present magnificent police force of India is due to the officers of that force and to no one else, and after twenty-five years' experience of that force I cannot pay its officers too high a tribute or express my gratitude to them too strongly.

It is the officers of the Indian Police who provide the District Magistrate with the necessary force to maintain order when the emergency arises. But it is impossible to deny the fact that it is the District Magistrate and the District Magistrate alone who is responsible for the proper employment of the police in the maintenance of law and order whenever a serious menace to them arises. It is obvious that in a situation of a critical or even of a serious character responsibility cannot be left to float between two officials. One, and one only, must be responsible and answerable afterwards for the correctness of the measures taken. In Indian districts this is, and always has been the District Magistrate.

Most District Magistrates with recent experience in India would be able to give concrete examples of the performance of such duties. From my own service I would cite as typical examples the following:—

(1) Measures taken in Mymensingh district in 1921-22 to deal with the Non-Co-operation disturbances.

(2) Measures taken in Bankura district in 1925 to deal with a Mohurram disturbance.

It is essential that the District Magistrate and the police should be under the same authority. Otherwise the District Magistrate will be without effective means for carrying out his duties for the preservation of the public peace. His position will be one of responsibility without power.

I should now like to mention the functions of the District Magistrate in connection with the movements of troops. When troops march by road the District Magistrate has to see that the camping-grounds and the wells are in a fit state for use. In 1927 I had to warn the military authorities against marching troops through Murshidabad district on account of the prevalence of cholera. The District Magistrate is also responsible for the supply of certain provisions and fodder for men and animals. He is responsible for providing the troops with a correct itinerary, and must supply any necessary civil officers to accompany them.

The District Magistrate is the Government's chief source of information about what is happening in his district. He must report by wire any sudden political incident or calamity of a serious character.

13th November, 1933]

I should now like to mention the Intelligence Branch of the police, the branch which deals with political crime in the districts of Bengal. In the evidence offered to the Joint Committee I have seen proposals that the Intelligence Branch of the police could be separated from the ordinary police. This is impossible. The Intelligence Branch is merely an investigating and detective branch and must be able to rely with absolute confidence on the complete and immediate co-operation of the ordinary police force. The word force is indeed appropriate. The ordinary police force supplies the power through which the discoveries of the Intelligence Branch produce concrete results.

At various periods of my service I have been brought into contact with the Terrorist movement. I may mention that as a magistrate in 1915, I committed to the Court of Sessions the Barisal Supplementary Conspiracy Case, and in 1931 I held charge of Midnapore district for two months between Mr. Peddie, murdered by Terrorists, and Mr. Douglas, who met with a similar fate.

The Terrorist movement is a question of vital importance in the political life of Bengal. The aim of the Terrorists is to secure by force the government of the country, and re-establish the ancient Hindu rule. As the British government stands in the way they seek to destroy it.

The question of the maintenance of law and order in India is of primary importance, especially now that the introduction of Parliamentary institutions into that country is under consideration. There is no evidence that Parliamentary institutions will be a success in India. On the contrary, experience of the elective system in Municipalities, District Boards, and the Legislative Assembly, points in the opposite direction. I can give facts in support of this assertion.

MEMORANDUM 90 FROM Mr. S. H. H. MILLS, INDIAN POLICE (Retired).

INTRODUCTORY.

In submitting this memorandum, I should like at the beginning to make it quite clear that I do not represent any association or other organization, although I believe that a large percentage of the Imperial Police Service in Bengal agree with my views. I fully concur in all the safeguards urged by the Indian Police Association in their memorandum to the Joint Select Committee. I also share the apprehensions of the Association as to the grave risk to the officers of the Indian Police Force, their men and all that they stand for, entailed by the policy of transfer of "Law and Order" (of paragraph 2 of the Representation of the Indian Police Association). At the same time, to quote from the paragraph referred to above, I "am not blind to the advantages of a settlement by agreement which will receive reasonable support in India."

If I uphold, as I do, all the recommendations of the Indian Police Association, it may well be asked as to the object of the present memorandum. This I will outline below. In paragraph 25 of the Representation of the Indian Police Association a brief reference was made to the existence in India of revolutionary organizations, the object of which was to overthrow by violent means the Government established by law. The Association stressed the point that such conspiracies would undoubtedly continue under the new Constitution as under the old; but they made no suggestions as to how this menace to the tranquillity of India should be countered, nor as to how the Intelligence or Special Branches of the various provincial Criminal Investigation Departments and their personnel were to be safeguarded.

Now Bengal is and has been for nearly three decades the focus of the terrorist conspiracy; and as I have been connected with Intelligence work in that Province almost continually for the past thirteen years, I felt that I might be able to place before the Joint Parliamentary Committee some of the aspects of this complex problem of terrorism, as also some suggestions as to the safeguarding of the Intelligence system and the personnel responsible for working it.

HISTORY OF THE TERRORIST MOVEMENT.

Terrorism first appeared in India in the Bombay Presidency as long ago as 1897, being inspired by Balgangadhar Tilak through his paper the "Kesari." It never took very deep root in Bombay, however, but the seed had been well planted and a few years later, about 1905, we find the nucleus of a revolutionary organization in Bengal. Here the soil was far more fertile, as intense feelings of bitterness had been aroused among the Hindu community against the Government during the "Anti-Partition" agitation. Two secret organizations were formed about this time, the "Jugantar" and the "Anusilan," and the ardour of recruits was fanned by highly inflammatory articles in various revolutionary organs such as the "Jugantar" and the "Bande Mataram." The avowed object of the two organizations was "to free the country from the foreign yoke," by force.

The Jugantar and the Anusilan revolutionary parties, and in particular the Anusilan, were most strictly organized on the system of water-tight compartments to prevent leakage of information. Initiates had to take the most solemn vows before the goddess Kali, and were threatened with the death penalty if they ever divulged any of the secrets of the party.

The organization rapidly developed and recruits flowed in. To secure funds dacoities (armed robberies) were committed, the victims being mostly villagers. Then the morale of the Intelligence system, which had been built up to counter the menace, must be undermined. To achieve this Indian officers must be assassinated, so as to deter others from entering the department. (It may be mentioned here that although between twenty and thirty Indian officers have lost their lives since the beginning of the campaign the morale of the officers of the Intelligence Department has never broken down, and there have always been volunteers ready to take the places of their murdered comrades.)

With the coming of the war years the terrorist movement increased in virulence and intensity, but the local Government then had a weapon to deal with it, viz., the "Defence of India Act." Large numbers of the more important and active revolutionaries were interned and by 1918 or thereabouts terrorism had been checked. Then came the general amnesty to political prisoners, and for some time there was a lull, although recruitment went on actively during the Non-co-operation movement of 1921-1922, when anti-Government feelings had again been aroused.

By the year 1924 the parties had again been consolidated and reinforced, and a further outbreak of terrorism occurred in an even more acute form. There is little doubt that this outbreak was largely the outcome of an infamous resolution passed at the sessions of the Bengal Provincial Congress held at Serajganj early in the year, eulogising one Gopi Nath Saha who had recently been executed for murdering a European in Calcutta. This resolution naturally inspired and inflamed the Hindu youth of the Province.

By the autumn of 1924 matters had become serious. Outrages were of constant occurrence, and even when the perpetrators were apprehended the ordinary courts were powerless to deal with them. It was therefore found necessary to promulgate an Ordinance on the lines of the Defence of India Act. This Ordinance was only operative for six months. In the spring of 1925, therefore, the Bengal Government drafted a Bill on similar lines known as the Bengal Criminal Law Amendment Act, and this was eventually certified by the Governor of the Province to remain in force for five years. This provided the Police with the weapon which they had used so effectively on a previous occasion, and during the period 1925-1927 the movement was again brought under control. It is significant that during this period a considerable percentage of the persons incarcerated were terrorists who had previously been interned under the provisions of the Defence of India Act.

By 1927 the situation was so well in hand that Government were able gradually to release the détenus, and by 1928 they were all at large again. The Bengal Criminal Law Amendment Act was, however, still in force, and up to the time of its expiry in the spring of 1930 the lull continued, the mere existence of the special powers being sufficient to prevent the commission of outrages. Just as during the period after the Defence of India Act, however, the released revolutionary leaders were not wasting time but were actively organizing and preparing to strike on a far more extensive scale immediately the Act lapsed. Within seventeen days of the expiry of the Act the most startling outrage in the annals of revolutionary crime in India occurred, viz., the Chittagong insurrection.

The magnitude and daring of this exploit not unnaturally sent a thrill through Bengal and facilitated recruitment to the two main revolutionary parties and their subsidiary groups. This raid also marked a new orientation of terrorist policy, viz., the attacking of European officials and non-officials, instead of

Indian police officers. Since this date eight British officials in Bengal have been assassinated, and four or five wounded. In addition two non-officials have been wounded, and two attempts have been made on the life of the Governor of the Province. Following on the Chittagong raid a further Ordinance was brought into force, giving the police similar powers to those possessed before, and this Ordinance was again embodied in a Bill of limited duration. As on the previous occasion, it was found that quite a large number of those arrested under this Act, had been interned once or twice before under the provisions of the earlier enactments.

CONCLUSIONS.

My object in tracing the history of the revolutionary movement in Bengal has been to show how, on each occasion on which the special powers have lapsed, terrorism has broken out in a progressively more menacing and dangerous form; in other words, to show how deep-rooted terrorism really is in Bengal. This is further borne out by the fact that, although something like 2,000 terrorists are at present in internment, outrages continue, hauls of arms, bombs and explosives are made, and the Intelligence Department and its District Intelligence Branches are working at high pressure. The find some two months ago in Calcutta of arms, ammunition, bombs, gelignite and dynamite, incidentally one of the biggest seizures ever made, is most significant, in that one is led to the presumption that an operation on a very large scale was in contemplation. As on previous occasions when the police have been given special powers, the movement has now been brought under control, but from the facts which I have quoted above, it will be seen that it is anything but moribund, and if the 2,000 détenus, or a large percentage of them, were released, the situation would be such as the Intelligence Branch could not hope to cope with. Not only this but the morale of the Indian officers of the Intelligence Branch would be severely strained. They have at two previous periods seen the anarchical movement checked as the result of their labours and by the use of special powers, only to be disheartened by the subsequent wholesale release of the internees. On each occasion the Intelligence system has had to be built up again, slowly and painstakingly. If this happens a third time, and they see the Intelligence system again dislocated, some of their agents assassinated and the lives of themselves and their comrades again jeopardised, is it to be wondered if these fine and loyal Indian officers, of whom I cannot speak too highly, 'become dispirited and their morale suffers'?

The remedy, in my opinion, is to have legislation on the lines of the current Act permanently on the Statute Book. It will be remembered that this was recommended by the Rowlatt Commission. This would show the terrorists that Government really intended to grapple with the situation, and that they would no longer have any respite to enable them to re-organize their forces. As at present the process of graduated detention should continue, leading to release when the attitude of the détenu had entirely changed, and he was no longer considered a menace to the public safety.

We now come to what, in my opinion, is an even graver threat to the stability of the Intelligence Department. There are two Congress Parties in Bengal and considerable jealousy and ill-feeling exists between them. Each of these Congress groups is backed by one of the two main revolutionary organizations, which might severally be described as the Left Wing of the Congress. Now the Congress, from an electioneering point of view, is the only organized body in the Province, and may be expected to dominate the elections. It is, therefore, probable that the Congress will have a majority in the Bengal Council when the new Constitution comes into being, and the Governor will, of course, have to appoint his Ministry from that Party. A situation may well arise, therefore, where the Minister responsible for Law and Order is an individual in close touch with one of the terrorist organizations—organizations which wield much power politically. The immediate effect on the Intelligence system of the Province of passing on secret information to such a Minister may easily be imagined; it might well prove to be the death-blow to the whole Intelligence organization. With the exposure of one or two secret agents, the remaining sources of information would feel that they could no longer trust the department with which they worked, and the Intelligence system would gradually collapse. Once having collapsed, it could never be resuscitated. Even now the British officials in the districts are in grave danger and go armed, and accompanied by armed guards. What would be their fate in the above contingency, one trembles to think. At the present time the Intelligence Branch is able to forestall many outrages by taking timely action against the conspirators. With the Intelligence Branch broken down, the lives of the aforesaid British officials would, however, be in the very gravest danger.

To meet this situation, I would respectfully urge that there be a proviso in the Bill which it is intended to place before Parliament, giving the Governor of a Province power to appoint an extra Minister or adviser from the Indian Civil Service, if he considers such a course necessary, to be responsible for all measures taken to deal with terrorism, including the control of the Intelligence and Special Branches. Alternatively the Governor of the particular Province might be empowered to take over the portfolio of terrorism himself, if he considered this desirable. I do not profess to be a politician, so I am unable to say which of these alternatives would be the more easily workable.

I would, however, urge that in order to safeguard the lives of British officials in Bengal, and of the officers of the Intelligence Branch, and to maintain the efficiency of the latter department, the above suggestions be given careful consideration.

16,528. Do you desire at this stage to extend these Memoranda by any statement or to make any corrections?—No, my Lord Chairman. (Mr. Mills.) There is one point I should like to make. On page 3 of my Memorandum, in the last line but one, the word "recognised" should read "organised." I should also like to make it clear that Mr. French and I are entirely independent of each other, and that our evidence is not in any way to be taken as though we were working together. We are working entirely separately.

16,529. I understand, however, that it is quite convenient to you that we should hear you together?—Quite so. (Mr. French.) I know Mr. Mills. We have served together in the same district in Bengal.

Dr. Shafa' At Ahmad Khan.

16,530. What was that district?—The district was Mymensingh.

Marquess of Zetland.

16,531: I see, Mr. French, that you lay great stress upon the fact that it would be practically impossible to separate any part of the police from any other part; in other words, your view is that the whole of the police, including the Intelligence Branch, must be under the orders of one authority?—Yes.

16,532. Now I am not quite clear what the conclusion is that you wish us to draw from what you have said on that point. Is your view, therefore, that the whole of the police should be transferred under the new Constitution to the control of the Ministers, or is your view that the whole of the police should be reserved to the Governor?—My view is that the whole of the police should be reserved to the Governor.

16,533. You would take the whole of the police away from the purview of the Ministers?—Yes.

16,534. But here you yourself lay great stress upon the fact that the police administration of a district is a matter for which the District Magistrate is responsible. Does it not seem probable that if the District Magistrate is given the authority of the Ministers, as, of course, he would be for all special subjects, it would be likely to lead to a good deal of administrative confusion if he were under the orders of a different authority only in so far as his police duties were concerned?—I think the District Magistrate should be under the authority of the Governor and not of the Ministers.

Mr. M. R. Jayaker.

16,535. Every District Magistrate in the Province should be under the authority of the Governor?—Yes.

Marquess of Zetland.

16,536. But, Mr. French, the District Magistrate has a great many duties, has he not, in connection with all sorts of administrative matters? Take, for example, the question of agriculture: the District Magistrate may have a great many duties to perform in connection with the development of agriculture and so on, may he not?—Yes.

16,537. If agriculture is under the control of the Ministry and the District Magistrate is only under the control of the Governor, how is government to be carried out?—It will be difficult.

16,538. I should have thought it would have been impossible?—Yes, it will be impossible.

16,539. So that your view is that the proposed Constitution in the White 13th Novembris, 1933] Mr. J. C. FRENCH and Mr. S. H. H. MILLS. [Continued.

Paper cannot possibly work?—Exactly, my Lord.

Marquess of Zetland.] Now I realise your position; I had not quite realised it before.

Earl of Lytton.] Neither will his proposal work.

Marquess of Zetland.

16,540. No; but he would not have any Ministry. May I turn for a moment now to Mr. Mills? Mr. Mills takes the opposite view to the view taken by Mr. French on the question of the control of the police. I understand Mr. Mills's position to be this, that while the general police of the Province might be transferred to the control of Ministers, there are certain departments of the police, namely, the special branch, which should be reserved to the Governor. Is not that your position?—(Mr. Mills.) Either to the Governor of the Province or else to a special Minister or Counsellor to the Governor, if such a course is considered necessary in a particular Province.

16,541. Then your view is that it would be possible to place one branch of the police under a different authority from the rest of the police?—I do not consider it would be unworkable.

16,542. That is all I wanted to know. You think that would be administratively possible?—Yes.

16,543. Very likely it would; I only wanted to know your opinion, because you have had a great deal of experience?—I do not think it would be unworkable. I think it would be better to have them under the same authority

Earl of Lytton.

16,544. When you say it would be possible, are you thinking of a division between the Intelligence Branch and the rest of the police, or are you thinking of a division between the Special Branch which deals with terrorist activities in Bengal and the rest of the Intelligence Branch?—No; I am considering a division between the Intelligence Branch and the Special Branch and the rest of the police.

16,545. You would leave the Intelligence Branch, that is to say the Criminal Investigation Department in general matters, with the general police force, and you would separate that department which is known as the Special Branch which deals with terrorist activities: is that what you mean?—Perhaps

I might make clear what the difference between the Intelligence Branch and the Special Branch is in Bengal.

16,546 If you please?—The Intelligence Branch deals with terrorism in the Province of Bengal; and the Special Branch is the Intelligence Branch of the Calcutta Police; i.e., it deals with terrorism in Calcutta.

Sir Phiroze Sethna.

16,547. You mean Calcutta City?—Yes, Calcutta City.

Earl of Lytton

16,548 The Intelligence Branch deals with much more than terrorist activities, does it not; it is the detective side of the whole police force?—No, the Intelligence Branch deals solely with terrorist activities.

Marquess of Zetland.

16,549. I was going to ask the Witness a question to make that clear, because I think it is quite possible that the Committee may be a little confused by these different terms. In Bengal, as the Witness has explained, the branch of the police which deals with the terrorist movement was divided into two parts; one part which dealt with the terrorist movement in the Mofussil; that is to say, the country districts; and the other branch which dealt with it in Calcutta, that is to say, a special small branch attached to the Calcutta police; and those two branches which are described by Mr. Mills in his Memorandum as the Intelligence Branch and the Special Branch are both really two departments dealing with the same activities, namely, the terrorist activities?—Yes.

16,550. And they are distinct from the Criminal Investigation Department, which deals with crime throughout the Province as a whole. That is clear, is it not?—Yes.

Lieut.-Colonel Sir H. Gidney.

16,551. My Lord Chairman, if Lord Zetland will allow me to interrupt just to clear up this one point at the moment, in answer to Lord Zetland, Mr. Mills, you said that the terrorist movement in Calcutta was dealt with by a special branch of the Calcutta police?—Yes.

16,552. Am I to understand that the Calcutta police is different from the Bengal Government Police?—Yes, it is a separate cadre.

Lieut.-Colonel Sir H. Gidney.] It is a special police department; it is distinct from the police as we think of them as an Imperial service of the police.

Marquess of Zetland.] It is the Calcutta Police Force under the control of the Commissioner of Police in Calcutta.

Lt.-Col. Sir H. Gidney.] That is right.

Marquess of Zetland.

16,553. There was one other question I wanted to ask Mr. Mills. I see, Mr. Mills, that you tell us that the Congress is by far the most powerful political force in Bengal?—Yes.

16,554. And you say that they will dominate the elections?—Yes.

16,555. That being so, they will dominate the Legislative Council of the future and the Governor will be bound to send for the leader of the Congress Party to form his Ministry. Now have you considered the proposed composition of the Bengal Legislative Council?—Yes, I have seen it.

16,556. It will consist of 250 members, will it not?—Yes.

16,557. 119 of the 250 members will be Muslims?—Yes.

16,558. The question I want to ask you is this: Do you include any Muslims in the Bengal Congress Party?—I think it is quite possible that there may be some who are members of the Congress Party under the new Council.

Dr. Shafa' at Ahmad Khan.

16,559. What proportion?—It is difficult to say what proportion. I should think perhaps 5 or 10 per cent.

Marquess of Zetland.

16,560. Anyway, your view is that a small proportion of Muslims may be members of the Congress?—Yes.

16,561. Then there will be 25 Europeans; you would not include them among the Congress Party, I suppose?—No.

16,562. There will be four Anglo-Indians. Would you include them among the Congress?—No.

16,563. There will be 30 seats reserved for the Depressed Classes. Now, generally speaking, would you say the Depressed Classes would be found in the ranks of the Congress?—I think the majority would.

16,564. 20 out of 30?—Perhaps 25 even.

16,565. 25 out of 30 of the Depressed Classes will be found in the ranks of the Congress?—I think so, in Bengal.

16,566. Even so, if you add up those figures I think you will find that the Congress must necessarily be in a considerable minority in the Bengal Legislature of the future, and that being so I do not quite understand the force of your contention that the Congress will be bound to dominate the Legislature and therefore the Governor will be obliged to form his Ministry from the Congress Party? I think it will be a very close thing as to whether the Congress is in a minority or not. I think they may very well be just in a majority.

16,567. You think they may?—I think they may. If one takes the figures, I think it is quite possible that they may, assuming that there are some Congress Mohammedans.

16,568. I have been taking the figures, and I cannot add them up to make a majority or anything like a majority. You said 5 per cent, or possibly 10 per cent. of the Muslims?—Yes, possibly 10 per cent. That would be, say, 10 or 11 Muslims and 80 Hindus.

16,569. No, not 80 Hindus. You have got out of that 80, 30 for the Depressed Classes?—Yes.

16,570. You think that 25 out of 30 might be Congress people?—Yes. That is 25 plus 11, that is 36; and then there will be 50 Hindus.

16,571. Will they all be Congress?—I think every one of them will be.

Sir Phiroze Sethna.

16,572. Is that so to-day? Are all the Hindus to-day members of the Congress?—No, they are not, but as soon as this new Constitution comes in there will be no Moderates left at all.

Marquess of Zetland.

16,573. Supposing that the whole of the Hindus are members of the Congress Party, that will bring your figure up to 86?—86.

16,574. Twenty-five Depressed Classes, 11 Muslims, and 50 Hindus; that is 86?—Yes; and then there are one or two others; there are the Labour members.

16,575. How many Labour members do you think will be members of the Congress?—I should think the majority of them would be.

Mr. N. M. Joshi.] They would be half Muslim members.

Marquess of Zetland.

16,576. How many Labour members are there to be?—Possibly eight.

13th November, 1933.] Mr. J. C. FRENCH and Mr. S. H. H. MILLS. [Continued.]

16,577. Supposing now that the whole of the Labour Party are also members of the Congress—it seems to me a rather improbable proposition, but let us assume you are correct. that still brings your number only up to 92⁹—Ninety-four.

16,578. Out of 250?—Yes. But then one has also got to consider that with the Congress dominating, as it does, politics in Bengal, more Muslims will come under the Congress flag.

Sir Phiroze Sethna.

16,579. You mean that that 10 per cent. would increase?—Definitely.

16,580. To what?—It might increase to 20 or 30 per cent.

Marquess of Zetland.

16,581. I now realise your position. Of course, if you think the Congress is going to be so powerful that it is going to rope in Muslims, Labour (Indian Christians I am not sure about), the Depressed Classes and all the Hindus, then, of course, I agree that probably the Congress will be the majority party?—I have already said that the Congress is the only organised Party, and it carries immense power in Bengal.

Lord Middleton.

16,582. In your Memorandum here you have traced the rise and fall of the terrorist Movement, and I imagine you would feel anxious about any further amnesty if it were granted a little later on, when the reforms come in. Is that so?—Yes, I should regard it with the gravest misgivings.

16,583. I do not know whether you can answer this question, but, at the present moment, in the Force with which you had latterly to deal in India, do you think there is any anxiety in that respect?—I think all the officers, Indian and European, of the Intelligence Branch and Special Branch have also the gravest fears of what will happen when the new Constitution comes in.

16,584. Do you mean any lack of firmness in handling this matter?—I mean as to any lack of firmness in handling this Terrorist menace.

Mr. M. R. Jayaker.

16,585. As a result of the amnesty, or as a result of the new Constitution coming into force?—As a result of the amnesty because on two previous occasions, as I have said in my Memorandum, the Terrorists have been released, and all the work which these officers have put in has been brought to nothing, and the Terrorist Movement has merely broken out again with renewed vehemence.

Lord Middleton.

16,586. In your Memorandum you make use of the expression "graduated detention." Could you kindly explain what you mean by "graduated detention"?—Under these ordinances which we have had in force in the Province, détenus, or the persons arrested, are classified in different grades of detention. They may be kept in jail, if they are of the very dangerous type; those not quite so dangerous are put in what is called foreign domicile, that is to say, they are interned in a village away from their homes. Those who are considered less dangerous than the above are interned in their homes. Police officers are constantly interviewing these détenus, and, if it is found that the attitude of any of them is changing after passing through these processes of detention, they are released.

16,587. Are you satisfied that the system of internment is a good one?—No; I am profoundly dissatisfied with the way the system is administered.

16,588. Why?—Because I consider that you will never deal with Terrorism in Bengal unless you put something like 150 or 200 of the leaders of the Terrorist Movement right outside India. My reason for saying that is that I know that practically every one of the outrages on British officials in Bengal has been plotted from inside the internment camps.

16,589. Will you turn again to your Memorandum a little farther on. From what you say there it would rather appear that you hint at a connection between the Terrorists and Congress. Would you like to amplify that?—The Terrorists for about the past 15 or 20 years have practically dominated the Congress in Bengal. I can mention two instances to show this. In 1924 the Bengal Provincial Congress was held at a place called Serajganj. Mr. C. R. Das, who was a far-sighted man, was very anxious to have a resolution passed in favour of Hindu-Muslim unity, but the Terrorist Delegates to the Congress refused to vote for this Resolution, unless a Resolution was also put extolling one Gopi Nath Saha who had assassinated a European in Calcutta, Mr. Day. Mr. C. R. Das realised that he would not get his resolution through unless he supported theirs, and so this infamous resolution was duly put and passed.

His Highness the Aga Khan.

16,590. Was it carried?—Yes, it was carried. To quote one more example.—At the Bengal Provincial Congress meeting at Faridpur in 1925, the same Congress leader, Mr. C. R. Das, realised that the Terrorists in the Congress were getting too strong for him, and were dictating his policy, so he decided to throw them over once for all. He therefore drafted a resolution condemning Terrorism at this Congress. This resolution was defeated. That was the end of Mr. C. R. Das's political career. He was a broken man, and died about two or three months later.

Lord Middleton.

16,591. Mr. French, may I turn to the last part of your Memorandum where you say "There is no evidence that Parliamentary Institutions will be a success in India." Have you made any study of the development of democratic Government in Eastern countries?—(Mr. French.) I have been in Afghanistan through the Khyber Pass to Kabul and the Ak Pass in the Hindu Kush, and from Kandahar to Gerishk and Farah to Herat. I have been in Katmandhu in Nepal; I have been in Thibet, as far as Garantse. I have also been in Palestine, Syria and Iraq. In those countries I see no chance of Parliamentary Institutions being a success.

16,592. Why?—In Afghanistan the whole system of Government is a Military autocracy, and it suits the people, and nobody wants anything else. In Katmandhu it is a military autocracy, and also suits the people. In Thibet it is the theocracy of the Dalai Lama, but that rests on military force as well, and that seems to suit the Thibetans. In Syria there is a façade of Parliamentary Institutions. It is said that it is maintained to satisfy the League of Nations, but there is no real election. The people elect whom they are told to elect. In Iraq it is just the same. The people elect as they are told by the local officials.

Mr. M. R. Jayaker.

16,593. You make no distinction between India under British rule for one hundred years and these countries which you have mentioned?—I make a distinction, but if one wishes to envisage what is going to happen in one oriental country, it is fair to look at the others as well.

16,594. I suppose your contention is that there is something peculiar in the Oriental mind which prevents it from getting used to Parliamentary Institutions?—It is not only the Oriental mind. It is also the Italian mind and the German mind.

16,595. In fact, every mind except the British, I suppose? You would draw the line there?—I would not go as far as that. That requires careful consideration.

Sardar Buta Singh.

16,596. What about Japan?—In Japan I am told two years ago there was a Cabinet which had a minority in the Japanese Parliament, and that relied on the support of the Emperor and the Army, and the Aristocratic Party.

Mr. M. R. Jayaker.

16,597. What is your prescription for the Government of these countries which you have mentioned—autocracy?—I would not say an autocracy exactly. A strong Government with a Council for advice.

Mr. Zafrulla Khan.] The Council to be composed of the British?

Marquess of Salisbury.] Do not you think we had better have the questions in proper order?

Lord Middleton.

16,598. I have only one more question. In regard to municipalities, Mr. French, you do not seem to think a great deal of the elective system in municipalities. Can you give any reasons why you deprecate them?—Yes, I should like, first of all, to point to a resolution of the Government of Bengal in the Report of 1930-31. It is the 16th paragraph and the report notes that the system of assessment in the municipalities of Bengal has not succeeded, and it goes on to say: "Where self taxation fails, self-government fails." I would just like to call attention to that resolution. Then I should like to give a few practical experiences of municipal administration in Bengal from one who has lived in these municipalities.

16,599. That being yourself?—Myself; because, after all, the test of whether an Institution really succeeds is whether it performs the functions for which it is constituted. I would, first of all, say that the inefficiency of elected Indian municipalities in Bengal has always been a commonplace all through my service. Everyone has accepted it in private conversation as a commonplace. Now for my practical examples. In municipalities under an elected Chairman and elected members in Bengal the roads are bad and full of holes; the drainage is bad, and there are pools and quagmires in the rains. As an example of the way they manage their roads, I will give an example from Vishnupur municipality in the Bancura district. In 1925 I was inspecting that municipality, and a number of ratepayers came to me and said they wanted me urgently to see something. I went along and found the municipality proposed to turn the lane on which their houses stood into a drain for carrying away water. The resolution had been passed, but I made the municipality withdraw it by threatening to use my special powers. The second point I would make is that in most municipalities the water supply is bad. When they have waterworks the waterworks are not well run, and bad water is conveyed to the ratepayers. I should like to give an example from Barisal in 1915. I was out on a launch, and after we had been 24 hours out the men's cook fell ill of cholera and died in the night. We went straight back to Barisol. On the voyage back two more men went down and died. The water they had been drinking on the launch was that from the Barisal municipal water supply. About that time, the Assistant Sanitary Commissioner tested the water, and he found there were cholera germs in it. He said that people would do better to drink from the river than from the Barisal municipal water. There were Government reports referring to the Barisal Municipal Water. The Report of the Sanitary Engineer for 1915, page 32, says: "The water at Barisal was not always satisfactory." The Sanitary Commissioners' Report, page 11, says: "The cholera rate was high in Bakarganj district." In the Bengal Government's Report on the working of municipalities in Bengal 1914-15, page 9, the management of the Barisal Municipality was not well spoken of.

Dr. B. R. Ambedkar.

16,600. Do you wish to suggest that there has been no improvement since 1914 up to 1933?—None.

Major C. R. Attlee

16,601. In 1914 was not the District Officer the Chairman of the Council?—No; there was an elected Chairman. The District Officer ceased to be Chairman in 1912.

Mr. Zafrulla Khan.

16,602. Was local self-government reserved in this respect or not?—The municipalities had got freedom of local administration.

Sardar Buta Singh.

16,603. What about special powers of the District Magistrates. Had not they powers to interfere?—The special powers of the District Magistrate were to intervene if the municipalities did anything which was dangerous to public health or public security—a special administrative power. I should also like to call attention to the supersession of the Calcutta Municipality; that is the leading municipality in India and has been in existence for a very long time.

Sir Phiroze Sethna.

16,604. Question?—There has been a Calcutta Corporation for a very long time. I should have used the word "Corporation" instead of "Municipality." I saw this in the Press. On the 8th August, a Bill was introduced into the Bengal Legislature by Sir Bijoy Prasad Singh Roy to supersede the municipality, to suspend it, and he gave a number of reasons. That was this year.

Mr. A. H. Ghuznavi.

16,605. Not to supersede it?—To suspend it. The reasons which he gave were almost every reason for which a corporation could be suspended. On the 5th September this year the Bill was passed by 67 votes to 16 in the Bengal Legislative Council, and the Council had no option except to suspend the Calcutta Corporation because it had gone bankrupt. I may submit that this honourable Joint Committee can get all the papers about this just by sending a telegram to Bengal. They can all come by air mail in less than a fortnight. You can get the Government investigation, you can get the debate in the Bengal Council, and you can get the Bill superseding it; and this Calcutta Corporation, I submit, is the leading municipal body in the whole of India.

Marquess of Salisbury.

16,606. Mr. French, you took over duty in Midnapore, did not you, after Mr. Peddie had been murdered and before Mr. Douglas was murdered—between the two, was it not?—Yes, my Lord.

16,607. And naturally you have a very strong feeling about terrorism. You have great experience, of course, of the duties of a District Magistrate, and you realise that it is part of the duty of a District Magistrate to be primarily responsible for law and order?—Yes, my Lord.

16,608. As the District Magistrate, it was your business primarily to look after law and order?—Yes.

16,609. The obligation, that is to say, is not on the Police in the first instance, but on the District Magistrate?—The District Magistrate maintains law and order through the medium of the Police.

16,610. He is responsible for giving the order?—He is responsible.

16,611. And, therefore, without going into the question of what system ought to be substituted for it, there is a great difficulty if the District Magistrate is under one authority and the Police is under another authority?—It would be an impossible situation.

16,612. We need not use strong adjectives, but there would be a very great difficulty indeed?—Yes.

Marquess of Salisbury.

16,613. You left India quite a short time ago, Mr. French?—I left India on the 6th August last year.

16,614. Therefore, it is not a question of out-of-date knowledge; your knowledge is all up to date?—Yes.

16,615. You pointed out the difficulty of the District Magistrate and the Police being under a different authority. You also feel a difficulty if the Intelligence Department and the ordinary Police are under a different authority?—I cannot see how the Intelligence Department can function if it is under a different authority from that of the ordinary Police.

16,616. Let me ask a few questions, if I may, of Mr. Mills. You have only recently returned from India also?—(Mr. Mills.) Yes.

16,617. You have had 13 years' experience there?—More than 13 years in India—but 13 years off and on in Intelligence work.

16,618. Will you tell the Committee what the 13 years' experience was?—Almost entirely in Intelligence Branch work.

16,619. I do not want you to speak of Police Officers on the active list, but of Police Officers recently retired: so far as you know the views you express are those of the Police Officers?—Yes, I think they are.

16,620. Of course, you cannot speak with any certainty, but that is your opinion?—Of those whom I have met.

Sir Samuel Hoare.

16,621. I am very sorry to interrupt, but I want to be quite clear what the answer actually covered. Were you speaking of Police Officers from the whole of India or from Bengal?—Police Officers from Bengal.

Marquess of Salisbury.

16,622. I beg your pardon: I ought to have made that clear. I see you say in your evidence, in saying that you support the Police witnesses who have already appeared before the Committee, that you specially support their view that even if there was a change of the Constitution in India, the terrorist conspiracy would continue?—Undoubtedly.

16,623. That is your view?—Yes because at the present time, if they can assassinate one European official, another one takes his place, but under the new Constitution there would be fewer and fewer British officials; therefore, assassinate the lot.

16,624. You have already told my noble friend that in the absence of special powers you are confident from experience that there will be a recrudescence of crime?—Undoubtedly, because terrorism is so deeply rooted in the Province.

16,625. I think you say that since the Chittagong outrage there has been the murder of eight British officials; is not that so?—Yes: eight British officials.

16,626. I want you to tell the Committee, if you will, have you had experience in Midnapore itself?—No, I have never been there.

16,627. But in Bengal generally?—Yes.

16,628. Perhaps I might ask Mr. French this. In Midnapore, what is the condition of public opinion with respect to the terrorists? Are they in sympathy with it, or how far is public opinion in sympathy with the terrorists?—(Mr. French.) I think that the sentiment of public opinion to the terrorists is mainly one of fear. There is a certain sneaking sympathy with the terrorists among a section of the Hindu Bhadrals as representing a national movement, but the main attitude to the terrorists is fear.

16,629. What goes on. Is there a sort of propaganda in favour of the objectives of terrorism?—A very strong propaganda.

16,630. What form does it take?—It takes the form of getting hold of students and schoolboys.

16,631. Especially the young?—Yes, especially the young.

16,632. At schools?—At schools—getting them in when they are school-boys or students.

16,633. Does it extend further than boys, does it extend to girls as well?—The girl movement has taken place rather after I left Midnapore. That is a rather recent phase. I am more acquainted with the efforts to get hold of the boys.

16,634. May I go back for a moment to Mr. Mills? You make certain recommendations to the Committee. Am I accurate in saying that you think that the exceptional powers should be made permanent?—(Mr. Mills.) Yes, my Lord.

16,635. You think that very important, do you?—I think it is most important.

16,636. Would you like to add anything to that, as to your reasons for that?—I think it is most important because on every occasion when there are special powers in force outrages continue for a short time, then there is a lull and the organizations merely wait until the day when the special powers lapse, when terrorism again breaks out.

Lord Eustace Percy.] Will Lord Salisbury allow me to put a question?

Marquess of Salisbury.] If you please.

Lord Eustace Percy.

16,637. When you say special powers in that connection, you mean special temporary legislation by ordinance?—Yes.

16,638. And when you say make those powers permanent you mean make them statutory?—I mean make them statutory so that the Police always have a weapon in hand to hold over the heads of the terrorists.

Sir Samuel Hoare.

16,639. Do you not mean something more than that? You mean the permanence not only of ordinances but the permanence of temporary legislation as well?—I meant something really on the lines of the Rowlatt Act.

Marquess of Salisbury.

16,640. You are obliged to regard this question as to what would happen if the police were transferred to the control of a responsible Minister. That is what you have to envisage, is it not?—Yes, and also the possible release of these 2,000 terrorists who are now shut up.

16,641. You have answered that in your last answer. As regards the transfer of police to responsible Ministers, I am not speaking of India generally but in Bengal. Will you say why you think that it would be dangerous if the Intelligence Branch of the Police were transferred to responsible Ministers?—It would be eminently dangerous in this way. At present a mass of secret information is passed on daily to the Police Member. Under the new Constitution the Police Member would be the Minister responsible for Law and Order.

16,642. When you say secret information, what character of secret information do you mean?—Information from secret agents with regard to the activities of the terrorists.

16,643. Using names, of course?—No, the names of the agents are never given.

16,644. Those are always kept secret?—They go under pseudonyms.

16,645. You are afraid of the consequences if the secret information were given to the responsible Ministers, are you?—Yes, because if your responsible Minister were a Member of the Congress Party and therefore connected with the terrorist party, it would only be a matter of two or three days before by a process of elimination, we spotted who your agent or agents were. If you had one or two agents assassinated no more agents would ever give you any more information because they would not trust you; and this would mean that your intelligence system would not only break down, but you would never in any circumstances build it up again. If it once collapsed it would be gone for ever.

16,646. And so you say that would be the death-blow of the Intelligence Department—I think that is the phrase you use in your Précis of Evidence?—A final death blow.

16,647. It would bring it to an end?—Yes.

Lord Hutchison of Montrose.

16,648. May I just ask one question on that point? In your experience in the police have you ever passed on the name of an agent to anyone?—No. The only circumstances in which we have passed on the name of an agent have been as follows. Under these ordinances two judges are appointed to review the case of every détenu who is interned and sometimes they ask us privately if we will tell them the name of an agent, and we tell them privately; otherwise it is never passed on to anybody.

Marquess of Salisbury.

16,649. However, the point is that if the secret information were conveyed to the Minister there would be great risk that the source of information would dry up?—I consider that in whatever form it was passed on there would be the gravest risk of agents being exposed.

16,650. Finally you suggest to the Joint Select Committee that there ought to be a nominated Minister; a Minister, that is to say, not responsible in respect of Law and Order?—I have merely offered it as a possible solution, because it is a very difficult problem.

16,651. I am not suggesting that that is the proper solution of the problem. I am putting the questions so that the Committee shall understand what your views are—not what my views are?—Exactly. (Mr. French.) Mr. Mills has reminded me that I should make an addition to my reply to Lord Salisbury as to the method by which terrorists are recruited. May I do so?

Chairman.

16,652. Certainly?—If this honourable Joint Select Committee sends for the papers of the reasons why the Calcutta Corporation has been suspended, they will find among them that the Calcutta Corporation employ terrorists in their Education Department as schoolmasters.

Sir Phiroze Sethna.] The Corporation has not been suspended.

Lord Rankeillour.

16,653. Mr. Mills, I want just to ask you for a moment, apart from the Special Intelligence Branch and apart from any special emergency, about the ordinary police. Do you think the changes proposed will affect their discipline and organisation?—(Mr. Mills.) Yes. I think that the discipline of the police will gradually become worse.

16,654. How do you think that will come about?—It will come about in various ways. I think it is mentioned in the Memorandum of the Indian Police Association—the gradual way in which it will come about. I can quote one possibility. At present in the Indian Police Force, a mixed force of Hindus and Muhammadans, under British leadership, will deal quite impartially with any body of communal rioters, either Hindu or Muhammadan. But let us visualise a situation where, we will say, there is a Hindu Minister, and a force the majority of which is Muhammadans is taken out to deal with Hindu rioters. Supposing they have to fire on them, the Hindu community will at once—at least one could imagine they would—run to their Minister and the Superintendent of Police, or the Commissioner of Police would be asked to explain why these Hindu rioters were fired on. One could see that Muhammadans would begin to think twice before they took any action against Hindu rioters, or even before they joined the police force if there was a chance of their being let down in that way. I may say that it applies pari passu to Hindus. I just mention Muhammadans for the sake of argument. It would apply to both communities, I think.

16,654A. You think there would be a feeling that they would not necessarily be supported in their action at the top?—Yes.

16,655. I am not sure in which Memorandum it is, but I think it is said that the terrorist movement in Bengal gained strength over a grievance of the Hindu community with regard to the question of the union or separation of Bengal. Is not that so?—Yes.

16,656. If the same community thought they had a new grievance might the effect be the same as before?—I think it is highly probable.

16,657. It might drive those people who were naturally law-abiding into sympathy with disorder?—Yes.

16,658. Now I should just like to ask Mr. French this. I think he dealt with the question of the District Magistrates. Is it the duty of the senior officer of police who is present in any emergency to obey the District Magistrate without any further reference or objection?—(Mr. French.) Yes, that is clearly laid down in Police Regulations, Bengal. When the District Magistrate is present the duty of the Superintendent of Police is to offer sound advice. If he offers it and the District Magistrate disregards it the responsibility is with the District Magistrate.

16,659. Do you think there is any danger of general instructions being issued at Provincial Headquarters which might conflict with and limit the discretion of the District Magistrate and the senior officer on the spot?—Excuse me. does that question mean removing the responsibility from the District Magistrate?

16,660. The sort of idea I had was this. Supposing a District Magistrate gave an order to the senior officer of police who was there present, do you see any danger that that officer might say, "This is contrary to my general instructions, and I cannot obey it"?—Not unless the present instructions are changed; the present instructions are absolutely clear.

16,661. And those instructions are laid down by the Provincial Government?—They are in Police Regulations, Bengal. I think the paragraph is 27, and it is quoted in my Memorandum.

16,662. Now with regard to the District Magistrate it has been mentioned that he has other functions. Would it be possible to redistribute the functions of the Provincial organisation so as to relieve him of these other functions?—To relieve him of functions with regard to Law and Order?

16,663. You can put it either way: either to relieve him of those functions or to confine him and to give someone else those functions?—If his functions are taken away, his efficiency for maintaining Law and Order would be reduced. The fact that he is in charge of many Departments assists him in maintaining Law and Order indirectly.

16,664. But you see it is obviously a difficulty if he has other functions than the maintenance of Law and Order and he had to obey someone else; he might have to be serving two masters?—Yes.

16,665. You cannot on the spur of the moment suggest a way out of that difficulty?—No, I cannot.

16,666. Do you think it would be possible for a permanent law to apply to Bengal alone and not to the other Provinces?—I should say that that would create very great ill feeling, if you treated one Province differently from another.

16,667. Would you apply the Bengal system to other Provinces then?—The Bengal system of the District Magistrate being responsible for Law and Order?

16,668. No, I mean the special ordinances and legislation with regard to Bengal?—Do you mean apply that all over India?

16,669. No, I do not suggest that, but I did not know whether you would, in answer to my former question, think it was possible to do so?—The question is whether I should be in favour of extending the Bengal ordinances all over India?

16,670. Yes?—Yes

16,671. But once and from the first, or only when some necessity arose?—I think I should do it as a precautionary measure, yes.

16,672. From the first?—From the first.

16,673. You would not merely make the system adoptive and apply it when necessary?—I would not wait until a lot of murders had been committed before applying it. I think prevention is better than cure

Major Cadogan

16,674. My Lord Chairman, I should like to ask Mr. Mills a question on his recommendations which appear in the penultimate paragraph of his Memorandum. You urge in that paragraph, Mr. Mills, that there should be a provision in the Statute giving the Governor of a Province power to appoint an extra Minister or Adviser from the Indian Civil Service, to be responsible for all measures relating to terrorism. Take your first alternative, the Minister have you thought what his status would be vis-a-vis the Legislature? Presumably, according to you, he would be in no way responsible to the Legislature. Would he be in the position of an Executive Counsellor or not?—(Mr. Mills.) He would be an Executive Counsellor responsible to the Governor.

16,675. Just a creature of the Government?—Yes. I admit that his position on the Executive Council would be a difficult one with Ministers of a persuasion different from his own. I can envisage that there are difficulties in this suggestion, but all that I have done is to put forward a proposal in order to protect British officials in the Province and to maintain the Intelligence Department intact.

16,676. Then I want to ask a question with regard to the nature of the Terrorist Movement. Mr. French has already supplemented what he has said in his Memorandum, namely, that it was a Movement to re-establish the ancient Hindu rule, by telling us that other extreme Movements were tacked on to it. I want to ask Mr. Mills whether he corroborates that view of Mr. French's?—(Mr. French.) Excuse me. Did you say other extreme Movements?

16,677. I thought he said that, apart from the aim of re-establishing the ancient Hindu rule, other extreme Movements are tacked on to it?—Can you point to the lines in my Memorandum which say that?

16,678. No. The paragraph I am referring to is: "The Terrorist Movement is a question of vital importance in the political life of Bengal. The aim of the Terrorists is to secure by force the Government of the country, and re-establish the ancient Hindu rule. As the British Government stands in the way they seek to destroy it." I am asking Mr. Mills whether he corroborates that?—(Mr. French.) But pardon me; I am not aware that I said there were other extreme Movements.

16,679. I misunderstood you?—Not a word of it.

16,680. It is simply and solely, in your view, a Movement to re-establish the ancient Hindu rule?—That is my view.

16,681. What do you mean by the ancient Hindu rule?—The rule in India before the Muhammadans invaded the country; that is the ancient Hindu rule and that is the ideal of the Hindus.

16,682. I pass from that question. I want to ask one other of Mr. Mills. Has your experience been too much confined to one Province to be able to tell the Committee what chances or what dangers there are of the Terrorist Movement spreading to other Provinces where at present it is not conspicuous?—(Mr. Mills.) I have had some experience in the Central Intelligence Bureau in the Government of India. The position roughly is that the Terrorist Movement until very recently has been entirely confined to Northern India, with its focus in Bengal; but in 1925, when the ordinance was brought into force in Bengal and action was taken under it by the police, the more violent elements of the Terrorist Movement started organising outside Bengal where there was no special legislation to hinder them, and we found the focus of violent activity shifting to the United Provinces, though the organising brains behind it were Bengal. It then moved on to the Punjab and to Bihar and Orissa.

16,683. Did you come to the conclusion that there is a branch of it spreading into Provinces where at present it is not conspicuous?—Yes, I consider there is a danger of it spreading there. In fact the nucleus of it is still present in those Provinces. You asked me one question and then you turned to Mr. French.

16,684. I beg your pardon?—Might I just give my reply to it? You asked me in connection with a paragraph of his memorandum as to the object of the Terrorists.

16,685. Yes?—In my experience in talking to many terrorists, their object is to gain complete independence, they are not going to be satisfied with any half-way measures, and their scheme to gain independence is largely this, I think (mind you, this is the result of my talks with terrorists). They realise that they cannot drive the British out of India because they do not possess machine guns and aeroplanes or other means to do it, but I should like to quote from a Terrorist pamphlet which was widely circulated and the author of which was one of the cleverest and most prominent terrorists we have ever had to indicate the lines of revolutionary policy.

Mr. A. H. Ghuznavi.

16,686. What was his name?—Sachindra Nath Sanyal, and the pamphlet was called "The Revolutionary." It was circulated in 1925-26. I cannot say these are his exact words, but they are approximately his words. He said: "The British Government can never be cajoled into giving concessions, but it can be dragooned." I think one can see that that is their policy. You find a bomb thrown in the Assembly. The bomb bursts. Nobody is injured particularly.

Lieut.-Colonel Sir H. Gidney.

16,687. They have been injured?—But no great damage is done. It was merely a spectacular outrage in order to attract public opinion. The policy is, by sporadic outrages and intimidation, to make it so uncomfortable that the British no longer wish to remain in the country, and to influence public opinion in this country.

Sir Reginald Craddock.

16,688. Mr. French, in answer to Lord Zetland, you made some observations about a District Magistrate and the difficulty he would experience if, in respect to law and order, it was under the reserved side and others of his duties were under the transferred side, under Ministers?—(Mr. French.) Yes.

16,689. But you have not laid stress, I think, on the fact that every District Magistrate in India is also the collector or Deputy Commissioner in certain Provinces, as he is called, and he has a variety of duties there. A great many of them are in connection with revenues. Is not that the case?—Yes.

16,690. Of course, it is rather less so in Bengal than in the Provinces, where there is no permanent settlement?—Yes.

16,691. You do not keep up a land record staff, for example? As a matter of fact, these things you have mentioned exist already under the present Constitution. For instance, it is the case, is it not, that a Deputy Commissioner or Collector—I prefer to call him that now because I am looking at that aspect of his duties—is entrusted not only with certain supervision of local self-government which falls within the portfolio of the Minister, but he also has to take an interest, as Lord Zetland said, in agriculture, in education, in public health, and so forth, and in all these things he corresponds through his Commissioner with the local government, which, since the Montagu Reforms in those branches, are Ministers. You do not suggest, at all events, that all these Departments should be taken away from Ministers, do you? That was not the meaning of what you were suggesting, I understand. You were only pointing out the difficulties of dual control, but you were not suggesting that the progress made under the Montagu Reforms should all be wiped out, were you?—Yes.

Sir Samuel Hoare.

16,692. I am not quite sure of the exact bearing of that answer. Mr. French would approve of the repeal of the 1919 Act; is that so?—Yes. I should go forward to a strong Executive with Councils only for advice.

Marquess of Zetland.

16,693. I must say I thought Mr. French's answer to me was quite clear. He wishes to abolish the Ministers altogether. Is not that so?—Yes.

Sir Reginald Craddock.

16,694. I was not quite sure of that. I thought he had not given sufficient attention to the work of the Collector. I know from personal knowledge that these miscellaneous things very often take up more time than the District Magistrate's work as District Magistrate. Now I would like to ask Mr. Mills a question. You have referred to the spread of terrorism to other parts of India?—(Mr. Mills.) Yes.

16,695. There have been some instances of it in the past—in Bombay and Madras, have there not?—I think Madras has only come to notice in the past three or four months; otherwise, it has been entirely free from terrorism.

16,696. Perhaps it was before you were out in India when Mr. Ashe was murdered?—Yes it was.

16,697. And there was the whole of the Sawarkar Conspiracy in Nasik?—Yes. Of course, the Terrorist Movement began in Bombay.

16,698. There was a Nasik Conspiracy case which was of great importance; in fact, it went back earlier to the time of the Chapekar and Poona murders. But at all events where you do see instances of it spreading from the focus of Bengal, as you have said, is in Northern India?—Yes.

16,699. Which includes practically everything, except Bombay and Madras, does it not? When you say Northern India, you mean all India from Bengal northwards?—I mean excluding the Deccan and Madras.

16,700. I say the Bombay Presidency and the Madras Presidency?—Yes.

16,701. In fact, the whole Bengal Presidency?—Yes, the old Bengal Presidency.

16,702. There is another point on which I want to ask you a question. Your idea is that the ordinary C.I.D.—what I call the ordinary C.I.D. who deal with things like note forgeries and so forth and outbreaks of ordinary dacoities as distinct from political dacoities—the ordinary C.I.D. might also be separated, might it?—I consider it might; in fact in Bengal to all intents and purposes now it is separated.

16,703. That is to say, the Terrorist Branches in Calcutta and Bengal are distinct?—In Bengal the C.I.D. has a Deputy Inspector-General in charge of it.

16,704. That is the ordinary C.I.D.?—No. He is in charge of both the Intelligence Branch and the Crime side of the C.I.D. but these are different offices. The Intelligence Branch is about three miles away from the Crime Branch of the C.I.D. and the Deputy Inspector-General nowadays spends practically all his time in the Intelligence Branch.

13^o Novembris, 1933.] Mr. J. C FRENCH and Mr. S. H. H. MILLS [Continued

16,705. Who looks after the crime?—There is a Superintendent of Police who works under the Deputy Inspector-General. He is a senior Superintendent and he runs the whole of the crime side.

16,706. The non-political crime?—Yes.

16,707. On the other hand, you often have to invoke the aid of the ordinary Police in the course of your work, have you not?—Yes

16,708. You have got more staff probably in Bengal on the special branch side or the political crime side than you have in other Provinces?—Yes, I should think so.

16,709. Even in Bengal you have got to invoke the aid of the ordinary Police very often?—Yes.

16,710. For instance, house surgeons; in conducting arrests, if there is likely to be any trouble?—Yes.

16,711 And you depend therefore upon complete co-ordination and co-operation between the ordinary Police and yourself?—Yes.

16,712. It would not be impossible, for example, for your Terrorist Branch to be let down owing to the ordinary Police looking the other way?—They certainly could do it.

16,713. They have not done it hitherto?—No.

16,714. You have not had any cases that have come to your knowledge of lack of co-operation where you had to complain?—No. I think, generally speaking, the local Police co-operate very well.

16,715. I was going to supplement that by asking: Have you got complete confidence that you would be sure of the co-operation of the ordinary Police if the ordinary Police and the special Branch were to be under different heads altogether?—But they would be under the same Inspector-General.

16,716. Yes, but I mean that one would be under the Commissioners that you have suggested and the other would be under the counsellor?—I do not think it would be a material difficulty if they were under the same Inspector-General

16,717 I wanted to get your views upon that. Then there is one question I propose to put to Mr. French, because it is suggested to me by the fact that he has travelled in other countries in the East and so on. Mr. French, in your travels did you stay in Peshawar on the North West Frontier Province at all?—(Mr. French.) Yes.

16,718. I should just like to know whether you ever heard of any talk about a Federation of these Provinces under the name of Parkstan?—I have not heard the name Parkstan, but the idea is in the air.

16,719. In the air where?—In India, in the Punjab, in the North West Frontier Province.

16,720. You can say that really from having heard about it, can you?—Yes, I have heard hints of it, but I have not heard the actual name Parkstan in India. I have hints of the thing; the idea of a great Muhammadan State, including the Punjab, the North West Frontier, Sind, Baluchistan and Kashmir, and also Afghanistan.

Mr. A. H. Ghuznavi.

16,721. Mr French, in your memorandum you state that the aim of the terrorists is to secure by force the government of the country and re-establish the ancient Hindu rule?—Yes.

16,722. You were my colleague in the Legislative Assembly in the year 1929?—Yes.

16,723. Do you remember the incident when the bombs were thrown?—One burst six feet away from me.

16,724. And five feet away from me?—Yes.

16,725. And they threw a number of handbills printed in red?—I saw them.

16,726. Let me put this to you: The object of the terrorist movement is to establish a Socialistic Republic; and here I will read to you from the Rules and Regulations of the Hindustan Socialist Republican Association: "The object of the Association shall be to establish a Socialist Republic of the United States of India by an organized and armed revolution" Therefore, if I say to you that the object is not to establish the ancient Hindu rule but the object is to establish a Communist Republic, is that correct? I am reading from their own rules and regulations?—Yes.

16,727. Is that correct?—I do not agree. I had a thorough insight into the terrorist organization when I committed the Barisal Supplementary Conspiracy Case, and the terrorist pamphlets and the terrorist regulations were full of references to the goddess Kali, and the oaths were taken on the altar of the goddess Kali, and there was one very striking thing in their instructions to their recruits. They said: "Some people say that the English have a strong army. Do not fear the soldiers and cannon of the English. On our side will be the gods and heroes of ancient times. When the time comes for us to meet the English in battle the weapons of the English will crumble in their hands." That is in the terrorist pamphlet of their organization.

16,728 Here is the terrorist leaflet (producing same)²—I know, but I may mention that in that Barisal supplementary conspiracy case the terrorists talked a lot about Italian revolutionaries; they talked a lot about Mazzini and Garibaldi. That was the cant revolutionary talk in those days. Especially they talked about Mazzini in view of his doctrine supporting assassination. Now they have taken up Communist and Socialist catchwords, but I maintain that those catchwords are only a sham; they are only a screen. That is my opinion.

16,729. It has been suggested here by Mr. B. C. Chatterjee in his Memorandum before the Joint Committee that the terrorist movement in its origin and aim was an anti-Muslim movement. Is that true?²—No; I should say it is primarily anti-English. If they succeed in getting the English out of the way then they will deal with the Muslims. That is their programme.

16,730. I will now read to you a statement. Do you know Mr. Barindra Gosh?²—The brother of Arabinda?

16,731. Yes?²—I have not met him; I know him very well by repute.

16,732. Did you know that he was a terrorist and was convicted?²—He was one of the founders of the Jugantar Society.

16,733. I will read to you a statement which Mr. Barindra Gosh made very recently on the 26th August, 1933. He said this: "I can definitely state that the Anandamath never preached a patriotic and holy war against the Muslims. I do not know what induced Mr. B. C. Chatterjee to say this in his Memorandum to the Joint Parliamentary Committee, but it is a statement that can easily be refuted by anyone who has read 'Anandamath.'" Following that he says: "I think no one can say with better authority than myself, who was instrumental in starting the first revolutionary party in Bengal, that Bengal terrorism was never communal." Is that statement correct?²—No, because in the Barisal supplementary conspiracy case, I remember the famous question letter which was one of the exhibits in the case in which one of the members wrote to the head and said: "When we have dealt with the English, what about the Muslims? Shall we not be their little brothers-in-law?" You know the Hindu word.

16,734. Yes, I know the Hindu word. Then Mr. B. C. Chatterjee before the Committee said this: "Let England do these two courageous acts of justice, and introduce the Reforms into India with the Hindus of Bengal on her side. And it is the firm belief of the present writer that such righteous action will win over the present revolutionary youths of Bengal in the same way that the courageous declaration of the 20th August, 1917, won over the then revolutionary party of India"²—You mean that a generous proposal will win over the revolutionary party?

16,735. Now I come to the two generous acts which he wanted the English to do. The first generous act was to renounce the Poona Pact, and the next generous act was to reduce the number of Muslim seats and give more to the caste Hindus. Those are the two generous acts he is referring to that will prevent the terrorism in Bengal and will make the terrorists, as he was a terrorist himself, go over to the right side?²—What has that got to do with terrorism? The terrorists are not interested in these questions. The terrorists take no interest in the Poona Pact and they take no interest in the number of Muslim seats. What they want is to turn the English out of India by force.

16,736. And terrorists care nothing at all how many seats the Muslims get and how many the Hindus get?²—The terrorists are not primarily interested in politics. They are concerned with their own movement.

16,737. I will ask you one more question. You were in Midnapore?²—Yes.

16,738. Law and order is not at present transferred: it is a reserved subject?²—Yes.

16,739. Can you tell this Committee why you have not been able to control this terrorist movement in Bengal?²—The reason for that is because the powers were not sufficient.

16,740. But law and order was not a transferred subject which was under a Member?²—No, but when law and order is in the hands of the Government, the Government must have sufficient powers to control terrorism properly.

16,741. Who was there to prevent the Government from taking those powers?—The Government did not take them: that is all.

16,742. Therefore, why do you say: "Do not transfer law and order"? The law and order was not transferred. Why do you not take this power to cope with the terrorist movement in Bengal?—Because the Government did not take sufficient powers completely to quell the Terrorist Movement in Bengal is no reason why they should be handed over to somebody else.

16,743. Your objection is not to transfer Law and Order, because you feel that the Terrorist Movement will increase, but the Law and Order is not a transferred subject. Why have you not taken those steps to put an end to the Terrorist Movement now?—That is an answer for the Government of Bengal to give.

16,744. Therefore I should like to ask you this: Then you have made out no case for not transferring Law and Order?—No; on the contrary, I think I have made out a strong case.

16,745. You said you had been in Midnapore after the murder of Douglas, and before the murder of Peddie?—No, Peddie was first murdered. Douglas succeeded me.

16,746. Can you tell me the reason why in Midnapore alone year after year these English Magistrates are being murdered?—I think the Terrorists regard Midnapore as a very suitable scene for staging a tour de force.

16,747. I put this to you: The Government did not take sufficient steps, otherwise they could not have murdered year after year the English officers there. It is the Government who should have taken those steps but have not taken them?—Mr. Mills has dealt with that question. The history of Terrorism in Bengal is of terrorism rising to a certain level, then the Government taking strong action, then the Government, when the outrages cease, giving up the special measures, the outrages re-appearing, further measures being put on, those measures being taken off, then further outrages occurring, and then further repressive measures. I can give you the dates. The first campaign of terrorism was from 1907 to 1915. Then the Defence of India Act was passed, and in 1916 it was enforced. By 1918 it had borne fruit. In 1918-19 the outrages were only one a year. Then in 1920 the Defence of India Act expired.

In 1921 the Rowlatt Act was repealed. In 1923 there were nine outrages. In 1924, 'eight. In October there was a limited ordinance, and 76 arrests. In 1925 the Bengal Criminal Law Amendment Act was passed with a five years' duration. In 1926 and 1928 the outrages dropped in number. In 1929 there were four outrages. In 1930, the Bengal Criminal Law Amendment Act expired on the 21st March. In April, 1930, came the Chittagong outrage. The Government immediately after that issued an Ordinance, but in 1930 there were 36 outrages and 19 murders. In 1931 there were 67 Terrorist outrages and nine murders. Now some very strong measures have been put on, and we will see that the outrages will cease.

16,748. You mean by "now," in 1933?—Yes, I understand so.

16,749. Mr. French, you are of the opinion that Law and Order should not be transferred?—Yes.

16,750. Is it only for Bengal?—For the whole of India.

16,751. Mr. Mills, I will just ask you one question. You have referred in your Memorandum to the fact that the seed has been well planted?—(Mr. Mills.) Yes.

16,752. Where?—It was planted in Bombay.

16,753. And after that?—After that the roots spread to Bengal.

16,754. And no other Province?—At that time it spread solely to Bengal.

16,755. Now?—Now there are branches of the organisation throughout Northern India.

16,756. Not in Madras?—I believe about three months ago an organisation came to light in Madras, and they ran a conspiracy case. That, I believe, was also due to Bengal influence.

Dr. Shafa'At Ahmad Khan.

16,757. Mr. French, in your replies to Mr. Ghuznavi, you have said that the targets of the Terrorist attack were mainly Europeans. Am I right in concluding from your replies that the Terrorist activities are directed against the Europeans as a whole?—(Mr. French.) The Terrorists have also murdered a number of very gallant Indian Police Officers, but they murdered them because they were serving the British Government.

16,758. But their primary object is to do away with the Europeans?—No, I should say that their primary object is to do away with the British Government in India

16,759. The Police are regarded by the Terrorists, I suppose, as the main instrument for the work of the Europeans?—The Police are regarded by the Terrorists as part of the British Government in India.

16,760. And therefore as the chief agent of the Europeans?—They are part of the British Government.

16,761. I put this to you, Mr. French. Anything that is done by the Police in the discharge of its duties is regarded as being guided, or at least inspired, by the European masters?—I do not accept the expression "European masters"—British Government.

16,762. The Europeans, therefore, have to get the blame for anything that is done by the Police?—I do not follow that.

16,763. I will come to my point. I am asking you whether you agree or not?—No, I do not agree to that.

16,764. The Police is and has been regarded as the chief agent for carrying out the work of the policy of the Europeans?—I do not know the term "European." I would say the Government in India.

16,765. Therefore, whatever is done by the Police the Europeans get the blame?—No, I do not know that.

16,766. I put it to you whether you are not really isolating the Europeans by keeping the Police reserved and if you transfer the Police to the charge of Indian Ministers they may be able to deal with the Terrorist activities and Terrorist crimes probably in a more efficacious and prompt manner than has been done so far?—I do not think so.

16,767. Why?—I think the British Government is more competent to maintain Law and Order than Indian Ministers under an elected system—under a Parliamentary system.

16,768. Your fear is, therefore, that if the Police is transferred it probably will not be able to discharge its duty?—I have not got a fear, I have got a certainty.

16,769. But you have also got a certainty that the entire system inaugurated since 1919 has been absolutely a failure in India?—I think it has been a failure, yes.

16,770. And that certainty is on the same footing as the certainty that you have just mentioned. The certainty that Parliamentary government is a failure is on a par with your certainty that the transfer of the Police would be a failure?—No, because I have observed instances in which it has failed. I have given the Municipalities. I have given reasons for considering that the elective system of municipal administration in Bengal has been a failure. I can also give the Legislative Councils, if you wish.

16,771. Your remarks regarding Bengal are applicable to every municipality in Bengal in 1933?—I should say they are applicable to the great majority.

16,772. Then you do not agree at all with Mr. Mills that the Intelligence Department, or the Intelligence Branch, could be at least isolated and placed in charge of the Governor?—No, I do not think so.

16,773. You disagree with him?—I do not disagree with Mr. Mills. I think Mr. Mills is viewing the question from a different angle. Mr. Mills' first concern (Mr. Mills will correct me if I am wrong) is how his Department can be kept intact and in proper working order. (Mr. Mills.) And also how European officials will be protected. (Mr. French.) Your question to me is whether, if you separate the Intelligence Department, it will be possible to run the province efficiently. Is that not so?

16,774. Yes?—I say, No.

16,775. Now, Mr. Mills, do you think that the proposal you have made regarding the placing of the Intelligence Bureau or the Intelligence Branch will be met by any section of the White Paper?—(Mr. Mills.) No, I do not think it would.

16,776. Your proposal is that the Intelligence Branch should be permanently placed in charge of the Governor?—I do not say permanently placed in charge of the Governor.

16,777. What is your time limit then?—I should say if there were a Minister whom the Governor felt was in no way connected with the Congress, he could very well place Terrorism under such a Minister.

16,778. The Minister would be practically the whole of the Executive Council?—Responsible for Law and Order.

16,779. He will constitute the Executive Council. You are thinking of the elected Minister?—I should leave it open to the Governor. If he considered that a Minister could be put in charge of the Intelligence system without any danger to the system, then it would be perfectly open to him to do so. The Minister responsible for Law and Order might very well be someone not connected with Congress at all. If that is so I see no reason why the Intelligence

Branch should not be put under such a Minister.

16,780. That clears up the position greatly, I think. Then your proposal does not differ fundamentally from the proposals that are implicit in the White Paper?—No. I should leave it entirely in the discretion of the Governor.

16,781. Then your proposal really is not based upon a radical modification of the White Paper?—No; so far as I have read the White Paper; all I suggest is that there might be power to appoint an extra Minister in charge of this Terrorist portfolio; or the Governor might take over the portfolio himself, if he considers it is desirable.

16,782. The extra Minister will not necessarily be the official Minister?—He might not be, if the Governor could find somebody else whom he considered could be in charge of the Intelligence Branch without danger to the Intelligence system.

16,783. He might be an elected Minister?—That is quite possible.

16,784. You do not exclude the possibility of an elected Minister being appointed in charge of the Intelligence Branch?—The only danger would be if the Congress Party were in power in the Council; he would then have to appoint his Minister from that Party.

16,785. And if the Congress Party were not in power you would have no objection to the appointment of a Minister who might be placed in charge of the Intelligence Branch?—No; it would be in the Governor's discretion.

Mr. Zafrulla Khan.

16,786. Mr. Mills, in your Memorandum one of the fears that you have expressed, if I may say so the main fear that you have expressed, is this, that if at any time there was a general amnesty exercised towards Terrorists, the work of the Special Branch or of the Intelligence Branch of the Police would be destroyed, and it would be impossible to build up the organisation again?—No. I do not say that in those circumstances it would be impossible to build up the organisation. I said that the morale of the Intelligence Branch would be very greatly lowered.

16,787. Take it at that. Would you regard an amnesty of that kind as a grave menace to the peace and tranquillity of India?—I think it would be a very grave menace to the peace and tranquillity of Bengal.

16,788. And you think the Governor ought to have power to resist any such proposal which his Ministry might make to him?—Yes, I do; because he is responsible for the tranquillity of the Province.

16,789. If the Governor had ample power to overrule his Ministers and to take any action which he considered necessary, or directed to be taken whenever he thought there was a grave menace to the peace and tranquillity of the Province, including any proposed amnesty to Terrorists, that would meet your wishes?—Yes. I believe that is provided in the White Paper.

16,790. Again, do you not regard Terrorism as a grave menace to the peace and tranquillity of India, apart from any question of amnesties?—I do.

16,791. And if the Governor had complete power to deal with that, that again would meet the fear that you have in mind?—Yes. I have made that suggestion.

16,792. One question with regard to these amnesties, the two that you have referred to in your Memorandum which have already taken place. You recognise that when those amnesties were announced Law and Order was completely reserved?—Yes.

16,793. So that the mere fact that Law and Order is reserved does not rule out any exercise of any particular power on any particular occasion?—I do not quite follow that question.

16,794. Law and Order being reserved merely gives powers to the Governor. It does not rule out the exercise by the Governor of his own authority one way or the other in favour of an amnesty or against it on any particular occasion when it might arise?—No.

16,795. Now, Mr. French, may I put one or two questions to you. I understand from answers you have given to questions put to you by previous questioners that, according to you, the whole of this scheme which originated in 1919 was a mistake I want to ask you this. I have understood clearly that at present you do not want to go forward; you want to go backward; but would you at any time consider that in India Parliamentary institutions and democratic institutions could be introduced?—(Mr. French.) I cannot see them possible in the reasonable future.

16,796. You think, therefore, that any urge towards them ought to be resisted?—What sort of urge?

16,797. Both in the form of formulating a constitution based upon that principle and also in the form of trying if possible to suppress any such desire among the people?—As I think they will not be feasible in the near future I think that making such plans is hardly useful energy.

16,798. That is answering one part of my question. May I put now the second part, which I think has not been answered. Do you think it could lead to mischief to permit the desire for such institutions to grow and be continued to be expressed in India for some years at least?—I am in favour of allowing as much liberty in India as is consonant with the maintenance of public order.

16,799. If you will excuse me, my question was not so far as liberty is concerned. My question is with regard to political aspirations and a desire and an expression of a desire for the attainment of these institutions?—That is a part of liberty.

16,800. Do you or do you not consider that the Government in India ought to encourage and promote a desire for democratic institutions and Parliamentary Government?—No.

16,801. And you think that the British Government in India has so far done nothing because it has been a reserved Government, to equip people of India for self-government, because that should not be the object of government at all?—I think it has tried and has not succeeded.

16,802. And that therefore it ought to abandon the attempt?—Yes.

16,803. Now you said with regard to a scheme to which reference was made by Sir Reginald Craddock that you had heard mention of it in the Punjab among other places?—I have not heard mention of it, I have just heard hints.

16,804. When were you in the Punjab last?—I was in the Punjab last in May of last year—May, 1932.

16,805. You have said that you heard hints of a great Muhammadan State including some Provinces of British India and also of Afghanistan?—Yes.

16,806. The hints must have been that this large and powerful Muhammadan State should be outside the British Empire if it was to include Afghanistan?—Well, they were only envisaging that as a possibility of the future.

16,807. But did the hints that you succeeded in hearing convey anything to your mind with regard to the possibility being that the Muhammadans of Northern India desired Afghanistan to be included within a British Federation of Muslim States, or did you think that they desired that these British Provinces should go outside the British Empire if it was to include Afghanistan?—I do not think there is an active desire at present to set up any such State, but it is a possibility that is in men's minds for some future time if necessary.

16,808. Did you hear hints directly or indirectly from any Muslim sources?—I heard them from Muslim sources.

16,809. Directly yourself?—Directly myself.

16,810. But it did not occur to you to inquire whether it was envisaged that this Federation would be within the British Empire or outside it?—I only heard it as a very vague idea.

Sarda Buta Singh.

16,811. Only one question, Mr. French. Are you aware that during these last 11 or 12 years Co-operative movement, education and agriculture, were transferred subjects under the control of Ministers?—Yes.

16,812. Is it a fact or is it not a fact that rapid improvement has been made in all these departments, such as in education; hundreds and thousands of new schools have been opened. Similarly many new Co-operative Societies, Central Banks and Central Co-operative Mortgage Banks have been started, and again much has been done for the improvement of agriculture?—Shall I take those items one by one?

16,813. As you please?—I do not think that the Co-operative credit movement in Bengal has improved. In my experience and in that of some other District Officers the Co-operative Credit Societies have fallen into the hands of village moneylenders; they lend money to each other, and then they lend it to the rest of the population. Last year in the Legislative Assembly a member enquired from me what had happened as regards the Registrar. The Registrar of Co-operative Societies in Bengal at that time was under suspension.

16,814. I am talking of the Punjab?—So much for Co-operative Credit Societies.

16,815. Have you anything to say with regard to the Punjab?—I do not know the Punjab well enough.

Sir Hari Singh Gour.

16,816. I just wish to ask you two questions, Mr. French. If you scrap

the Montagu-Chelmsford Reforms, as you advocate, and go back to autocratic rule, which is your objective, do you think it will add to the contentment of India?—Yes

16,817. It would?—Yes.

16,818. For how long do you think that contentment will last?—Indefinitely.

Sir Phiroze Sethna.

16,819. In that case you would have Executive Counsellors?—I would certainly have Executive Counsellors.

16,820. Would they be all Europeans?—Certainly not. All I say is that I am against Parliamentary government. I am not in the least against Indians holding important posts in the Government. I am not at all against that in any form.

Sir Hari Singh Gour.

16,821. Would you appoint Indians as Governors of Provinces?—If they were fit for the post, yes. I am only against Parliamentary government in India; I am not against the employment of Indians in any way.

16,822. I want to ask Mr. Mills one question. Mr. Mills, the terrorist movement in Bengal has a pretty long history?—(Mr. Mills.) Yes.

16,823. During all these years the terrorist movement in Bengal has continued in spite of the efforts made to control it?—Yes, because the action which has been approved by the Government, has always been inadequate to deal with it. Firm enough measures have not been taken.

16,824. You ascribe the continuance of the terrorist movement to the weakness of Government?—I consider that the Government are always afraid to take too severe measures because of public opinion.

16,825. Therefore, it is a weakness of Government?—Yes.

16,826. And that weakness has nothing to do with the Montagu-Chelmsford Reforms because the terrorist movement began in 1906?—That is so.

16,827. And that weakness may continue in future, even if you are to reserve law and order; there is no guarantee against it?—No. But the Government at the present time are taking firm measures. They seem to realise that it is a grave matter.

16,828. After all, it depends on the discretion of the Government?—Yes.

16,829. The Government is sporadically strong perhaps—sometimes strong and sometimes weak?—Yes.

16,830. There is no guarantee in future against a sporadically weak Government?—No.

Sir Phiroze Sethna.

16,831. You told us the differences between the Intelligence Branch of the Police and the Special Branch of the Police, Mr. Mills?—Yes.

16,832. You explained to us what is the difference in Bengal or does the same division extend also in the other Provinces?—No; I think Bengal is the only Province which has an Intelligence Branch, in other Provinces it is called the Special Branch of the C.I.D. It is confusing, but it is the same thing practically.

16,833. You refer to the Intelligence Bureau of the Government of India?—Yes.

16,834. How does that differ from the others?—Its functions are different from those of the Intelligence Branch in the Provinces, its functions being to co-ordinate the work of the different Provinces.

16,835. You referred to two Congress Parties in Bengal?—Yes.

16,836. Which are those?—The two Congress factions, one might call them.

16,837. Are they known by different names?—No, they have different leaders.

16,838. You have explained what is the avowed object of the terrorists and you suggest your remedy in your Memorandum, namely, to have legislation on the lines of the current Act permanently on the Statute Book?—Yes.

16,839. Do you not think the remedy is worse than the disease, after your experience in Ireland?—I have never been in Ireland.

16,840. You have not, but I mean the experience of this country?—No, I do not think it would.

16,841. You think oppressive measures would stop terrorism?—I see no other method of dealing with it at all.

16,842. Supposing the White Paper proposals ended in reforms which satisfied the great majority of Indians?—They would not satisfy the terrorists because they are completely irreconcilable. Their sole aim is complete independence.

16,843. You refer to municipalities: I suppose your experience is confined to Bengal Province, Mr. French, to judge from the municipalities which you quote as being mismanaged?—(Mr. French.)

My personal experience is confined to Bengal, but from what I have heard from other District Officers, it is much the same in other parts of India.

16,844. You single out a few cases from administration reports. Is not it a fact that against one such municipality which you say is mismanaged there are dozens which are well managed?—No.

16,845. Have you proofs to show that?—The extract which I read from the Bengal Administration Report was about the Province as a whole, about the municipalities as a whole.

16,846. And you gave quotations from administration reports, not of this year, last year, or two years ago, but of several years back?—The rest of my evidence was my own personal experience.

16,847. In reply to Lord Salisbury you said your knowledge was up to date, Mr. French, yet you told the Committee that the Calcutta Municipality was superseded. Again you said it was suspended. Is that so?—I should have used the word "suspended."

16,848. You used both?—I should have used "suspended."

16,849. Is it suspended?—I saw the notice in all the newspapers here that on the 5th September the Bill had passed amending it.

16,850. May I tell you it is not suspended? The Bill imposes certain restrictions, and the information which you have given to the Committee is not correct?—I will take it from you, but it is "The Times" newspaper that I read it in. It is "The Times" which is not correct if the information is not correct.

Sir Hari Singh Gour.

16,851. I think you got it from the "Morning Post"?—Also "The Times."

Sir Phiroze Sethna.

16,852. You said the main attitude of the Indian public towards the Terrorists is that of fear? Do you imply thereby that the attitude is also one of sympathy towards the Terrorists?—No, the attitude of the mass of the population is not of sympathy.

16,853. I am glad to hear that. One last question, Mr. French. I understand you were Government Whip in the Legislative Assembly when you were there?—I was Assistant Government Whip.

16,854. I beg your pardon. You said: "There is no evidence that Parliamentary Institutions will be a success in India." Will you tell the Committee what has been your experience of the time when you were on the Assembly, whether the Assembly was worked on proper lines or otherwise?—The reason why the elective system has not succeeded in the Legislative Assembly is based on two grounds the first ground is, in my observation, the majority of the elected members of the Legislative Assembly did not represent political parties or political modes of thought, but represented different communities, Hindus or Muhammadans. The evidence I have to offer in support of that is the sort of questions asked in the Legislative Assembly. I could support my contention by reference to the Debates in the Legislative Assembly. That would take a long time, and would occupy a great deal of the very important time of this Joint Committee, so I just propose to give four or five typical questions if you wish. They are all of a communal nature. Shall I read them, or will you take them as read?

16,855. I do not think I will trouble the Committee; there is no time now. That is all?—My second reason to say that the elective system has not succeeded in the Legislative Assembly is that in 1931 the Legislative Assembly refused supply to the Government. On the 23rd March, 1931, a proposal was passed reducing the rates of income tax with a loss of 240 lakhs. On the 26th March, 1931, the Viceroy recommended its restoration.

Lord Eustace Percy

16,856. The Viceroy?—The Governor-General.

Mr. N. M. Joshi.

16,857. Did not the European members in the Assembly also vote for the reduction of the income tax?—Not that one. Again in the case of the Indian Finance Bill (supplementary and extending), in the special Session of November, 1931, between the 16th November and the 19th November four crores were refused to the Government. The Viceroy had to restore this also.

Sir Phiroze Sethna.

16,858. And you find fault with the Assembly for doing so?—I find fault with the Assembly for refusing necessary supplies to the Government.

Sir Phiroze Sethna.] Therefore, they are not fit for democratic Government.

Major C. R. Attlee.

16,859. Mr. Mills, I wanted to ask you one point with regard to the question of the Congress getting power in Bengal. Has not the Congress Party always quarrelled among itself in Bengal?—(Mr. Mills.) It has for a considerable period.

13^o Novembris, 1933.] Mr. J. C. FRENCH and Mr. S. H. H. MILLS. [Continued.]

16,860. Do not most communities quarrel among themselves in Bengal?—I do not think one can say that.

16,861. Have there not been dissensions even among the Muslims too?—Yes, but I do not think there has ever been such a definite cleavage as there has been between the two Congress factions in the Province.

16,862. Why do you assume that suddenly with the introduction of the reforms all these dissensions will be healed and you will have complete domination by a united party?—I think when there is a chance of getting real power there will be a far stronger incentive to combine.

16,863. Has not the Congress Party real power in the Calcutta Municipality?—In the municipality they have.

16,864. That did not prevent Mr. Sen Gupta and Mr. Subas Bose from quarrelling?—No, it did not prevent them.

Mr. M. R. Jayaker.

16,865. Mr. French, so far as I can gather from your Memorandum your attitude is this, that you are not suggesting any modifications of individual proposals of the White Paper, but you are absolutely opposed to the scheme of the White Paper?—(Mr. French.) Yes.

16,866. Therefore your position is different from that of Mr. Mills?—(Mr. Mills.) Yes, I mentioned that before.

16,867. I take it, Mr. French, your Memorandum is based upon your experience in the Legislative Assembly which you frankly stated is a failure of Parliamentary Institutions?—(Mr. French.) Yes.

16,868. You do not share the view of some people, that it has laid the germs of real representation, as yet in a quickening form?—No.

16,869. May I read to you the opinion of the Government of India in their despatch where, speaking of the Legislative Assembly, this is what they say: "That Assembly has sown the seeds as yet only quickening of real representation." I take it you do not share this view?—No.

16,870. May I point out to you that the signatories to that despatch are the following: Lord Irwin; Commander-in-Chief Sir William Birdwood, Sir George Rainy, Sir James Crerar, Sir George Schuster, Sir B. L. Mitter, Sir Fazl-i-Husain, and Sir Joseph W. Bhore. May I further point out that two of these gentlemen, Sir George Rainy and Sir James Crerar, are the doyens of your Service? Do you share their view, or do you think they are absolutely wrong in their estimation about that?—My view being what it is, I cannot say that their view is right.

16,871. May I point out to you that the representatives of European commerce in India who have gone into the Legislatures, Central as well as Provincial, do not share your view at all. May I point out to you that their representative giving evidence before this Committee stated his experience in the following terms: "I have been in three Legislatures in India, and all I can say is that the amount of assimilation of the Parliamentary system which has gone on in the minds of my Indian colleagues is very considerable. I think that the proceedings in the Assembly, indeed of the Bengal Council, when I was a member during its most stormy days, and of the Madras Council, would do great credit to any Parliamentary Institution." You think this view is wrong?—Yes.

Lt.-Col. Sir H. Gidney.

16,872. Mr. Mills, in answer to Dr. Shafa' At Ahmad Khan you said that the Governor should have power to hand over Law and Order even to an elected Minister?—At his discretion.

Lieut.-Col Sir H. Gidney.

16,873. In reply to a previous question you said that if the Congress Party were in power the Governor should elect a Minister from them in charge of Law and Order?—Yes, at his discretion.

16,874. You also said that it is your opinion it is quite likely that the Congress Party would sweep the elections?—Yes.

16,875. Supposing I put before you a picture of a Party—it may be developing in India to-day under the guise of some other name—but with the principles and objects of the Congress Party, would you object to that Party?—It all depends whether it has associations with the terrorists.

16,876. Then do you state here definitely that the Congress Party and the terrorist party are one and the same thing?—Practically, in Bengal

16,877. Do you mean by this that the Congress leaders are really the brains behind the terrorist movement?—Yes, most certainly.

16,878. In your Memorandum you have given quite a different idea of how law and order should be managed. The first alternative you suggest is to appoint an extra Minister or adviser from the Indian Civil Service if the Governor considers that necessary, and the other alternative is that the Governor would take over the portfolio himself?—Yes.

16,879. You now introduce a third method by suggesting that even if this Minister were an elected Minister, provided he did not belong to one of these Parties you would not object to him taking over Law and Order?—I have said there, if the Governor considered such a course necessary. He might not consider it necessary.

16,880. Now do you look upon the Calcutta Corporation as a mirror reflecting the political opinion of Bengal as a Province?—I think it does.

16,881. Have you ever known a Muslim to be elected as Mayor of the Calcutta Corporation?—No.

16,882. Do you think a Muslim will ever be elected as Mayor?—I should think it is improbable.

16,883. Then do you think that the composition of the Bengal Legislative Council with a large majority of Muslims would not have an antidotal effect upon the Congress? Do you think that the suggested Council of Bengal with a large percentage of Muslims would not be an antidote to the Swaraj ever regaining power?—I have already said that I consider a certain number of Muslims would come it on the Congress ticket.

16,884. Then do you agree with me that a large number of Muslims to-day support Congress candidates?—Yes, I have already said so.

16,885. Am I right in saying that the reason of this is because of their financial indebtedness to the Hindus?—That I am afraid I cannot give an answer to.

Earl of Lytton.

16,886. Mr. Mills, I want to ask you one question on the subject of releases of which you have spoken. You deplored indiscriminate release of détenus?—Yes, my Lord.

16,887. You are aware, of course, that apart from general amnesties which have taken place from time to time there has been a regular policy of releasing selected individuals on undertakings?—Yes.

16,888. When you spoke about outrages committed by those who had been released did you include any men who were released after giving an undertaking?—I cannot say that, but we have had cases of détenus who have been released and have given an undertaking, having been re-arrested when further repressive legislation came in; in other words, they have broken their word and gone back to the terrorist movement.

16,889. You have known cases where men have given an undertaking and have broken it afterwards?—Yes, I can speak from my experience of a case in which an undertaking was given, I think, after the Defence of India Act expired, and that man went back again into the movement. We have had cases of it; I am certain of that.

16,890. I am speaking, of course, of detenu under the Bengal Ordinance?—Yes.

16,891. Do you know of your own experience of any men who were released after giving an undertaking and who have been subsequently re-arrested?—Yes, I know of one or two cases.

Lieut.-Colonel Sir H. Gidney

16,892. Continuing my question, would not I be right in saying that the Muslim community in Bengal to-day are now quite capable of managing their own affairs with the majority that they will have in the proposed Council and that they would resent the Congress leadership?—If the Muslims were in a majority.

16,893. They are in a majority now, but would not I be right in saying that if they would be able to get a majority of the Congress they would not have the leadership of the Muslims?—I have already said there would be some Congress Muslims who would vote with the Congress Hindus.

16,894. In your Memorandum you made a statement that is was more than likely?—Yes.

16,895. The Muslims to-day are a different community from what they were a little while ago, are they not?—Yes.

16,896. Surely the Muslims can be depended upon, if Law and Order were given to them, to see that Law and Order were carried out properly?—I have already said that if the Governor considered it desirable he could make over "terrorism" to the Minister responsible for Law and Order straight away.

16,897. Therefore all these reasons which have been given about the Muslims not supporting the Congress and being in debt, etc., are really not important factors to prevent Law and Order being given over to the Minister?—I think we must wait and see what the elections show.

16,898. Is it a fact in your experience in Calcutta in the Intelligence Department that arms and ammunition are being imported via the ports?—Yes.

16,899. Can you tell the Committee whether this has been on the increase of recent years?—I think it has been on a considerable increase.

16,900. Could you say within the last five or ten years?—In 1924 the situation was becoming so serious that I moved the Bengal Government to appoint a special staff to deal with arms smuggling in the Port of Calcutta.

16,901. Could you tell me what that staff consisted of?—I think it consisted of an inspector and four sub-inspectors.

Sir Hubert Carr.

16,902. There is only one question I want to get quite clear, Mr. Mills, and that is: In the case of a separation of the Special Branch from the C.I.D.—?—The Intelligence Branch.

16,903. Yes, the Intelligence Branch—would you be satisfied that the Intelligence Branch could in case of necessity depend upon getting the support which it would require from the uniformed police?—Yes, because both branches would still be under the Inspector-General of Police.

Dr. B. R. Ambedkar.

16,904. Mr. Mills, there is just one question I should like to ask you, because I am rather interested in getting your view of this matter. You stated somewhat emphatically that under the proposed Constitution in Bengal Muslims and the Depressed Classes would be under the influence of the Congress?—I think there is every chance of their being under the influence of the Congress—a percentage of them.

16,905. You said about 20 of the Depressed Classes?—Yes.

16,906. I suppose it is not your suggestion that as it is to-day there are any Depressed Classes or there are any Muhammadans who are in sympathy with the terrorist movement?—We have quite a large number of Depressed Classes who have been arrested as terrorists.

16,907. From what community?—We have had some from peculiar communities and there have been a number of Shahas; then from Midnapore quite a number of the Depressed Classes have been arrested—particularly Midnapore.

16,908. Shaha is not a schedule of the Depressed Classes?—No. In the Midnapore district there have been quite a number of the Depressed Classes who have been arrested.

16,909. Now the next point that I want to draw your attention to is this: May I just put it? Is it your experience, for instance, that a large community like the Namasudras in Bengal are in any way connected with the Terrorist movement?—Yes, they are.

16,910. The next question that I want to ask you is this: You know that under the White Paper proposals the minorities in Bengal have separate electorates?—Yes.

16,911. Do you still think that, notwithstanding the separate electorates, the Congress will have any influence in the election of the members of these communities?—I think it is highly probable.

16,912. How would that influence be felt?—Because the Congress having the Terrorists behind them is very greatly feared in the Province, and that fear would tend to dominate them.

Mr. N. M. Joshi.

16,913. May I ask the Witnesses whether they will agree with me on account of their experience of the Province that whatever may be the aim of the Terrorists one of the important causes of the rise of the Terrorist movement is the economic position of the Province, namely, that on account of the peculiar circumstances of the Province the Permanent Settlement and the subdivision of the landlords, the educated middle class finds it difficult to get suitable employment?—I think it is the same all over the world. I do not think that has had any particular reaction on the Terrorists.

16,914. You think that on account of the unemployment these young men do not take to the Terrorist movement, but it is simply due to their political motives?—I think it is due to political movements; economic causes account for something, but that is the main reason.

16,915. What is your view, Mr. French?—(Mr. French.) My view is that the economic consideration is quite secondary.

16,916. Have you not had cases of people who had sympathy with the Terrorist movement give up the movement when they got suitable jobs?—(Mr. Mills.) Yes, I have had such cases.

16,917. Does not it show that if these young men could get suitable jobs many of them would leave the movement?—I do not think that applies, because we have also had cases of Terrorists who have obtained suitable employment (and also wealthy men), who still throw themselves heart and soul into the movement, but we have also had cases of men who have thrown it up when they have had suitable employment.

Chairman] We are greatly obliged to you, gentlemen, for the way in which you have given your evidence.

(The Witnesses are directed to withdraw.)

Ordered, That this Committee be adjourned to to-morrow at half-past Ten o'clock.

Colonel R. F. BAIRD, Lieut.-Colonel C. L. DUNN, C.I.E., and Lieut.-Colonel H. H. BROOME are called in and examined as follows:

Chairman.

16,918. Colonel R. F. Baird, you served 31 years in India in the Indian Medical Service, retiring in 1929, were a civil surgeon in the United Provinces for twenty years and then held the post of Inspector General of Civil Hospitals in the United Provinces for three years, acting in this capacity as chief medical adviser to the United Provinces Government?—(Colonel Baird.) Yes.

16,919. Lieut.-Colonel C. L. Dunn, you joined the Indian Medical Service in 1902; you were Deputy Sanitary Commissioner in the United Provinces in 1910-14 and again in 1919; and were Director of Public Health in the United Provinces in 1919-32?—(Lieut.-Colonel Dunn.) Yes.

14^o Novembris, 1933.]

16,920 Are you now retired?—Yes.

16,921. Lieut.-Colonel Broome, you joined the Indian Medical Service in 1903, in 1908 were appointed Professor of Anatomy in the King Edward Medical College, Lahore; returned to the Medical College in 1918, became Professor of Surgery in 1921 and, a year later, Principal of the College?—(Lieut.-Colonel Broome.) Yes.

16,922. You, too, I think, are retired from the Indian Medical Service?—Yes.

16,923. Colonel Baird, you are also retired?—(Colonel Baird.) Yes, my Lord.

16,924. Colonel Baird, you hand in a Memorandum which is number 92?—Yes. It is as follows:

MEMORANDUM 92 ON CIVIL MEDICAL SERVICES BY COLONEL R. F. BAIRD, I.M.S. (Retired).

(The writer spent thirty-one years in India in the Indian Medical Service, the first eight years in Military employment in various parts of the country, the subsequent twenty years as a Civil Surgeon in the United Provinces (with the exception of four and a-half years active service during the war). He was then selected for the post of Inspector-General of Civil Hospitals in the United Provinces, which he held for three years. In this capacity he acted as chief adviser to the United Provinces Government in all medical matters (excluding Public Health), and controlled a staff of some six to seven hundred doctors distributed over the Province. He retired in 1929.)

Medical Services being, under the Reforms Scheme, a Transferred subject, I administered the Department under an Indian Minister.

I found during this period that the standard of the medical relief afforded to the people of the Province was undergoing a very decided deterioration, ascribable to the following factors:—

1. Tendency of the Minister in charge to interfere with details of Medical administration instead of confining himself to matters of Medical Policy. I was on many occasions asked to alter my proposals for both important and comparatively unimportant appointments, and to fall in with the private plans of the Minister for these appointments. Even the postings of subordinate doctors to small towns and villages were not too unimportant for the Minister to interest himself in. On one occasion he wished to interfere in the selection of the head assistant in my own office. I found that Indian doctors would frequently go to the Ministry to try to influence him regarding their own appointments, behind my back. Their proper course if they desired an interview with the Minister, being to obtain it through me.

It is obvious that if the Head of a Department, particularly of a highly technical Department like the Medical, has not the power to award merit by good appointments, and confine slackness and inefficiency to the less important posts, both the discipline and efficiency of his department suffer enormously. Promotion no longer goes by merit and ability but by Ministerial favour.

Much friction was of course caused by disagreements between the Minister and the Departmental Head, and a point was not infrequently reached when one or other must either resign or give way. I found that the only way to avoid this climax, was to adopt a policy of compromise, permitting myself to be overruled on less important matters.

What was the reason for this constant Ministerial interference in the petty details of administration? Communal feeling, nepotism, bribery, are freely suggested by opponents of the Reforms Scheme to explain the shortcomings of Indian Ministers; I should hesitate to make such imputations. As a rule it was perfectly clear that the peculiar actions of the Minister were traceable to a desire to please a political friend or placate a foe. It became exceedingly difficult to protect the Medical Department from this political wire-pulling.

2. Loss of British personnel.

In the years preceding my tenure of office and during my actual tenure, the number of I.M.S. officers employed in the Province was constantly dwindling. Their services were not dispensed with, but vacancies caused by casualties and retirements were not filled up. I several times made representations to the Minister asking for more officers to fill vacancies, but the invariable reply was that funds were not available. It is noteworthy that I had what may be called a "safeguard" in the shape of an existing order of the Secretary of State that at least twenty-five I.M.S. officers should be employed as Civil Surgeons. This safeguard could always be ignored on Financial grounds.

14^o Novembris, 1933]

I refer to the imperative need of British personnel again later.

3. Waste of public money in fostering Ayurvedic and Unani systems of medicine.

Under the Reforms Scheme the tendency has been to spend greatly increased amounts of money on these outworn systems "Colleges" and "Hospitals" have received considerable grants at a time when funds were urgently required for the maintenance of the regular Medical Services and the salaries of a few I.M.S. officers were too great a charge for the Provincial Budgets. It is true that one can sympathise to some extent with an Indian's feeling for what is part of the ancient culture of the country, but to ask a government to spend money on these systems, is like asking an Army Commander to raise and equip a corps of archers, when machine guns are urgently wanted. Moreover, the evil does not stop here, and throughout the hospitals of India one can see dozens of patients suffering from advanced disease, easily curable in the early stages by simple surgical or medical means, who have wasted weeks or months in seeking relief from a baid or hakim. Thousands of eyes are permanently blinded annually by the unscientific attempts of ignorant satyas to cure cataract. It is thus clear that a Government which fosters and encourages with money grants these ancient systems is doing a great disservice to its own people.

4. Incompetence and mismanagement of local authorities (District boards and municipalities). In pre-Reform days the Collector or Deputy Commissioner of each district, a member of the I.C.S. was Chairman of the District Board. Speaking from a long personal experience, I can say that the Chairman and Civil Surgeon worked hand in hand for the welfare of the medical institutions in the District. The funds available were often less than could be wished, nevertheless subscriptions and taxes were collected, and hospital buildings were kept in reasonably good condition, surgical and medical equipment, drugs, hospital clothing and bedding was usually sufficient for the need of the institution. Now all this is changed. The District Boards Act of 1922 released the Boards from official control. The Indian chairman, though often a man of education and ability in other directions, has little knowledge of or sympathy with medical aims. Deterioration of medical relief was soon in evidence. Hospital buildings fell into disrepair, money was not forthcoming for renewal of essential instruments and equipment. Side by side with this many abuses arose, staffs of hospitals tended to be used for the private purposes of the Chairman and members of Boards, also for electioneering purposes. Appointments, transfers, and punishments of hospital personnel and servants, are now vested in the Board, and these functions are often exercised in complete disregard of the Civil Surgeon's recommendations. Discipline naturally suffers. It is true that a strong Civil Surgeon can to some extent protect his own hospital staff, but the majority of Civil Surgeons are now Indians, and naturally have not the independence of a British doctor, and are themselves liable to be drawn into local political intrigues. Should they refuse, their lives are often made a burden by false charges and frivolous complaints—I received constant requests for transfers to another district from Indian doctors from the causes indicated. The obvious remedy for this state of affairs was for Government to take over the Boards again, and I understand that in many cases this has now been done.

At the end of para. 2 I referred to the imperative need of a strong British element in the Civil Medical Service. During my tenure of office I formed a very strong impression that if Provincial Autonomy became an established fact, with Finance under Indian control, no British Civil Medical officers whatever would be employed by the Provincial Government. It did not therefore surprise me when the "Services Sub-Committee" of the Round Table Conference reported in January, 1931, "that in future there should be no Civil Branch of the I.M.S." Whether the Civil Medical Services of India are called I.M.S. or not is a matter of comparatively minor importance. My point is that whatever these services are called it is essential that they contain a strong British element. It would be disastrous for the welfare of the Indian masses if the immense field of medical work (as yet hardly touched) were to be divorced from Western ideals and thought. Indian public men have scarcely as yet realised the terrible economic wastage caused by disease, and the modern conception that every individual who is sick (mentally or physically), crippled, or blind, is a drain on the resources of the State. State Medical Service is to-day the direction in which modern Governments are everywhere tending, and such a Service is actually a Revenue producing department. In the Indian Medical Service India already possesses the framework of a State Medical Service, with great opportunities for extension and development along the required lines. To talk of its abolition at present would therefore appear to be the height of folly.

I need not here refer to the necessity of maintaining a War reserve of doctors for the Army, and the necessity of British Doctors for the British element remaining in the Services. These necessities are well known to everyone.

There is, however, another subject seldom discussed to which I must allude, and that is, the very low standard of Medical Ethics which exists in India. It is difficult for an Englishman who does not know India to conceive the extent to which Bribery or attempted Bribery enters into the daily life of the Doctor in India. Every district Civil Surgeon (with a few exceptions) is a police surgeon and as such he is called upon almost daily to examine and subsequently give expert evidence in the Criminal Courts regarding cases of murder, assault, rape, etc.

He is frequently also called to the Civil Courts for evidence regarding age, sanity, testamentary capacity, etc. In addition to this he constantly examines candidates for admission to the Public Services, Government servants for sick certificates, invaliding, etc. Below the grade of Civil Surgeon, Assistant Surgeons and private practitioners have much of the same work to do.

In a very large number of these cases bribes are offered to obtain a favourable opinion—I am speaking of what I know, as many attempts have been made to bribe me in important cases, and my friends among Civil Surgeons have had similar experiences. I can give details if required. Indians are perfectly well aware that Bribery is abhorrent to Englishmen in the Indian Services, and if they approach them even occasionally, it is certain that they approach their own countrymen, born and bred in a "favourable" atmosphere, much more frequently. There are ample evidences that these bribes are frequently accepted;

I could not of course take up the attitude that all English doctors are unbribeable, and all Indian doctors bribeable, but there is a very marked difference between the British and Indian standpoint. I have seen such remarkable opinions expressed by Indian doctors in both Criminal and Civil cases, and so many medical certificates given without the doctor even seeing the patient, as to leave no doubt in my mind that bribes had been accepted. I was for three years President of the Medical Council, and in the routine work of that Council many cases of false certification came up for consideration. The attitude of the Indian members towards such cases was almost invariably to minimise the offender's fault, and refuse to take any action. Had there been no British members, no action would have been taken in the majority of cases.

There is no doubt whatever in my mind that a strong British element in the Civil Medical Service makes for better Medical Ethics, and that a weakening of it causes deterioration. Unless the Criminal Courts can trust the evidence of a Police Surgeon and know that it is uncontaminated, the administration of Justice becomes impossible.

Reverting to the future of the Civil Medical Services; it is useless to disguise the fact that the Indian Medical Service is very unpopular with politically minded Indians. They regard its members as highly privileged people who stand in the way of the development of an Independent Medical profession. This attitude is no doubt partly a reflex of the feeling of the Independent Practitioners themselves. The latter, however, are in my experience even more envious of their own countrymen who have had the good fortune or ability to enter Government employment. The bone of contention is the privilege of private practice which is permitted by Government to its officers, so long as it does not interfere with their public duties.

A better understanding between doctors in and outside Government service is in my opinion most desirable. So far as the I.M.S. is concerned I believe that it would be prepared to abandon its right to practice privately if this would lead to a better understanding with the Independent Indian Practitioner, and convince politically minded India that English doctors do not go to India exclusively for private gain. I feel assured that a reorganised Service could be formed, the members of which would confine themselves to duties such as the charge of some of the larger hospitals, medical charge of all Public Services, medico-legal work as Police Surgeons, Public Health, Research, and Medical Education. The field of work is so large, so varied, and so interesting that it should not be difficult to enlist a body of enthusiastic medical men, both British and Indian, to enter such a Service even though shorn of the emoluments of private practice.

16,925. Colonel Dunn, you hand in a Memorandum number 93^P—(Lieut.-Colonel Dunn.) Yes, it is as follows:

MEMORANDUM 93 BY LIEUT.-COLONEL C. L. DUNN, C.I.E., DIRECTOR OF PUBLIC HEALTH, UNITED PROVINCES, 1919-1932.

EFFECTS OF THE INTRODUCTION OF COMPLETE PROVINCIAL AUTONOMY ON THE PUBLIC HEALTH OF INDIA.

1. On the prevention of epidemics and general sanitation.

I do not think that the Government have altogether realised the effects which the proposals to grant complete autonomy to the Provinces of India would have on the health of these provinces and of India as a whole.

There are several essential measures for the protection of the health of the people which cannot be given practical effect to in the water-tight compartments of provinces, but which can be effectively controlled by the Central Government. This obvious fact has been realised in England as the result of experience ever since the introduction of the reforms of 1832. Under that Act, public health was practically relegated to the control of the Local Authorities, with the result that little or no improvement in the mortality and morbidity rate is evident from a study of the vital statistics available for that period, and the sanitation of most towns remained in a most unsatisfactory condition.

With the introduction of the Public Health Act of 1875, in which the Central Government laid down certain obligatory duties for observance by local bodies, an immediate improvement was noticeable, and with the successive amendments to this Act, each increasing the powers of the Central Government for the enforcement of measures to improve sanitation and the prevention of disease, the improvement in the public health became more and more marked.

These lessons were not lost on the Dominions, and the experience gained by the Home Government was made use of in Australia, South Africa, etc., where great and important powers of control for the prevention of disease were reserved to the Federal Governments.

In the United States public health was originally made a State subject and is still so to a great extent, with the result that the Federal Government are having immense difficulties, as the result of the legislation of their predecessors, in putting the public health of the whole country on a sound footing.

In view of the experience gained in other countries and of my own experience of the difficulties I have had to contend with, I am strongly of the opinion that complete autonomy in respect of public health must be greatly modified in the new Government of India Act.

Is it realised that in India, which is a country of great religious pilgrimages, the efforts of the Provincial Public Health Departments to control the annually recurring epidemics of plague, cholera, small pox, etc., have been rendered comparatively ineffective owing to there being no Public Health Act for all India permitting of the control of the pilgrim traffic and designed to prevent the continual importation of these diseases from one province to another by pilgrims and other travellers?

Is it realised that all the efforts to improve sanitation and hygiene in a progressive province are continually inhibited by the backwardness of adjoining provinces and Indian States?

Is it not obvious that a Government of India Act providing for the control of infectious disease and laying down obligatory provisions for the maintenance by each province of a minimum cadre of public health officials to maintain a standard degree of efficiency and sanitation and the prevention of disease would not only be accepted without any intelligent opposition by the provincial Governments, but would be welcomed?

Recommendations to this effect were put forward by the United Provinces Government in their Memorandum to the Simon Commission on page 434 and approved by the Simon Commission on page 152, Vol. II, of their report.

14^o Novembris, 1933.]

I consider that a Public Health Act for all-India, binding on the provinces, which lays down certain essentials should be introduced and that the Government of India should retain the power to legislate for the public health of India as a whole. I append four examples of what I consider essentials:—

(a) The minimum staff of Provincial Public Health officials to be employed by each province and their qualifications and status.

(b) The areas—urban and rural—for which qualified medical Officers of health and sanitary inspectors should be employed and the proportion of such Officials to the population of each area.

(c) The minimum obligatory measures to be taken by each Provincial Government to prevent the spread of epidemic disease.

(d) Measures for the control of travellers suffering from or contacts with infectious disease, especially pilgrims travelling to religious festivals.

2. On the adulteration of food and drugs.

The Adulteration of Food and Drugs, especially the former, is exceedingly rife in India, and the various Provincial Governments have made laudable endeavours to cope with this evil, but owing to their powers being limited to their provincial boundaries, the evasion of the provincial laws by the importation of adulterated food, such as ghee in large quantities, from one province to another, has been found almost impossible to prevent. All India legislation would be much more effective in stamping out this evil.

3. On the prevention of Malaria.

The ineptitude of the measures for the prevention and treatment of malaria taken by Provincial Governments is a scandal that was severely commented on by the Malaria Commission of the League of Nations, and the efforts of the Government of India to deal with the situation have not been altogether praiseworthy.

They have, it is true, quinine plantations on a meagre scale, but on such a meagre scale that the great need of India for quinine and its allies have to be met by the contract purchase of quinine from the Dutch East Indies at a price laid down by the ring of producers who control the world prices.

The result of the present system has produced the paradox that the Government of India have accumulated huge stocks of quinine which the Provinces will not buy at the price demanded, and 90 per cent. of the villagers of India get annual attacks of malaria and never see quinine. The Linlithgow Commission recommended the control of the management of the Production of Quinine by the Government of India (c.f. page 491 of their report). It is a pity they did not also recommend that it was the duty of the Government of India to provide all the quinine and its allied preparations necessary to properly treat free every person attacked by malaria in the whole of India, and thus raise the economic output of the country by at least 20 per cent. I submitted a joint note with the Director of Agriculture to the United Provinces Government in 1931 giving it as our opinion that if sufficient quinine were made available to give every agricultural labourer who was attacked by malaria 90 grs. of quinine per attack during the period 15th September to 15th November in each year, the "RABI" (spring) crop per acre would be increased by an average of 2 maunds, which would make all the difference between penury and comparative comfort, and which would increase the revenue of the province to a proportionate extent. Inability to provide funds for the initial expense was pleaded as a reason for not introducing this measure as an experiment even in one tahsil.

The experiment was, however, introduced in a modified form by the Gorakhpur District Board at their own expense in one tahsil with the promising result that the incidence of malaria in that tahsil was reduced by nearly 50 per cent., the Board is still continuing the experiment but the result of the economic output has not yet been published.

4. The Indian Medical Service.

What will be the effect of the proposed abolition of the Civil branch of the Indian Medical Service on the health of the people? The Services Sub-Committee of the 1st Round Table Conference in 1931 recommended that there should in future be no Civil branch of the Indian Medical Service, and that no "listed" posts should be reserved for Europeans as such. They proposed instead that sufficient provision for a war reserve for the Army and to attend on British officers and their wives should be recruited on contract. The Government has come to no decision on this report and it would appear from the fact that 2½ years have elapsed since it was presented, that Government has had great difficulty in coming to any decision. I understand however that this decision is to be committed to the Joint Committee in the near future.

It is, I suppose, permitted to criticise this report in spite of the fact that Government has come to no decision. The substitution by the Sub-Committee of an alternative to the Indian Medical Service indicates that they realise the necessity for a war reserve for the military branch and a small cadre of doctors to attend on British officials and their wives and families, but their reasons for substituting a cadre with no traditions or standards to maintain for the present highly efficient system do not appear to have any solid foundation. They have not apparently realised that the class of doctors who would accept such posts, if any, would be of a necessarily much lower standard than the Indian Medical Service.

I wonder if they had considered the relevant opinion of the Simon Commission on this subject which was as follows, "A medical service recruited provincially in India will be no substitute for one with the excellent traditions of the Indian Medical Service," and "The Indian Medical Service could ill be spared for still another reason, loss of contact with the standards and progress of Western medicine, which would be entailed by a failure of recruitment of the Indian Medical Service, would be disastrous for the future of the public health in India.

I am convinced that the deterioration which has already taken place in the Medical and Public Health Departments of the Provincial Governments would be accentuated if the recommendations of this sub-committee are given effect to. That deterioration of a grave kind has occurred in the administration of the Civil Hospitals and the branch dispensaries is undoubted. They are now badly maintained, ill-equipped and inefficiently staffed and the lack of proper control is evidenced by the grave deterioration in discipline and hence in hospital cleanliness (cf. pages 408, 409, and 413 of the memorandum of the United Provinces Government to the Simon Commission).

In the Public Health Department, Indian Medical Service recruitment has practically stopped already with the result that this great and essential Department has been deprived of the services of highly qualified and experienced officers with high standards and ideals who keep in close touch with all modern advances in sanitation and the prevention of disease, who by precept and example inculcated in their Indian colleagues a spirit of emulation which militated against the insidious encroachment of slackness in initiative and loss of mental and physical energy, which seem to be the heritage of the inhabitants of tropical countries.

With Indian Medical Service Officers totally eliminated from the public health departments, I am afraid that deterioration would be rapid. The abolition of the Civil branch of the Indian Medical Service would also have serious repercussions in the recruitment of suitable officers for the military branch. It is well known that the Indian Medical Service was a very popular service before the introduction of the reforms, and the numbers of candidates at each examination were far in excess of the vacancies. What is the state of affairs now? Examinations have been dropped altogether and all sorts of inducements have to be offered to endeavour to obtain a sufficiency of officers of the right stamp. This in spite of the fact that the cadre is now down to 650 regular officers, 200 British and 100 Indians in civil employ, and 230 British officers and 120 Indians in the military branch. The number in civil employ before the war was 500, and the civil branch constituted the chief attraction of the service as it provided adequate professional opportunities. According to the Warren Fisher report one of the difficulties in obtaining recruits for the R.A.M.C., R.N.M.S., and R.A.F.M.S. has been the lack of professional opportunities, and this difficulty has always existed in these services. In the Indian Medical Service this objection did not previously exist, hence the greater popularity of the Service. If therefore the Indian Medical Service is to be a purely military service, its attractions, which have gradually been on the wane, will vanish altogether, and I predict that British recruits of the right type will be almost unobtainable.

The Simon Commission has commented in this connection: "A failure of recruitment for the Indian Medical Service would be a serious matter for India."

It appears to me, therefore, that the abolition of the Medical branch of the Indian Medical Service would be a grave mistake, and I do not believe that there is a real demand for such abolition. The demand chiefly emanates from the voluble politicians who desire the elimination of the British element from every service as quickly as possible; it does not even emanate from the Indian Medical profession, in which I have a large number of friends who have often assured me that the last thing they desire to see is the total elimination of the British element. Those of the non-official medical profession who desire the elimination of the Indian Medical Service, equally desire the elimination of the Indian members of the Provincial Medical Services who compete with them for private practice to a far greater degree than the I.M.S. officer. They stigmatise, with some justice, all paid Government Medical officers who are allowed private practice, as favoured individuals who enjoy a large subsidy which gives them an unfair advantage over their unsubsidised competitors. In the public health services I have been asked several times to post a British officer to large municipalities as Medical Officer of Health, so that even the municipal boards are not all anti-British in this respect.

In the rural areas the I.M.S. officer will be missed more than anywhere else, as there is no more popular and trusted officer than the British doctor who tours in tents through the villages of his district. The demand therefore for the abolition of the Civil Branch of the Indian Medical Service is manifestly unreal and is only supported by a very small percentage of the population, and it is notorious that even the strongest adherents of the section of Indian opinion in favour of the complete Indianisation of the superior services, frequently requisitions the services of eminent officers of the Indian Medical Service when it is a question of a difficult surgical operation being required.

Even in the Universities where the policy of Indianisation of the professional staff has been rapidly carried into effect, there are now signs of reaction and the services of eminent I.M.S. officers are being sought.

5. Conclusions.

The logical conclusions therefore are that in certain respects complete provincial autonomy for the administration of the medical and public health services without any control from the Government of India is not only undesirable in the best interests of the people, but that there would be little authoritative objection to the degree of control necessary to maintain a uniform standard of efficiency in all the provinces of India, and to maintain the necessary degree of liaison between the provinces to ensure the best results. It is also logical to conclude that a proportion of I.M.S. officers in the provincial services is just as necessary as in the Indian Civil Service and the Indian Police, the so-called "security" services. Surely the maintenance of a high standard of health for the personal and economic benefit of the people is as great a requirement of "security" as the safeguards of the maintenance of law and order by the inclusion of a proportion of British officers in the I.C.S. and Police in the service of the provinces.

I do not say that their conditions of service should remain as at present. These could easily be modified to remove the majority of the present objections to their retention. For example the provincial Government might be given a great degree of choice in their selection instead of having no choice as at present. This objection was the only one that Rai Rajishur Bali had to their retention when Hon. Minister in the United Provinces for Medicine and Public Health. He assured me that he would be strongly opposed to handing over the whole of the Hospitals to the Provincial Medical Service. His idea was a service of Civil Surgeons consisting of 25 per cent. I.M.S. officers, 25 per cent. promoted Provincial Service Officers, and 50 per cent recruited in the open market, British or Indian.

The Civil Surgeons and Government Medical Officers could be debarred from private practice among Indians, or only be permitted to carry on a consulting practice which would mean that they would have to be called in consultation by Indian practitioners before seeing patients. These are in my experience the two strongest objections to the retention of the Civil Branch of the Indian Medical Service, and with the removal of these, would it not be a grave mistake to abolish this useful branch altogether against the desires of the great majority of the Indian people?

16,926. And Colonel Broome, you hand in a Memorandum number 91?—(Lieut.-Colonel Broome.) Yes, it is as follows.

MEMORANDUM 91 BY LIEUT.-COLONEL H. H. BROOME.

The subject I wish to make some observations on is that of Medical Education in India. My experience is mainly confined to the King Edward Medical College, Lahore, Punjab. I was appointed to that institution in 1908 as professor of anatomy and later as professor of surgery. For the last seven years of my service I was, in addition to my surgical post, Principal of the College.

In my time as Principal the degree given by the Punjab University was recognised by the General Medical Council of Great Britain and our graduates could register and practice in England. As a consequence of this the Council (G.M.C.) became interested in medical education in India and required the attainment of a certain standard in the teaching and in the examinations, and they eventually sent out inspectors to the examinations to see that the requisite standard was maintained and also to make suggestions as to the medical curriculum.

The authority of the G.M.C. and the regular inspection were of the greatest service to medical education in India. They compelled a high standard to be kept up and made it obligatory on the University to provide, through the Government, increased facilities for the training of students and the teaching of medicine.

I regard it as a great calamity for the future of medical education in India that the supervision and inspection of the G.M.C. has now ceased. Indian Universities, in my experience, are vastly different from British ones. Their main object is to pass as many students through their examinations as possible and indeed they may be described as examining boards. They are not primarily concerned with maintaining a high standard of education and many of their students, from lack of preliminary knowledge and in some cases of ability, are not fitted for a university career. Without the pressure of the G.M.C. I feel convinced that the standard of medical education in India will greatly deteriorate.

APPOINTMENT OF PROFESSORS IN THE MEDICAL COLLEGE.

The appointment of professors in the Medical College is done by the Indian Minister of Education, with the advice no doubt of the Inspector-General of Civil Hospitals. The Punjab University has no say in the matter. In my opinion this arrangement is not satisfactory as it leads to considerations, other than suitable qualifications and experience, influencing the choice. It is generally believed by the Indians themselves that family, political and communal interests play a larger part than they should in the selections. Certainly in my time as Principal, professors were appointed who had no claim to such posts. As an example the present professor of physiology was selected in spite of my expressed opinion in writing that he was totally unfitted for the post. He had never acted as a demonstrator and had no qualifications to teach the subject. He was put in just to officiate, and when I saw him he informed me that he knew nothing about physiology except what he had learnt many years ago in his ordinary medical course, and would have to start to read it up. He had never done any teaching in his life. I subsequently learnt that he has been confirmed in the appointment and is now the permanent professor of this important and advancing subject.

Another time an officer was sent to officiate for 12 months as professor of midwifery and gynecology. The gynecological operations, of which many are performed in the Lahore College hospitals, are mainly abdominal. This officer had no knowledge of the technique of abdominal surgery. He admitted that he had never done an important abdominal operation. The result was that he had to leave most of the operations to his house surgeon and when he himself operated the house surgeon had to supervise and give advice; and the holder of this appointment is the specialist for the Province.

Even the comparatively unimportant appointments of house surgeons and house physicians, which only last for one year, are made by the Minister. These posts are filled by the recently qualified students and one would imagine that the principal and professors of the college would be quite capable of choosing, out of the applicants, the men who by their college careers had shown themselves the most suitable. The procedure, however, is that a number of names of the students of the different communities are selected in consultation with the physicians and surgeons and from this list the Minister makes the appointments. He does not always accept the recommendation, and in one instance, the only man who had obtained honours in surgery for the previous eight years, and whom I had selected for my own house surgeon, was turned down and a Moslem of much inferior qualifications was appointed. It was generally believed by the students of the college that the selection was made because of the political importance of the family of the successful candidate. It is true that in the end I was able to get the appointment altered but only by a personal appeal to the Governor of the Province.

C. L. DUNN, C.I.E., and Lieut.-Colonel H. H. BROOME.

Sometime before I left India I wrote to the Punjab Government (the Minister for Education) suggesting that a committee should be formed to make professional appointments in the Medical College. I suggested representatives from the University, including the Vice-Chancellor, the Medical College, and the Inspector-General of Civil Hospitals. On a vacancy occurring subsequently a committee was appointed, but it consisted of the I.G.C.H., the Principal of the College, an ex-member of the professional staff and four Indian general practitioners of Lahore city. I cannot think that this was a proper committee for such a duty, moreover the recommendations which this Committee made were not carried out by the Minister who appointed it.

INDIANISATION OF THE MEDICAL COLLEGES.

This is proceeding at a rapid rate, too rapid in my opinion. The Lahore Medical College, as apart from the hospital, has four professional appointments—Anatomy, Physiology, Pharmacology and Pathology. These posts are now filled by Indians.

In the hospitals of the college the European professors are being replaced by Indians as the posts fall vacant. Lahore has a large European population, yet the Civil Surgeon is an Indian and the two professorships of surgery are both held by Indians. In other words, there is no European Surgeon to operate on the Europeans in the capital city of the Punjab where most of the important surgery of the province is performed. I do not wish to reflect on the professional attainments of the holders of these appointments but I think that some attention should be paid to the wishes of the large European element of the province.

I have not the slightest doubt that in a few years the whole of the teaching staff of the College will be Indian and in my opinion that will not be to the medical advantage of the province.

I have always held strongly that the teaching of Western Medicine is best carried on by Western doctors. The subject is after all a foreign one to India and is opposed to many of the beliefs and practices of the country. Attempts are at times made in the Legislative Chamber to start the teaching of indigenous systems of medicine in the Medical College. These attempts have up to now been defeated but in the future they may be successful, and then we shall have the spectacle of Western Medical Science, and its utter negation, being taught together in the same Government institution.

In my view so long as Western Medicine is taught in India the majority of the professional appointments should be filled by Europeans, not necessarily by any service but by the persons best qualified by their professional attainments and experience to hold them.

May I add that I have the greatest affection for India and its peoples and have never received anything but the utmost courtesy and kindness from them.

16,927. Have you any statements which you would care to make at this stage, gentlemen, or do you desire to make any corrections in your memoranda?—(Lieut.-Colonel Baird.) I have none. (Lieut.-Colonel Broome.) I have none. (Lieut.-Colonel Dunn.) I would point out that at the end of paragraph 9 there seems to be a typographical error.

16,928. That is in Memorandum 93?—Yes. The words "but would be welcomed," seem to have been missed out.

Mr. Butler.

16,929. Colonel Baird, are you aware that a certain number of posts are reserved for the Indian Medical Service in the Provinces?—(Colonel Baird.) Yes.

16,930. You refer, in paragraph 2 of your memorandum, to the fact that an existing order of the Secretary of State with regard to the reservation of certain posts could be ignored on financial grounds?—Yes.

16,931. Can you explain how that existing order can be ignored on financial grounds?—What I meant to say was this,

14^o Novembris, 1933.] Colonel R. F. BAIRD, Lieut.-Colonel
C. L. DUNN, C.I.E., and Lieut.-Colonel H. H. BROOME

Sir, that in my time the existing order of the Secretary of State was that a certain definite number of Indian Medical Service Officers were to be employed as Civil Surgeons. The numbers during my time, and in the time preceding that, fell below the number ordered by the Secretary of State, I think the actual number was 25. I frequently drew attention to this and asked for more officers to fill the vacancies. The vacancies, of course, were caused by casualties, retirements, and so forth, but I was always told that I must bring the matter up again in the next year's budget and, if the Provincial Finances were better, I might get what I asked for. When I brought it up again I always received the same reply, that funds were not available for the number of Indian Medical Service Officers sanctioned at present. In my time, and in the time preceding my tenure of office, there was an existing order of the Secretary of State that a certain number of Indian Medical Service Officers should be employed as Civil Surgeons in the Province. When these numbers became less from casualties due to retirements, sickness and so on, I drew the Minister's attention to it and asked that the officers might be replaced and more officers might be asked for from the Government of India. The reply I got was that the Provincial Finances did not admit, at present, of more Indian Medical Service Officers and that I should bring the question up when the next Budget was under consideration. When I did so I still received the same reply, that these officers could not be asked for at present, their places, of course, being taken by Indians of a Provincial Service whose salaries are very much less.

16,932. Is it not true, Colonel Baird, to say that Local Governments are required under the rules to report to the Secretary of State, through the Government of India, if a Reserved Appointment is left vacant or is filled otherwise than by the appointment of an Indian Medical Service Officer?—I believe that is so.

16,933. I think it is true to say that no case has come before the Secretary of State of the type that you mentioned. No such case has occurred?—I do not know about that, Sir. I cannot say.

16,934. Can you tell me whether a report was made by the Local Government as required under the Rule?—I am not sure about that.

16,935. Would you agree that if such a report had been made the safeguard would have been a reality?—I cannot say. It may be.

16,936. I am only dealing with the technical aspects of your memorandum and I just wanted to put to you that, in our experience, no such case, as far as we are aware, has come before us, and, therefore, that safeguard remains valid. You have mentioned at the end of your memorandum the point about Indian Medical Service Officers indulging in private practice?—Yes.

16,937. Would you care to develop that in any way for the information of the Committee?—I would like to say that many officers of the Indian Medical Service have made considerable fortunes by practising privately.

Lieut.-Colonel Sir H. Adney.

16,938. When?—And they still do to some extent. I mention this because I think it leads to a great deal of jealousy of the Indian Medical Service by Indian practitioners. It has often occurred to me, and to many other officers, that it would be far better to abolish or limit this right to private practice, at any rate to some extent, if it would cause a better feeling with the independent profession in India. To abolish the right to private practice would be, no doubt, difficult, because I think many Indians themselves, quite apart from what the British might think about it, would be very sorry to lose the services of skilled surgeons and physicians; but there is no question that an extensive private practice does interfere with the public duties of a medical officer. The busier he is in private practice the less time he has for his public duties.

Marquess of Zetland.

16,939. Colonel Baird, has the proposal that you make, that private practice should be abolished, been before any representative body of the Indian Medical Service?—Not formally, I think, but it is a question that has often been discussed privately.

16,940. Could you give us any idea as to whether the proposal would be readily accepted by the Indian Medical Service if, in return for that concession, they retained a position analogous to the position which they hold at the present time?—I think many men would be very glad to enter the Indian Medical Service or any Civil Medical Service in India without any chance of private practice. A certain number of men would prefer not to have anything to do with private practice. It is a question of recruitment, I think, in the Medical Schools.

C. L. DUNN, C.I.E., and Lieut.-Colonel H. H. BROOME.

Lieut.-Colonel Sir H. Gidney.

16,941. I thought that was the great inducement for men of the present standard to enter the Indian Medical Service. I thought that was the greatest inducement to-day?—I do not agree with that.

16,942. The British Medical Association admits that in its memorandum, that it is the chief inducement, and I submit it is, and it is a good one too?—If it is the chief inducement then I think it ought not to be.

Mr. Butler.

16,943. May I turn to your Memorandum, Lieut.-Colonel Dunn? You mention the question of a Public Health Act in the first paragraph of your memorandum?—(Lieut.-Colonel Dunn.) Yes.

16,944. Is it not true to say that under present arrangements and under the proposed arrangements as they are outlined in the White Paper, Public Health is, and will be, a Provincial Subject?—Yes.

16,945 Will there not, therefore, be some difficulty, to use your phrase, in having a Public Health Act for all India binding on the Provinces?—I see no difficulty.

16,946. If there was such a Public Health Act binding on the Provinces would it not interfere with the autonomy of the Provinces in this department, and can you make any suggestion which would avoid that, while, at the same time, achieving the objects which you have in view?—I do not see quite how it could be avoided. I think I have put my reasons for the proposal fully in the memorandum, that Public Health cannot be treated in watertight departments, especially in a country like India in which epidemic disease is rife and in which it is carried from Province to Province by pilgrimages, and I think, therefore, as I have said in my memorandum, that as far as a few limiting enactments are concerned it would be for the good of the Provinces and for the good of the population of All-India if certain principles were reserved to the Government of India. At present they do reserve the sanitation of ports, the prevention of the importation of epidemic disease from other countries, but the Government of India cannot, under the present rules, interfere with the Public Health Policy of a Province at all, with the result that epidemic disease—and in this respect I would specially emphasise cholera—is carried all over India every year, and all the efforts of the Provincial Governments to prevent the entrance of this disease into their area is nullified in every way by there being no provisions of any kind whatever to assist them in combating the spread of this disease.

Mr. Zafrulla Khan.

16,947. How would you bring the Indian States into your scheme? With regard to epidemic diseases, you will realise that epidemic diseases make no distinction between British Provinces and Indian States?—That is so.

16,948. The Indian States are not governed by any legislation passed by the Government of India on such matters?—I do not see any objection, if a Federal Government is established, to the Federal Government passing an All-India Act.

16,949. The Indian States have made it perfectly clear that they cannot make these matters Federal?—I have had great difficulty myself in dealing with it owing to the absence of any powers at present.

Mr. Butler.

16,950. Having in view the objects which you desire to achieve, which are important ones, what would be your view of a suggestion that the autonomous units should consider the matter after the new Constitution comes into force and come to some agreement between themselves?—I should consider it satisfactory, but I should not consider it as satisfactory as the Federal Government reserving to themselves powers to enforce certain minima. We do not want very much, but, if certain minima were reserved to the Federal Government, it would be to the good of the people of India in every State and in every Province.

16,951. May I refer you to your remarks about the production of quinine in India. I believe the annual production of quinine is approximately 160,000 lbs. and the annual consumption is approximately one and a half million pounds. Would it not be very difficult to make up the difference between those

C. L. DUNN, C.I.E., and Lieut.-Colonel H. H. BROOME.

two amounts?—I think it would be very difficult and it would take a very long time, but I do not say that it is impossible.

16,952. Have you any suggestion with regard to this very serious problem of malaria and how a sufficient supply of quinine could be made available?—I have submitted one or two memoranda on this subject to the United Provinces Government already and it seems to me that it has been proved that quinine can be produced just as successfully in many areas in India and Burma as it is in Java and it only requires a similar well organised and energetic organisation for doing it to produce the same result as is now produced in Java.

16,953. Do you think it could be produced as cheaply as it is in Java?—I see no reason why it should not be.

Lieut.-Colonel Sir H. Gidney.

16,954. My Lord Chairman, I would like to ask a few questions on this matter. Colonel Dunn, you have in your very excellent Memorandum here drawn pointed attention to the unsatisfactory state of the public health of India, and you have attributed that unsatisfactory state to the want of co-ordination between the Provinces vis-a-vis the spread of infectious diseases?—Partly.

16,955. And you have advocated an All-India Public Health Act, which would bring these Provinces together, and, in that way, control the present spread of these infectious diseases. Would you contradict me if I said that there is no part of the British Empire that spends less money on public health than India?—I would not dream of contradicting you, Sir.

16,956. Then you would agree with me. Did you read the last Debate in the Legislature, when the Budget was presented this year, on the medical aspect of it?—No.

16,957. You did not?—No.

16,958. Would you agree with me that you could relegate India to some part of Central Africa so far as its Public Health protection is concerned?—I do not quite understand your implication.

16,959. I mean by that the provision of supplies for public health in India as compared with other parts of the Empire is not comparable; it is so small?—I agree to that.

16,960. Therefore, the Government of India, or the Provincial Governments, are not devoting enough attention to the health of the country?—Nothing like enough.

16,961. In other words, our deliberations, and the deliberations of most Councils, are towards the wealth and not towards the health, and you think health should take a prior position among the Services, including the Security Services?—I do.

16,962. I agree with you. Are you aware that the Government of Australia spends nearly £2,000,000 a year or thereabouts in the prevention of diseases of this nature?—Yes, rather more than £2,000,000.

16,963. Do you know Canada devotes almost a similar amount?—Rather more.

16,964. Do you know that the smaller parts of the Crown Colonies have a sort of controlling Public Health Act with regard to infectious diseases?—Yes.

16,965. Even Ceylon?—Even Ceylon. Ceylon has a very good one.

16,966. And there is no such Act in India?—No.

16,967. Therefore, for that reason, you think that it is necessary that it should be instituted in India?—Yes.

16,968. I agree with you. I will take a case now, the case of Kumba Mela, with which you are probably very familiar. The Kumba Mela, I think, attracts to that fair nearly half a million people or a great deal more?—3,000,000. At the last Kumba Mela in 1930 there were 3,000,000.

16,969. I believe those people come from all parts of India?—All over India.

16,970. I believe you generally have either an endemic or an epidemic of cholera, or some other disease?—Invariably.

16,971. I believe you have no force by which you can co-ordinate your Provinces so as to get your suspects away from this area, where the men collect in such masses?—No. When the pilgrims come into the United Provinces, they then become subject to the laws of the United Provinces, and I am thankful to be able to say that the powers granted to me in that respect, when once they were in the United Provinces were very great.

16,972. But you may have many cases of cholera in the United Provinces from other Provinces before you exercise your powers?—From other Provinces, yes.

16,973. Therefore you say there is nothing to prevent an epidemic of cholera spreading?—I cannot prevent them coming in from Bengal.

14^o Novembris, 1933.] Colonel R. F. BAIRD, Lieut.-Colonel
C. L. DUNN, C.I.E., and Lieut.-Colonel H. H. BROOME.

16,974. That is why you want this Federal Act?—Yes.

16,975. You then talked about malaria, and Mr Butler asked you certain questions on malaria. Is it a fact, or is it not a fact that the Government of India have accumulated stocks of quinine, and have enough supply for the next 20 years?—I would not say that. They have, I believe, nearly half a million pounds of quinine in stock, but I hold, that if that half million pounds were applied to the purposes for which it was collected it would be expended in one year or less.

16,976. I quite agree. Is it a fact that the total annual mortality from fever of all classes in India is about four millions?—That is reported; it is not actual.

16,977. What would be the actual?—As you know, the primary reporting agency is the village chowkidar, and he is in the habit of putting down any hyperpyrexia, in the words of the vernacular, as "Bokhar," and it is classed as malaria, although a great proportion of it is not, although it may be induced by constant and chronic malaria in the villages.

16,978. I suppose if I were to make a graphic description of malaria in India in support of your quotation in your Memorandum, and suppose we had, say, 2½ million who died from malaria in India, and you put their bodies side by side, they would cover an extent from the north to the south of India, would they not?—I am afraid I cannot say that.

16,979. They would be what one would call the malaria longitude of India, and the Government of India has no power to stop that, as the Government of India?—As the Government of India they have no power whatever in the Provinces in that respect.

16,980. And the Government of India have always had to depend on the Dutch Indies for its supply of quinine?—Yes, 75 to 80 per cent.

16,981. And the Government of India have, in the past, tried to develop cinchona plantations, and failed?—Yes.

16,982. You believe the Government of India can supply all the quinine that is necessary?—I do.

16,983. Do you think that by doing that, and by the free distribution of quinine, you would improve the economic output of India?—I think the result would be, not only the improvement of the economic output of the villages of India, but it would be an astonishing improvement.

16,984. Therefore you say that this can best be accomplished by a Public Health Act for all India?—Yes.

16,985. As regards the adulteration of food and the adulteration of drugs, you know an exposure I made, in the Assembly, of chalk that was sold for quinine?—Yes.

16,986. Quinine that was imported into the Customs consisted of nothing but chalk, and not quinine?—Yes.

16,987. You know the exposure I made of this?—It is true.

16,988. The markets to-day are glutted with spurious drugs?—Yes.

16,989. And no Province, although it has a Food and Drug Adulteration Act, has operated against it, to your knowledge?—We have tried to do so in the United Provinces, but, according to the watertight compartment regime, we could only prosecute anyone who manufactured this quinine within the boundaries of the Province.

16,990. How can you prosecute a man who sells a drug that is sent from Japan, or Germany, or England?—That is why we could not, because the Act says, that the retailer could not be prosecuted if he, in good faith, sold the article in the condition in which it was received.

16,991. Therefore the poor infected malarial man in India is being given chalk instead of quinine?—Very often.

16,992. Because there is not an All-India Government Act that would prevent this importation. Do you think an All-India Act would prevent this importation?—I think it would be certain to.

16,993. Therefore you think another reason you want an All-India Act is to prevent these spurious drugs from being imported into the country?—And imported into one Province from another.

16,994. From the Punjab in particular?—The worst place for manufacturing spurious quinine is Sindh.

Mr. Zafarulla Khan.] How does it get into the Punjab?

Lieut.-Colonel Sir H. Gidney.] From Japan, America and Germany.

Mr. Zafarulla Khan.] The Punjab has no port.

14^o Novembris, 1933.] Colonel R. F. BAIRD, Lieut.-Colonel

C. L. DUNN, C.I.E., and Lieut.-Colonel H. H. BROOME.

17,037. In the bigger stations it would be very alluring with a big practice?—Yes.

17,038. Is it or is it not a fact that these big stations are always reserved for British Indian Medical Service Officers?—In the United Provinces we had practically no Indian Officers, but they were not reserved for anybody.

17,039. Am I not right when I say that these big stations were practically reserved appointments for British Indian Medical Service Officers?—Yes.

17,040. Then would it be a correct thing to say that it would be right for the Indian to resent that?—I should think so.

17,041. Therefore the Indian resentment on that score is quite a legitimate one?—No doubt.

17,042. Then do you not think it is not a question of private practice so much as the reservation of these important stations to Indian Medical Service Officers?—It may be so.

17,043. That is the whole secret?—It may be.

17,044. Regarding the Provincial Medical Services and the Civil Surgeons, you have made a suggestion here, or was it Colonel Dunn, in which it is stated that it is quite likely that one of the solutions would be, if there was a division of the Civil Surgeons. I think it was Colonel Dunn who said that in the second last paragraph of his Memorandum. His idea—that is the idea of one of the Members of the Council—was a service of Civil Surgeons consisting of 25 per cent. officers of the Indian Medical Service, 25 per cent. promoted from the Provincial Services, and 50 per cent recruited in the open market of British India?—(Colonel Dunn.) That suggestion has been made.

17,045. Do you think that would work?—I think it would. The Minister seemed to think it would. What he objected to, as I have stated in the Memorandum, was that he had no choice whatever as to what Indian Medical Service Officers should be taken into the Provincial service; that he had officers thrust upon him without any choice whatever as to who they should be. He said if the Provincial Governors had the choice as to the Officers they should employ his objections to the employment of Indian Medical Service Officers would disappear.

17,046. Would you tell me if it is a fact or not a fact that if private practice were stopped to Indian Medical Service Officers you would get the same class of recruits who entered the Service when you and I entered it?—I am very glad to have the opportunity of answering that because I think the attraction of the service is not actually the money: it is the professional opportunity.

17,047. I quite agree with you. The opportunity gives the practice?—In the Army, in the Military Branch, the opportunities for practice are very small.

17,048. Now, Colonel Baird, when you and I entered the Service we had a very severe competition that year?—(Colonel Baird.) Yes.

Lieut.-Colonel Sir H. Gidney.] We had over a hundred candidates for a few posts.

Dr. Shafa'at Ahmad Khan.] In what year was that?

Lieut.-Colonel Sir H. Gidney.

17,049. Many years ago; I do not like to say when. I believe I am correct in saying that at that time the best man in every college and hospital in the United Kingdom had as his object the Indian Medical Service. Almost all the top boys went in for the Indian Medical Service?—Some of them.

17,050. In other words, we had the cream of the medical profession in the Indian Medical Service then?—Yes; possibly that is a slight over-statement.

17,051. We had not adulterated milk. Am I right in saying that we did attract a very good class of man for the Indian Medical Service?—Perfectly right.

17,052. I believe the recruitment for the Indian Medical Service was very keenly competed for both in England and in India at that time?—Yes.

17,053. There were innumerable coaches in London who accepted bids for coaching for the Service?—Yes.

17,054. And that competition went on to the War?—Yes.

17,055. At the War competition ceased and since then there has been no competition?—That is so.

17,056. Since then it has been by nomination, both in England and, latterly, in India annually?—Yes.

17,057. Would I be right in saying that the class of doctor who enters the Indian Medical Service to-day is not of the same type as heretofore, from a professional standpoint?—Probably.

* 17,058. Do you not think I would be right in saying they are not of the same type?—Probably you are right.

14^o Novembris, 1933.] Colonel R. F. BAIRD, Lieut.-Colonel
C. L. DUNN, C.I.E., and Lieut.-Colonel H. H. BROOME.

Mr. R. A. Butler.

17,059. Are you aware that it has been recently announced in the House of Commons that the recruitment for the Indian Medical Service shows distinct signs of improvement during this last year?—No, I did not know that.

Mr. R. A. Butler.] Actual statements have been made in the House of Commons, and they bear out what I have said

Lieut.-Colonel Sir H. Gidney.

17,060. Is it or is it not a fact that with the inducements that are being offered to-day in England it is difficult to get a sufficient number of men to go out to India in the Indian Medical Service?—I believe so.

17,061. Although their pay is almost doubled from what it was when you and I entered it?—Yes.

17,062. Is it or is it not a fact that the type of Indian who presents himself for nomination in the Indian Medical Service qualification in India is of a higher qualification than the man who presents himself in England?—I do not know.

17,063. Would you be surprised if I told you that there were some London M.D.'s, M.R.C.P.'s and F.R.C.S.'s—the highest qualifications?

Sardar Buta Singh.] Of India?

Lieut.-Colonel Sir H. Gidney.

17,064. Yes, of India?—I did not know that.

17,065. Would you or would you not be in favour of reopening the service to an open competition?—Yes; I would certainly be in favour of that.

17,066. Do you think, if you had simultaneous examinations for the Indian Medical Service, both in England and in India, you would almost get back to the same standard of man?—Perhaps you would.

17,067. Without barring private practice or anything else or closing the civil branch?—I should doubt it very much.

17,068. Do you think if this were done it would satisfy Indian opinion and the opposition that we meet to-day, which I agree with you is very largely the result of the unfair competition in private practice between the official and the non-official practitioner, would cease to exist?—It might go some way towards it, no doubt.

17,069. Therefore, you are in favour of open competition for the Indian Medical Service?—I have not considered it in all its bearings at all.

17,070. But do you think it would be a step in the right direction?—I really could not say without further consideration.

17,071. You have held appointments in India, Colonel Dunn, and Colonel Baird and Colonel Broome have held professional appointments. Do you think it is a right thing for any Council to debar members of the profession in India from entering the Indian Medical Service simply because they do not come up to the standard of the British Medical Council? May I explain my question. I speak subject to the correction of the Secretary of State. My question is this. At present the General Medical Council refuses to recognise the Indian medical qualifications at the Universities which, ipso facto, means that unless a man has a British qualification he stands a very poor chance of entering the Indian Medical Service by nomination. I know there are exceptions. Is it fair for any Medical Council so to penalise a nation as has been done by the General Medical Council so far as our degrees are concerned?—(Colonel Broome.) We should have to go back to the origin to answer that. The reason why the Medical Council refused to register Indian degrees in England was because they refused to be inspected in their examinations.

Lieut.-Colonel Sir H. Gidney.] I am not talking of the registration for practice in this country; I am talking of practitioners in India who are entering into a service in India and who are being nominated into that service in India.

Mr. Zafarulla Khan.] But surely the qualifications for entering any particular service in India are to be laid down by the Secretary of State, and it is open to him, if he so chooses, not to rely upon the standards set up by the Medical Council.

Lieut.-Colonel Sir H. Gidney.

17,072. I said I was speaking subject to correction by the Secretary of State, because I believe that Indian degrees have lately been accepted. But do you think, Colonel Broome, that it is right for any General Medical Council to make that imposition?—I do not know that the Medical Council has done that. The Medical Council simply refuses to register Indian students who have qualified for practice in England. Their attitude is that they are not concerned with what goes on in India. If they could register and come to England to practice the Medical Council's attitude was "If this is the case, we must have authority to inspect examinations and see that they are up to our standard."

14^o Novembris, 1933] Colonel R. F. BAIRD, Lieut.-Colonel

C. L. DUNN, C.I.E., and Lieut.-Colonel H. H. BROOME.

17,073. I quite agree with that?—That was their attitude

17,074. I have no desire to oppose it at all. That is not my point, Colonel Broome. What I am trying to point out is that since the Medical Council has refused to recognise Indian degrees from 1930 to the present time, those Members of the Indian medical profession have in a way been disqualified or they have been handicapped from entering the Indian Medical Service in India?—I think they have been handicapped, yes.

Mr. Butler.] My Lord Chairman, I will not interrupt Colonel Gidney further, because the whole of this question is under consideration. It is right to say, though, that the Secretary of State makes his own regulations with regard to this matter and is not bound by the General Medical Council.

Lieut.-Colonel Sir H. Gidney.

17,075. I am glad to know that. I quite agree with you that the Medical Council here have every right to insist upon a standard, but I was talking of India. (To the Witness): You know the Indian Medical Council Bill that has lately been before the Assembly?—I know it has been before the Assembly.

17,076. Are you familiar with the terms of it?—No.

17,077. Do you think that that four years' limit to the recognition of foreign and British qualifications will act adversely on British qualified men if it were in any way altered by the Legislature?—I am not familiar with the Bill. What is the four-year limit?

17,078. You are not familiar with it?—No.

17,079. Are you familiar with that Bill, Colonel Dunn?—(Colonel Dunn.) I am not.

17,080. Or you, Colonel Baird?—I know that portion of it, Sir Henry.

17,081. Do you think it would adversely affect men of British qualifications who are practising in India to-day?—There has been a certain amount of anxiety which has been expressed to me by certain possible candidates for the Indian Medical Service that at the end of four years it will be within the power of Provincial Legislatures, medicine being under Provincial autonomy, to refuse to recognise a British qualified officer who had gone out to India, because at the end of four years it would be possible for the Legislature to debar them from registration in India.

Mr. Zafrulla Khan.

17,082. Not if there was reciprocity established in the meantime?—Not if reciprocity were established.

Lieut.-Colonel Sir H. Gidney.

17,083. Then do you think it would be advisable in the interests of all concerned that there should be a real reciprocity between the two countries so far as medical qualifications are concerned?—I think it would be one of the greatest advances for the profession in India.

17,084. And you would advocate that being done?—I would.

17,085. Now one last question, Colonel Baird. With your experience of the Indian Medical Service, am I right in saying that grave discontent exists in the minds of the Indian Medical Service officers to-day?—Yes, I think so.

17,086. And you do not think that it leads to the efficiency of the Service?—No.

17,087. Or to the administration of the Department?—No.

17,088. You know that many Committees have been held to inquire into the grievances and the arrangements of the two Services, the R.A.M.C. and the I.M.S., and none of them have been operative?—Discontent in the Services?

17,089. To effect an amalgamation between the two Services and to reorganise the Services?—Yes.

Lieut.-Colonel Sir H. Gidney.] Would you agree with me if I suggested for the consideration of this Joint Select Committee that a Committee should be appointed at once to go into the entire matter of the I.M.S. and R.A.M.C. as they exist to-day, with a view to satisfying the present officers in those Services and satisfying the professional aspirations of India?

Marquess of Salisbury.] I understand that is what the Secretary of State is doing now.

Mr. Butler.] The whole matter is under consideration, Lord Salisbury.

Lieut.-Colonel Sir H. Gidney.] No. That Committee is inquiring into something else.

14^o Novembris, 1933.] Colonel R. F. BAIRD, Lieut.-Colonel
C. L. DUNN, C.I.E., and Lieut.-Colonel H. H. BROOME.

Mr. Zafrulla Khan.] There is no Committee inquiring into this, but the matter is being inquired into.

Lieut.-Colonel Sir H. Gidney.] Would you agree to a Committee being appointed to enquire into it?

Earl of Derby.] It is appointed; it is enquiring into it.

Lieut.-Colonel Sir H. Gidney.] I do not know that it is.

Mr. Butler.] The Government is naturally giving this matter its most serious consideration, and has been for some time past.

Lieut.-Colonel Sir H. Gidney.

17,090. I know that the Government has been seriously considering it, but what I ask you is this: Would you think it would be a good thing, as I have already suggested at the three Round Table Conferences, and I think Lord Zetland is familiar with my views upon this matter—if a Committee were appointed to enquire into the whole of this matter and so settle it once and for all?—Yes, I think so.

Earl of Derby.] A Committee to be appointed by whom?

Lieut.-Colonel Sir H. Gidney.] By Government.

Earl of Derby.] What sort of a Committee?

Lieut.-Colonel Sir H. Gidney.] A Committee consisting of members from this country, I.M.S. members and private practitioners from India.

Earl Peel.] What makes Sir Henry think that appointing a Committee will settle that matter once and for all?

Lieut.-Colonel Sir H. Gidney.] When I say settle it once and for all, I mean come to some decision and let their decision be acted upon rather than having Committees and no decisions acted upon at all.

Dr. Shafa'At Ahmad Khan.] Cannot you do that without a Committee?

Mr. Zafrulla Khan.] Perhaps Mr. Butler will be able to inform the Committee as to whether as a result of one of the recommendations of the Services Sub-Committee of the Round Table Conference the matter is now being pursued.

Mr. Butler.] That is exactly as the Secretary of State said in his evidence on the 3rd October. The matter is at present under consideration and a submission will be made.

Mr. M. R. Jayaker.] Is this proposal of appointing a Committee also under consideration?

Mr. Butler.] No, not as far as I know; but I should have thought the whole of this matter was a very suitable one for the consideration of the Joint Select Committee.

Sir Hari Singh Gour.

17,091. Colonel Baird, you have made a statement in the penultimate paragraph of your Memorandum to the following effect: "Reverting to the future of the Civil Medical Services, it is useless to disguise the fact that the Indian Medical Service is very unpopular with politically-minded Indians"—Yes.

17,092. What are the reasons for the unpopularity of the members of the I.M.S. with politically-minded Indians?—So far as I know, they consider that they have too many privileges, too much pay and too much emolument from private practice. That is my idea.

17,093. That is to say, they complain of the kind of emoluments and privileges enjoyed by the I.M.S.?—Yes.

17,094. Compared with the private practitioner or practitioners of equal standing drawn from the country?—Compared with private practitioners.

17,095. Is it not a fact that a great deal of the unpopularity of the members of the Indian Medical Service is also due to the fact that it consists of Britishers who, after they have accumulated experience of Indian conditions and diseases, retire very naturally to England and deprive the people of India of the benefit of their ripe experience?—I do not agree to that. They retire because they have to.

17,096. They have to retire; but is it not a fact that Indian members of the Indian Medical Service, that is to say, members of Indian nationality, when they retire, get into private practice and give the benefit of their medical advice to the people of India?—I suppose they do, yes.

17,097. In that respect the members of the British service do not compare with the Indian members of the Indian Medical Service?—I see.

17,098. That is a disadvantage to which the people of India are exposed, because your service, that is to say, the European members of the Indian Medical Service, have necessarily to retire and naturally they retire into their own country?—Yes.

17,099. Now it has been said in Memorandum No. 93 of Colonel Dunn, in the last paragraph: "The Civil Surgeons and Government Medical Officers could be debarred from private practice among Indians, or only be permitted to carry on a consulting practice which would mean that they would have to be called in consultation by Indian practitioners before seeing patients. These are in my experience the two strongest objections to the retention of the Civil Branch of the Indian Medical Service, and with the removal of these, would it not be a grave mistake to abolish this useful branch altogether against the desires of the great majority of the Indian people? What is your view of a reconstructed Indian Medical Service?—(Colonel Dunn.) I should have to explain it very shortly because it is a very large question.

Chairman.

17,100. Would you prefer to put in a Note upon it?—No; I can explain it, I think, my Lord Chairman, in quite a few words. My idea of a reconstructed Indian Medical Service would be that the needs of the Army having been met, there should be a surplus sufficient to supply a few Indian Medical Service officers for employment under Provincial Governments as civil surgeons and in the Public Health Department. In the Public Health Department they are already debarred from private practice, and the jealousy between the Service and the private practitioner does not extend to the Public Health Department at all; there are no such things as private practitioners in the Public Health Department, and I have met no jealousy between Indian members of the Public Health Department and their British colleagues. As far as the Medical Branch is concerned, I suggested that if, as Colonel Baird also advocated, private practice was debarred or very greatly limited to the Civil Branch, the objections to retaining the British element in the Civil Branch would practically disappear.

Sir Hari Singh Gour.

17,101. If you were to Provincialise the members of the Indian Medical Service, would you give the Provincial Government the right to employ them or not to employ them?—I would insist on a certain number being employed in each province.

17,102. Whether the Provincial Governments like it or no?—Whether the Provincial Governments like it or not, from the point of view of a reserve for the Military Branch, and from the point of view of being available to attend on the European employees of that Provincial Service, as it is a part of their contract to give free medical attendance, but for private practice among Indians I would bar them altogether, except, as I say, when they were called in in consultation by an Indian practitioner.

17,103. But would it not lead to this: It has been said in the course of evidence to-day that the Provincial Governments, represented by the Ministers, object to having members of the Indian Medical Service forced upon them, and that if they have the right of selection, or a right to refuse to employ any member, then it would be much better, rather than if a number of men of the Indian Medical Service were told off to serve in the Province, whether the responsible Ministry wanted them or not?—I give the opinion of one Indian Minister. I cannot say that other Indian Ministers would think alike.

17,104. In all your statements to Sir Henry Gidney, and to the other questioners, you have said that India compares very badly with other countries, and Sir Henry Gidney went to the length of depicting India as comparable to Central Africa, in the matter of public health. For how long has India been in this backward state?—For a very long time.

17,105. Under a benign autocratic Government?—Yes.

17,106. And it has made no headway during the long period of years during which you have served India?—I will not say that; it has made a good deal of headway.

17,107. But it is still deplorably backward?—The headway is slow.

17,108. Do you know that within the last 12 years since the introduction of the Montagu-Chelmsford reforms, the number of hospitals in India has been doubled, and that fact is noted in the Simon Report?—I think you had better address that to Colonel Baird.

17,109. Is that so, Colonel Baird?—(Colonel Baird.) Is that in the Simon Report?

17,110. Yes?—I do not know.

17,111. Apart from the Simon Report, did you know that, as a matter of fact, during the last 12 years a very large number of hospitals has been added under the impulse of Ministerial responsibility?—I think you mean dispensaries.

17,112. Dispensaries, yes?—Quite possibly they have increased, yes.

17,113. And the Ministers and the Legislatures take a keen interest in public health and public medicine?—Yes. (Lieut.-Colonel Dunn.) Yes; not a financial interest.

17,114. But there has been a financial stringency all round?—(Colonel Baird.) Yes.

17,115. And that has deprived the Ministers of the necessary resources for the purpose of implementing their programme. Is that not so?—I daresay it is. I have not been in India for the last four years.

17,116. But before four years I would ask you? I am dealing with the Ministerial responsibility from 1921 down to date?—As far as I can remember there had been no increase in hospitals up to 1929.

Mr. Zafrulla Khan.

17,117. Surely you are speaking of your own province, Colonel Baird?—Of my own province.

17,118. Would Colonel Broome confirm that with regard to the Punjab, that there had been no increase of dispensaries during the 10 years?—(Lieut.-Colonel Broome.) No; I think there has been a considerable increase of dispensaries, but no increase of hospitals.

Lieut.-Colonel Sir H. Gidney.] There is a difference between hospitals and dispensaries.

Sir Hari Singh Gour.

17,119. We will call them dispensaries and hospitals, to be on the safe side—either one or the other. You will admit that, under the impulse of reforms, since 1921 a keen and lively interest is taken in the Medical and Public Health Departments of Government?—(Lieut.-Colonel Dunn.) I do not admit that altogether. I admit the keen and lively interest, but I strongly object to being put down as having given evidence that there has been, beyond a keen and lively interest, any real improvement because, financially, it is a fact that can be easily proved from the records, that the amount of money devoted in the United Provinces to public health has decreased.

Lieut.-Colonel Sir H. Gidney.

17,120. Quite right?—And not increased.

19355

Sir Hari Singh Gour.

17,121. Could that be due to the fact that there is a divided purse, that the Reserved Departments take what they want and the residue is left over to the transferred Departments?—I would say it was due really to the fact that the keenest interest was taken in providing schools, and more schools, and more schools, in preference to providing hospitals.

17,122. Do you deprecate the multiplication of the schools?—I very much deprecate the multiplication of schools by the method in which it has been done to the detriment of the hospitals.

17,123. Do not you think a wider knowledge of the sanitary laws is the best preventive medicine that the people can have?—The argument I have used with my own Government is, Is it a good thing to try and ram knowledge into a lot of small boys in a village school under a tree, while you take no steps whatever to see that those boys are even going to live to be adults to enjoy that knowledge?

17,124. Your attention was drawn to the fact that in India for some time past chalk had been sold as quinine, and the Legislative Assembly passed a resolution, to which Sir Henry Gidney might bear testimony, that the importation of vegetable ghu should be immediately stopped, because it was deleterious to the health of the people, but nothing has been done so far. Are you aware of it?—I am aware of it.

Sir Hari Singh Gour.] What means have you then of enforcing the wishes of the people of India that there should be a real response to the demands of the people for an improved condition of life; for example, they should get quinine when quinine is necessary, and butter when butter is necessary, and not synthetic oil.

Mr. N. M. Joshi.] Self-government.

Sir Hari Singh Gour.] Self-government? I suppose you have no reply to give to that question? I will leave it at that.

Dr. Shafa'at Ahmad Khan.

17,125. Colonel Baird, you were Inspector General of Civil Hospitals for three years in the United Provinces?—(Colonel Baird.) Yes.

17,126. From 1927 to 1929?—Yes.

17,127. Your relations with the Ministers were cordial?—Yes, very.

14^o Novembris, 1933.] Colonel R. F. BAIRD, Lieut.-Colonel
C. L. DUNN, C.I.E., and Lieut.-Colonel H. H. BROOME.

17,128. But you were diametrically opposed on certain aspects of their policy?—Frequently.

17,129. Did you represent it in any way to the Governor on the question of appointment or interference with the appointment of your subordinates?—I had some private conversations with the Governor.

17,130. Could not you do it officially through the Secretary, who sees the Governor once a week?—Yes, I could do that.

17,131. Did you do it?—Yes, I spoke to the Governor through the Secretary once or twice.

17,132. You did represent your differences with the Minister officially to the Secretary to the Governor?—Yes, many times.

17,133. And no action was taken on your representation?—The Governor would take the view that compromise was the only line to take up unless I personally was prepared to resign, and to ask an administrative officer to resign is asking a great deal of him, because he loses his pay, and he loses his extra pension, and he loses prospects of further promotion.

17,134. So you had to get along with him?—I had to get along with him somehow.

Lieut.-Colonel Sir H. Gidney.

17,135. Were you ever asked to resign?—You accept the position that you have taken up your post under a willingness to work the reforms scheme as well as you can.

Dr. Shafa'at Ahmad Khan.

17,136. Although you did not support the reforms scheme in many aspects?—I knew nothing about it, or very little about it, until I took over the post of Inspector-General.

Lieut.-Colonel Sir H. Gidney.

17,137. Were you asked to resign?—No, I was not asked to resign, but I should have resigned, strictly speaking, many times.

Dr. Shafa'at Ahmad Khan.

17,138. What is your experience, Colonel Dunn, if I may ask?—(Lieut.-Colonel Dunn.) My experience on the whole was that my relations with the Ministers were exceedingly amicable, but I agree with Colonel Baird that I looked upon it that I was there, as an Executive Officer of Government, to carry out the policy of the Government whether I agreed with it or not.

17,139. Sometimes you did agree with him?—I very often agreed with him, and even if I did not, if it was the policy of the Government it was my business to carry it out.

17,140. What is your experience of the United Provinces Legislative Council? Did it ever turn down your budget, or reduce it substantially?—Never.

17,141. Did it turn down any proposal made by you for the development of your Department in any of its aspects?—I think Dr. Shafa'at Ahmad Khan knows the procedure as well as I do.

17,142. I am not speaking of the procedure, I am speaking of what actually occurred?—The procedure was that many of my proposals were turned down because they never reached the Council, because the Minister was afraid that he might not get a majority if he wished to carry the proposal.

17,143. I am asking you only about the Council. I am not speaking of the Finance Committee of the United Provinces Council. The proceedings are confidential; I cannot quote them. Did the Legislative Council ever turn down any of your proposals?—The Legislative Council never turned down any major proposal of the Ministers.

17,144. Colonel Baird, what is your experience of the Legislative Council, so far as the Medical Department is concerned?—(Colonel Baird.) Certainly there were cuts occasionally.

17,145. Substantial cuts?—Not very large cuts perhaps, but there were cuts.

17,146. In many cases they were only token matters to discuss policy. They were not substantial cuts?—Quite so.

17,147. So you will agree with me that, so far as the Council itself was concerned, it did not reduce substantially the budget of the Medical Department?—The budget of the Medical Department, no, but it does not follow that the Minister puts up all the proposals of his Inspector-General or Director of Public Health, as Colonel Dunn said.

17,148. I am only speaking of the Legislative Council. We did not know at all what happened inside?—No.

17,149. We only knew what the proposals were in the Council itself?—Yes.

17,150. Then, Colonel Baird, may I take it, so far as you were concerned as head of the Department, your relations with the members of the Council also

14^o Novembris, 1933.] Colonel R. F. BAIRD, Lieut.-Colonel
C. L. DUNN, C.I.E., and Lieut.-Colonel H. H. BROOME.

were quite harmonious?—Quite harmonious.

17,151. What do you say, Colonel Dunn?—(Lieut.-Colonel Dunn.) Quite so.

17,152. I should be justified in saying that the Council as a body co-operated with you in making your schemes a success? It was not factious opposition?—Is that addressed to me?

17,153. Yes, to you, Colonel Dunn?—I would say that the Council as a rule carried out and voted for the proposals of the Minister.

17,154. Which were mainly your proposals?—Not always.

17,155. "Mainly," I said?—Mainly.

Mr. N. M. Joshi.

17,156. May I ask one question at this stage? Is it not a fact that besides the Minister there is a Finance Member in every Province, and it is quite possible that the Finance Member, instead of the Minister, turned down the proposals?—That, very often, happened.

Dr. Shafa'at Ahmad Khan.

17,157. A number of your proposals which were supported by the Minister were rejected by the United Provinces Finance Committee and never came up before the Council?—That I am aware of.

17,158. Colonel Baird, you have said that the local bodies have interfered unnecessarily with your work so far as the control of the Department is concerned. Do you know under what conditions the local bodies have worked since they were reformed—Municipal Boards and District Boards?—(Colonel Baird.) I know something of them.

17,159. What is your experience of the financial difficulties they have experienced?—You mean the District Boards?

17,160. We will take them separately. Take the District Boards. Do you know anything about the working of the District Boards?—A little, yes.

17,161. Do you know that they have very inelastic sources of revenue; that they have got a very large district to look after; in one district a population of 3,000,000, and that they have to depend, to the extent of 45 per cent. of their revenue, upon the Government grant, and they have to spend, and do spend, 50 per cent. of their entire on education?—That hardly explains why, before 1922, the Boards were better—at least I think they were.

17,162. Better in what respect?—That there was more money available for the Medical Department and other Departments, and more practical interest and work done for them.

17,163. So far as the Medical Department is concerned, Colonel Baird, you must have looked at the memorandum supplied by the United Provinces Government to the Simon Commission, and there they explain the reason for the rise in expenses of Medical Supplies and also of the increase in the prices of the necessities of your department. Have you read that paragraph?—I have read it at some time or other.

17,164. The United Provinces Government presented a memorandum to the Simon Commission in which they explained the difficulties of the Local Bodies, District Boards and Municipal Boards, in the United Provinces, and they said that the resources, particularly of the District Boards, were inelastic, and, in the second place, they said that the fact of the increase in prices of medicine, and so on, had considerably added to the difficulties of these bodies. I do not think you have taken that into account. The third factor, Colonel Baird, is the enormous expenditure incurred on education, the District Boards spend 50 per cent. of their entire income on education. The roads, public health, medical relief, and all the other necessities of life have to be provided out of the balance of 50 per cent., so when you sent up your budget to a District Board and desired anything to be done they had to take into account the needs of various departments—the construction of roads, the building of schools, the starting of various schemes of rural sanitation, and so on?—Yes.

17,165. Then, Colonel Baird, you have mentioned the waste involved in the establishment of the unani system of medicine?—Yes.

17,166. Do you know the Unani system of medicine claims adherents among a very large body of educated Indians at the present time?—Yes.

17,167. Would you be surprised to know that the Hindu University at Benares and the Muslim University at Aligarh have two magnificent colleges specialising in a modified and modernised system of Unani medicines which you have condemned?—That is what I complain of.

17,168. What is your contention?—My complaint is that very large sums of money are spent on these colleges and schools in fostering these ancient systems, as I said in my Memorandum.

14° Novembris, 1933.] Colonel R. F. BAIRD, Lieut.-Colonel [Continued.
C. L. DUNN, C.I.E., and Lieut.-Colonel H. H. BROOME.

Sir Hari Singh Gour.

17,169. Are you in favour of osteopathy?—I did not mention it in my Memorandum, but I can tell you all about it if you like.

17,170. It is not an orthodox system. Are you in favour of it?—How do you mean in favour of it?

17,171. Do you regard that as an orthodox system of medicine?—It does not claim to be a system of medicine; it is a technique.

Dr. Shafa'at Ahmad Khan.

17,172. Colonel Baird, are you aware of the fact that the expenditure on the Unani system constitutes only one-tenth of the expenditure of the whole department?—If it was only one-hundredth I should still complain.

17,173. And are you aware that the Legislative Council unanimously approve of the Proposal to have an indigenous system of medicine in various schools?—Unfortunately, that is so.

Dr. Shafa'at Ahmad Khan.] There are a number of Indian Medical Service Officers who believe in it also.

Sir Hari Singh Gour.] They would be struck off the rolls of the Medical Council if they did.

Dr. Shafa'at Ahmad Khan.

17,174. There is one I.M.S. officer I know of?—That is a very good thing. Once he is a qualified medical man he can believe in what he likes and practice what he likes.

17,175. Would you turn to your Memorandum where you have got this paragraph beginning "There is however another subject seldom discussed to which I must allude, and that is, the very low standard of medical ethics which exists in India"?—Yes.

17,176. That is based on your professional experience in the United Provinces?—Yes.

17,177. And you think that for this purpose, if for no other purpose, you need a very strong infusion of the British element in the Indian Medical Service?—Yes. That is one of the reasons I should give.

17,178. Are you aware of the fact that there are about 300 Indian doctors practising in England?—I should think so, yes.

17,179. And that they have got flourishing practices. There are 100 here in London and 200 in other parts of Great Britain?—Yes.

Earl Winterton.] They do not practice ancient Hindu systems in England?

Dr. Shafa'at Ahmad Khan.] No.

Mr. Zafrulla Khan.

17,180. Colonel Broome, in view of the references that you have made in your Memorandum with regard to certain professional appointments, would you consider that this power of selecting and appointing to these offices should be vested in an independent Public Service Commission rather than that it should remain in the hands of a Ministry?—(Colonel Broome.) Yes, I should.

17,181. And you would consider that system satisfactory?—Yes, I think it would be.

17,182. I am aware, Colonel Broome, that you were not directly in charge of the Public Health Department in the Punjab, but perhaps you can give some information to the Committee, if you happen to possess it. Can you inform the Committee when a separate Public Health Department was set up in the Punjab?—I think it was in 1921 or 1922.

17,183. Under the Reforms?—I am not sure. I cannot give you the date.

17,184. Would I be correct in suggesting that for the first time a separate Public Health Department was set up in the Punjab under the Reform system?—(Lieut.-Colonel Dunn.) No. (Lieut.-Colonel Broome.) No, I think it was set up in Colonel Foster's time. He was very largely instrumental in it.

17,185. He was the officer, but was not it after the Montagu-Chelmsford system of reforms?—I cannot say definitely.

17,186. Somewhere about then—just before or just after?—Just before or just after. (Lieut.-Colonel Dunn.) Might I interpose as, being a Public Health officer, I know the facts of this?

17,187. Certainly?—There was a separate Public Health Department in the Punjab since, I think, the year 1867.

17,188. Was there a Director of Public Health?—He was known as the Sanitary Commissioner. The title was altered.

17,189. When was a Director of Public Health first appointed in the Punjab?—The title of Sanitary Commissioner was altered to Director of Public Health in the year 1922, I think.

17,190. This is the point of my question. Since then has there been a deterioration or has there been a good deal

14^o Novembris, 1933.] Colonel R. F. BAIRD, Lieut.-Colonel
C. L. DUNN, C.I.E., and Lieut.-Colonel H. H. BROOME.

of expansion in the Punjab in the Public Health Department?—There has been expansion.

17,191. Could you give the Committee some idea with regard to the number of Medical Officers of Health, both in municipalities and in the District Boards which existed before the inception of the reforms, as compared with those that exist now?—There were no District Medical Officers of Health at all before the reforms.

17,192. Every district now possesses one for the district and one for the headquarters of the district?—In the Punjab?

17,193. Yes. All my questions refer to the Punjab?—That is correct.

17,194. Therefore the expenditure on this department in the Punjab was, during the first 10 years after the reforms, as compared with the expenditure on this department for the 10 years before the reforms, considerably more?—The 10 years before the reforms included the war period, in which the expenditure went down very considerably.

17,195. Take any 10 years before the reforms and compare them with 10 years after the reforms?—I cannot say exactly with regard to the expenditure in the Punjab, but I know, in the United Provinces, the expenditure did not go up. During the 10 years before the reforms, in fact I may say from the year 1906, the expenditure in the Public Health Department in the United Provinces was considerably greater.

17,196. True, Colonel Dunn, you have said that already with regard to the United Provinces and I had not forgotten it. It was for that reason that I was asking questions with regard to the neighbouring province?—That needs explanation. The matter of dealing with the great epidemic of plague which came into India early in this century was at first administered by the Medical Departments, and, subsequently, in the year 1919 or 1920, this particular branch of prevention of disease was transferred, and rightly so, to the Public Health Departments, so that the expenditure before the war was shown in the medical budgets and not in the Public Health Budgets, but if the expenditure on anti-plague work is taken into account, as it was Public Health work, the expenditure in the pre-war 10 years was considerably greater than in the post-war 10 years.

17,197. For the simple reason that there has been comparatively little plague in the post-war 10 years?—No. The organisation although slightly changed, was broadly the same. There were fewer outbreaks of plague in the post-war 10 years and the deaths from plague amounted to something like 60,000, 70,000 or 80,000 per annum, which was considerably less than in the pre-war period, but the number of officers and the organisation employed in the pre-war period was very great indeed, and there were no District Medical Officers of Health. In the post-war period there was no special department for dealing with one particular disease, such as plague. That was abolished and, instead of that, was brought in the permanent system of District Medical Officers of Health. The expenditure was less. Before the War, Indian Medical Service Officers were employed and in the post-war period it was Indian Officers of the Public Health Departments.

Lieut.-Colonel Sir H. Gidney.

17,198. The difference in pay being?—Very considerable.

Mr. Zafrulla Khan.

17,199. So that according to yourself, this reduction in salaries owing to the employment of Indian Officers instead of Indian Medical Service Officers does not mean a reduction on the actual preventive activities of the Department?—Not in the number of personnel employed.

17,200. But you will admit (again I am confining my questions to my own Province because I have not any detailed knowledge of other Provinces) that the whole organization of the Department of Public Health after the Reforms in the Punjab, whatever it may be due to, is better and on a larger scale than it was before the Reforms?—That I quite agree to.

Marquess of Salisbury.

17,201. Of course, the whole object of you three gentlemen is to help forward the health of India? That is your main interest, of course?—(Colonel Baird.) Yes.

17,202. That is the object of your evidence?—Yes.

17,203. I think it was Colonel Broome who said that he has no doubt that when the White Paper is carried into effect there will be a total Indianization of the Medical Services. Is not that what he said?—(Colonel Broome.) Actually I was referring to the appointments in the Medical College.

14° Novembris, 1933.] Colonel R. F. BAIRD, Lieut.-Colonel

C. L. DUNN, C.I.E., and Lieut.-Colonel H. H. BROOME.

17,204. Yes, I beg your pardon. It was Colonel Baird then who felt there would be a very great loss of British personnel?—(Colonel Broome) I think so.

17,205 And you think that would be very unfortunate?—Yes.

17,206. Not because you have got any prejudice against Indian Medical Officers, but as you think the medical science has come from the West and is professed in the West, they are more likely to keep up a high standard than the Indian Medical Officer would?—Exactly.

Earl Winterton.] Do you say that medical science has come from the West?

Marquess of Salisbury.] We need not go back so very far.

Earl Winterton.

17,207. I want to know the answer. I did not hear the answer. In reply to Lord Salisbury, the answer was, I think, that medical science came from the West?—Modern medical science, perhaps I should have said, came from the West. Medical science came from the East, if you go back three thousand years.

Marquess of Salisbury.] You do not want to go back as far as that, Lord Winterton.

Earl Winterton.] If Lord Salisbury asks me my opinion, I think a great deal of the medical science of to-day is based upon what was known three thousand years ago.

Marquess of Salisbury.

17,208. Of course, we keep in mind the fact that the whole of this matter is under consideration by the Secretary of State, and all that you want to do is to make representations, I suppose, partly to the Joint Select Committee but also to the Secretary of State, as to what the changes should be. Is not that so?—Yes.

17,209. On a perfectly friendly footing, of course?—Quite.

17,210. I think it was Colonel Dunn who thought that the recommendations of the Services Sub-Committee of the Round Table Conference would have a very disastrous effect?—(Colonel Dunn.) I think so.

17,211. Because the effect would be to prevent the proper recruitment of British Medical Officers?—Yes.

17,212. Why do you think that?—Because I think there would not be the same inducement to officers to enter the Indian Medical Service, if the civil branch were abolished as proposed by that Sub-Committee.

17,213. I do not want to press you about the question of the ethical standard of the Indian Medical Service, neither do I want to dwell too much upon improper appointments, because there are improper appointments made all over the world, of course, but in your evidence you do show, Colonel Baird, that in your experience there have been a good deal of improper appointments under the pressure, as you think (you may be wrong, of course) of the Minister under the Montagu-Chelmsford Reforms?—(Colonel Baird.) Yes. The Minister is constantly asked to do things for his friends which are totally opposed to what the Head of the Department considers right.

17,214. I mean, such matters as asking for certificates and things of that kind. In those cases pressure is put upon you?—That is another question, is it not? You were talking about pressure being brought to bear upon the Minister in the matter of medical appointments?

17,215. Yes, quite so. As far as that is concerned, what you complain of is that the Minister does not take your recommendation; his motive is not as pure as it ought to be, if I may put it in that way?—He is not able to say no.

17,216. But also I think you said that a great deal of pressure was sometimes put on Medical Officers as to the evidence they give in certain cases and as to the certificates they should grant?—Yes.

17,217. And you think that if that pressure were exerted upon Indian Medical Officers it might have an unfortunate effect?—Yes; the standard is utterly different in India from what it is in England.

17,218. In what respect do you mean?—Dr. Shafa'at Ahmad Khan was just going to draw my attention to the fact that there were many Indians practising medicine in England. I would not for one moment suggest that those officers would be more likely to accept a bribe than an English doctor, but in India the atmosphere is totally different. Everybody tries to get what he wants by bribery, and the Medical Department is particularly subject to these influences of bribery.

14^o Novembris, 1933.] Colonel R. F. BAIRD, Lieut.-Colonel
C. L. DUNN, C.I.E., and Lieut.-Colonel H. H. BROOME.

[Continued.]

Mr. M. R. Jayaker.

17,219. Do you mean to say that the Indian atmosphere is full of the impulse to bribe?—Yes.

Lieut.-Colonel Sir H. Gidney.

17,220. Only the medical profession?—Oh, no.

Mr. M. R. Jayaker.

17,221. Would you say the same about the British medical profession?—I think the medical profession in India is more subject to these kinds of influences than other professions.

Dr. Shafa'at Ahmad Khan.

17,222. And they are invariably Indian, are they not?—Not invariably, no. I have been myself approached frequently.

Marquess of Salisbury.

17,223. Now I only want to ask just one question of Colonel Dunn, if he will allow me. I was much struck by your evidence that you thought there ought to be much more Central control for public health in India?—(Colonel Dunn.) Yes.

17,224. I think one of the Indian Delegates asked you whether that would be possible in harmony with Provincial autonomy. Was not a question of that kind put to you?—Yes.

17,225. You thought that it was quite possible, notwithstanding Provincial autonomy?—Well, who has defined Provincial autonomy?

17,226. Your attention has been called to the fact that a good number of subjects even under the White Paper are reserved for the Central Government?—Yes.

17,227. Such a thing as traffic in arms and ammunition?—Yes.

17,228. And the cultivation and manufacture of opium?—Yes.

17,229. So that it would not be altogether out of harmony with the establishment of autonomy in the Provinces if certain very important things were still reserved for the Central Government?—I quite agree. I think that even Provinces themselves would not object in any way to a co-ordinating Public Health Act for their own benefit, because it would be quite impossible to confer that benefit without a co-ordinating All-India Act.

17,230. The difficulty being that public health does not respect frontiers or borders at all. One infection passes across from one Province to the other, and therefore there ought to be some Central control?—Yes.

17,231. I understood that to be your view. Would you think that public health is of such transcendental importance, especially to these vast masses of population, that every effort should be made, if possible, to co-ordinate public health all over India?—Yes.

Marquess of Zetland.

17,232. I only want to ask one question of a rather general nature, but one which really touches the foundation of the whole matter. The witnesses have referred to the Report of the Services Subcommittee of the First Round Table Conference, and they dissent from the proposals made by the majority of the Committee, because they say that under the scheme there proposed the requisite number of medical officers of the calibre required could not be obtained. That, I understand, is their objection to that scheme. I was a member of that Committee, and I dissented from the Report on those very grounds. But the witnesses also admit that the Indian Medical Service as at present constituted is very unpopular with what they have described as the politically-minded classes. The question therefore that I would like an answer to, if I could get it, would be this: Can you suggest a scheme which will have the effect that you desire, namely, that of securing for India an adequate number of sufficiently qualified British medical officers, which will at the same time be acceptable to the Indian politically-minded classes?—(Colonel Baird.) Are you addressing that question to me, my Lord?

17,233. I do not mind who answers it. I would be only too glad to have a solution of the problem from anybody?—I think that what is wanted, is what I suggested in my Memorandum. I made a tentative kind of suggestion that you should endeavour to recruit a service of enthusiastic men who were lovers of science and not lovers of money; who would consent to accept moderate pay and fairly good prospects, in return for very excellent opportunities of work. As Sir Henry Gidney pointed out just now, one of the great inducements that are held out to young medical men to go out to India is that they will make a lot of money. In my opinion that is quite the wrong sort of inducement to hold out. There is an enormous amount of work,

14^o Novembris, 1933] Colonel R. F. BAIRD, Lieut.-Colonel
C. L. DUNN, C.I.E., and Lieut.-Colonel H. H. BROOME.

both in the curative medicine side and the public health side, and in education and research, which has to be done, and what is wanted is a type of man who will be content to do that and not bother with private practice at all. Many hundreds of men I know would infinitely prefer not to have anything to do with private practice.

17,234. Then your suggestion so far is that the conditions of the Indian Medical Service should be altered to this extent, that its members should be debarred from private practice?—Wherever possible. There would be places, possibly, where you could not quite debar them.

17,235. I agree there might be exceptional cases; but, generally speaking, you would lay down that the conditions of service should be changed in that respect. Now a question that I want to ask you on that is this. Are you satisfied that you would get the men you require under those conditions?—I think you would. I do not know what the British Medical Association thinks about it, but I know of no reason why you should not get those kind of men.

17,236. That covers that aspect of the matter. Then are you satisfied from your experience that an Indian Medical Service recruited on those conditions would be acceptable to the politically-minded classes in India?—I think it would certainly be more acceptable. I think it would be acceptable.

17,237. Perhaps that is a question that I should address to the members of the politically-minded classes themselves?—(Colonel Broome.) Might I say that, as Sir Henry Gidney has pointed out, there is not a large amount of general practice in India; it is confined to a few cities. I quite agree with Sir Henry Gidney that the average civil surgeon does not make more than 100 or 150 rupees a month. I do not think that that can account for the jealousy of the politically-minded classes. The average member of the I.M.S. makes very little more than his pay.

17,238. I am glad to hear that opinion. Then the final question, arising out of that, would be this. I understand from what has been said this afternoon that one of the real reasons why the I.M.S. at the present time is so unpopular with the Indian politically-minded classes is that the officers are imposed upon the Provincial Governments, whether they wish to have them or not; but I cannot see how you are going to get over that difficulty and at the same time maintain an adequate reserve for the Indian Army?—(Colonel Dunn.) I put that in my Memorandum, and I would like to point out that it is perfectly easy to carry out. If in a Province—take my own Province, the United Provinces—the requirements for the reserve for the Army and for attendance on the wives and families of the British Officers still serving in India would amount, we will say, to 20. Instead of these 20 Officers being sent by the Government of India from the Army Department to take up these civil posts, I think that the Provincial Governments should be given a choice from the Officers available for that purpose, in exactly the same way as at the present moment the Inspector General of Civil Hospitals in each Province is appointed by the Province having the choice of three Officers.

17,239. I see that; that certainly seems to be an advance in the direction of meeting the views of the Indian Provincial Governments. But let me see that I quite clearly understand your proposal. You would still say, would you not, that in each Province there must be a specified number of I.M.S. Officers?—The Services Sub-Committee of the First Round Table Conference has admitted that; but they proposed to substitute certain European medical officers engaged on contract to replace the I.M.S. Officers. My point is, why replace an approved and efficient service with great traditions and a great standard of efficiency by makeshifts in the way of officers engaged, say, for five years, with a return passage?

17,240. I quite see your objection to the proposal, but what I wanted to be quite clear about was your own suggestion. I understand your own suggestion to be this, that the I.M.S. should remain as it is at present, except that perhaps the conditions of service should be altered in some respects, namely, that private practice should be debarred. Then you would say to each Provincial Government: "You are to reserve so many posts in your Province for members of the I.M.S.," and, having said that, you would then say to them: "Now, here is a list of the Medical Service Officers available. Make your choice from this list." Is that your proposal?—That is my proposal. The number, I may point out, is large. Somewhere about 250 officers are employed in civil employ; and there is a very large number of officers in military employ with their names down for employment in civil employ; and the list of officers could easily be made available; instead of as now, the Director General advises the Government of India that such and such an officer may be released for a Province in the Punjab; that officer is sent. The Provincial Government has got no say as to whether his name was Jones or Smith, or as to what he was. I say they should be given a choice.

Lieut.-Colonel Sir H. Gidney.

17,241. Would you apply the same policy as regards the war reserve of the I.M.D. in civil medical employment?—Yes.

Lord Hardinge of Penshurst.

17,242 I suppose the Director General keeps back the best officer for his own service?—No. The Director General in this respect is merely a post office. The officers are employed in military service under the Director of Military Services in India who has complete control of the military medical officers. The Director General merely applies to the Director of Military Services for an officer for a certain Province, and the Director of Medical Services (he is the head of the Army Medical Services) says: "You may have Captain Jones."

17,243. Because he does not want Captain Jones himself?—He has no say in the matter. Captain Jones is available, and he is pushed into the Province where there is a vacancy.

Miss Pickford.

17,244. I want to ask whether the attendance on the wives and families of British officials is private practice or not?—(Colonel Baird.) Attendance on the wives and families of British officials in civil employment is private practice; in military employment, it is public duty.

17,245. Then your proposal to debar the civil surgeon from engaging in private practice would also debar the wives and families of British officials from attendance by the I.M.S. officers?—No. I would say they would have to do that as part of their public duties, if there were any alteration of the existing rule. They would continue to do it exactly as they do it now, but they would not get paid for it.

17,246. Then your proposal is that the I.M.S. officer should do that without additional fees as part of his ordinary duties?—Yes, exactly.

17,247. And you would not wish, in debarring him from private practice, to debar the wives and families of British officials from his attendance?—No, certainly not.

17,248. That point is not made clear in your Memorandum, is it?—No.

Archbishop of Canterbury.

17,249. May I just interject there to ask this? You speak only of British officials. Does what you say apply to British residents in India as well?—Only to the families of officials, I think. British residents would have to have some other arrangement, I should say.

Earl Peel.] It does not apply to business people.

Lord Eustace Percy.

17,250. Am I not right in thinking that Colonel Dunn in his Memorandum only proposes that the bar against private practice should be a bar against private practice among Indians?—(Colonel Dunn.) Yes. What I proposed was that they should not be allowed private practice among Indians; but they should be allowed consulting practice. That means that they would not have any such consulting practice unless called in by an Indian doctor.

17,251. But they would be able to do private practice among Europeans?—Yes.

Miss Pickford.

17,252. Then do you think, with that reservation, the objections that are felt by the politically-minded Indians to the I.M.S. would be removed?—I certainly think so. I think it might not remove all their objections; but I know that these two objections have been voiced to me many times as the strongest objections to posting of the I.M.S. officers to civil employ. They said that it was an unfair advantage given to a subsidised Government servant to take the bread and butter out of the mouths of the private practitioner who had no official salary to fall back upon.

17,253. You think they would not so much mind if those doctors could practice amongst Europeans, but not practice amongst Indians?—I do not think any Indian practitioner wishes to filch the British patients from the British doctor.

14^o Novembris, 1933.] Colonel R. F. BAIRD, Lieut.-Colonel [Continued.
C. L. DUNN, C.I.E., and Lieut.-Colonel H. H. BROOME.

Lord Irwin.

17,254. Might I ask one question to clear up a point arising out of Miss Pickford's questions? Colonel Dunn has said quite clearly that he would consider under his scheme allowing the civil surgeon to continue to serve the wives and families and the rest of all European residents. I understood Colonel Baird to say that he would retain that permission for civil servants and soldiers. Did he mean to limit it to that, or would he mean also, although he did not say so, to go as far as Colonel Dunn would?—(Colonel Baird.) I should say that in communities where there were a large number of English residents they would have to make their own arrangements for medical attendance, like planters now do. In Calcutta and Bombay, and other large towns, there are already English practitioners who are not in the Service.

17,255. Therefore, in those places do I understand you to say that you would contemplate prohibiting the I.M.S. from attending to private European patients?—Yes.

Earl Winterton.

17,256. Then the converse of that would be that in places where there were only two or three unofficial Europeans, they would be permitted to have the use of this Service?—Yes.

17,257. It would be a little difficult to draft that in an Act of Parliament, would it not? Would you have a numerical basis?—I have not quite followed the question.

17,258. Would you have a numerical basis? Would you have hard and fast rules? Would you say that in Town A, where there were 50 Europeans, they should not be permitted to use this Service, but in Town B, where there were only three or four Europeans, they should be permitted to use the Service? Would you put hard and fast rules in the Act?—I think you would have to have a rule, with certain exceptions, according to the size of the place, certainly.

Marquess of Salisbury.

17,259. You do not suggest that all this should be put into the Constitution Act?—No, I have not gone as far as that.

Marquess of Salisbury.] I understand it would be under rules.

Earl Winterton.] Yes, under rules. I am sure I made that clear.

Sir Austen Chamberlain.

17,260. May I put one other question just to get the proposal exactly in my mind? What I understand the witness to contemplate is that, in the first place, the Indian Medical Service Officers would have their duties enlarged to attending on the wives and families of officials?—Yes.

17,261. And that attendance would be covered by their salary?—Yes.

17,262. They would take no fees?—No.

17,263. He further, as I understand, holds that where there is a large British community apart from the official community they can make their own arrangements for a doctor?—Yes.

17,264. But there are certain cases where the members of the non-official British community are so small that they would be unable to maintain a doctor among them by such practice as they offer?—Yes.

17,265. And that in that case the Indian Medical Service officers should be allowed to practise among them?—I think in a case like that, certainly, you would have to make an exception.

17,266. That brings me to this question: In that case do you propose that they should give their services without fees to those people or, alternatively, that a fee should be charged, but accounted for to Government?—It might be done in that way, certainly, but I should think it would only affect a very few people in most cases. Perhaps it might be allowable, in a case like that, to make an exception and allow the officer to charge a fee.

Mr. M. R. Jayaker.

17,267. May I pursue that question a little further? How would it work? Take a place like Bombay or Calcutta or Madras, where there are a large number of European private residents; whom would you class under European—only British, or Italians or Germans and other people who come from Europe? Do you mean European residents or do you mean merely the British community?—I had not thought of that, but I should think they would have to make their own arrangements.

17,268. Supposing they made their own arrangements and they called in a Civil Surgeon and it was a place where, according to your suggestion, he was prohibited from practising among the British community, if you leave them to make their

C. L. DUNN, C.I.E., and Lieut.-Colonel H. H. BROOME.

own arrangements you leave them to call in the Civil Surgeons?—I would not allow them to call in the Civil Surgeons.

17,269. Do not you think they would have a grievance in that case?—I think perhaps they would.

Archbishop of Canterbury.

17,270. I was much impressed by some of the arguments in favour of certain aspects of Public Health being Central rather than Provincial subjects. Could one or other of the Witnesses indicate whether there are certain branches of the subject of Public Health that would be specially suitable for Central Legislation as distinct from others?—(Lt.-Col. Dunn.) The most suitable branches of Public Health for Central Legislation are undoubtedly the prevention of epidemic disease, the control of the adulteration of food and drugs and—well there is no “and”—because malaria is also an endemic and an epidemic disease, but the control of malaria is the greatest problem in India at the present day, the economic output of the people being so continually reduced by disability from malaria, not the actual death rate from malaria but the fact that practically every inhabitant of large tracts of India gets malaria every year and suffers, consequently, from reduced vitality for several months during the year—untreated malaria.

17,271. You feel that there are certain broad subjects which could be included in a General Public Health Act?—Yes.

17,272. One other question. Does your proposal mean merely legislative control, not administrative control, from the Centre in the Provinces?—I think it means also administrative control, because it means that certain inspecting officers from the Centre should be empowered to see that the legislation has been carried out.

17,273. If legislation is Central, why may it not be left to the proper officers in the Provinces to carry out that legislation?—Because, in my experience, legislation—we will take the Municipal Acts lays down certain obligatory duties on Municipalities with regard to Public Health, and in my experience, these obligatory duties are not carried out unless someone from the headquarters of Government is continually inspecting and keeping them up to the mark. That is one of the reasons for having such officers as Directors of Public Health.

Lord Irwin.

17,274. Might I ask a question arising out of what the Archbishop has put? What would be Colonel Dunn's view as to the desirability of having Public Health treated as one of the subjects for which the Central and the Provincial Legislatures could legislate concurrently, enabling the Centre to legislate on matters which they thought were required, as proposed in paragraph 114 of the White Paper?—There is no reason why that should not be done, my Lord.

Sir Austen Chamberlain.

17,275. That would go a long way to meet you, would it not?—It would.

17,276. You understand that, under the White Paper proposals in the field of Concurrent Legislation the Federal law overrides the local law if the two are in contradiction?—Exactly.

Earl Peel.

17,277. I think you wanted administrative control as well, you said?—The present position is that the Public Health Commissioner of the Government of India had to write and ask my permission to come into the Province. He has no duties and no powers whatever of any kind. He used to write a polite letter and say: “May I come down and see such-and-such of your activities,” and then go away thanking me for my courtesy. That is the position at present.

17,278. I thought you said to Sir Austen Chamberlain that it would go a long way to meet you if there were concurrent powers of legislation on Public Health questions?—Yes.

17,279. I gather you think it would be ineffective without administrative control as well?—I think there should be an inspecting control.

Miss Pickford.

17,280. Arising out of that, do you require the administrative control—the inspectorate control—to be Central or Provincial?—Central.

17,281. You do not think the powers of the Director in the Province are sufficient?—I do not—not in respect of such epidemic diseases as cholera, which know no provincial boundaries. The invisible line is crossed in hundreds of places without administrative control to co-ordinate the activities of two contiguous Provinces.

17,282. If you have a Central Act do you still think the administrative control in the Province to carry out that Act would be insufficient?—It would be insufficient in places where the infectious disease overlaps the Provincial boundary. It might be necessary for the Central control to co-ordinate the activities in dealing with an epidemic which might be on the borders of two Provinces. I have had personally to deal with that in the United Provinces and Bihar and Orissa, where the boundaries are contiguous with an invisible line, and with the disease passing backwards and forwards and no activity going on on one side of the invisible line to supplement and help the activities going on on the other side.

C. L. DUNN, C.I.E., and Lieut.-Colonel H. H. BROOME.

17,283. If it was an obligation on the Director of Medical Services in each of those Provinces to carry out a Central Act, would their powers still be insufficient?—I think so. We have enormous numbers of people who carry infectious disease by rail; and railways, I take it, would be a Central subject.

The Aga Khan.] Dr. Shafa'At Ahmad Khan will put my questions, my Lord Chairman.

Dr. Shafa'At Ahmad Khan

17,284. Colonel Dunn, your object, I suppose, is co-ordination, is it not?—Yes.

17,285. Does it necessarily involve control?—I think I explained as to how it would be possible for two contiguous Provinces with a Director of Public Health to control cholera travelling by rail.

17,286. Supposing you have an inter-Provincial Council of Health which met at Delhi and Simla and discussed questions of common concern, and supposing the inter-Provincial Council arrived at certain principles concerning the whole of India, would not it be possible to attain what you desire on a voluntary basis of this kind, rather than on a basis which will completely emasculate Provincial autonomy?—I do not agree that it would completely emasculate Provincial autonomy.

Dr. Shafa'At Ahmad Khan.] That is what we think on this side.

Mr. R. A. Butler.

17,287. I put this question to you at the very beginning of the evidence to-day and you said you thought there would be a chance of agreement between the autonomous units on these matters?—Yes, but I should prefer something other than a chance agreement.

Lord Eustace Percy.

17,288. Colonel Dunn has spoken about inspection. As he will admit, an Inspector is no good unless above the Inspector there is some administrative authority with the authority to issue orders. Does Colonel Dunn mean that there shall be at Delhi a Director-General of Public Health who can issue instructions to the District Officers on either side of the indivisible line, and, if he does not propose that, what does he propose?—I do propose that. I say it because railways, I take it, are to be a Central subject. I may say that in running a Kumbha Mela at Allahabad to which Sir Henry Gidney referred, this question arose, as to who was to control the whole organization which we put into force, and the Chief Medical Officer of the East Indian Railway, which as far as the United Provinces are concerned, is an autonomous body, said to me that the only thing that could possibly be done was that he would order all his officers to take my orders and he would put himself under my orders; otherwise, we could not come to a successful conclusion.

17,289. There is this distinction here. You can give to a Federation powers to control inter-State traffic, by which you could control the question of Kumbha Mela movement from place to place—you could give powers to a special Federal Service, but in the case of controlling an epidemic of cholera on the borders of two Provinces you would be obliged, as you say, to give a Federal Officer power to give orders to the Provincial service. I am not opposing your idea, I like it; but can you help me to see how that would in practice work as an administrative problem?—It works in the Union of South Africa and it works in the Commonwealth of Australia.

17,290. Does it work in the Commonwealth of Australia?—Yes.

17,291. How does it work?—The powers for controlling infectious disease are vested in the Central Government.

Mr. M. R. Jayaker.

17,292. May I pursue this question, a little further, Colonel Dunn? You necessarily imply that the Central Government should have power over Indian States. Supposing pursuing your analogy of an indivisible line: there are British Provinces and an Indian State is between. I suppose you will want equal power over sanitary affairs in

14^o Novembris, 1933.] Colonel R. F. BAIRD, Lieut.-Colonel
C. L. DUNN, C.I.E., and Lieut.-Colonel H. H. BROOME.

the Indian State in order that that should be completely successful?—Exactly.

Dr. Shafa'at Ahmad Khan.

17,293. May I put one more question? Colonel Dunn, do you know of the arrangements that are in force now among the different States of Europe for the prevention of infection, for instance, in Switzerland?—Yes, I have a working knowledge of them.

17,294. Could you tell me what the arrangements are, very briefly indeed?—They are on a voluntary basis. The various European states arrive at general agreements for the prevention of infection and they are carried out. If anybody wishes to go from one European state to another in the presence of infectious disease he has to have a certificate as to having been examined, vaccinated or inoculated, as the case may be, before he is allowed to enter that state, or he is kept in quarantine for 10 days. We have exactly the same thing in India. No Indian or European can go into Ceylon for any purpose whatever when cholera or plague are epidemic, or who comes from any district in which it exists, without having been examined, inoculated or vaccinated and quarantined for six days. That is the rule now.

17,295. And the States and Switzerland make these arrangements among themselves?—Between the States and Switzerland, no.

Lieut.-Colonel Sir H. Gidney.

17,296. Colonel Baird, in view of the importance of your opinion as regards satisfying the political-minded Indian against the Indian Medical Service by depriving him of practice to a certain extent, is that opinion your own individual opinion or the opinion of retired Indian Medical Service Officers, or the opinion of the Service? Is it your own opinion?—(Colonel Baird.) It is my own opinion.

17,297. Colonel Dunn, would you be in favour of a Minister of Health in the Federal Government?—(Colonel Dunn.) I have advocated it for years.

17,298 A Minister of Health?—Yes.

Sir Reginald Craddock.

17,299. I want to ask about this private practice. I do not think you all agree as to debarring consulting practice; that is to say, I think some of you would allow a civil surgeon to be called in as consultant by an Indian medical practitioner to an Indian patient of his. That often happens, does it not?—(Colonel Baird.) Yes.

17,300. They are called in by the Indian practitioner in consultation. You do not want to debar that, do you?—(Colonel Dunn.) I do not. (Colonel Broome.) I do not want to alter that at all. I think the public ought to be allowed to call in consultants if they want them. Why should they be deprived of what is possibly the best knowledge in the country?

17,301. I wanted to get it clear that that was the opinion of at all events two of you on that subject. I suppose in your own experience you have often yourselves been called in on such occasions?—Yes, most of my time I have been consulting surgeon, and I should consider it was very hard on the people of the country that they should be deprived of anybody's special knowledge.

17,302. You will find perhaps that Indian patients and the Indian practitioner call in the British doctor often in cases when the ladies of their houses are ill?—Certainly.

17,303. Is not that fairly common?—Yes, quite common.

17,304. That is in Northern India?—Yes.

17,305. I wanted to verify that because when I was last in India I was informed by one of the Indian Members of the Madras Council that that was the case very frequently?—Yes.

17,306. I was there on the Lee Commission, and I was just talking to him privately regarding the Indian Medical Service, and that is what he told me—that very frequently British Officers were called in to attend the ladies of the family. I am glad, therefore, to hear that you verify that from your experience of Northern India, too. There is only one other question I wanted to put to you, as there is so very little time. We heard a good deal about the neglected state of medicine to the multitude in India, but is it not one of your experiences that in all these vast masses of rural areas where the hakims and baidas are employed, it would be almost impossible for them to call in Government doctors except as sub-assistant surgeons in charge of dispensaries?—That is the case, is it not?—Yes.

17,307. In fact, I suppose you have known many cases, as indeed I have, in which the patient and his relatives call

14th November, 1953.] Colonel R. F. BAIRD, Lieut.-Colonel
C. L. DUNN, C.I.E., and Lieut.-Colonel H. H. BROOME.

all these people in together. They take the medicine of a baid or a hakim, one day, and the sub-assistant surgeon's treatment another day, and so forth. Have you not come across that?—(Colonel Baird.) Yes, I have heard of it.

17,308 And there is also rather a tendency sometimes for the British Indian Medical Service Officer to be called in when a patient is practically moribund?—That is my complaint.

17,309. That is to say, if you had been called in earlier it would have been very much better?—Exactly.

17,310 Then, of course, it is very common for a baid or a hakim to say that it was the British doctor who finally polished off the patient?—Yes.

Lord Rankellour.

17,311. I have not a great deal to ask. Colonel Dunn, you realise that port quarantine is a Federal subject?—Yes.

17,312. And you see no insuperable difficulty in applying the Federal system of Federal Officers to internal quarantine, sanitary quarters, and so on?—I did not propose Federal Officers for the Provinces. I merely proposed certain control over certain Officers.

17,313. The port quarantine officers would be Federal Officers?—They are Federal Officers or under central control.

17,314 Then you notice among the Provincial subjects there is control of alcohol, drugs and narcotics; would you reserve all that to the Central Government?—Yes.

17,315. Would you be satisfied with the setting up of a board corresponding to the General Medical Council here?—I think it is a necessity.

17,316. That is subject to certain restrictions on existing practitioners or practitioners in the next few years, and ultimately an appeal in certain cases to the Governor-General?—Yes.

17,317. And you think that is a satisfactory arrangement?—I think it is very satisfactory.

17,318. Now we have been told about the numbers of the Indian Medical Service, some of whom are on military duty and others of whom are on civilian duty, but I think I understood that the Military Authorities think it necessary to have a reserve and that is supplied by the present number of Indian practitioners?—Yes.

17,319. Does the number of practitioners which the Military Authorities regard as necessary for the reserve correspond more or less with the number required for civilian purposes?—(Colonel Baird.) The answer is that it does

Sir Austen Chamberlain.

17,320. May I put one question with regard to the last answer? I think you said that it corresponded more or less exactly with the number employed on civilian duty. You do not mean that the number required for the reserve is the same as the number engaged in civilian practice, do you? I understood that the number in civilian practice covered those required for reserve and the necessary minimum that must be left over?—It would depend upon the size of the emergency. More men would, of course, be wanted for a great war and very few for a small frontier war.

Sir Austen Chamberlain.] But I was trying to get at the basis upon which the number of civilian appointments were calculated, and I thought it was that the basis was that there should be enough to supply, or, it was thought, a sufficient reserve on mobilisation, and to leave the minimum required for civil practice.

Mr. R. A. Butler.] I think that is borne out by the actual figures. There are at present 302 officers in civil employment, 200 of the latter forming a War Reserve.

Sir Austen Chamberlain.

17,321. So that would be a third of the number outside the War Reserve at present?—Yes.

Lord Rankellour.

17,322. Do you think, therefore, that the number of civil appointments is greater than the Military Authorities think necessary for their purposes?—I could not say that.

17,323. But I thought it was elicited that there were these numbers outside the War Reserve in civilian employment?—What actually happened in the Great War was that nearly all the men on civil duty were taken for military purposes and very few were left, but they had to retain some.

17,324. That was a margin for what I may call civil contingencies in the case of the Great War?—Yes.

17,325. If it had been a little earlier I was going to ask you what were these two Indian traditional medical systems,

C. L. DUNN, C.I.E., and Lieut.-Colonel H. H. BROOME.

but I will only ask now: Are they irreconcilable with Western allopathy?—Yes, they are quite irreconcilable with Western knowledge.

Dr. Shafa'at Ahmad Khan.

17,326. All of them?—Yes, I think so.

Lord Eustace Percy.

17,327. Just two small points. I do not know if I ought to ask this: May I ask how far the United Provinces, about which we have heard most, is a typical province so far as expenditure on public health is concerned?—(Lieut.-Colonel Dunn.) In the United Provinces the population is 49,000,000. It is the second biggest Province in India. I believe Bengal has about 500,000 more population, and the expenditure on public health in the United Provinces (the provincial expenditure) amounts at present to between 19 and 21 lakhs of rupees. In the Punjab, with a population of 29,000,000, the expenditure is very nearly as great. In Madras the expenditure is very much greater.

17,328. In Bengal?—In Bengal the Public Health Department spends very little provincially, as it has been decentralised more or less, making the District Boards responsible for their own Public Health, with very bad results.

17,329. Is it true (I ask for information, although I have an impression) that the expenditure per head of the population for public health and Medical Services in the United Provinces is less than in any province in India, except possibly Bihar and Orissa and the Central Provinces?—I think that is correct.

Dr. Shafa'at Ahmad Khan.

17,330. Has not your expenditure fluctuated, sometimes about 19 lakhs, at other times about 30 lakhs?—The expenditure is generally due to Government grants for large schemes such as drainage and water works, but the normal expenditure on the routine work of the Department has fluctuated very little.

Lord Eustace Percy.

17,331. I wanted to ask Colonel Broome a question. He has very strong feelings about University appointments by the Minister. Have you read the Report of the Punjab University Commission?—(Lieut.-Colonel Broome.) No, I have not.

17,332. You cannot answer my question? I wanted to know whether a recommendation had been made by that Commission to place those appointments in the hands of the University? You do not know?—No.

Earl Peel.

17,333. I want to ask just one question: We have been speaking about private practice, and these Civil Surgeons, and so on. In your experience I suppose it is true that a number of these families, I will not say of officials but of non-officials, live at such distances even from a Civil Surgeon that it is difficult in many cases for them to get the services of their own doctors?—(Colonel Baird.) Yes.

17,334. And, even with the services you have got, the cadre of the Civil Surgeons is very small?—Yes.

17,335. I am asking from the point of view of the patient rather than the doctor?—Yes.

17,336. And, from the point of view of the patients, they are rather hardly served in that way, are they not?—Yes, they are. There are very few of them nowadays outside large stations.

17,337. So many people find it some hardship to get a doctor?—Very great hardship.

17,338. I would like to ask you one more point. You talked about drawing away the private practice from these civil surgeons when they transferred to the Army, but, in your case, would withdrawing the opportunities of private practice have a serious effect or not on the quality of the recruiting for the Indian Medical Service?—That is rather difficult to answer. I think you would have to recruit a special type of officer. Certainly, as we said before, private practice has acted as a lure to draw men to India, especially in the old days, 30, 40 or 50 years ago, but, nowadays, private practice to any extent is limited to the large cities practically, and I do not think it would be a great hardship to abolish private practice altogether, except in exceptional cases.

17,339. It might be not a great hardship, but do you still think you would get first class men going out with that limited opportunity?—Yes, I think you could.

[Chairman.] Thank you, gentlemen. We are very greatly obliged to you for giving evidence here.

(The Witnesses are directed to withdraw.)

Ordered, That this Committee be adjourned to to-morrow at Five o'clock.

SUB-COMMITTEE A

DIE LUNAE, 17^o JULII, 1933

Present:

Lord Hutchison of Montrose.
Major Attlee.
Sir Reginald Craddock.

Mr Davidson.
Lord Eustace Percy

DELEGATES.

Sir P. Pattani.
Sir Hari Singh Gour.

Dr. Shafa' At Ahmad Khan.

The Lord EUSTACE PERCY in the Chair.

Mr. H. L. CHABLANI and Rai Bahadur HIRANAND KHEMSING are called in, and examined, as follows.

Lord Eustace Percy.

A1. Mr. Chablani, you are Joint Secretary of the Executive Committee of the Sind Hindu Conference Committee?—(Mr. Chablani.) Yes.

A2. And Dean of the Faculty of Arts in Delhi University?—Yes.

A3. I think you were also the leader of the Deputation of the Sind Hindu Association before the Statutory Commission?—Yes.

A4. Rai Bahadur Hiranand Khemsing, you are in the legal profession, and you are a Zamindar I think?—(Rai Bahadur Hiranand Khemsing) I was in the legal profession, but am not now. I am at present a Zamindar.

A5. And you were President of the Hyderabad Municipality for a number of years?—Yes.

A6. Gentlemen, we have your Memoranda of Evidence before us, and it is as follows:

MEMORANDUM 39 BY THE SIND HINDU SABHA AGAINST SEPARATION OF SIND FROM THE BOMBAY PRESIDENCY.

With reference to a brief statement of "The Case against separation of Sind from the Bombay Presidency," submitted by the Sind Hindu Sabha, 100 copies of which are sent herewith in compliance with the cable received in India from your office on the 20th of May, we have the honour to invite attention to the fact that this statement is merely a convenient summary of the broad facts of the question, and that, for the proper appreciation of the issues involved, it is necessary to refer not only to the officially published literature on the subject (which in this case includes the relevant portions of the Bombay Government's memorandum prepared for the Indian Statutory Commission, the reports of the Committees appointed by the Bombay Legislative Council, and the Indian Central Legislature to assist the Simon Commission, together with the notes by Dr. Ambedkar and Sir Harising Gour, the report of the Indian Statutory Commission and the evidence led before it by the Sind Hindu Association, the proceedings of the Sind Sub-Committee of the Indian Round Table Conference, the report of the Sind Financial Enquiry Committee, Mr. Brayne's report on the Sind Conference and the full proceedings of the Sind Conference), but also to the following non-official publications:—

(1) "Financial Aspect of the Separation of Sind from the Bombay Presidency," published by Mr. H. L. Chablani in 1927.

(2) "Separation of Sind from the Bombay Presidency" (a rejoinder to K. B. Mahomed Ayoob S. Khuhros' story of the sufferings of Sind), published by Mr. H. L. Chablani in 1928.

(3) "The True Facts Regarding the Separation of Sind from the Bombay Presidency," published by the Executive Committee of the Sind Hindu Conference Committee in reply to the mis-statements made by the separationists at the Indian Round Table Conference.

(4) The written statement on the financial consequences of separation of Sind presented by Mr. H. L. Chablani to the Sind Financial Enquiry Committee (particularly pages 10-18).

(5) An address by Mukhi Gobindram Pritamdas, Chairman of the Reception Committee of the Sind Anti-Separation Conference (1932).

(6) An Address by Sardur Sampuran Singh, President of the Sind Anti-Separation Conference and a member of the Sind Sub-Committee of the Indian Round Table Conference (1932).

(7) A criticism of Mr. Brayne's report of the Sind Conference issued by the Executive Committee of the Sind Anti-Separationists Conference (1932).

2. At the very outset we desire to emphasise the fact that the decision of His Majesty's Government to constitute Sind into a separate Governor's Province in the new Indian Federation with a subvention from the Federal Government, is not only against the recommendation of the Bombay Government, the Bombay Legislative Committee, the Indian Central Committee, the Simon Commission, the Nehru Committee, Sir Purushotamdas's Committee, the Indian National Congress, the All-Parties Conference at Lucknow, and the Indian Round Table Conference, but has been made in the teeth of opposition of the Hindu minority in Sind, supported by almost the entire Indian Press, including Anglo-Indian journals like The Times of India.

3. It should be further remembered in this connection that even the conditional recommendation of the Sind Sub-committee of the R.T.C. in favour of the principle of separation was an ex parte decision secured by misrepresentation of facts and fallacious arguments, which, in the absence of any Hindu member from Sind, went unchallenged. For instance, statements were freely made at the meetings of the Sind Sub-committee that "95 per cent. of the people of Sind are for separation of Sind" (Lpp. 73), that "it is a demand by Sindhis, including Europeans and everybody" (Lpp. 19), that "the overwhelming majority of the people in Sind want separation, not only the Mussulmans, but the Hindus and Parsis and Europeans and others" (Lpp. 29), "that the most enlightened community, though they are a handful in Sind, the Parsees, have been urging the separation of Sind" (Lpp. 4), that "on this question there is virtually no difference of opinion between the Hindus and Mahomadians of Sind," that "Hindus were the first to be in favour of separation," that "Seth Harchandrai, the greatest leader we have had in Sind, and a Hindu," made a representation to the Right Honourable Mr. Montagu that Sind be separated, that he moved at the Indian National Congress of 1913 a resolution for the separation of Sind from Bombay (pp. 22-3), and that "he protested again and again, in resolutions passed by the Indian National Congress, urging upon Government to separate Sind" (pp. 22-3), and that "the demand was pressed by Sind Hindus in a deputation to the late Mr. Montagu and Lord Chelmsford when the current Reforms were on the anvil," that the question "has been mooted from time to time, and the Hindus were the first to be in favour of the separation of Sind," that "in earlier years there was no controversy about it at all, as shown by my friend on the right, that Hindu, Parsis, Europeans and Mushims, not only in Sind, but outside Sind, and all agreed that it was an injustice to Sind to keep her tied to the apron strings of Bombay" (p. 27), that in 1922 Sir Montagu Webb headed a deputation of Sindhis and waited on the Governor of Bombay, threatening that if they were not properly dealt with, they would ask for "a separation," that "non-official Europeans, headed by Sir Montagu Webb, are in favour of separation," and that European officials in Sind favour separation but "owing to official etiquette, they cannot commit themselves in this connection." Each of these statements is either wholly devoid of truth, or at best a gross misrepresentation of actual facts; and ample proofs in support of this serious charge will be found in the Introduction (page 3), Chapter I, "Are Parsis and Europeans in favour of Separation of Sind"; Chapter II, "The Hindu attitude regarding Separation"; and Chapter III, "The Past History of the question of the pamphlet on 'The True Facts Regarding the Separation of Sind from the Bombay Presidency,' fifty copies of which are submitted herewith to enable each member of the Parliamentary Committee to see for himself the extent to which grossly unfair advantage was taken of the absence of the other side at the R.T.C. to misrepresent the true facts and mislead the members of the Sind Sub-committee into committing themselves in favour of the principle of separation of Sind from the Bombay Presidency. Attention is invited to the review of the past history of the question, supported by documentary evidence contained in Chapter III of this pamphlet, which clearly brings out the fact that up to 1920 the leading Hindus and Muslims of Sind, jointly pressed for the repeal of the Sind Commissioner's Act, which meant a more complete amalgamation of Sind with the Presidency proper and that the present agitation for the constitution of Sind into a separate Province was initiated and fostered by the All-Indian Muslim politicians outside Sind, with a view to make Sind a pawn on the chess-board of Communal politics in India.

The main arguments advanced in favour of separation of Sind at the meeting of the Sind Sub-Committee were, firstly, that Sind was not really a deficit province, but was shown to be a deficit area by manipulation of figures by the Bombay Government and Mr. Chabiani, and secondly, that Sind was badly neglected by the Bombay Government. The financial fallacies of the Muslim Separationists are examined in detail in para. 2, chapter IV of the "True Facts Regarding Separation," and have now been fully exposed by the expert Sind Financial Enquiry Committee, which has shown that the Presidency has been spending annually on Sind nearly one crore more than the revenue from Sind. In the face of this, the second charge likewise falls to the ground, for the Bombay Government cannot be justly accused of neglecting Sind when it has been spending on it nearly 50 per cent. more than its revenue. A detailed examination of four specific allegations in this connection will, however, be found in para. 3, pages 49-57 of the pamphlet referred to above. If further proof is needed of the immense progress made by Sind under the administrative connection with Bombay for the last 80 years, it is furnished by the contrast between Sind in the days of the Talpurs and Sind to-day, a brief reference to which is made on page 1 of "The Case Against Separation." In this connection a presumption was drawn against the Bombay Government from the mere fact of "the geographical isolation of Sind from Bombay and the difficulties of communication between the two," owing to which it was alleged that "Sind does not depend on Bombay to any extent," that "once in a blue moon some question crops up as regards Sind which is discussed or debated in the Legislature," that "the Bombay Government cannot govern Sind from such a distance." But a careful consideration of the facts will show that there is not much substance even in this line of attack. In almost every major province, there are places between which and the Headquarters it takes as much time to travel as between Karachi and Bombay. Secondly, the difficulties of communication between the two has of late decreased considerably, so much so that the Bombay Legislature Committee, of which Sir Shah Nawaz Khan Bhutto was the chairman, definitely stated that "with the changes which have taken place during the last few years the delegation of powers (under the Sind Commissioner's Act) is no longer necessary." At the present time Sind has a regular service of three different means of communication with the Headquarters, by air, by sea and by rail, which few divisions of other provinces can boast of. The Bombay Government has all along supported the demand for a more direct railway route to Bombay, and thanks to their persistent efforts the Government of India have recently approved of the demand for a shorter and quicker railway route between Sind and Bombay, so that even this grievance will be removed at an early date, whether Sind is separated or not. Thirdly, the allegation that because of the distance, the heads of departments in Bombay and Poona are unable to get first hand knowledge of the conditions in Sind, and are ignorant of the local conditions, is untrue, in as much as the Bombay cabinet has always included not only a non-official from Sind, either as Minister or Executive Councillor, but also one or two civilian members who have served in Sind for quite a long period. Finally, the instances given on page 54 of "The True Facts Regarding the Separation of Sind from the Presidency" will conclusively show how baseless is the statement that "only once in a blue moon some question crops up as regards Sind which is discussed or debated in the Bombay Legislature."

17° Julii, 1933.]

There remains to notice the implied application to Sind of the linguistic principle of redistribution of provinces to India. Three points are worthy of notice in this connection. In the first place, the case of Sind is not being considered as a part of a general scheme of redistribution of provinces on any principle, linguistic or otherwise, as was definitely recommended by the Simon Commission, for then the merits of all alternative schemes of amalgamation, such as the suggestion of amalgamating Sind with Panjab, or a part of the Panjab will have to be considered. Secondly, the linguistic principle in the form in which it is usually stated is inapplicable to Sind, for, as pointed out by the Sind Hindu Association in their memorandum to the Simon Commission, the case of Sind is materially different from that of Orissa or Karnatic. There is no question of bringing together, under one administration, people speaking the same language but now scattered about under different administrations; the Sindhi speaking people are already under one administration. The administrative divisions of the Bombay Presidency are even at present linguistic areas. Sindhi is, as far as possible, even now in Sind, the medium of instruction in primary and secondary schools; it is the language of official business and of law courts, quite to the same extent as it would be in a separate province of Sind; and so far as Sindhi language can aid a special variety of culture, traditions and literature, the administrative connection of Sind with Bombay does not act in any way as an obstacle to its development. Bombay does not propose to interdict the use of Sindhi language, or use its political power to force Gujrati or Marathi on Sind. Nor will any rational Government in a separate province of Sind forbid the use of Gujrati in the business world of Karachi, or as the medium of instruction in some schools at Karachi and in Thar and Parkar District. The transformation of a linguistic division into a province will bring about no change whatever in these important respects, and therefore all this philosophy of benefits from linguistic provinces is wholly irrelevant to the main issue. Thirdly, the linguistic principle is, as was pointed out by the Simon Commission, only one among the many factors in the problem, and all the over-riding administrative, financial and political considerations, which in the opinion of the Simon Commission must prevail against it, exist in the case of the Sind.

4. The facts and the arguments referred to above will, it is hoped, be considered sufficient to prove that, for from there being "an impressive case for the division of Sind from the Bombay Presidency and the creation of a separate Provincial Government there," as the Sind Sub-committee of the Indian Round Table Conference was led to believe by false representations, no adequate reason exists for severing the administrative connection that has continued for more than 80 years, and proved to be so beneficial to Sind. But apart from this negative aspect of the case, there are very serious administrative, economic, financial and political reasons against the proposed change. The real smallness of Sind in area, population and financial resources, the economic difficulties of an undeveloped small province owing to the smallness of the security it can offer for development loans, the fluctuations in its total revenues, and the consequent uncertainty of the security it can offer for its loans, and the less insurance it will have against risk of failure for its development schemes, and the administrative objections against constituting Sind into a separate Governor's Province, were first pointed out by Mr. Chablani on pages 1-3 and 13-17 of his pamphlet on the "Financial Aspects of the Separation of Sind from the Bombay Presidency," a copy of which is submitted herewith. Some of these were supported by the Bombay Government in their memorandum prepared for the Simon Commission, and considered sufficiently weighty to justify their "strong opposition" to the constitution of Sind into a separate province and to make the proposal "both impracticable and undesirable." The Bombay Legislative Committee (including its chairman, Sir Shah Nawaz Khan Bhutto) came to the definite conclusion that "the administrative difficulties are real and cannot be ignored," while the Simon Commission were of the opinion that "there are grave administrative objections to isolating Sind and depriving it of the powerful backing of Bombay before the future of Sukkar Barrage is assured." Even after the Round Table Conference, the Sind Financial Enquiry Committee were compelled incidentally to admit two serious disadvantages of the proposal, as the following extract from their report will show:—"Top-heaviness is almost inevitable in a province so small as Sind will be. That the cost of constituting a separate Government for a comparatively small area is inevitably disproportionately high, is, in our view, a fact which cannot be controverted, and which must be squarely faced when the arguments for and against separation are being weighed" (para. 431). . . . We contemplate that, in certain cases, Sind will be unable to maintain a cadre of officers of its own, and will be forced to the expedient of borrowing men either from the Presidency or from some other province. We realise the cogency of the argument that any such system is unsatisfactory from the point of view of the Government of the Province, since naturally, they cannot have the same control over officers who are merely lent for a period, and whose future advancement does not lie in their hands, as they have over their own permanent servants, but this is a disability which must, we think, be faced. We would make it clear that our proposals in this regard are framed not in the interests of the officers in question, but entirely in the interests of efficient administration. It is impossible to secure an even flow of promotion if the total number of men borne on a cadre falls below a certain point; a very small departure from the normal scale of casualties, such as would hardly affect a large cadre, will result, in a small one, either in a complete block in promotion, with the result that senior officers have to be retained in junior posts, or in undesirably accelerated promotion, junior officers being promoted to senior posts before they have the experience necessary to enable them to fill them efficiently. Moreover, these effects are complementary, a block in promotion almost invariably entails accelerated promotion as soon as the block clears, and vice versa. Where, therefore, the number of officers required for a service is small, or where, as in the case of the judicial cadre, it is impossible to obtain, in the junior appointments, the kind of experience necessary to enable the duties of the higher ones to be efficiently discharged, we can see no alternative to resorting to the expedient of borrowing officers of the required qualifications from elsewhere." (Para. 44.)

It has to be remembered further that the expert financial enquiry committee has in their estimates merely assessed the cost of separation, and made no estimate of the cost of "independent institutions of all kinds for the new Province" (para. 46), so that Sind will have to depend on the generosity of other Provinces, not only for its higher education and research to a greater extent than Assam, which has been bitterly complaining of being the only Province in India without a University of its own, and without a single college for the training of teachers or for higher education in agriculture, Veterinary Science or medicine (Vide pp. 6-7 of the Volumes of the Reports of the Provincial Committees attached to the Simon Commission), but also for its Borstal Jail (p. 56), its Police Training School (p. 57), its reformatory school and school of arts (p. 58), its Director of Industries, Industrial Engineer, and Industrial Chemist (pp. 63-4), and its Consulting Architect (p. 65). The undesirability of such a state of affairs will easily be realised by those who know the difficulties of securing admission of students from the Delhi Province into the professional and technical institutions of the neighbouring Provinces of the Panjab and the United Provinces. The special administrative difficulties connected with the Sukkur Barrage which will cover three-fifths of Sind, were pointed out to the Simon Commission, both by the Sind Hindu Association and the Chief Engineer of the Sukkur Barrage, who summed up his views in the sentence: "The whole difference between success and failure depends on the strictness, efficiency and impartiality of subsequent administration, and if I may mention it, it is a very difficult thing in a country like Sind—far more difficult than it is in the Bombay-Deccan." Their importance was emphasised by Mr. Brayne in para. 37 of his report on the Sind Conference, and the need of making some special arrangements to meet these difficulties seems to be implicitly admitted by the authors of the White Paper, which includes the administration of the Sukkur Barrage in Sind among the "special responsibilities" of its future Governor—an arrangement which will either break down if the Governor is a weak man, or reduce provincial autonomy to a farce if he is a strong and assertive personality.

To sum up, the final picture of the administration of the proposed Province of Sind, which emerges from these considerations, is an undeveloped Province with small and fluctuating revenue resources, with a small credit in the open market or with the Federal Government for raising loans to cover its deficits or to develop its resources, with no control over its higher officers borrowed from other Provinces, or over the Barrage which will cover three-fifths of its area, and dependent on unreliable outside generosity for higher education and research. It is difficult to imagine how the creation of such a Province will mean an improvement on the existing connection with Bombay, from the point of view of the political ambitions of even the Sind Muslims; for, as an important group with weightage of representation on the Bombay Council, they will be able to influence and control the administration in the whole of Sind in all questions of major policy far more effectively than under the proposed arrangement. To the Hindus of Sind it means a double loss, they will not only lose their share in the amenities, the credit, and the increased power open to the Hindu majority in Bombay including Sind, but will be relegated as an ineffective minority in a Council with limited powers of control over the greater part of Sind and with little or no capacity for developing Sind.

17^o July, 1933.]

5. The financial objections were upheld by the Sind Financial Enquiry Committee and Mr. Brayne, and are presumably no longer denied. And, as has been pointed out in the "case against separation," if the British Government were to adhere to the resolution of the Sind sub-committee, endorsed by the Indian Round Table Conference and professedly accepted at one stage by the Prime Minister, or the Muslims were to honour the statements made by their leaders at the meetings of the Sind Sub-committee of the R.T.C., and the All Parties Conferences, the question should now be closed; for this resolution, according to the authoritative interpretation given by its chairman (Lord Russell) in reply to a specific enquiry by Sir Phiroze Sethna, during the sittings of the Committee and agreed to by Sir Shah Nawaz Khan Bhutto himself, meant that "if Sind cannot show that it can successfully stand on its own legs, the separation does not take place." (Vide p. 87 Proceedings.) The Muslim demand of a subvention from the central Government at this stage amounts to a repudiation of all the emphatic assurances given in the Sind Sub-committee as to Sind's ability to stand on its own legs—assurances on the strength of which alone even the principle of separation had been accepted by the R.T.C. For some unaccountable reason, the British Government has rewarded the party guilty of this breach of faith by accepting the unreasonable demand for a subvention. The whole episode is unworthy of the high tradition of justice and fair play built up by generations of Britishers in the past, and has created a most painful impression on the Hindu mind.

Even the promised subvention by the White Paper does not, however, solve the financial problem. In the first place, it is temporary, and no future national Federal Government attempting to do justice to all Provinces would tolerate it for any length of time, for statistical calculations show that in the decade 1912-21 the average income per capita was the highest in Sind among the Indian Provinces, and that in 1928-29 it was higher in Sind than in any other Province except Bombay Presidency proper, that the expenditure per capita on nation-building activities in 1930-31 was higher in Sind than in any other Province except in Bombay, and that the percentage of taxation per capita in 1930-31 to the total income per capita in 1928-29 was substantially lower in Sind than in the Panjab, Madras, Bombay Presidency (excluding Sind), United Provinces, Central Provinces and Berar, and the N.W. Frontier Province. (See the statistical Tables in Mr. Chabiani's paper on the Federal Financial Committee and Provincial Contributions, a copy of which is sent herewith. Exhibit VIII.)

Secondly, a subvention of 80 lakhs a year will not be enough to cover the initial deficit of Sind on the date of separation, for a careful scrutiny of the latest available figures will show that Mr. Brayne's estimate of the initial deficit on 1st April, 1933, the assumed date of separation, has already gone wrong by several lakhs. As the Hindu members of the Sind Conference point out in a note printed as Appendix G to Mr. Brayne's report, "The revenue receipts in 1930-31 and the Revised Estimates of 1931-32 are lower than the basic figures assumed by the Miles Committee by as much as 24 lakhs, while the expenditure in 1930-31 exceeded the committee's basic figures by 2.3 lakhs." In spite of this fact, and notwithstanding the warning given by the expert committee, that by their basic figures of income and expenditure, they "do not altogether mean a budget estimate for the year 1933-34," (Para. II of their report), Mr. Brayne has adopted as the basis of his estimate of the initial deficit in the year 1933-34, the "basic figures" adopted by the expert committee under all heads of revenue, except Excise (see Appendix A or his report). For instance, in spite of the committee's explicit statement that under Land-revenue, "with matters as they now stand, it would not be in the least safe to budget for more than about 90 lakhs for 1933-34" (vide page 36 of their report), and with the information available to him that according to the accounts of the latest year (1929-30) for which complete figures were compiled, the Land-revenue collections amounted to only 91.28 lakhs, Mr. Brayne persisted in assuming a figure of 102 lakhs for Land-revenue in 1933-34. Subsequent figures, now available, have fully justified the estimate put forward by the three Hindu members of the Conference, the Accounts for the year 1931-32 showing the Land-revenue collections to be only 92.41 lakhs. Similarly, Mr. Brayne has assumed for Excise receipts 29 lakhs a year, against the committee's basic figures of 33 lakhs, while the actual for 1930-31 and 1931-32 are only 25.79 lakhs and 25.66 lakhs respectively. The receipts from Stamps are estimated by Mr. Brayne at 20 lakhs, while the actuals for 1931-32 are only 16.89 lakhs. Moreover, Mr. Brayne's statement that 80.5 lakhs "is a reasonable estimate of the probable initial deficit of Sind on a date assumed for present purposes to be 1st April, 1933," is very misleading, for a glance at the figures given on page 27 of his report will show that even on the basis of the figures assumed by him, the initial deficit amounts to 91.45 lakhs, of which 11 lakhs are to be covered by additional taxation in the form of a new cess on Land-revenue, and 80.5 lakhs by a subvention. In addition to these manipulations, Mr. Brayne has reduced the expert committee's estimate of Sind's liability for pension charges from 16.5 lakhs to 9 lakhs a year without pointing out any mistake in the actuarial calculations of the expert committee on the basis of a wrong analogy, as has been pointed out on page 8 of the pamphlet "A Criticism of Mr. Brayne's Report of the Sind Conference." He has further effected a cut of 4 lakhs under interest and repayment of debt by proposing what really amounts to a questionable device of postponement of repayment at the very start of Sind's new career, viz., that instead of the existing arrangement of repayment of unproductive debt in 30 years, a separate Sind Province should not only repay the same in 50 years but be allowed to count the 50 years' period, not from the point of time at which the particular loan was borrowed but de novo from the date it is constituted into a separate Province. For a fuller discussion of Mr. Brayne's estimate and justification of the estimate put forward by the anti-separationists, reference may kindly be made to pages 38-9, 45-6, 54-8, 61-6, 76-8, 86-7, 107-110 and 112-131 of the Proceedings of the Sind Conference, a note by three Hindu members of the Sind Conference printed as Appendix G of Mr. Brayne's report, and the pamphlet "A Criticism of Mr. Brayne's Report of the Sind Conference," a copy of which is submitted herewith.

The conclusion to be drawn from the figures given above, is that, even with a subvention of 80 lakhs, the process of balancing the Sind budget on the date of separation will involve additional taxation to the tune of 33 to 44.5 lakhs (i.e., 33 if Mr. Brayne's estimate of pension liability and debt charges be accepted, and 44.5 if the expert committee's figures are adopted). And this heavy taxation will be imposed in a province whose total receipts from taxation, including Land-revenue and water-rate, amounted to only 158 lakhs in 1929-30 and about 145 lakhs in 1931-32, at a time of unprecedented trade depression and an exceptionally severe fall in the prices of agricultural produce, and on people who are already complaining bitterly of the sudden and steep rise in the rates of Land-revenue assessment in the Sukkur Barrage Zone, which covers 3/5ths of its area.

In spite of this heavy taxation and a subvention of 80 lakhs a year, the standard of administration and amenities in the new province of Sind will be below the level of even Assam, which has been complaining bitterly of its forced backwardness because of insufficiency of its financial resources. Nor do the estimates of the Expert Committee and Mr. Brayne include the cost of institutions like a University and Government Colleges of all kinds, Engineering, Medical, and others, adequate mileage of Government Provincial Roads or medical relief, the absence of which was cited as a proof of neglect by the Bombay Government and made a ground for demanding separation of Sind from Bombay during the discussions at the meetings of the Sind Sub-Committee of the Indian Round Table Conference (see pages 10-11, 29, Proceedings). A reference to paragraph 46 of the Report of the Expert Committee will show that they rejected the view that any scheme of separation will fail to meet the case unless provision is made for institutions and items, the absence of which was one of the main arguments advanced in favour of separation, considered that "their task is to assess the cost of separation" and did not "feel that the provision of such institutions falls properly under this head." Nor has the Expert Committee included in their estimates for the next 30 years the development expenditure at the rate at which the Bombay Government has been incurring it on Sind during the post-reform period except the few items to which the Bombay Government have already committed themselves (see pages 76-8 of their report)

Mr. Brayne has gone even further and his estimate of a subvention of 80 lakhs makes no provision whatever, even for the items of capital expenditure and expenditure charged to revenue, to which the Bombay Government has already committed themselves (vide Chapter V of the Sind Financial Enquiry Committee's Report), nor for the normal growth of expenditure and revenue under non-barrage heads or for the considerable expenditure which must be incurred upon communications, agricultural and other beneficent services if Sind is to reap the full advantages of her resources in the new era of development upon which she has entered (vide para. 35 of Mr. Brayne's report). And his estimate of the period for which this subvention will be necessary not only knocks out 345.2 lakhs out of the accumulated interest on the Barrage debt by debiting it to Bombay—a suggestion now ruled out as unfair by the British Government, but takes full credit for the entire anticipated proceeds of the land sales and receipts from land assessment from the Barrage Zone without providing a pie for the inevitable growth of expenditure due to the developments in the Barrage Area. A fuller discussion of his untenable position will be found on pages 14-15 of "A Criticism of Mr. Brayne's Report" issued by the Executive Committee of the Sind Anti-Separation Conference, to which the attention of the Parliamentary Committee is specially invited; but enough has been said above to make it plain that under the budgetary conditions proposed by Mr. Brayne, in spite of a sharp increase in taxation of 20 to 33 per cent. which will make Sind's taxation per capita the heaviest among the Indian provinces even after a subvention of 80 lakhs, Sind will become what Earl Russell feared "a backward province in the middle of India" (vide p. 50, Proceedings of the Sind Sub-committee) and what the majority of the Sind Sub-committee of the R.T.C. "did not want to create in India—a semi-bankrupt province that will be a source of weakness to the whole community" (vide Mr. Isaac Foot, p. 62 of the Proceedings).

6. Both the Expert Committee and Mr. Brayne rest their hopes for the future on the anticipated surplus from the Sukkur Barrage. Both admit that Sind cannot stand security for the Barrage debt and that the question is whether the Barrage can stand security for Sind. The members of the Expert Committee, however, take particular care to begin their observations with the warning that "it is never an easy matter to forecast with confidence the financial prospects of a new irrigation scheme, and to do so during the period of a serious economic crisis, the duration and ultimate effect of which are at present and will for some time remain unknown, is clearly an impossibility." And yet it is on the basis of this "clear impossibility" that absolute reliance is being placed by Mr. Brayne and the authors of the White Paper for the financial solvency of a separate province of Sind in the near future. Some idea of the complicated factors involved may be had from even a cursory perusal of pages 12-8 of the written evidence submitted by me before the Sind Financial Enquiry Committee, a copy of which is sent herewith, and pages 107-9 and 127-8 of the Proceedings of the Sind Conference. The wide difference between different estimates based on different sets of assumptions makes all the difference between substantial surpluses and heavy, almost crushing, deficits, as can be easily seen by a reference to para. 33 of the Sind Financial Enquiry Committee's report, para. 34 of Mr. Brayne's Report, and para. 4 of "Criticism of Mr. Brayne's Report of the Sind Conference," issued by the Executive Committee of the Sind Anti-Separation Conference. The major facts involved in these divergent estimates are the Land-values, intensity of cultivation,

17th July, 1938]

the rates of land-revenue assessment and the prices of agricultural produce, each of which is subject to so many varying economic influences, local and world wide, that few qualified economists would venture a definite prophecy regarding what would happen in the next 30 years. As it is, neither the Expert Committee nor Mr. Brayne had any claims to be considered as expert economists. To give only one illustration of their profound knowledge of economics, the Sind Financial Enquiry Committee state with approval in para. 62 of their report that "it is the firm conviction of both the irrigation and revenue authorities in Sind that both the area which can be disposed of and the prices which will be obtained for it can safely be considered as being independent of the value of the agricultural produce." When the absurdity of this proposition was pointed out during the proceedings of the Sind Conference, the Expert Revenue Officer of the Barrage changed front and said "that the Committee had misunderstood the irrigation and revenue authorities in Sind. They had enunciated no such proposition." The plain truth of the matter is that both the Expert Committee and Mr. Brayne have accepted as correct the estimates put by the Barrage Officials, who consider it a point of honour to stick to their old estimates in one form or the other, though through causes beyond their control the bases on which the original estimates were framed have been proved to be wrong by the actual course of events. Compared to the original project estimates, the capital outlay has increased, the rate of interest has gone up, the working expenses have risen, the land-values and prices of agricultural produce have tumbled down, but all this makes practically no difference to the productive character of the Barrage and the anticipated surplus therefrom, a minus figure in one place being easily offset on paper by a plus entry elsewhere.

Nor is this all, the experts themselves differ according to the degree of optimism they can command, Mr. Brayne being invariably more optimistic than the Expert Committee, his task being to balance the Sind Budget somehow. The Expert Committee thought that "both sales of land and payments will have to be spread over a considerably greater number of years," and that "so long as prices generally remain low, the amount of money available for land purchase must inevitably be limited" (para. 62). Mr. Brayne is troubled by no such thought; he bases his estimate on the express assumption of "recoveries from land sales at prices more or less according to the programme anticipated" (para. 34 of his Report). The Expert Committee regarded it "a very rash assumption in existing circumstances" to realise "the full rates of assessment" (page 29), based upon the prices of 1919-29, but Mr. Brayne considered it quite safe to assume for the purpose of his estimate a drastic revision of assessment after only five years" according to the higher rates proposed in the settlement reports on the basis of pre-slump prices during the decade 1919-29. Under the rates based upon the prices of May, 1931, called the slump prices, the Expert Committee thought that "the financial prospects of the Barrage would be precarious in the extreme, and on the criterion utilised in the case of irrigation schemes, it would have to be classed as unproductive (para. 80). Mr. Brayne thinks otherwise. On the basis of a series of assumption including the rates based during the first five years upon the agricultural prices of January, 1932 (when there was a temporary rise of prices owing to the sterling and the rupee having gone off the gold standard since September, 1931) and thereafter upon the prices of the decade of 1919-29, the Barrage is shown to be a productive asset. Had the basis been the prices of April and May, 1932, when Mr. Brayne was holding the Sind Conference, instead of the prices of January, 1932, Mr. Brayne's substantial surplus would have turned out to be a huge deficit. Such is the arbitrary and precarious basis on which Mr. Brayne's optimistic estimates are based.

Whatever may be the value of these varying estimates, it is common sense to suggest that if reliance is to be placed upon the Barrage as the security for a separate province of Sind, we must allow some reasonable period of time for uncertain factors of this magnitude to disappear so that there may be a firma terra to base one's estimates upon. To ignore the stern realities of the existing agricultural depression particularly in cereal producing areas and to stake the welfare of the people of Sind on a gamble on the future course of land value and prices of agricultural produce grown in Sind would be the height of un wisdom and nothing short of a leap in the dark. And the responsibility of this serious plunge into the deep dark, it must be repeated, rests on the British Government and the British Government alone, for they are effecting this separation of Sind, not only against the considered judgment of the Bombay Government and the Bombay Legislative Committee and in the teeth of opposition of a million of loyal Sind Hindus who constitute an overwhelming majority of the literate and educated community in Sind but also in direct contravention of the provisions of the existing Government of India Act and the express conditions laid down by the Sind Sub-Committee of the Indian Round Table Conference.

7. The Political consequences of constituting Sind into a separate Governor's province are no less serious. The economic and social facts, given in some detail on pages 59-63 of the pamphlet on "The True Facts regarding the separation of Sind from the Bombay Presidency" will show how serious are the obstacles in the way of establishing in Sind a really democratic responsible provincial Government. The bulk of the rural population consists of either tenants—at will without any security of tenure or a written deed or landless labourers on the land. Out of a total population of 38 lakhs, only 83 thousand holders own 91.1 per cent. of the land and only 2,251 holders own as much as 32.4 per cent. of the total area held. The curse of the province is the big zemindar, owning much land and sometime even enjoying honours from Government, often the patron of the Pathardars who are the owners of the Patharis—"the clearing houses of stolen property" and "the ganglion of the nervous system which gives to cattle theft in Sind its special character of organised crime" (vide the Report of cattle lifting Committee in Sind), ever ready to give evidence against other zamindar's Bad-mashes (bad characters) while shielding his own, most unwilling to pay a fair price of land or the cost of water supplied to him at the expense of the taxpayer or taxes on property, and ever anxious to influence by all the means at his command the course of justice in order to free from the just clutches of law his criminal relatives and tenants. His normal attitude towards women is reactionary in the extreme, kidnapping and abduction of women being a matter of everyday occurrence and in case the victim is a Hindu a matter of glory for his faith in which every Muslim must help the Muslim aggressor rather than the Hindu victim. Wife-killing, the one crime which Sir Charles Napier could not suppress, is almost as common among the Baluchis to-day as it was 80 years ago. The rural population in Sind lives in a semi-feudal regime under the thumb of the big zemindar and the fanatical Pir, in mortal dread of their oppression, mitigated occasionally either by the intervention of the Police, the civil Court and the strong English civilian touring in the district, or the fear of a rival Zemindar or a Pir in the neighbourhood. The recent case of Pir Pagaro in which a human being was confined for years in a cage reminds one of an incident recorded by Sir Charles Napier 90 years ago. The incidence of crime per 1,000 of population is much higher in Sind than in any other province of India (excluding Burma) while the percentage of literates among the Sind Muslims is the lowest in India. The Larkana riots, the Jacobabad murders, the organised gang dacoities in the Sukkur District show that the Sindhi Muslims continue to be almost as intolerant as they were in the forties of the last century, when James Burnes described them to be "the most bigoted, self sufficient and ignorant people upon earth," adding that "there is no country in Asia or rather on earth, so perfectly priest ridden." What is still more serious, they refuse to be influenced by other communities, even in political matters; for though in a majority of 73 per cent. in Sind, they are still wedded to separate electorates and demand an irremovable statutory communal majority in the legislature and the local bodies. In these conditions, it is impossible to achieve any political progress in a separate province of Sind, and the only way to give Sind the benefit of the coming reforms is by association with the more democratic and progressive forces in the Bombay Presidency.

8. For these reasons, the Sind Hindus feel strongly that not only no case has been made out for severing the 90 years old connection of Sind with Bombay, but that exceptionally strong reasons exist for turning down the proposal to constitute Sind into a separate Governor's province in the interests of the welfare of the people of Sind in general and of the Sind Hindus in particular. If, however, owing to the political prejudice against the Hindu community in general and the hidden forces working in favour of an Anglo-Muslim alliance at any price, these arguments and protests prove of no avail, they would as an alternative urge that the proposal may be deferred for a decade till the future of the Sukkur Barrage is assured and the province recovers from the acute agricultural depression from which it is suffering heavily at present.

Should neither of these alternatives be acceptable, they would earnestly ask the British public to recall to mind the circumstances under which they were invited by the Hindus of Sind to free them from the intolerable misrule of the Talpurs in the forties of the last century, the professions made in this regard by the first British administrators, the continuous and loyal co-operation they have had from the Hindus in Sind in evolving order out of chaos, and the substantial contribution which they have made to the economic, social and educational advancement of Sind on the assurance of British protection of life and property and encouragement of freedom of enterprise in Sind. According to the information given to Captain Hamilton at the beginning of the 18th century, "the proportion of Hindus to the Musulmans was then ten to one"; Mr. Crow wrote in his memoirs (1800), "in number with the Musulmans they (Hindus) are two to three"; while in 1840 James Burnes stated that "the Hindus are not now more than one-fifth of the community." The change is accounted for by the terrible persecution of the Hindus by the Kalohras and the Talpurs, on account of which, according to the narrative of James Burnes, he found "that amongst the many who secretly pray for such a consummation, none seemed to have a more devout wish to see the British colours flying in the bastions of Hyderabad, than the Hindus of respectability, who uninvited entered on the subject of their grievances and discoursed largely of the cruelties and indignities to which they were subjected." Lest this dark history, which explains the transformation of "a land as rich as covetousness would wish it," according to Portuguese travellers of the 16th century, into a land of "shikargahs," at the time of Burnes' visit, repeats itself and the British charged by posterity with breach of trust, adequate safeguards are necessary (a) to protect life and property and maintain economic security; (b) to maintain the existing standards of administration at least in the departments of Police, Justice and Education; (c) to prevent the establishment of an oligarchy of ignorant, bigoted and medieval big zamindars of Sind, and (d) to secure the protection of the minorities in Sind, particularly the most substantial minority of the Hindus.

To secure the first, the Sind Hindus press that Law and Order and Justice (especially the highest court in Sind) should be made reserved subjects in Sind and the control of the town police be made over to the municipalities. If, for any reason, this is deemed inexpedient, a convention may be established that these departments shall be in the hands of a non-Muslim for the first 20 years. Further, a statutory provision be made that in all cases of communal riots, a punitive tax shall, if demanded by half the number of Hindu or Muslim members in the Sind Legislative Council, be imposed on the Muslims to provide adequate compensation to the families of Hindu sufferers and on the Hindus to compensate adequately Muslim families who suffer losses thereby.

As regards the second, our demand is that the subvention given to Sind on the date of separation should be adequate to cover the initial deficit, whatever it might be, and to maintain the existing standard of administration at least in the Departments of Police, Justice and Education till such time as the net surplus from the Barrage, over and above the expenditure directly or indirectly due to it, is not adequate enough to cover Sind's deficit. Should, for any reason, additional direct taxation be imposed to cover any part of the deficit during the next 10 years, the Hindus community, which has all along opposed the constitution of Sind as a separate province, should in fairness be exempted from such direct taxation.

In order to secure the third object, the composition of the Sind Council proposed in the White Paper be altered in such a way as to impose a reasonable limit on the representation of the big Zamindars in Sind. This can be done by increasing the number of seats specially reserved for them from two to six and declaring them ineligible for contesting other seats. At the same time, the representation accorded to European and Indian Trading and Commercial interests should be at least doubled in view of their importance in the economic life of Sind, and one seat be given to graduates of the University as is the case in all other provinces.

For the protection of minority interests, our first demand is that for the first four terms of office, the Governor of the Province to whose hands the White Paper entrust the duty of "safeguarding the legitimate interests of minorities," shall be a non-Muslim, particularly in view of the grave fears and suspicions roused by the statements made by accredited Muslim leaders that the Hindus of Sind are required as hostages for the good conduct of Hindu majority towards Muslim minorities outside Sind. Secondly, we demand joint electorates for elections to the local legislature, to local bodies and to any representative body that might be constituted by Statute. In justification of this demand, it may be pointed out that separate electorates were originally established on the demand of the Muslim minority as a device for safeguarding their position as a minority and that there is no reason why they should be tolerated in a province, where the Muslims form 73 per cent. of the population and will form an overwhelming majority of the electors under the extended franchise and where the minority community itself demands joint electorates as its best protection. The Sind Hindus attach great value to joint electorates, mainly for two reasons. They soften the aggressive communal consciousness of the majority community and give the minority an opportunity to educate the Muslim public on political issues at the time of elections and to organise political parties on a common programme or policy; occasionally, they will make it possible for the minority to punish a fanatically communal member by throwing their weight in a contested election on the side of a more moderate member, and a lesson learnt by one intolerant member is bound to have an educative effect on others. The Sind Hindus feel that separate electorates, far from protecting them, will make for their oppression at the hands of an irresponsible majority returned on a communal ticket, and consider it very unfair and unreasonable that the Muslims and the Government should thrust upon them a supposed safeguard for the minorities, which they are convinced is not only a dangerous poison in the body politic aggravating communal consciousness and preventing the growth of a moderate party from the ranks of both Hindus and Muslims, but also an open door for their oppression by fanatics among the majority community.

17^o Juhī, 1933.]

Regarding representation on the local legislature the composition of the proposed Sind Council indicated on page

79 of the White Paper does not appear to them to be a fair distribution of seats among different interests, considering their economic, social and educational position in Sind. In the first place it is unfair to classify the seats in Sind into (a) General, and (b) Muslim; the classification should be rather (a) General, and (b) Hindu, since the Hindus are the most important minority in Sind just as the Muslims are in other Provinces. As it is, the Parsis, the Indian Christians, the Anglo-Indians and Sikhs are expected to share with the Hindus the General seats, leaving to the Hindus much less than their importance and position in Sind entitles them to. Considering the fact that the Hindus pay nearly 40 per cent. of the Land revenue partly as owners and partly as lessees and Mortgagees in possession, the bulk of the Excise Revenue, Stamps, Registration, Income Tax in Sind, that the number of literates among them is three times the number among the Muslims and that of English knowing adults eight times as large, that on the basis of the existing franchise for the Bombay Legislative Council the Non-Muslims have 67,087 qualified voters, as against 60,838 Muslim voters, and above all the weightage enjoyed by the Muslim minorities in other Provinces, the Hindus of Sind have reason to be greatly dissatisfied with the representation proposed for them. The total number of general seats open to all minorities (except the Europeans) is only 19, of which one will certainly be captured by a Non-Hindu, either a Parsi, a Sikh or an Indian Christian so that Hindus will have only 18 out of a total of 55 seats (excluding special constituencies). The Sind Hindus feel strongly that even if no allowance is made for the fact that they are being taken away against their wishes from a big Province in which as a part of the Hindu majority they would have shared the political power of the majority community and being reduced to the position of a minority in a small Province, they are in justice entitled to at least 40 per cent. representation in the Legislature. Quite apart from the special facts referred to above in favour of this claim, the weightage in representation asked for is not in excess of what the Muslims have secured in other Provinces. Excluding special constituencies, 14.3 per cent. of the seats in the Madras Council have been reserved for Muslims who form only 7 per cent. of the population; in Bombay 8.2 per cent. Muslims have been given

19 per cent. representation in the Legislature, in the United Provinces Muslims who constitute only 14.2 per cent. of the population have secured 30.7 per cent. of the seats in the Legislative Council. Similarly Muslims who are only 11.2 per cent. of the population in Bihar and 4.4 per cent. in C.P. have been accorded 28.5 per cent. and 13.4 per cent. of the seats in the provincial legislation, while in Sind, the Hindus who form 26.8 per cent. of the population and an intelligent and progressive section with considerable stakes in the Province, have been given only 32.7 per cent. representation. Thus in the light of the weightage enjoyed by the Muslim minority in other Provinces, the Hindus' claim for 40 per cent. seats will appear an exceptionally strong one. It may here be added that in this case there is no Lucknow Pact to be adhered to and that even the Sind Pact and the Allahabad Unity Conference agreements conceded 37 per cent. to the Hindus in Sind.

The seats assigned to the special constituencies in Sind also call for comment. Of the two seats reserved for Landholders, one should be reserved for the Hindu Zamindars who as Owners and Lessees and Mortgagees of land pay nearly 40 per cent. Land Revenue. The number of seats reserved for Commerce and Trade, European and Indian, is unfairly low compared to other Provinces. Karachi is a port of considerable commercial importance and commerce and trade of Sind are the very life-blood of the Province, and yet only one seat has been given to European Chambers of Commerce and one to two Indian Chambers, while in Assam the European commercial interests have secured eight and Indian three. These important interests, in a maritime Province like Sind, with a port like Karachi and its enterprising merchants now found all over the business world, should have at least four seats for Europeans and four for Indian commerce and trade.

For the rest, the Hindus of Sind demand for the individual members of their community nothing more than equality with the members of the majority community before the law and the public administration of the Province, and safeguards against invidious discrimination against them or vexatious restrictions on their enterprise and economic activity. With this end in view, they would press for equality of franchise qualifications for both Hindus and Muslims in rural as well as in urban constituencies, an open door through competitive examinations to the public services without any reservation of posts in favour of the majority community and express provisions in the constitution in some such terms as the following.—

(1) There shall be no discriminatory legislation or taxation and none shall be prejudiced merely by reason of his caste, creed or tribe in acquiring or enjoying civic and economic rights, including the right of owning, purchasing or disposing of landed estates in the open market and the freedom of choice of any profession or calling.

(a) Any legislative measure or administrative policy undertaken by the Ministry to which objection is taken in the Council by more than three-fourths of the members belonging to all the minority communities on the ground that the policy or measure is discriminatory or that it injuriously affects particular interests of any of the minority communities shall, if the Ministry accepts the objection as valid, be withdrawn. If the Ministry does not admit that the measure or policy is of such a character, a reference shall be made by the Ministry to a special tribunal appointed for the purpose by the Central Government consisting of three Indian judges, no two of whom shall belong to the same community and one shall belong to the aggrieved community, and their opinion, which shall be given within a month of the reference, shall decide the question and be binding on the Provincial Government.

MEMORANDUM 40. THE CASE AGAINST SEPARATION OF SINDH FROM THE BOMBAY PRESIDENCY.

SINISTER MOTIVE.

The separation of Sindh has been demanded not on its own intrinsic merits but in pursuance of a policy of having more Muslim provinces to preserve the 'balance of power.' The statement has been openly made by accredited Muslim leaders that the Hindus of Sindh are required as hostages for the good conduct of Hindu majorities towards Muslim minorities outside Sindh. This brutally frank statement of the real motive of

17^o Julii, 1933.]

the Muslim separatist's demand has rightly caused grave fears and suspicions among the Sindh Hindu population, which have been greatly enhanced by the persistent rumours of the contemplated appointment of a Muslim as the first Governor of Sindh, to whose tender mercies the White Paper assigns the task of minority protection in Sindh

PROSPEROUS UNDER BOMBAY.

Separation is urged ostensibly on the ground that Sindh had suffered greatly on account of the connection with Bombay, but this has been proved to be wrong both by the Indian Central Committee attached to the Simon Commission and the Simon Commission.

It is flying in the face of truth to say that Sindh had suffered under Bombay. To appreciate how far this is a travesty of truth, it is necessary for the British public to recall to mind the past history of Sindh and the remarkable transformation it has undergone, during the last eighty years of its administrative connection with Bombay, from the "Unhappy valley" of Burton's days, full of "shikargahs" and wild beasts, to the land of the Barrage canals and the flying aeroplanes. Its population has increased by over 300 per cent.; its cultivation has extended even more; its canal irrigation has transformed barren lands into smiling fields; its system of education and local self-government has been brought into line with that of advanced Bombay; its residents enjoy in association with the more advanced people of Gujrat, Bombay and Maharashtra the largest measure of self-government that any province has in India; its port of Karachi has risen from a fishing hamlet to a position of approaching equality with Madras, Bombay and Calcutta; financially, it has all along received considerable help from the Bombay Presidency; economically, one of the gigantic schemes of irrigation ever undertaken in the history of India has been initiated by the efforts of the Bombay Government and the guarantee of its taxpayers; commercially, most of its leading commercial communities, Europeans, Hindus, Parsis, and Khojas have close business and social connections with Bombay; and so strong has grown to be the tie between Sindhis and the people of the other divisions of the Bombay Presidency that to-day the majority of the residents of Karachi, the seat of the Commissioner in Sindh, speak languages, other than Sindh. And just at the time when the people of Sindh were looking forward to a more rapid economic progress owing to the Sukkur Barrage, and the heavy programme for construction of roads, feeder railways, and a new Barrage at Kotri, to which the Bombay Government had committed itself, an apple of discord has been thrown among the people of Sindh by outside politicians, who have dragged Sindh as a pawn on the chess-board of all-India communal politics, and demanded for the so-called "balance of power" between Hindus and Muslims in India, the separation of Sindh from the Bombay Presidency and its constitution as a separate Province.

Eighty years is not a small period in the history of any province or even a nation; and there should be exceptionally strong reasons for severing the administrative connection that has continued so long and worked so much to the benefit of Sindh. No such cause has yet been shown to satisfy any reasonably-minded person.

AN EX-PARTE DECISION.

So far as the Hindus of Sindh are concerned, they have not been consulted by the Government at any time before they accepted the principle of separation at the Round Table Conference. Not a single Sindh Hindu was a member of the R.T.C. to place the Hindu case before that body; its decision was thus purely ex-parte; and Sindh Hindus feel that this decision was taken hastily and on false representations made by the Sindhi Muslim members of the Sindh Sub-Committee of the Round Table Conference.

PROTECTION OF SINDH HINDUS—A BRITISH PLEDGE.

Sindh was conquered by the British, at the direct invitation of Sindh Hindus, to free it from the intolerable misrule of the Talpur Mirs. It is now being made over to a still greater misrule—that of an ignorant, fanatical and criminally inclined oligarchy of Sindh Zamindars without any adequate protection to the enlightened minority of the Sindh Hindus, whose unstinted co-operation with the British for the last 80 years has brought order and progress to the Unhappy Valley of Burton's days.

NO DEMAND FOR SEPARATION.

There has never been a demand for the separation of Sindh from any of the non-Muslim communities in Sindh. The wild statements made on this point have been proved to be either wholly devoid of truth or at least a gross misrepresentation of real facts. At no time were the European commercial community of Sindh in favour of an independent province, although at one time they thought that amalgamation with Punjab would be beneficial. But after the recent economic and agricultural developments in connection with the Barrage, they have expressed the opinion that Bombay has played a wonderful part in helping Sindh and have not asked for separation through their two accredited bodies—the Karachi Chamber of Commerce and the Sindh European Association.

17th July, 1933.]

The Hindus of Sindh constituting more than 26 per cent. of the population are strongly opposed to separation.

The smaller minorities like Parsis and Indian Christians have at no time asked for it.

Up to 1927, even the Muslim leaders like Rais Ghulam Mohammad Bhurgri, Haji Abdulla Haroon, and Ghulam Ali Chagla, joined the Hindus in demanding a more complete amalgamation with Bombay by the repeal of the Sindh Commissioner's Act.

OBJECTIONS UPHOLD.

The Bombay Legislative Committee attached to the Simon Commission, of which Sir Shah Nawas Khan Bhutto (the Sindhi leader of the Muslim group in the Bombay Council) was chairman, came to the conclusion "that administrative difficulties which have been pointed out by the Bombay Government are real and cannot be ignored" and that "for financial reasons alone the proposal is impracticable"; and that Sindh "must, in order to secure this advantage (full provincial autonomy) continue as part of the Bombay Presidency."

The Simon Commission definitely stated that "there are grave administrative objections to isolating Sindh and depriving it of the powerful backing of Bombay before the future of the Sukkur Barrage is assured," stressed the financial objections against, laid down a number of conditions which must be fulfilled by all proposals for constituting new provinces, and recommended a general Boundary Commission to which the class of questions, "of which Sindh and Orissa are only particular illustrations" should be referred.

UNFAIR TACTICS.

At the R.T.C., Sir Shah Nawaz Bhutto, instead of presenting the case against separation as the Bombay Government had been led to believe on account of his signing the report (referred to above) of the Bombay Legislative Committee attached to the Simon Commission, turned a somersault and strongly advocated separation of Sindh.

Sir Ghulam Hussain Hidayatullah, another Sindhi gentleman and a member of the Bombay Governor's Executive Council, who was sent by his Government as member of the R.T.C., refused to call himself the representative of the Bombay Government. He claimed individual independence for himself to demand separation, though his own Government was opposed to it, and was chiefly instrumental in committing the Russel Sub-Committee to the principle of separation.

Gross mis-statements of facts and fallacious arguments alike went unchallenged. The Bombay Government was actually "dished"; it had no representative of its own and no Sindhi Hindu to present the case against separation.

Even so, the result of this ex parte hearing of the case by the Russel Sub-Committee and the R.T.C., was that only the principle of the separation of Sindh was accepted and a recommendation made, which in the explicit words of Lord Russel meant that "if Sindh cannot show that it can successfully stand on its own legs, the separation does not take place."

THE DEMAND FOR SUBVENTION—A BREACH OF FAITH.

At no stage of this controversy, did the Muslim separationists talk of a subvention. They repeatedly assured the Congress, the All-Parties Conferences at Delhi and Lucknow and the Russel Sub-Committee of the R.T.C., that Sindh was financially self-supporting; or if there was any slight deficit, it could and would be made up by Sindh. At the All-Parties Conference at Lucknow, a Sindh agreement was signed by Muslim leaders like Maulana Shaukat Ali, Sheikh Abdul Majid, Haji Abdulla Haroon, Mr. M. C. Chagla, Maulana Zafar Ali and others, and this was unanimously accepted by the whole Conference. This important agreement, which was intended to close the whole controversy, reads as follows:—

"Simultaneously with the establishment of Government in accordance with the Nehru Committee's report, Sindh shall be separated from Bombay and constituted into a separate Province.

17^o Julii, 1933.]

Provided—

(1) after an enquiry it is found—

(a) that Sindh is financially self-supporting.

(b) in the event of its being found that it is not financially self-supporting, on the Scheme of separation being laid before the people of Sindh with its financial and administrative aspects, the majority of the inhabitants favour the scheme and express their readiness to bear the financial responsibility of the new arrangement.

(2) that the form of Government in Sindh shall be the same as in the other provinces under the constitution;

(3) that the non-Muslim minority in Sindh shall be given the same privileges in the matter of representation in the Provincial and Central Legislatures as the Muslim minorities are given under the Nehru Committee's Report in areas where they are in a minority."

Even the Congress is bound in honour to respect this agreement. Not only the Congress leaders signed it at Lucknow, but they re-iterated the position taken up in this agreement in subsequent resolutions. At the R.T.C., Mahatma Gandhi presented the Congress scheme for a communal settlement, of which paragraph 7 runs as follows:—

"Sindh shall be constituted into a separate Province provided the people of Sindh are prepared to bear the financial burden of the separated province."

The position taken up by separationists before Government was no less clear and emphatic. The Muslim evidence before the Simon Commission asserted that Sindh was not a deficit province. The Muslim members of the Indian Central Committee of the Simon Commission agreed to making separation of Sindh conditional on its being self-supporting, for they were "of the opinion that if the people of Sindh are prepared to face the financial burden and other disadvantages which seem likely to result from the constitution of a separate province, their wishes in the matter should be complied with." Again, the assurance given by Sir Shah Nawaz Bhutto, His Highness Aga Khan, and Mr. Jinnah at the Russel Sub-Committee definitely ruled out a subvention to a separated Sindh.

If, at any time, there was any question of a subvention either from the Government of India or the Government of Bombay to set up Sindh as a separate province, there was no need to call the Brayne Conference in Karachi to ask the representatives of Sindh how they were going to meet the deficit—such a deficit having been disclosed by the expert investigation of the Miles Irving Committee.

The question of a likely subvention was never in the mind of the Sindh Separation (Russel) Sub-Committee of the R.T.C., and it was never in the mind of any member of the Round Table Conference for the simple reason that the Sindh Muslims had made it a grievance that Bombay had received more from Sindh than it spent on it and contended Sindh was always a self-supporting province.

Sir Shah Nawaz Bhutto said in the Russel Committee that "Sindh must stand on its own legs" and that "we do not want any financial help." Further, he plaintively asked "if we are not able to support ourselves how can we ask for separation"?

Both H.H. Aga Khan and Mr. Jinnah also said "it is up to the representatives of the proposed new province to show how the deficit should be met by taxing themselves" (page 82 of the proceedings).

The Chairman of the Sub-Committee, the late Earl Russel, observed in reply to Sir Phiroze Sethna: "I will tell you, in view of the last words of Mr. Jinnah, what the recommendation of the Sub-Committee is: it is if Sindh cannot show that it can stand successfully on its own legs, then separation does not take place."

The recommendation of the Sindh Sub-Committee, as interpreted by Lord Russel, was endorsed by the Round Table Conference; and in pursuance of it, the Prime Minister, on behalf of His Majesty's Government, appointed the Miles Irving Sindh Financial Enquiry Committee. This expert committee showed that on the day of separation Sindh would have to face an initial deficit of 110.42 lakhs a year, which would grow to 144.19 lakhs in 1962-63 unless the Lloyd Barrage came to the rescue (para. 84 of the report). They further pointed out that even if the full rates of assessment proposed for the Barrage area were realized, "a very rash assumption in the existing circumstances, Sindh will always be a deficit province on our basis of calculation, although the deficit will fall to below half a crore of rupees after 14 years and below a quarter of a crore after 18 years. If only the slump rates are imposed, the deficit will never be less than a crore of rupees. At the average of the two rates, the deficit will not fall below a crore of rupees until the fourteenth year after separation, the ultimate deficit on the full development of the Lloyd Barrage being 63.71 lakhs " (para. 83 of the Miles-Irving report).

An enormous deficit of over a crore of rupees having been disclosed by the expert committee, Government took the next step of ascertaining from the representatives of Sindh as to how they were going to finance themselves satisfactorily in the event of separation, as announced by the Prime Minister. And Mr. Brayne was asked to preside over this Sindh Conference.

After a three weeks' conference at Karachi, Mr. Brayne disclosed a deficit of 80 lakhs, which is considered to err grossly on the side of over-optimism; and the representatives of Sindh, having failed to find the means to overcome the deficit, this chapter must close and the status quo must be maintained.

THE UNREASONABLE DEMAND ACCEPTED.

Having failed to make out a case for separation on its merits, having failed to prove that Sindh was a surplus province, having failed to show that by retrenchment or by additional taxation, Sindh could stand on its own legs, the Muslim separationists have shifted their ground now, and rest their hopes on a subvention from the Central Government. Thus they repudiate all the emphatic assurances given in the Sindh Sub-committee as to Sindh's ability immediately to pay its way—assurances on the strength of which alone even the principle of separation had been accepted by the R.T.C.

"If Bombay has been paying the deficits of Sindh, let the stronger partner, the Government of India, relieve Bombay of this burden and pay the deficit itself, which Bombay will greatly appreciate, and Sindh, too, will enjoy the pleasure and glory of separation"; that is the last argument now advanced by the separationists.

It is not correct to say that Sindh is receiving a subvention from Bombay. Sindh at present is a part of the Bombay presidency; the whole of the presidency, including Sindh, is one administrative and legislative unit, the people of both parts control expenditure and determine policy; but a subvention from Simla is a different matter altogether, as there will be no union of interest and unification of control of policy and expenditure in that case. It is this unwarranted demand for separation of Sindh and for a subvention of 80 lakhs from the Federal Government at the cost of Hindu majorities in other Provinces, which the White Paper has endorsed for no ostensible reason except to placate the Muslims under the pretence that it was supported by the R.T.C.

ILLUSORY HOPES FROM THE SUKKUR BARRAGE AND PROSPECTS OF INCREASED TAXATION.

The Miles Irving Committee has laid it down that it is not a question of the Sukkur Barrage standing security for Sindh, but whether Sindh with hardly 150 lakhs of revenue can stand security for the Barrage—Sindh which is already a deficit province without any of the Barrage commitments yet thrown on its shoulders. Mr. Brayne was, however, of the opinion that the Barrage will be able to stand security for Sindh seven or eight years after separation. This is too impossible a forecast on account of the acute depression, the slump in prices and fall in the demand for the Barrage land and its value. His estimates are not only opposed to the definite finding of the expert Sindh financial enquiry committee, but are also based on a number of unjustifiable assumptions including the realisation of full rates of assessment and the assumed prices of land sales in the Barrage zone after five years. At present the fall in the prices of primary products and land is over 50 per cent.; and the chances of these assumed rates being realised are almost nil. On the question of these rates, we wish to invite public attention to the speeches made in the Bombay Legislative Council by Muslim Members so recently as 20th February, 1932, and 11th March, 1932, and to the resolutions passed at a meeting of Larkana Muslim and Hindu Zamindars, Jagirdars and Agriculturists under the chairmanship of Sir Shah Nawaz Bhutto in May, 1931. On the general ability of the people of Sindh to bear more taxes, Sir Shah Nawaz Bhutto expressed himself at the R.T.C. as follows: "The people have no money and they are already starving and cannot pay more taxes." The Barrage is too gigantic a project to be run by the untried hands of the new

Sindh provincial ministers. And any one knowing anything of the conditions in Sindh should say that the anticipated Barrage revenue would be hardly sufficient for the inevitable growth of expenditure in the Barrage zone.

Even with a subvention of 80 lakhs, Sindh cannot stand on its legs. The consequential attempts to add to the height of taxation in this period of acute depression will only create serious discontent among all classes of people of Sindh, on whose shoulders the main burden of any proposed taxation must ultimately fall.

NO MONEY FOR DEVELOPMENT AND THE PROSPECTS OF A C₃ PROVINCE.

With the Barrage revenue mortgaged for a generation, there will be no money for nation-building services. Being a purely agricultural province, Sindh has no expanding sources of provincial revenue. Education, sanitation, medical relief, transportation and every branch of nation-building activity will receive a serious set back; and, as the late Earl Russel said, "Sindh would be a black spot on the map of India amidst progressive sister provinces," if they separated this deficit province from Bombay.

The Hindus of Sindh, who are associated with a first class and progressive province, take the strongest objection to have to be satisfied with the amenities provided by a C₃ province, which Sindh will be after separation.

As the Muslim evidence and arguments before the Sindh Financial Enquiry Committee and the Brayne Conference show, even the increasing expenditure to which the Bombay Government has committed itself in respect of primary education and prohibition, and the programme entailed by the Barrage are to be washed out. No additional headquarters establishment is to be provided for Land Records, Excise, Stamps, Forests, Registration, Police, Education, Public Health, Co-operation, Industries, for our chhota sahibs are quite fit to be transformed into barra sahibs at the magic words "separate Sindh from Bombay." The Chief Court Act will be repealed; no judicial district is needed for Nawabshah; no Inspector of Schools as distinct from the Director of Punjab Public Instruction is required for inspection of Indian or European Schools; there should be no Borstal School or Police Training School; the proposed new Districts at Dabu and Guni are not wanted; the Civil Surgeons of Karachi and Hyderabad are lightly worked and should be shifted for half the time to the district jails as Superintendents; we need no university, no Government Arts or Science College, no professional college in Agriculture, Medicine or Art, in Electrical and Mechanical Engineering or Technology, nor are special arrangements with Bombay necessary for these branches of higher education; and there will be no town-planning schemes or a sanitary division, no revenue commissioners, Dastadars, Supervising Tapedars or Huzur Deputy Collectors. The Legislative Council will be housed in the rooms of second floor of the J. C's Court. Or if this is found inconvenient, the J. C's Court must be shifted bag and baggage to their old premises which they have quitted out of sheer perverseness. There will be no further expenditure on revenue and police; the programme of agricultural Research and development must be cut down; and that of roads and education ignored for the time being. So the new heaven of "better education, better roads, better amenities" which the separationists have been promising us, has boiled down to this catalogue of noes."

A SUMMARY.

Let us summarise —

(1) Sindh is being used as a pawn in the game of high Muslim politics. The statement was openly made by Muslim leaders that the Hindus of Sindh would be held as hostages for the good conduct of six Hindu majority provinces towards Muslim minorities. This has rightly caused fears and suspicions among the Sindh Hindu population.

(2) The Hindus of Sindh, who form the most influential and educated minority, have not had a fair deal; they have never been consulted and they were treated in this matter as of no consequence at all. Hitherto, they have supplied the bulk of administrative staff and professional talent. They have been pioneers in the field of education, social reform and local self-Government; they sowed the seeds of public life in Sindh; they stimulated internal trade and built up the indigenous banking system; they have connected Sindh with the trading centres of India and the world, and they supply the most enterprising element among the zamindari class. But their very existence depends upon political and economic security and freedom from invidious and crushing taxation; and anything that is likely to affect this essential basis of modern civilisation is a matter of life and death to them.

17^o Juln, 1933.]

(3) The conditions on which separation had been sought by Muslim leaders have not been fulfilled. There was no question of a subvention from Simla at any time.

(4) Sindh was conquered and annexed by the British because of the misrule of the Mirs and yet it is being made over to the control of a Council dominated by an ignorant, fanatical and medieval oligarchy of Sindh Zamindars without any adequate protection of Sindh Hindus against oppression and misrule.

(5) Association with a first class presidency like Bombay means full provincial autonomy for Sindh and the credit and security which a bigger unit assures for all its component parts.

(6) Taxation will be widely distributed and no invidious distinctions will be made if Sind continues to be a part of the Bombay Presidency.

(7) The future of the Barrage will be assured under the management of the experienced and decently paid Bombay experts belonging to the permanent services.

(8) On account of continuity of policy, a decent standard of administrative and material and moral progress will be maintained.

(9) By continued association with the more advanced people of Guzerat, Maharashtra and Karnatak and Bombay city and the large European official and unofficial elements, Sindhis will learn the art of Parliamentary Government quicker; they will know how to give and take and to compromise, to lead and to command which are the essentials of of successful Self-Government. Communalism will gradually occupy a back-seat and will disappear altogether, which is the greatest need of Sindh to-day.

(10) A separate Sind will be a C3 Province.

(11) Separation at present is a leap in the dark. It will create immense communal, political, social and economic complications which it is the duty of wise statesmanship to avoid.

I do not know whether there is anything you would wish to add at this stage by word of mouth?—(Mr. Chabiani.) If your Lordship will permit me, I might sum up the general drift of our representation, and add one or two observations that I would like to make.

A7. Certainly?—In the first place, we wish to invite the attention of the Parliamentary Committee to the fact that almost every Committee and Commission that has sat on this particular question has not recommended the constitution of Sind into a separate Province on the basis of the White Paper proposals that the weight of administrative experience of the Government of Bombay, under which we are at present, the opinion of persons who have spent their lifetime in service in Sind, including those who have been members of the Bombay Government, have been opposed to this proposal. In the second place, we wish the attention of the Parliamentary Committee to be invited to the broad fact that, excepting before the Simon Commission, the other side of the case has never been heard by the British public. At the Round Table Conference, in spite of repeated representations by the Sind Hindus, they were not given an opportunity of placing their point of view before the Round Table Conference, but statement after statement which have absolutely no foundation, or which are, more or less, perversions of the actual facts, went absolutely unchallenged before the last Round Table Conference; that even the conditional recommendation of the Round Table Conference in favour of the principle of the separation of Sind has been accepted on the basis of this ex-parte hearing of the case. Therefore, we wish that this Committee would do us the favour of ascertaining the facts upon which that principle of separation was agreed to at the Round Table Conference, and not merely go on the impression that the case was argued before the Round Table Conference and that the principle of separation had been accepted. Thirdly, we wish to invite attention to the fact that the formula adopted by the Round Table Conference on the recommendations of a Sub-Committee was given an authoritative interpretation by Lord Russell, as the Chairman of the

17^o July, 1933.]Mr. H. L. CHABLANI and RAI BAHADUR
HIRANAND KHEMSING.

sub-Committee, which is on the record of the Proceedings of the Conference; that the Members of the sub-Committee were led to commit themselves to the Resolution on the distinctly expressed interpretation put by its Chairman, that if Sind cannot show that it can stand satisfactorily on its own legs, separation does not take place; and that therefore the decision of His Majesty's Government as embodied in the White Paper is a radical departure from the Resolution which was adopted by the Sub-Committee of the Round Table Conference and endorsed by the full Round Table Conference. Then we wish also to draw attention to the fact that Sind has had for ninety years administrative and historic connection with the Bombay Presidency. Prima facie, an administrative connection which has continued for nearly a century should not be severed excepting on very exceptional grounds, and that no such exceptional ground has ever been advanced by any responsible body of people. Then, Sir, we have pointed out a number of administrative, economic, and political considerations against separation. Sind, although large in area, is a very small unit for the constitution of a Governor's Province, its population is less than that of many districts and divisions in other Provinces. Its area also is very thinly populated, only 14 houses to a square mile being its density, its financial resources are small and hence its credit in the open market for the purpose of borrowing on the credit of its revenues, is bound to be extremely small. It is an undeveloped area, which is looking forward to an era of very rapid economic development in coming years, in view of the new factor in the situation, viz., the Sukkur barrage. In order to make that Sukkur barrage itself a success, certain preliminary conditions are absolutely necessary; in the first place, economic and political security in the Interior; in the second place, a rapid development of its communications; in the third place, attention to the new problems that would arise, problems of sanitation owing to the new area being developed agriculturally, and problems of agricultural development. It is on the eve of a momentous change in the economic conditions of Sind that this proposal has been put forward. It is at a time of acute economic depression in trade, which leaves very little money available for the purpose of development. It is a time when economic conditions of cereal producing countries have been very, very adversely affected, and all the estimates of the barrage rest finally upon the prices of agricultural produce, upon the capacity to export cereals from Sind, nearly ten times the exports which are taking place to-day. It is a time when the World Conference has been considering limitations on the export of cereals and restrictions on the production of food grains that this vast export from Sind is expected. Each of these factors may upset all the estimates. Further, we invite attention to the peculiar political circumstances of the case: the man-power available to run a responsible Government in Sind is extraordinarily poor in quality, particularly within the majority community, whether we take the test of literacy or whether we take the incidence of crime, whether we take the number of educated people understanding English, or whether we take the number of people with a modern outlook. From all points of view, the political circumstances of the case are such that it is difficult to contemplate in the near future the establishment of any kind of democratic responsible government. The broad fact of the economic situation in Sind is that only 2,000 individuals hold 32 per cent. of the land; that 80,000 individuals hold 92 per cent. of the land; that the entire rest of the agricultural population are tenants at will and can be ejected without any notice whatever. The rural areas are completely under the domination of the big Zamindar, and this big Zamindar is not a descendant of the old agriculturist; this big Zamindar is a descendant of a military chieftain who took possession of the land in the disorders of the previous rule and were confirmed in their possession at the time of the British conquest. That is the real position of the situation. On the administrative side, with which the financial question is closely linked up, in the first place, it is a deficit area at the present moment. The Expert Committee stated that the initial deficit would be 110 lakhs, rising to 144 lakhs in 30 years' time. Mr. Brayne has eliminated several of the items which the Expert Committee took into account, and reduced the so-called deficit to 91 lakhs and not 80 lakhs, 11 lakhs being expected to be made up by additional taxation. But this estimate of the initial deficit is based on the average of the Revenue during two years, 1927 to 1929, but the actual figures of Revenue in the succeeding years shows a shortage of 20 to 24 lakhs over these basic figures which have been assumed. The Expert Committee itself issued a warning that these basic figures were not to be understood as indicating the deficit in the years 1933 or 1934, when they calculated the normal deficit of 110 lakhs rising to 144 lakhs. The Province, therefore, will have to add immediately to the existing taxation, even if it gets a subvention of 80 lakhs from the Central Government, taxation to the tune of 38 to 40 lakhs. Its total Revenue to-day is 1½ crores to 1¼ crores. In other words, it means the additional taxation of 20 to 30 per cent. immediately in this period of depression. Mr. Brayne's estimates wash out all the commitments of the Bombay Government for capital and Revenue expenditure in the next 30 years. For instance, arising out of the barrage, is the project of another barrage in Lower Sind to save Lower Sind from ruin. Some money has been provided in the Bombay Government's programme for roads and communications in the Barrage area, but Mr. Brayne's calculations, as distinguished from the Expert Committee's estimates, have eliminated all this expenditure which the Expert Committee took into account on a very, very conservative basis. The second point to remember is that neither the Expert Committee, nor Mr. Brayne, has included in their estimates any money for those independent institutions of research and higher education which every Province in India has, excepting N.W.F. Provinces and Assam, in some respects, e.g., a University, Government colleges of agriculture, electrical engineering, and medicine and technical institutions of all kind. The Province is expected to be dependent upon outside charity and generosity for the admission of its own students, a position which is very unsatisfactory, as revealed by the fate of the Delhi students. The students of Delhi, speaking from personal experience, find the door shut against them in other Provinces, with the exception of one or two individuals admitted to the medical college of Lahore. It does not provide anything for these items of expenditure. The Expert Committee suggested that public servants will have to be borrowed for many Departments from other Provinces, and they point out that this position, from the political point of view, will be unsatisfactory. The difficulties in the administration of the barrage have been pointed out by Sir Charleton Harrison before the Simon Commission. He stated that for the last 50 years the Sind administration has been struggling continually against the big Zamindar at the upper end trying to have water at the expense of the Zamindar at the lower tail of the canals, and summed up his view by saying that the whole difference between success and ruin of the barrage really depended upon the integrity, impartiality and efficiency in the distribution of water to the barrage lands. Then there are other difficulties such as Sir Charleton Harrison pointed out to the Simon Commission in answer to questions by Sir Hari Singh Gour. At present the Secretary of State and the Indian Government have prevented the Punjab from launching other schemes of irrigation till it is sufficiently known what the effect of the barrage is going to be on the supply of water but under Provincial Autonomy there would be grave difficulties. To-day, in a quarrel over the division of water between the Punjab and Sind, Sind is backed by the Bombay Government which has direct access to the Secretary of State and the prestige of one of the three older historic Presidencies. This, Sir, broadly speaking, is our case against separation. We have in the last paragraphs of our Memorandum considered other possibilities, in case, for any reason of high politics the British Government decides against us. We do not wish to be dragged at all in these high politics, we plead that the question of Sind must be decided upon the basis of the welfare of Sind and Sind alone; that any kind of external considerations of the balance of power between the different communities in India or the dreams of a Pan-Islamic federation with countries across the Frontier or a new consolidated Islamic unit in the Indian Federation should not come in the way of deciding the case of Sind on the basis of the Sind conditions and the Sind conditions alone. That, Sir, is our earnest prayer. We have had the bitter experience of being treated as purely pawns in this game of communal bargaining at the Indian Round Table Conference and at the sessions of the Congress. The second alternative we have hinted at, if, for any reason, the British Government sticks to its commitment to the principle of

17th July, 1933.]Mr. H. L. CHABLANI and RAI BAHADUR
HIRANAND KHEMSING.

HIRANAND KHEMSING.

Separation, is that it should not be given effect to till the economic situation improves or the future of the Barrage is known definitely. We are at present really in the dark as to what is going to happen to the Barrage area. If both these alternatives are rejected, we should have at least adequate securities for our protection. We ask for securities, broadly speaking, of four different kinds. In the first place, we want security of life and property. In the rural areas of Sind during the last ten years there have been occasional outbursts of communal rioting and communal dacoities and pretty frequent cases of kidnapping of women and children of the minority communities, which have naturally raised considerable alarm. We require that life and property should be adequately secured. In the second place, if democratic Government is to mean anything, some limit ought to be placed upon the power of the big Zamindar to capture the bulk of the seats on the Sind Council. As I said before 2,000 individuals hold 32 per cent. of the land in Sind and 80,000 hold 92 per cent. and the tenants are tenants at will, completely at the mercy of the Zamindar. Thirdly, we ask for securities for the legitimate rights of the minorities; we ask for no special privileges; all that we ask for is that no member of our community should be discriminated against, on the ground that he is born a Hindu. Whether it is a question of buying and selling land in the open market, or a question of admission to the Services or to educational institutions, we want an open door. In the matter of taxation we want no discrimination against us. We have had a bitter experience of the professional taxes proposed by the local Boards in rural Sind which had to be turned down by the Bombay Government on account of this objectionable feature. Tax schedules were so manipulated as to hit only the minority communities. We have had bitter experience of this mentality at the Sind Conference when proposals were made which hit only the minority communities, their trade and their income. We want protection against this administrative discrimination against the members of our community. Above all, we want some method open to us, in case of mis-government, of turning out a Government that misbehaves. If we have separate electorates, if we have reservation of seats for a majority of 73 per cent., it is impossible to turn out any fanatical Minister. My community, therefore, attaches very great importance to Joint electorates as they would give them some power of influencing public opinion, of forming political parties and of displacing intolerant members. In other Provinces, the minority communities have asked for separate electorates for their protection and not the majority community. Here is a minority community that pleads for joint electorates, and if minorities are to be given the protection they consider necessary, which is consistent with democratic ideas and the principles of democratic government, our case for joint electorates is an exceptionally strong one. We claim adequate representation on the basis of joint electorates. As a matter of fact, we own 27 per cent. of the land, a figure corresponding to our population ratio, but we hold about 13 per cent. more land as lessees and mortgagees in possession, so we pay 40 per cent. of the land tax. We pay almost the entire Income Tax; we pay an overwhelming part of the Excise as it is almost wholly paid by the cities wherein we are in a majority. We form a majority in all the urban areas of Sind. The number of literates among us is three times as large as the number of literates in the Muslim community; that of the English educated people, we have eight times the number Muslims have; of voters to-day we have about the same number as the majority community. We claim, Sir, that as a minority community we have contributed much to the building up of modern Sind with the help of the British Government; the entire educational and administrative system have been built by us; the professions, the trade and commerce of Sind, are entirely our making. We plead, Sir, that such a minority community deserves at least the same weightage as has been accorded to minority communities in other Provinces. That, Sir, is really briefly the case that we have put forward.

A8. Do you wish to add anything, Rai Bahadur Hiranand Khemsing?—(Rai Bahadur Hiranand Khemsing.) No, Sir.

A9. Perhaps I may just put two questions to clear up questions of fact. You said, Mr. Chablani, that the Expert Committee estimated the deficit of Sind at 110 lakhs to start with, rising to 144 in 30 years?—(Mr. Chablani.) Yes.

A10. That was the estimate, not including the out-turn of the barrage?—Yes.

17^o July, 1933] Mr. H. L. CHABLANI and RAI BAHADUR
HIRANAND KHEMSING.

A11. Including the Lloyd barrage, they arrived at a deficit, with revenue from the Irrigation at full rates of 6.86 lakhs in 30 years' time, and at slump rates 120 lakhs. That, I think, is right, is it not?—They made three estimates, one is on the basis of slump rates, according to which they say, on page 29 of the Report, that the deficit will never be less than a crore. Then they have made an estimate on the average of the two, the slump rates and the full rates, in which case they place the deficit at 63.7 lakhs in 30 years. The last is the estimates based on what they call the full rates.

A12. Yes, I just wanted to get those figures, that is all?—May I draw attention to the fact that about the full rates, they definitely said that it would be "a very rash assumption" on the existing circumstances. Even on the basis of full rates they said that the deficit would be below a $\frac{1}{4}$ of a crore only after 18 years.

A13. 6.86 in 1962?—Yes.

A14. Then another question on figures, but here more a question of opinion. Do you accept Mr. Brayne's estimate of 12 lakhs as the additional cost of separation?—No, Sir, I do not accept it at all. I accept it as a correct estimate if you include only the items which he has taken into account. But then the standard of administration contemplated is below the standard in some cases, even in the North-West Frontier Province; it is certainly not the Bombay standard of administration; it is not even the Assam standard of administration; it is what the Expert Committee and Mr. Brayne consider as barely necessary to add immediately for running the administration. It does mean a considerable deterioration in the existing standard of our administration.

A15. But then would you agree with his statement that the highest estimate of the additional cost of separation is 23 lakhs?—I do not agree to that. My evidence before the Expert Committee will indicate that. I put it at a much higher figure, about 36 lakhs.

Sir Reginald Craddock.

A16. Mr. Chablani, unfortunately Sind was the only part of India that I was not able to visit, or I should have been able to put my questions with more local knowledge. Could you tell me whether the Bombay Government has published any correspondence or despatch of the Bombay Government which gives an opinion on this subject?—Yes, they published a Memorandum which was submitted to the Simon Commission. It is a published document.

A17. Was it in favour of separation?—Strongly against separation of Sind. If you will permit me, I will quote it.

A18. Have the Bombay Government changed their minds since then?—My information is that they still retain the same opinion.

A19. I remember a good many years ago there was an idea of joining up Sind with the Punjab, was there not?—That was so.

A20. That would not find any favour now, I understand?—The position is that we think that it would be very much better than a separate Province of Sind, because, after all, Sind will be a part of a bigger unit, and there are certain points of common economic interests between Sind and Punjab which certainly makes it a far better proposition than a separate Sind, but we certainly prefer to continue with Bombay. The change of opinion really has been largely in the Punjab; originally the Punjab wanted Sind, but to-day, for certain communal reasons perhaps, neither the Hindus nor the Muslims of the Punjab want it.

A21. I just wanted to find out what your opinion was upon that?—We prefer it to a separate Sind, but our first preference is the existing connection with Bombay. The European Chamber of Commerce has however been always in favour of the amalgamation with the Punjab.

A22. Now I have heard it said that the number of Hindus opposed to separation is quite an insignificant section. Have you any remarks to make upon that point? Yes. I have already submitted, but, unfortunately, it does not seem to have been circulated owing to technical reasons, a pamphlet entitled: "The true facts regarding the separation of Sind from the Bombay Presidency," containing a true statement of facts. In Chapter 2 on page 7 (seq.) the Hindu attitude regarding the Hindu separation of Sind is dealt with at length and the misstatements made by the separationists fully exposed. I have given you the number of prominent people who have openly issued manifestoes and statements against separation. On page 14 you will find their names. On page 16 I have given the text of another manifesto. On pages 17 to 19 I have given you the number of Panchayets protesting again it. On pages 21 to 24 I give you the list of 138 Panchayets which have passed strongly-worded resolutions against separation. I have also given you in this the proceedings of various Conferences that has been held in Sind against separation. Then in Chapter 3, you will find the past history of the question before 1924, which has often been grossly misrepresented. All this will show you that this statement has no basis of fact at all, but it continues to be repeated.

HIRANAND KHEMSING.

A23. Then there are a certain number of Hindus who are in favour of separation, are there not?—No, Sir; at present there is not even one person, but some years ago there were about 19 individuals who came to a certain kind of compact with some Muslims in Sind, and they agreed to the separation of Sind on certain very important conditions which have never been accepted by the general body of Muhammadans. I have got their manifesto, which was issued only the year before last, in which they make their position clear that they would never support separation of Sind without these conditions. For instance, they insisted on joint electorates all over India; they were influenced by outside Congressmen who were bargaining with the Muhammadans outside Sind, and in return for joint electorates and other conditions were prepared to give Sind to Muslims. This handful of Hindus supported that bargain.

A24. That was on conditions which applied to the whole of India, and which were not confined to Sind?—That is so.

A25. That is to say, as part of a bargain?—As part of a bargain.

A26. Taking the purely local points of view, are there some Hindus still who are in favour of the merits of the proposal?—No, there is not one at the present moment in favour of separation on the basis of the White Paper or the Muslim demand.

A27. You are saying this with some confidence?—Yes, Sir. I am prepared to quote the writings and public utterances of people whose names are often cited by the other side. Some of them are even members of executive committees of the conferences against separation.

A28. The Hindus are in a minority of 27 per cent., I think you said?—Yes.

A29. I gather from what you said, that in the matter of wealth and education, they are 50 per cent. of the whole, that is to say, if you take the education and wealth, if you judge it by income tax, for example, you would find that the proportion of income tax paid by the Hindus is greater than that paid by Muhammadans?—The Hindus pay about 95 per cent. of the income tax. The Muslims are largely agriculturalists, who pay no income tax.

A30. But then, when you come to the Land Revenue, the Muhammadans would pay the rest?—Yes, but we also pay about 40 per cent.

A31. Have you got 40 per cent. of the area, or is the 40 per cent. due because you have much richer land?—I am talking of the Land Revenue.

A32. Does it rise to 40 per cent. because the land held by the Hindus is rich land?—No, because of the acreage, either owned or leased.

A33. It is average land?—Yes, it is average land.

A34. If you take the Provincial Service man, and the Subordinate Service and the Civil Services, I suppose the Hindus have got a share in that much more than their numbers?—Yes, in most Departments, but in certain Departments, they are even below the population ratio; in the Police, they are absolutely negligible.

A35. That is the case, of course, in many parts of India, the Muhammadans in the Police. Of course, you have not the Forests there, but in the Police and Forests, and most of those lower Executive posts, the Muhammadans are largely in excess of their population proportion?—Yes, but there is another fact, too. In the last ten years, the Hindus' percentage in the higher Services has gone down considerably. For instance, in education department they have practically been wiped out, because of the transfer of primary education to local bodies. The local bodies have thrown out all Hindus educational officers.

A36. And the higher Civil appointments, like the Judges, subordinate Judges and District Judges—are they mostly Hindus?—I think it is a fair share; we have just a bare majority, I should say, of the higher posts in the Revenue and Judicial Departments.

A37. And the Bar?—It consists almost wholly of Hindus.

17^o July, 1933.] Mr. H. L. CHABLANI and RAI BAHADUR
HIRANAND KHEMSING.

A38. Almost all Hindus?—Yes. Medical men are almost all Hindus, engineers almost all Hindus.

A39. Then the fear of the Hindus is that you would get a Muhammadan Legislative Council, or very largely a Muhammadan Legislative Council which would exert influence over the Ministers?—Certainly.

A40. So that in any action taken with regard to legislation or administration, the Muhammadans would be unduly favoured. That is your idea, is it?—The real position is this: We are not even afraid of that, if the choice of the Muhammadan Ministers is confined to Sindhis. In the Services what we fear is that the Muhammadans, for communal reasons, will import people from outside Sind.

A41. You mean that there are not enough educated Muhammadans for posts drawn from Sind itself, and, therefore, they will get Muhammadans from other parts of India?—Among the graduates, the Muhammadan percentage would be less than 10, among the matriculates it would be, perhaps, below that; among the educated females perhaps, not a single Sindhi Muhammadan girl has passed the matriculation examination.

A42. Then you said you wanted weightage but you did not want a communal electorate?—Yes. We want weightage to the extent of 40 per cent. only for the first ten years. Thereafter we will be quite content with the reservation of seats on the population basis, with the right to contest additional seats, which was conceded by the Nehru Report to all minorities.

A43. Do you want reserved seats now?—Yes.

A44. With a weightage giving you 40 per cent., is that it?—Yes, that is because the communal consciousness at present has been raised to a pitch which will probably impose a very serious handicap on minorities in the first ten years, but given joint electorates for ten years, we expect at the end of ten years we shall not ask for anything more than reservation on the population basis with the right to contest additional seats.

A45. And, in addition to your reserved seats, you would contest for a share of the other seats in the general electorate?—Yes. The broad principle that I am enunciating is the absence of a statutory majority, so that it would be possible for us to have political parties.

A46. Therefore, you want to have 40 per cent., plus anything you can gain on the general electorate?—No, at present only 40 per cent., ten years after, 27 per cent., which is the population ratio, plus any share of the general seats which we can get.

A47. But how are you going to get that 40 per cent.?—By reserved seats.

A48. With liberty to contest other seats, too?—No, Sir.

Lord Eustace Percy.

A49. Not until ten years?—Not until ten years

Sir P. Pattani.

A50. After ten years, you would revert to the population percentage?—Yes; after ten years we will have the population percentage, plus any seats which we can secure from the general seats.

Sir Reginald Craddock.

A51. Then you said that Sind was inclined to be rather lawless at times?—Yes.

A52. What are your ideas about Law and Order, whether it should be a Transferred subject, or Reserved for a time?—We have asked for Law and Order to be Reserved, and even if the whole thing is not reserved, at least certain species of lawlessness should be reserved—the kidnapping of women and children and dacoities, particularly.

A53. It is a little difficult, is it not, to reserve particular crimes?—If the C.I.D. Department originally was constituted for Thugees, I do not see why a special agency cannot deal with this species of crime in Sind.

A54. You would have a kidnapping and a Dacoity Department, like there used to be a Thuggee Department? It was there in my time?—I am only suggesting it, if for any reason it is not possible to Reserve Law and Order.

A55. But you would prefer Law and Order to be Reserved in the first instance, but, failing that, to have a special Department for the special kind of crimes, that Department being Reserved?—Certainly, and I would certainly add, what I have said on page 13 of the Memorandum, about justice. Unfortunately, we have no High Court, we have only a Judicial Commissioner's Court, which is intended to be raised

HIRANAND KHEMSING.

to a Chief Court, but the appointments, whether of the Chief Court or the Judicial Court will rest with the Local Government. We want the highest Court in Sind to be outside of political influence and the appointment of its Judges to rest with the Central Government or the Secretary of State.

A56. What is the composition of the Judicial Commissioners at present?—Four judges, including one barrister and one civil servant.

A57. And the other two are drawn from the Bar?—One man is drawn from the Bar.

A58. Are they Sindhis or from other Provinces?—Only one Sindhi, so far.

A59. What is that, a Hindu or a Muhammadan?—It has been a Christian or a Hindu, so far.

A60. Therefore, you want the Courts, that is to say what you call the Department of Law and Justice, which includes the Courts and the Police, to remain reserved, at all events, for the present?—The position of Justice is slightly different. If the Highest Court appointments are in the hands of the Central Government or the Secretary of State, and there is a separation of the Judicial and the Executive, then Justice need not be formally a reserved subject, because, if the lower judiciary is under the control of the High Court and the High Court appointments are above political influence, then there is a sufficient safeguard.

A61. That is to say, if the judiciary are entirely under the Chief Court, you would be satisfied about them, but the Police would still remain?—Yes.

A62. What about the Magistrates? You know that the separation of the Executive from the Judicial is a difficult question; it is very expensive, it has always been found to be rather too expensive. At the same time, the Magistracy that you get under the present system is a Magistracy that goes about on tour and gets to know local life, and so forth, and they are, therefore, better fitted to discharge their duties from their general experience, whereas a Magistracy who do nothing else are apt to become purely urban. I am only putting to you what is very often the case?—If financial considerations do not permit that reform, then it has to be reserved.

A63. With all your financial difficulties about which you have been talking, the separation of judicial and executive would merely be a little added expense?—Certainly.

Major Attlee.

A64. Mr. Chablani, your community is the wealthier of the two communities in Sind, I take it?—No. If you include land amongst the forms of wealth, it would not be, because of the big Zamindar who owns considerable land.

A65. In proportion to population, you are a wealthier community, man for man, so to speak?—If you take it man to man, certainly; but if you take the men at the top, then the men at the top are largely the big Muslim Zamindars.

A66. Are most of the trading classes Hindu?—Almost entirely, you could put it as high as 99 per cent., and, of course, the European community.

A67. You say the Hindus and Zamindars are owners, lessees and mortgagees, and they, therefore, pay nearly 40 per cent. of the Land Revenue?—Yes.

A68. Are there a large number of mortgages held by Hindus?—Yes, because the big Muhammadan Zamindar is very often not able to manage his land, and most of his land go to Court of Wards, who lease it to the highest bidders.

A69. Therefore, I take it, your community will have a considerable influence due to its economic position?—Provided there are joint electorates.

A70. Of course, it is quite possible to put up somebody in a separate electorate?—It is not possible at all, with the communal consciousness at present; it will only mean more trouble.

A71. I have heard it suggested elsewhere?—I must tell you about the local conditions. The Hindu merchant is afraid of the big Zamindar, and he can only get on with the good will of the big man. In fact, he cannot execute the decrees of the Law Courts, unless the big man helps him or at least creates no trouble, so that the big Muslim Zamindar, particularly in Upper Sind, has a tremendous power; it is not the merchant class that has the power.

A72. Is your community as a whole in favour of an extension of self-government in India?—Certainly, but may I add here that a denial of the right of the hill tribes of Assam to a separate Governor's Province does not mean denial of the right of self-government to the whole of Assam India.

A73. The point I was going to ask you about was your suggested veto, that the

17th July, 1933]Mr. H. L. CHABLANI and RAI BAHADUR
HIRANAND KHEMSING.

Governor should be a non-Muslim, and that anyone in charge of Law and Order should be a non-Muslim for the first 20 years. Is that not rather a dangerous suggestion? What might happen in other Provinces in India?—I do not see the evil. If the position in other Provinces was such that the minority communities were afraid for the security of life and property, they ought to be entitled to have the assurance that they are to be in the hands of somebody they can trust, but I deny that the position is the same.

A74. I have heard exactly the same opinions expressed by minority communities in every Province?—If that is so, I am afraid it will have to be done.

A75. With slight variations, stronger or weaker, but the position has been put pretty fully on that?—If the position is as you state it to be, and if the communal protection rests upon nothing else but the Governor of the Province, there is no alternative.

A76. Now you want to remain in with Bombay?—Yes

A77. You have, as a matter of fact, have you not, had a Muslim Minister for a large number of years in Bombay?—Yes, always we have had a Muslim Minister

A78. How did Sind get on with him as a Minister—all right?—It did get on all right, but in certain cases we had a very sad experience, not exactly because of the Muslim, but because of the combination of the non-Brahmins with the Muslim. The non-Brahmin in the Presidency wanted a free hand against the Brahmins in the Presidency, and he got the support of the Muslim Minister, on the condition that the Muslims would have a free hand in Sind against the Hindu. We had rather a bitter experience, particularly in the Education Department.

A79. Now one other question. Do you expect considerable immigration into Sind when the Barrage gets under way?—I do, and my fear is that the immigration will not be of the quality which Sind needs.

A80. Who will that be, do you think—Sikhs?—Border tribes.

A81. You do not think they will come down from the Punjab?—I do not think the Punjab people will come down; they have already burnt their hands in land investments sufficiently.

A82. Has the proposal been put up to you for joining Sind with the Punjab?—It has never been formally put up before us, 20 years ago, it was a question of active controversy. At that time, the Muhammadan leader was against it, and this Muhammadan leader commanded the confidence of the Hindus, too. His idea was that economically the Sind peasant would not be able to stand against the Punjabi, and he felt that in the economic life of the Province, with the administration in the hands of the Punjabis, they would be worse off.

A83. One last question with regard to the cost of separation. You suggest that Mr. Braynes' estimate does not allow for a full establishment for a Province on the Bombay model?—Certainly.

A84. But do you think that Sind is entitled to have every kind of institution if it cannot pay for them? Why should Bombay pay for them more than anybody else?—Quite true, but there are certain amenities of civilised existence that civilised people ought to have even in association with others, if they cannot have their own. If Sind cannot have a medical college of its own, it must have it in association with others.

A85. But why should it be paid for by the people of Bombay rather than by the people of All India?—May I give a little explanation? Who are the people of Bombay? I may tell you, as a matter of fact, that other divisions have a larger deficit than Sind. Maharashtra and Karnataka both have a deficit; and Gujarat is just self-supporting. It is only the City of Bombay that has a surplus, and the City of Bombay is not made by any one community or any one particular Division. It is the surplus of the City of Bombay that is financing the rest of the Province.

A86. And as a port, Karachi is the chief rival of the City of Bombay?—We have not seen the rivalry at present. I may refer you to the evidence before the Simon Commission where the Chairman of the European Chamber definitely said that Karachi has not suffered.

A87. The point is whether Bombay should suffer. You are asking that Bombay should pay the cost for its rival port?—Even Sind has contributed something to the making of Bombay. Take the banking community of Multan Shoroffs who are really Sindhis; take the silk trade of Bombay; it is in the hands of the Sindhis.

Sir Hari Singh Gour.

A88. Mr. Chablan, in the Report of the Sub-Committee of the Round Table

17^o Jullii, 1933.]Mr. H. L. CHABLANI and RAI BAHADUR
HIRANAND KHEMSING.

Conference four reasons are given on the question of the separation of Sind; the first is the social and linguistic differences?—Yes.

A89. Second, geographical isolation; third, insistency of demand; and the fourth is not a reason for a separation but a reason for dealing with the question of separation, namely, the question of financial borrowing. I wish to take you through all these four reasons very briefly. As regards the last question, they said they are in favour of separation, if the Expert Committee and the other investigations showed that Sind would be a self-contained and self-supporting Province. In the course of your statement to-day, you said that Lord Russell committed the Sub-Committee to the view that if investigations showed that Sind stood to remain in deficit for a long time, then the question of separation must go by the board. Will you please refer me to that statement?—It is on page 87 of the Proceedings of the Sub-Committee. Sir Phiroze Sethna asked the question.

A90. Then I am limited to this, that if Sind is not able to stand on its own legs, separation does not take place. That is the view of the Round Table Conference?—Yes.

A91. We have therefore to enquire whether Sind would ever be in a position to stand on its own legs. Now, as regards its present and potential revenue, we shall first deal with the present revenue. The present revenue of Sind is a crore and a-half?—Yes.

A92. Rising to about a crore and three-quarters?—Yes.

A93. And the potential revenue of Sind depends upon the success of the Sukkur Barrage?—That is the only source of revenue.

A94. Before the Simon Commission a very long and searching inquiry was made of the Chief Engineer of the Sukkur Barrage, Mr. Harrison—now Sir Charles Harrison—and is it not a fact that he very categorically stated that the future of the Sukkur Barrage is on the lap of the Gods, or words to that effect. Will you please refer me to that statement?—I will refer you to the page.

A95. I think the questions are on pages 121 and 122?—I will give you the exact words. On pages 121 to 122 of the Fifteenth Volume of the Simon Commission Report the question was put to Sir Charles Harrison “I am told that the Government of the Punjab want to tap the Indus and its tributaries higher up?” His answer was. “They want to take a certain amount of water, yes. (Q.) Have you come to any arrangement with the Punjab Government as to how much they will take and how much they will leave for the use of the Sukkur Barrage?—(A.) The Punjab Government have put in their demands and we have put in our counter-demands, and the matter will eventually come under the consideration of the Irrigation Board. (Q.) Consequently the question of what amount of water you will get in future depends upon the result of the negotiations which are proceeding between yourselves and the Government of the Punjab?—(A.) No, the question at stake is only as to the amount of water we will get in very bad years, and then only for a few days in those very bad years. It is not a question of the failure of the scheme, but of avoiding what might be considerable inconvenience to the Sind cultivator. (Q.) I think I am right in saying that the amount of water you are able to assure to the people of Sind in future depends on the result of these negotiations?—(A.) Yes, exactly.” Then the Chairman intervened, and the question was again put to the witness: “You have the Punjab Government very anxious to utilise all the flow of water that passes through its land, and if a scheme such as that to which the Chairman has referred is brought into operation it will materially affect the success of the Sukkur Barrage?—(A.) If we permit it, yes. (Q.) You see the uncertainty?—(A.) No, there is no uncertainty now the orders of the Secretary of State and the Government of India have been given that until such time as we can prove there is water available the Punjab projects must not be taken in hand. (Q.) Suppose they get provincial autonomy” (that is the important question) “and all the powers of the Secretary of State and the Government of India are transferred to the Punjab Government, then your scheme would be imperilled.” The answer was: “And the Bombay Government will then have to exert its influence to abolish provincial autonomy. (Q.) They will use their good offices with the Government of the Punjab, but the Government of the Punjab might say: ‘This is our water, not yours; hands

HIRANAND KHEMSING.

off' In that case, your scheme would be jeopardised?—(A.) That is on the assumption that each province will fight entirely for itself, without any correlating authority, which for the Irrigation Department might easily be the Irrigation Board, a technical Board. If the provinces desire to live together in any degree of amity, they must decide to abide by the decisions of the Irrigation Board for the whole of India. (Sir Hari Singh Gour) Yes, but they may or may not, you see. It will depend on the attitude of the Punjab Government, influenced as it must be by its legislative council."

A96. The position then, according to Sir Charles Harrison, is this. There is only sufficient water that flows through the Indus; it flows first to the Punjab and then goes to Sind. The Punjab has been holding up its irrigation scheme out of deference to the orders of the Secretary of State and the Government of India in favour of Sind. If you give provincial autonomy to the Punjab and also to Sind, there will be a conflict of interest as between the quantity of water that each province is entitled to receive from the River?—Certainly, and there have been quarrels.

A97. And as there is not enough water to feed the two irrigation schemes of the Punjab and Sind, the future of the success of the Sukkur Barrage depends upon what development is made in the irrigation projects of the Punjab?—Certainly.

A98. That introduces an element of uncertainty which neither the Expert Committee nor the Brayne Committee went into, but which was present to the mind of the Chief Engineer of the Sukkur Barrage?—Yes, that is so; and there are other uncertainties of which neither the Expert Committee nor the Brayne Committee have taken note; for instance, under the old irrigation project of barrage, they expected to be able to export 130,000,000 tons of cereals. At present the World Economic Conference is considering how to limit production.

Lord Eustace Percy.] I do not think we need go into the question of the world demand for wheat.

Sir Hari Singh Gour.

A99. Broadly speaking, I suppose what you would say is that the difficulty in the Punjab regarding the apportionment of water is the difficulty that has been presenting itself nearer home, in Egypt, in the case of the water of the Nile, as to who should get it and how much of the water they should get?—There have been frequent quarrels. Even the Bombay Government have been fighting the Punjab Government on behalf of Sind.

Lord Eustace Percy.] We are not here, I think, discussing whether the Punjab should have proper quantities.

Sir Hari Singh Gour.

A100. Now I ask you another question. Supposing the middle course is adopted and things go on as we expect they might go on, do you not think that with the accrual of fresh revenue from the Sukkur Barrage Sind will be able to stand upon its own legs, say, within ten years?—Not within 40 years. The Expert Committee itself rules out 30 years.

A101. How long would you give Sind to be able to stand upon its own legs, in any case?—I think the period could be shortened only if somebody were to play the fairy godfather or godmother, whatever you call it, and Sind got a tremendous amount of money for developing Sind. For instance, if you invest now on railways and roads about 50 crores more, probably the whole thing would be hastened.

A102. But would it not be over-capitalised by that time?—Sometimes, on a big scale, things may succeed which, on a small scale, are doomed to failure.

A103. An argument has been used, and Major Attlee had it in his mind when he put to you a question, that the Bombay-cum-Sind Province is now a deficit Province?—Yes.

A104. Somebody has got to pay that deficit amount?—Yes.

A105. Why should you object to paying that amount to Sind rather than to Bombay plus Sind?—May I explain the position? Bombay controls expenditure in Sind and supposing Bombay gets no money for wiping out its deficit—

A106. I am asking you the question?—I am just explaining my position. It is open to Bombay to make a general retrenchment and save a crore of rupees in ways that are not open to a small Province.

A107. The question that I am putting to you is this: Supposing the money which is the deficit at present of Bombay and Sind is allocated to Sind, would it in any way satisfy the claim of the Bombay Presidency without Sind?—No.

17th Julii, 1933.]

Mr. H. L. CHABLANI and RAI BAHADUR
HIRANAND KHEMSING.

A108. Therefore that argument does not hold good. The claim of the Bombay Presidency, if this amount is made over to Sind, still remains and will have to be made good by the Government of India?—Certainly.

A109. The point, therefore, is that the present difficulty of Bombay plus Sind is no answer to the separation of Sind?—It is no answer at all.

A110. Now I pass to the other questions that have been raised by the Sub-Committee. One is the racial and linguistic differences between the inhabitants of Sind and the Presidency of Bombay. Is there a racial and linguistic difference between Sind and Bombay any more than exists, as it were, in other provinces?—I am afraid even in Sind, Upper Sind and Lower Sind, there is a racial and linguistic difference. Upper Sind is quite different. You will have every ten miles linguistic and racial differences, if you want to go by linguistic and racial differences.

A111. The Central Provinces have got two very sharply divided racial and linguistic differences between the Hindus and the Maharrattas?—Yes. On the other hand, I may point out that commercially the language of Sind even to-day is Gujrati.

A112. The second point raised is the geographical isolation of Sind from Bombay. Is it not a fact, if I understand aright, that the Government of India were going to eliminate this geographical isolation by linking up Sind with a railway?—The Government of India have approved of the scheme and the preliminary work has begun.

A113. And that would do away with the alleged isolation of Sind from Bombay?—Certainly; but even now we have three different means of communications; the aeroplane service, the sea service and the railway service.

A114. The aeroplane at present is not a popular means of communication. The last point that is made by the Sub-Committee is the insistency with which separation has been advocated. I want to know what amount of public opinion and agitation has supported the separation of Sind, and since when?—It is since 1927 that this demand has arisen. The proposals emanated from outside Sind. Before 1927 the leading Hindus and Muslims were all united in demanding a more complete amalgamation with Bombay, by doing away with the Commissioner of Sind Act, which gives the Commissioner of Sind a certain amount of independence. In 1929 Sir Shah Nawaz Khan Bhutto who was Chairman of the Bombay Legislative Committee attached to himself said that Sind should not be separated from Bombay. He signed the report, which is an official document. He made a somersault at the first meeting of the Round Table Conference.

Major Attlee.

A115. I think he made that somersault, if it was one, while the Simon Commission were going their way round?—At least he signed the Report against the separation of Sind all right.

Sir Hari Singh Gour.

116. Then what originated the demand for separation in 1927?—It was in the Delhi Muslim proposal first of all. It emanated from a conception of keeping a kind of balance of power, or for holding the Muslim majorities in some areas hostages for the good behaviour of the Hindu majority in other Provinces. Behind it also there have been some ideas of a new federation of the Western States. It has sometimes taken the form of a new unit in Indian federation. The whole idea has emanated from external considerations.

A117. Do you mean to say that you ascribe the agitation to a dream of the consolidation of the Muslim power?—Partly it is Pan-Islamic union with the outside, and partly it is the communal bonds within India itself. That is, holding the Hindu minorities hostages in some parts for the good behaviour of the Hindus elsewhere.

A118. Apart from the external influences that are brought to bear upon this question, is there any local demand on the part of the Muslims?—As I have said, it is difficult to say about the local demand. It is only a few individuals who are putting it up. I even now here have a statement against the separation of Sind from the leading Muslim Councillor of Hyderabad Municipality, who issued only last month an interview with the Press, but I must say that at the present stage of almost complete ignorance the more vocal section of the Muslim leaders certainly are for separation, and they are largely in alliance with the outside forces. I have repeatedly told them to take a referendum, placing before the people the actual consequences of separation, but they have always declined to put the matter to the voters.

17th July, 1933.] Mr. H. L. CHABLANI and RAI BAHADUR
HIRANAND KHEMSING.

A119. What is the view of the European officials? I do not refer to serving officials, but to those who have retired. What is their view as to the question of separation?—To my knowledge, you could hardly find a retired European official who would say "Yes." As far as the facts given by us are concerned the retired commissioners who are near about London could certainly be asked to tell you confidentially what they think.

Lord Eustace Percy.] Certainly, that will always be within the power of the Committee.

Sir Hari Singh Gour.

A120. Then your statement is that the European officials connected with Sind who have since retired from service, so far as you know, are almost unanimously against separation?—Yes, so also the European non-officials, through the Chamber of Commerce. The European Association, the Simon Commission have stated, do not want separation.

A121. The European Chamber of Commerce?—The European Chamber of Commerce. The European Association of Sind definitely stated before the Simon Commission that they are against separation.

Dr. Shafa' at Ahmad Khan.

A122. My difficulty, my Lord Chairman, is that I did not wish, and nobody from our side wished, to raise this question at all. As, however, it has been raised, in deference to the wishes of the Committee, I am prepared to cross-examine the Witnesses. I am afraid my cross-examination may take some time, because a controversial document has been given to us, and I pray for your indulgence. It is comparatively long. Mr. Chablani, would you kindly turn to paragraph 2 of your Memorandum. I do not at this stage wish to cross-examine you upon what you have spoken of to-day, when we started these Proceedings, because I do not think anything additional to what you have put down in your Memorandum arises, though in the course of the cross-examination, some points have actually been developed by you which will necessitate some examination further on. In paragraph 2 you say that the separation of Sind was opposed by the Bombay Government, the Bombay Legislative Council. Of course, you mean the Committee of the Simon Commission?—Yes.

A123. "The Indian Central Committee, the Simon Commission, the Nehru Committee, Sir Purushotamda's Committee,"

—what is that Committee?—It was a Committee appointed by the All-Parties Conference of Delhi.

A124 In 1927?—In 1927 or, probably, 1928.

A125. "the Indian National Congress, the All-Parties Conference at Lucknow"—which was that? Last year?—No, 1928.

A126. "and the Indian Round Table Conference, but has been made in the teeth of opposition of the Hindu minority in Sind, supported by almost the entire Indian Press, including Anglo-Indian journals like 'the Times of India.'" Of course, I know that the Bombay Government has opposed the separation of Sind, but I am not absolutely certain whether the recommendation of the Committee that co-operated with the Simon Commission, opposed the separation of Sind in principle?—May I read out to you the passage, if you want it?

A127. Yes. It opposed it on various other grounds?—I think it opposed it altogether. I will just read out the relevant passage.

"We feel strongly that the question must be judged mainly, if not solely, from the point of view of the Presidency only. . . . We consider that at the present stage, at any rate, there cannot be any justification for such a step being taken because, from the figures before us, it appears that for financial reasons alone, the proposal is impracticable. The administrative difficulties which have been pointed out by the Government of Bombay are also real and cannot be ignored. Then again it seems clearly desirable that the Bombay Presidency should first of all secure full provincial autonomy. This, it may be safely considered, is within easy reaching distance of an advanced Presidency like Bombay. But if Sind were a separate Province, it could not, at such an early stage, expect an equal privilege, and it would, therefore, inevitably be denied the advantages of any further step forward which Bombay may secure. It must, therefore, in order to secure this advantage, continue to be a part of the Bombay Presidency. As soon as Sind has developed further in material prosperity, and if, as a result of an early and thorough investigation it is found that finances permit, we consider that its claim will demand immediate investigation, etc., etc."

A128. That will do for my purpose. Do you not think that the principle of separation is implied in the paragraph

17th July, 1933.]Mr. H. L. CHABLANI and RAI BAHADUR
HIRANAND KHEMSING.

you have read out?—I am not able to understand the meaning of the word "separation." The financial, practical, administrative and political considerations are again something which you call a principle.

A129. I do not think they say political there, do they?—They have said political autonomy.

A130. It depended mainly upon the financial considerations then as regards the Indian Central Committee?—Yes, if Sind is prepared to stand the financial burden and put up with administrative disadvantages. That was carried by a majority of one.

A131. Then the Indian National Congress, did it oppose the separation of Sind in principle?—I do not understand the word "principle."

A132. My contention is that so far as the principle of separation is concerned, it was asserted by the Round Table Conference in 1930, but this principle had been accepted by various Committees before?—May I point out what I have said in paragraph 2? Kindly read the words, that "this proposal to constitute Sind into a separate Governor's Province in the new Indian Federation with a subvention from the Federal Government." I submit that all these Reports are against this proposal.

A133. Perfectly right, but I was dealing only with the principle of the separation of Sind?—What about the principle of a subvention?

A134. I will deal with that separately. Then you said that this proposal was opposed by almost the entire Indian Press?—Yes.

A135. What do you mean by the entire Indian Press?—Shall I give you a few? The "Indian Daily Mail", "The Times of India", and the Indian "Social Reformer".

A136. What about the "Daily Gazette" of Karachi?—The "Daily Gazette" of Karachi has never been in favour of separation.

A137. Has it opposed it?—Yes, several times, but you could quote some passage which would raise a doubt whether it did not prefer union with the Punjab.

A138. And, of course, the Muslim Press in Sind have been supporting it?—There is only one Muslim daily paper supporting it.

A139. There is one daily paper, several weekly papers. I have been reading some of them for the last five years?—I do not think there are more than 100 subscribers to the weekly you speak of. I do not read them.

A140. I am not sure about the estimate of their circulation. Now as regards the other point that has been developed by you, that separation was opposed by the Europeans, did the Europeans oppose the separation of Sind before and do they oppose it still?—Yes, all along.

A141. What about Sir Montagu Webb?—A statement was made, and I can give it you.

A142. He is in London?—Yes. He said he never supported such a proposal.

A143. My point is this: That the representative of the European Community on Mr. Brayne's Committee, Mr. Price, was a wholehearted supporter of the separation of Sind last year, and his views were expressed in the proceedings of Mr. Brayne's Committee. He represented and voiced the opinion of the European Community about Sind?—May I say that the Sind Conference were prepared to accept the separation subject to the question of finance.

Lord Eustace Percy.] I think we must really confine ourselves to the arguments advanced by the Witnesses, and the question of how far they represent the community represented by the Witnesses. I do not think we can go into the question of how far they are supported by other sections of opinion.

Dr. Shafa'at Ahmad Khan.] The question was put and Mr. Chablaní said quite definitely that the Europeans in Sind opposed the separation of Sind.

Lord Eustace Percy.] I am not complaining of any questions put.

Witness.] May I say that I said the European Chamber of Commerce and the European Association are opposed to constituting Sind into a separate Province, and that statement can be verified by the Statement and Memorandum before the Indian Statutory Commission, and they have never resigned from that position. There is no subsequent Resolution of the Chamber of Commerce or of the European Association to the contrary, not even a discussion on it.

A144. But, I believe, Mr. Price was voicing the sentiments of the European Association on Mr. Brayne's Committee?—You are entitled to draw your own inferences, but that is not supported by any Resolution of the Chamber in question.

17^o Juli, 1938.]Mr. H. L. CHABLANI and RAI BAHADUR
HIRANAND KHEMSING.

A145. Then in paragraph 3, which is highly controversial, and which discusses some very serious issues, you have dealt with a number of recommendations of various Committees, and then you have, in other paragraphs, attacked Mr. Brayne himself, one of the most capable and one of the most efficient officers who India has produced?—I am sorry, Sir, that any prejudice should be created against me by any such observations. I have made no such observations. Mr. Brayne is a personal friend of mine.

A146 Take paragraph 6. "Nor is this all, the experts themselves differ according to the degree of optimism they can command, Mr. Brayne being invariably more optimistic than the Expert Committee, his task being to balance the Sind budget somehow"?—If you ask me a question on it, I will answer it.

A147. I could quote other paragraphs, but I do not want to deal with this aspect of it myself. Is it not a fact that the late Mr Harchandrae and others saw Sir Montagu Webb in 1917 and urged upon him the necessity of separating Sind, which is proved almost from the diary of Sir Montagu himself, which has been published?—Excuse me, the diary says just the reverse, and I could quote to you from the diary.

Sir P. Pattani.] Are these individual views to influence the decision of the Joint Select Committee, I wonder?

Witness.] Here is the text from the diary, page 10: "The interesting part of the discussion occurred when we came face to face with the separation of Sind. The Sind Provincial Conference, which came on behalf of the Congress Muslim League Scheme, wants the abolition of the Commissioner in Sind, pending the creation of a special Province. They do not want a special Province at present because of the expense."

Dr. Shafa'at Ahmad Khan.

A148. Quite, but they did see him?—And the full text of their memorial is given on pages 9 and 10 of the pamphlet on True Facts. If the Committee wants it I can hand it over. I gave it to Sir John Simon.

Lord Eustace Percy.

A149. I wonder if we could shorten the Proceedings, perhaps, if I put this question to the Witness? Is the contention of your Memorandum confined to the issue of the constitution of Sind as a separate Province in the present circumstances?—Yes.

A150. And you are not arguing, necessarily, in your Memorandum against the constitution of a separate Province of Sind at a future time under different circumstances?—No.

Lord Eustace Percy.] Therefore, I think we can leave the question of principle, perhaps.

Dr. Shafa'at Ahmad Khan.] Yes.

Lord Eustace Percy.] And treat only the existing circumstances.

Dr. Shafa'at Ahmad Khan.] Perfectly right, my Lord Chairman. I was only trying to show that the movement for the separation of Sind had its origin prior to 1927, that the demand had been put forward by the people of Sind long before the Reforms of 1928, and that quite a number of prominent Hindus, Muslims and Parsees have advocated the separation of Sind and had advocated the separation of Sind, since then. That was the only point I wished to make.

Lord Eustace Percy.] Quite.

Dr. Shafa'at Ahmad Khan.

A151. Mr. Samshed Mehta, the Chairman of the Karachi Municipality, I suppose, supports the separation of Sind?—Yes—not unconditionally.

A152. I am talking of the separation of Sind?—But subject to those conditions.

A153. Then as regards the Sind Muslims, I think you said, in reply to a question by Sir Hari Singh Gour, that the prominent Muslims leaders of Sind had advocated the separation of Sind?—After 1927.

A154. But that the masses, if a referendum was taken, would oppose it?—I do not make any statement of this sort. It is very doubtful whether they would agree to stand any burdens. I cannot say what the result would be, because the masses at present are certainly uneducated. I do not know to what extent they would be governed by other considerations. If you talk to them of Muslim Raj, you may get any vote, but if you asked them to vote on a specific measure of taxation, or asked them, "Are you prepared to cut down the expenditure here?" I have not the slightest doubt a straight vote would be against you.

Dr. Shafa'at Ahmad Khan.] I should like to say the Muslim leaders of Sind are voicing the feelings, not only of Muslims, but of a very large number of Hindus.

17th July, 1933.] Mr. H. L. CHABLANI and RAI BAHADUR
HIRANAND KHEMSING.

Sir Hari Singh Gour.] I should like the Doctor to give evidence, so that I may have a chance of cross-examining him.

Lord Eustace Percy.] Sir Hari, I hope the Committee will remember that we are hearing evidence on this subject from both sides, and, therefore, it will be unnecessary, I think, for the Members of the Committee, or the Delegates, to argue with the Witnesses, because we shall be having the view of the other side presented to us with equal strength.

Sir Hari Singh Gour.] That is so.

Dr. Shafa 'At Ahmad Khan.

A155. Then, Mr. Chablan, in paragraphs 3 and 4, you have adduced reasons to prove that there are no linguistic or racial differences that divide Sind from Bombay?—I never said anything of the sort, in any sentence.

A156. That, so far as the distance is concerned, it is not really very far from Bombay?—I have said that.

A157. Do you not agree with me that parts of Sind are at a distance of about 800 miles from Bombay?—Yes, it takes you more time to reach one end of Sind from Karachi than from Karachi to Bombay.

A158. But you believe, in some cases, it is absolutely essential for persons who have to do with the Headquarters of the Bombay Government to go all the way from one part of Sind to Poona, a distance of 900 miles. Do you not think that people do find it very inconvenient to have to cover all that long distance?—I do not find the distance any longer than between certain parts of Bengal.

A159. Do you not think that there is any difficulty at all?—If you have at the Headquarters, members of the Secretariat, Ministers, Executive Counsellors, who have experience of Sind, I think there is absolutely no difficulty in dealing with the matter. We have rather felt that the Bombay control all along has been for the benefit of the people.

Mr. Davidson.

A160. May I ask what was the reason for the appointment of a Chief Commissioner if it was not a fact that communication was difficult?—He is an ordinary Revenue Commissioner, with certain powers of local government delegated to him from 1860, when for reasons of economy, it was joined to Bombay, and in those days, when there was not even a railway throughout Sind, it was found necessary to delegate certain powers of local government. It is a historic relic of the past, and, since 1919, certain powers of the Commissioner have been transferred back to the Ministers. In fact, our case has been that those historic reasons now do not exist, that Sind should be placed on a par with other divisions by a more complete administrative amalgamation. That was the case right up to 1922. Hindus and Muhammadans urged time after time in favour of the repeal. That is why the Bombay Committee of the Simon Commission itself now says that those reasons do not operate, that the Commissioner's special powers should be now removed.

Dr. Shafa 'At Ahmad Khan.

A161. Now in the last sub-paragraph of paragraph 4 you have dealt with the question of the appointing of extra heads of all Departments, and creating separate institutions, educational, agricultural, veterinary, scientific, medical, and so on?—Yes.

A162. I think so far as I am concerned, it is futile to discuss these questions, because they have been very thoroughly discussed by the Expert Committee, then Mr. Brayne's Committee also went into it, and later on they fixed the amount that would be needed for separation at 12 lakhs. I cannot possibly go, and I do not think that many persons would be able to go, minutely into the various points raised in it. All that I would like to point out is that the 12 lakhs that would be needed for separating Sind will be, in a way, met by the agreement of the Sind Zamindars, an agreement that was announced by them in Mr. Brayne's Committee, to impose a cess which would realise 11 lakhs of rupees. That objection which we have heard, therefore, will really be met?—Excuse me; in the first place, it is not a correct statement of the position. The Expert Committee refuse to go into it—not that they went into it and rejected it. They say: "It is not part of our task to assess the cost of these independent institutions," the absence of which was urged as a ground for separation, for the university or the medical college, and so on. They said: "It is no part of our task." I submit that when the case of separation is exactly this: that Bombay has neglected Sind because there is no university, because there is no Government college, because there is no agricultural college; that when they want to create a separate Province on that very ground, the cost of instituting the Province must include an estimate of the cost of providing these institutions, the absence of which is given as the ground for separation.

HIRANAND KHEMSING.

Lord Eustace Percy.] I hope we shall not get into a metaphysical discussion as to what the cost of separation is to cover. It was used in one quite clear sense by Mr. Brayne, and by the Expert Committee. You may say that you would like to use those words in another sense.

Dr. Shafa'at Ahmad Khan.] Yes.

Lord Eustace Percy.] But I have intervened, because I am afraid that if we get to a discussion of the financial details of those two Reports, we shall certainly never conclude this discussion. I think that we must assume that those Reports are before the Joint Select Committee; that the Joint Select Committee will take them into consideration with Mr. Chablani's evidence, and that we cannot possibly cross-examine Mr. Chablani on all the points discussed by the Conference or by the Expert Committee.

Witness.] May I just only say one word. The point of my remark is not to question those estimates; the point of my remark in this Memorandum is that this Committee should visualise the kind of Province that is going to be created. It will be a Province in which these amenities would not exist. That is all the point of my Memorandum, if you will kindly look at the concluding paragraph.

Lord Eustace Percy.] I quite appreciate your point.

Dr. Shafa'at Ahmad Khan.

A163. I simply wish to point out that on pages 46-82, the Expert Committee discussed these proposals very thoroughly, and they went into all these details with the greatest possible care and, if I may say so, with great impartiality. Then, Mr. Chablani, you have said, about the middle of paragraph 5: "Subsequent figures, now available, have fully justified the estimate put forward by the three Hindu members of the Conference, the accounts for the year 1931-1932 showing the Land Revenue collections to be only 92.41 lakhs"—Yes.

A164. For three years, 1929-30, 1930-31, and 1931-32, owing to extraordinary circumstances of depression and low prices of agricultural produce, the Government of Bombay, like other Provincial Governments, gave special rebates in the Land Revenue, and that naturally upset the ordinary calculations, but in the year 1932-33, the revision of Settlement of Land Assessment has been effected throughout the barrage area, and besides, the Government have given no rebate whatsoever. This will naturally result in the increase of Land Revenue income in Sind, even much beyond Mr. Brayne's estimate—

Lord Eustace Percy.] Is this a question?

Dr. Shafa'at Ahmad Khan.] I am putting this forward in reply to the contention put forward in the Memorandum.

Lord Eustace Percy.] I really do not think we can get into an argument on the subject. We want to know Mr. Chablani's views, and having ascertained his views, and put any questions for our own enlightenment to him, we must form our own conclusions.

Mr. Davidson.] May I suggest, Mr. Chairman, that my own feeling about it is this. If each of us were to go through a Memorandum put in by a Witness, and traverse every statement with which we should not agree, we would be doing two things which I think would be wrong. First of all, we would be disclosing what I think a judicial body ought not to disclose—their own views. We want to ascertain the views of the witnesses. Secondly, I think we would be spending a great deal of time in doing something which was, in fact, not what we, perhaps, ought to do.

Dr. Shafa'at Ahmad Khan.] My difficulty is this. For the last two years, the question has been thrashed out in all its details, and we thought that the whole question had been practically settled and finished, as far as we were concerned. Now, in this Memorandum, the old figures and, if I may say so with the greatest respect, the old controversies, have been revived, and as a member of the Muslim Delegation I cannot allow Mr. Chablani's figures to go unchallenged. I should be neglecting my duty if I did. It is for this purpose that I want to challenge the figures which have been given here, because I believe that these figures are proved to be not strictly in accordance with the results of the Revenue administration of this year.

Lord Eustace Percy.] I do not complain of any question put for the purpose of challenging one of Mr. Chablani's figures, but you are reading out a long statement.

17th July, 1933.] Mr. H. L. CHABLANI and RAI BAHADUR
HIRANAND KHEMSING.

Dr. Shafa' at Ahmad Khan.] Not at all. I was simply showing that the estimates of Mr. Brayne's Committee have, not only been accurate, but the actual collections of revenue have gone much beyond Mr. Brayne's estimates, and that the proposition he put forward is really a workable proposition, but Mr. Chablani says, "No, the estimates are really under-estimates."

Witness.] My answer is that, in the first place, the accounts for the year 1932 to 1933 are not closed, and no figures are available. What Dr. Shafa'at is putting is really an assumption on the basis of something he has heard. Really, no accounts will be available till October for the year 1932-33. The second thing is that there is a good deal of confusion and mixing up of figures. The revenue figures for 1932 and 1933 mix up two things; the non-barrage area and the barrage area. So far as the barrage is concerned, we have included those estimates in the estimates of income from the barrage. If you take the two then certainly the income is greater in 1931, but whether the revenue is greater than the figure that I have given for 1931 to 1932, plus the expected revenue from the barrage, would be quite a different matter. For proper accounting you have to add these two things together in order to see how far the actualities agree with the estimate. The statement made by Dr. Shafa is not strictly accurate. As the world knows, since 1925 there has been a fall in the prices of agricultural produce, with only slight variations here and there, and since 1929 it has been exceptionally severe. Whether we should count the prices of 1919 and 1918 as normal, or whether we should consider 1925 to 1929 as normal, or 1929 to 1932 as normal—these are three different issues. What we are banking on is the continuation of conditions which existed in the post-war and the war boom periods; those are the periods on which full rates of the Barrage are based.

Lord Eustace Percy.] May I simply say this, that all of us who have had to examine Indian finances, or even the finances of any country at the present moment know that all the figures given in all reports, and all the figures given by Mr. Chablani in evidence, are highly hypothetical and should be subjected to the very closest examination, and the Joint Select Committee will subject them to the very closest examination before they accept any figures put before them.

On that understanding, I suggest that in this Sub-Committee we should refrain from any detailed attempt to impugn any figures in any of these reports, leaving that to a subsequent examination.

Dr. Shafa'at Ahmad Khan.] I accept your ruling, my Lord, and I will not refer to any figures, but this, of course, should not imply that I accept the figures which have been given in this memorandum.

Lord Eustace Percy.] Nor do any of us at the moment.

Dr. Shafa'at Ahmad Khan.

A165. Quite. (To the witness): Then turning to paragraph 7, this, if I may say so, with the most profound respect, is a highly controversial paragraph, and I certainly do not desire to deal with it in detail. I think you will agree with me that the impression is likely to be created (I will not go further) that you are really indicting the whole Muslim community of Sind?—I am not A166. I must say that is an impression it has left on my mind, and therefore I do not wish really to go into its details. I am absolutely certain of this, that all the sensible, and all the best, elements of the Hindu community of Sind do not subscribe to this paragraph?—I do not understand upon what authority your statement is based. I certainly dispute the statement. They are only facts and figures which can be got from the Government publications. I have merely put them together. I am prepared to give proofs.

A167. I will mention only one point then regarding the riots you have mentioned, the Larkana riots. The witness has mentioned in paragraph 7, the Larkana riots, the Jacobabad murders, the organised gang dacoities in the Sukkur District, and so on?—I do not wish to deal with all this; it is very distasteful; and if I had to perform the duty of collecting all the facts from my own province I could give about 10 times the amount; but I do not wish to do it. I am also a member of the minority community. I have always said that I am quite prepared to have confidence in the Hindu community, and I have always taken this attitude.

A168. You have mentioned about the Larkana riots. So far as the Larkana riots are concerned, am I right in my information that the judgment of an impartial judge like Mr. Norman is an adequate proof that all the 80 Muslims

HIRANAND KHEMSING.

that were clapped in jail at the false complaint of Hindus were innocent and were liberated?—Excuse me, I deny the fact that it was on the initiative of Hindus, it was a police case. The Police got at some people; some people were innocent.

A169. But were they liberated?—Of course not. One was convicted. That is my grievance. The riot took place in broad daylight in the district headquarters. The whole of the headquarters was given over to rioting and yet not one man was punished.

A170. Mr. Norman's judgment is very clear upon that point?—It is a reflection upon the Police investigation, on the insufficient evidence they collected.

Lord Eustace Percy.

A171. That was not the question put to you. The question was, what was the judgment?—I am not aware of that judgment at all. I am only aware that not one man was convicted.

Dr. Shafa'at Ahmad Khan.

A172. Then you refer to a very curious phenomenon, which is called the Anglo-Muslim alliance, in paragraph 8. What is that alliance?—You have heard of the Minorities Pact?

A173. Yes; but what does this passage refer to?—All that I am saying is that there is a great prejudice against the Hindu community at the present moment. I am giving expression to the feeling that we wish our case to be judged on its merits, and not because of anything Hindus might have done in other Provinces. We do not want that our case should suffer because of the associations with various matters.

A174. Is there a great prejudice against the whole Hindu community?—We do find it.

A175. Here, also, in England?—The feeling has been expressed, and it is as much a fact as a fact itself.

A176. I will not deal with it further. I only wish to say that I have not come across any instance of it?—Then I see no reason why Sind should be separated.

A177. Then I will not deal with the historical portion with which the rest of that paragraph is concerned?—I would welcome any examination upon that.

A178. Then, later, in paragraph 8, you give, if I may say so, the constructive part of your memorandum. You make certain suggestions for protecting the life and property of the Hindu community?—Yes.

A179. Are you prepared to concede the same rights to Muslims in minority provinces?—Yes, wherever the conditions approximate to Sind.

A180. But do you not think that the Muslims in minority provinces will also say that their condition too is very peculiar?—It is for the Joint Select Committee to see if the facts are approximately what we have suggested, and if the facts elsewhere are approximately as we have pointed out for Sind, I suggest that they should be protected in the same way as we have asked.

A181. If they are, what happens to constitutional reform in India?—After all, in any constitution there are elements of civilisation that must form the basis of any constitutional structure. All that I ask for is that those essentials of modern civilisation must be maintained at any cost.

A182. Personally speaking, without committing anyone, I should have thought that we are starting a new era in India, and that we should have gone on the policy of forget and forgive, and starting a new chapter in a very big book. I, personally, when I issued my interview last year, after my return from India, advise all the Muslims of Sind to be as generous as they possibly could to their brethren?—Did they?

Lord Eustace Percy.] Here again this is hardly question and answer.

Dr. Shafa'at Ahmad Khan.] Mr. Chablani, in his memorandum, has said that it is the Muslims from outside who have started this agitation, and I want to disprove that. I feel that this demand has really sprung up and originated in Sind itself, and Sind Muslims are undoubtedly backed by Muslims from other provinces. In the first place, the movement to which Mr. Chablani has referred is not supported by any responsible Muslims in any part of India. I can assure you, Mr. Chablani, that, so far as Muslim outside officials are concerned, they have got no other desire but to see a contented Sind in which the Hindus, with their extraordinary power of organisation, their wealth, their culture, pull their weight and play their part in building up a new Sind.

Lord Eustace Percy.] Dr. Shafa-at was, I think, perfectly justified, from his point of view, in making that statement in reply to the statements made by the witness in the memorandum before us; but that statement having been made, I think we can pass now to the next question.

Dr. Shafa' at Ahmad Khan.] I have finished, my Lord Chairman.

Sir P. Pattani.

A183. With reference to the remarks which the Witness has made in reply to questions put by my four colleagues on the other side, I do not know that I can add anything very important by putting many more questions. I will only deal with three questions. I think that a perusal of your Memorandum shows that we come to only three important issues, namely (1) Your fear, which is a communal sentiment, merely; (2) that you are afraid of administrative inefficiency; and (3) the incapacity for bearing financial burdens. Beyond that, I do not think there is anything really important. Now with regard to the first, namely, the communal sentiment, do you not think that this has been a recent growth, considering its historical point of view, that even the Muhammadan was not a communal man before, because if he had been, there being 800 years of Muhammadan rule, no Hindu would be left?—May I answer that that refers to the peculiar history of Sind right up to the 17th century. Your broad generalisation is true, that the rule of the Muhammadan in Sind was not very oppressive; but when you come to the 17th and the 18th centuries, you will notice something like a catastrophe has taken place. In 1699 the population of Sind is 10 Hindus to 1 Muslim; in 1790, it is 2 to 3; in 1930, it is 1 to 4. One can easily see what a transformation took place during that period. So, in a space of about 100 years, something like the destruction of an old civilisation took place. That was the position at the time of the British Conquest; it is really a slow recovery under the British rule that has taken place, and during this period of slow recovery, right up to 1919, I should say, the communal problem did not exist in Sind, under the strong British administration. It is only since 1919 that it has begun, and with the death of the Great Muhammadan leader in 1924, Mr. Bhurgir, things have become very bad indeed in Sind.

A184. Do you not think that if the administration of the Province is altered in the way suggested, things may improve?—It is quite possible to improve it; I hope it will improve, but the process must be left open for improving it, and the process that I can visualise is nothing short of a complete joint electorate. That is the only process that they can gradually understand, probably, not statutory majorities and separate electorates. That is not the path along which any communal adjustment can take place in Sind.

A185. So you are afraid of the majority of the Muhammadan community not giving you a fair share in the administration?—I would not like to put it like that.

A186. The majority community in that Province?—You can put it as a majority of the Muslims in Sind, because, after all, the Muhammadans in Sind do belong to different stages of civilisation; some are 20th century men; others have hardly emerged from the 10th.

A187. It is, therefore, that you have suggested that the Law and Police should be Reserved and that there should be financial solvency?—Yes.

A188. You know that the Governor has the special power reserved to himself to intervene and protect life and property in any Province in India?—I do feel that if things go very, very wrong indeed, a strong Governor would intervene, but so far as the ordinary affairs of life are concerned, I do not think the Governor would feel that, in discharge of a special responsibility, he ought to intervene. Take, for instance, the kidnapping of women; take, for instance, a riot in one particular place. By itself it may not justify the Governor intervening; it is only when he finds a cumulative series of incidents over a couple of years that he might think it is sufficient cause for him to intervene, but it is not a consolation to a minority community that only when things go very wrong and are about to break down the Governor will act.

A189. But that is likely to happen in any other place?—If you have got an area which has a long border inhabited by wild tribes in which 14 houses to the square mile is the density, in which communications are so imperfect as in Sind, in which there are 10,000 miles of desert land, in which cattle lifting is an ordinary sport, as a former Commissioner of Sind put it, in which the crime incidence is the highest, and literacy the lowest in India—if such conditions exist in the rest of India, I must say Law and Order must be reserved.

17th July, 1933] Mr. H. L. CHABLANI and RAI BAHADUR
HIRANAND KHEMSING.

A190. I will not proceed on that question any further. Then the second question is the administrative inefficiency due to illiteracy, as you said just now?—From two points of view, the financial resources are not adequate.

A191. I am coming to the financial aspect last. With regard to the fear of administrative inefficiency because of the illiteracy of the majority of the inhabitants of that Province?—I will not put it so strongly as that. Because of the kind of elected member that is probable under the conditions existing in Sind. After all, if only the elected members are enlightened, one would expect a different state of affairs.

A192. That is your fear?—That is my fear.

A193. That the administration will suffer and there not being capable administrators to run the State?—The Muslim Zamindars are only interested in only two things, water and gun licences.

A194. It is, therefore, that you would like to remain in Bombay, because your idea, probably, is that by contact with a far advanced portion of the Presidency, the backward Province may develop and progress towards improvement?—That is exactly my idea. As a matter of fact, it has happened that way.

A195. Do you not think that by making people responsible for their own domestic affairs, they will, in course of time, work more for their own welfare?—I do not see a sufficient amount of leadership at present.

A196. Being like that and linked to a Province at this distance and not having a State in the hands of the people, there is less chance of a Province advancing than if it took the chances?—May I refer you to the achievement of Bombay during the last 10 years as far as Sind is concerned. How much capital expenditure has been incurred in Sind by the Bombay Council? I think that the record of the Proceedings is a sufficient answer as to what progress has been made when Sind, along with Bombay, has ruled the Presidency.

A197. I do not want to prolong the controversy unnecessarily. You said that the Muhammadans want to hold the Hindus in Sind as hostages, in order that the majorities in other Provinces may behave. Is that really the danger? Do you believe in this?—I do, because I have given you the ground.

A198. I am sorry if you do. Then this Constitution, if granted to India, will be a Constitution for mutual harassing, instead of self-government. Now the last question, which is financial incapacity of the Province to administer itself. You will agree that if Sind finds its own funds, you will not oppose separation?—I never suggested that.

A199. So it is only a question of time?—If Sind, not only meets its own deficit at present, but could go on at the rate of progress at which it has been going on with Bombay, then certainly most of my objections would disappear.

A200. If Sind takes it over, promising that they will put on no taxes rather than be linked with Bombay, would you agree with that?—Everybody says somebody else should be taxed.

A201. Without discrimination of communities—no discrimination in method of taxation?—May I submit that under the economic conditions of Sind, there are only about who have individuals of taxable capacity, the big Zamindars, and there is no ghost of a chance of their footing the bill. The Bombay Council, on every occasion, have refused to tax them.

Lord Hutchison of Montrose.

A202. I have only one question. All the points that I wanted to ask have been touched upon. As regards administration, you point out in paragraph 4 of your Memorandum, that if Sind became a separate Province, it would have to borrow officers from other parts of India?—Yes.

A203. And for that reason, there would not be sufficient control over those officers?—Not a great amount of control.

A204. And the argument you give is that administration would be faulty because their future advancement does not lie in the hands, as they would be, of their permanent servants?—That is one reason. The second is that sometimes a comparatively junior official will shoot up into a responsible position, and sometimes very good people rot in subordinate positions.

A205. But, surely, good administration does not depend on the control over the advancement?—It does certainly depend on the efficiency of people. A good many people would like to go to a Province which is sufficiently slow for them.

A206. Is not the administration to-day run very largely by the bulk of the people borrowed from other areas?—That is perfectly true; but the bulk of these men are under the same provincial government at present.

17^o Julii, 1933.] Mr. H. L. CHABLANI and RAI BAHADUR
HIRANAND KHEMSING.

A207. The other question in relation to that is this. Do you think it is necessary for a Minister to enforce his control over the administration and to have the welfare of the officers in his hands?—No. I would certainly welcome that; but under the system contemplated it would not be so.

Lord Eustace Percy.

A208. I should just like, before rising, to ask one question. You have mentioned in your memorandum several cases of unfortunate incidents in Sind, riots, and so on, and you have emphasized that in your verbal evidence. That has taken place under the existing Bombay regime, has it not?—Yes, when the Bombay Government had to retrench Police expenditure.

Sardar M. V. KIBE and Mr. L. M. DESHPANDE are called in and examined as follows.

Lord Eustace Percy.

A212. Sardar Kibe, you are President of the Sardars and Inamdars Association of the Bombay Presidency?—(Sardar Kibe.) Yes.

A213. Mr. Deshpande is President of the Inamdars Central Association, of Satara?—(Mr. Deshpande.) Yes.

A214. You have presented to us a Memorandum with accompanying statements?—(Sardar Kibe.) Yes; they are as follows:—

MEMORANDUM 44 BY THE SARDARS' AND INAMDARS' CENTRAL ASSOCIATION OF THE BOMBAY PRESIDENCY.

On behalf of the Sardars' and Inamdars' Central Association of the Bombay Presidency representing the ancient landed aristocracy and gentry of the Bombay Presidency, we have the honour to submit the following statement to the Joint Parliamentary Committee.

It has been the proud and esteemed privilege of this Association to represent the class of the landed aristocracy and gentry commonly called as "Landholders" before all Parliamentary Committees and Commissions. This Association had on previous occasions presented the views of our class to the Right Honourable Mr. Montague and His Excellency Lord Chelmsford in 1917, to the Parliamentary Franchise and Subjects Committees in 1919, to the Muddiman Committee, to the Simon Commission,

19^o Juli, 1933.]

and to the Franchise Committee presided over by Lord Lothian. Our Association had the honour of being called upon to send representatives to tender oral evidence before all the Committees and Commissions mentioned above.

This Association had also sent a statement to the Second Round Table Conference on behalf of the Sardars and Inamdars of the Bombay Presidency.

Representation.

1. We feel it a misfortune to record that our representation in the Legislature was not increased in proportion to the increase in number of members of the Legislatures by the reforms of 1892, 1909 and 1919, in spite of our strenuous efforts to secure it. It is a great injustice to our class, and we felt keen disappointment when the White Paper not only perpetuated the injustice, but intensified it by not increasing our seats. Our class claims increased and adequate representation consistent with the magnitude of our interests, our historical and political importance, and our great utility to the nation by securing stability and by guiding its progress on sound lines.

2 The Sardars and Inamdars of the Presidency proper (exclusive of Sind) own 2,070½ villages as alienated, the total number of villages in the Bombay Presidency proper being 20,834½. The alienated land revenue of our class is Rs. 1,07,13,995 the total land revenue of the unalienated villages being Rs. 4,80,15,007. It can thus be roughly said that the Sardars and the Inamdars hold one-tenth of the villages of the Presidency proper and one-fourth of its revenue. We urge that the magnitude of our interests entitles us to have adequate representation, and we are not and cannot be satisfied with merely two seats which the White Paper allots to us.

3. Our class has on its lists persons of all religions, castes and communities and we are above all narrow feelings of communalism which is so rampant in the Bombay Presidency at present. Our presence in adequate numbers will be a great asset to the Legislatures.

4. We form an educated and cultured class which has the advantage of coming into direct contact with the public and with the Government and all its Departments, and no class is better fitted for the development and uplift of the villages and the rural population which forms the vast bulk of the population.

5. Paragraphs 147 and 148 of the Montague-Chelmsford Report describe us and lays down the policy with respect to our class as follows —

“The acknowledged and natural leaders in the country areas are the landed aristocracy. They generally represent the ancient and well-born families, and their estates are often the result of conquests or grants from some mediaeval monarch. By position, influence and education they are fitted to take a leading part in public affairs. Some of them are beginning to do so, and our aim must be to call many more of them out into the political lists.”

6. The representatives of our class will always be persons of balanced views and will be of great help to direct the progress of the nation on proper lines.

7. Our class has the largest stake in the country, and with our education and culture, our representatives in the Legislatures will be guided with reason and responsibility.

8. The principles of natural justice entitles us to have an increase in the number of our seats proportionate to the increase in the number of members of the Legislatures.

9. All alienations or Inams are included under the head of land revenue for administrative purposes which has so long been a reserved subject, and the Executive Government is not at present bound by any vote or resolution of the Legislature. Such a resolution of the Legislative Council is merely recommendatory and not binding on the Government. This will change with the advent of provincial autonomy when the land revenue will be a head directly subject to the provincial legislature. Instances can be quoted when the majority party in the Council have tried to rush through anti-landholder legislation, and where the Government at times came to the assistance of the landholders. The experience of the past twelve years has given sufficient proof of the existence of a strong feeling against the landholders' class. A solitary representative of the landholder class cannot meet all adverse criticism under the existing rules in a House of one hundred and seventy-five members, and this aspect strongly strengthens our case for increased and adequate representation.

10. Having regard to all these considerations, we modestly claim twelve seats in the provincial legislature and two in the lower house of the Federal Legislature.

19^o Julii, 1933.]

11. Assuming that the Sardars and the Inamdars are given 12 seats in the Provincial Legislatures we suggest that three seats should be allotted to the Northern Division, four to the Southern and five to the Central Division. Our Association strongly favours plural constituencies with cumulative voting.

Second Chamber for Bombay Presidency.

12. Our Association has strongly been favouring a Second Chamber for the Bombay Presidency. We fail to understand why a Second Chamber was constituted in three Provinces only and not in the Bombay Presidency, where there is a consistent demand for the same. We urge with all force that this question should be reconsidered.

13. The bi-cameral system of Legislature prevails in almost all European countries, and in America which has the reputation of being the most democratic country. The units constituting the American Federation have a Second Chamber. Experience has proved the desirability and utility of a Second Chamber.

14. The Indian Provinces which will constitute the units of a big Federation and which have a population which is divided by acute feelings of castes, communities and religions, the need for a Second Chamber is the greatest. It is inconceivable that at the threshold of a new era of great constitutional reforms, the affairs of the vast areas and populations of the Bombay Presidency should be left to the unrestricted control of a single Chamber. We do not think that the power of veto or the extra-ordinary powers vested in the Governor will be in practice an effective check on hasty, ill-considered or discriminating actions of a single Chamber. The check for over-hasty and panicky or anti-communal legislations must be found from within, and cannot either effectively or for a long time be imposed from without.

15. The necessity for a Second Chamber is more pressing at the initial stage of Provincial autonomy when the Legislature will be new to the Power with which it will be invested, and the voter has yet to learn the value and proper use of the vote.

16. We have the honour of pointing out that there is a clear demand for a Second Chamber in the Bombay Presidency. The Committee of the Bombay Legislative Council co-operating with the Simon Commission, the Bombay Provincial Franchise Committee and the Bombay Government have made definite recommendations for the establishment of a Second Chamber.

17. We are compelled to observe that the recommendations of the White Paper contained in paragraph 74 of the Proposals are like putting the cart before the horse. The real necessity for a Second Chamber exists during the initial stage of the reforms, and the proper course, we suggest, would be to establish a Second Chamber in the Provinces at the outset with provision for its abolition at the end of twenty years if the public opinion favoured such a course.

Guarantees.

18. Our Association has all along been pressing the question of guarantees for safeguarding the property rights resulting from solemn pledges and Sanads given by the Secretary of State on behalf of His Majesty's Government. Our Association feels grateful that the question was favourably considered by His Majesty's Government as announced in paragraph 134 of the White Paper.

19. As observed in paragraph 147 of the Montague - Chelmsford Report, "The estates of the landholders are the result of conquest or grants from some mediaeval monarch." In pre-British times many of the ruling princes and many of the landholders stood practically on the same level. After the introduction of the British Government, "landholders" having extensive territories were constituted into ruling princes by entering into treaties with them. Such of the old magnates as did not then possess extensive estates were not invested with territorial powers and these now constitute the class styled as "landholders" of the Bombay Presidency. Solemn pledges were given and Sanads were issued to them on behalf of the Secretary of State for India as representing His Majesty's Government that their estates would be continued to them from generation to generation without any further increase in land tax or succession duty. Our Association urges that the Indian or Provincial Legislatures should not be given any power to impose any tax on Inams and Saranjams in contravention to the terms of the Sanads and pledges, nor should they have any power to attach, abrogate or curtail an Inam or Saranjam in any way either directly or indirectly, and that specific provisions be inserted in the new Government of India Act to effect this.

20. As stated above, the landholders and the Ruling Princes stood on the same level in pre-British times, the only difference being the extent of their estates and their political importance. While it is unanimously agreed that treaties made with the princes shall be respected, our claim for statutory provision for respecting the Sanads and pledges given by His Majesty's Government is just, modest and reasonable.

19^o Juhii, 1933.]

21. There are many alienations guaranteed and recognised by the British Government which have passed on account of territorial exchange in some Indian States. Such alienations are mentioned either specifically or in general terms in the treaties with the States concerned. These alienations were not included in the calculations of revenues forming the basis of exchange of territories. Fortunately, now the representatives of the Indian States are sitting along with the representatives of British India and His Majesty's Government, and we most earnestly request that specific provision should be made in the new constitution for their undisturbed continuation without any interference or hindrance by such Indian States. The Indian States have no claim over them, and these alienations ought to revert to the British Provinces concerned in case of lapse.

22. In case of any dispute arising with respect to such alienations, the British Courts should have the exclusive power to adjudicate with respect to them.

23. We request that specific provisions should be incorporated in the new constitution which would safeguard undisturbed continuation of such alienations.

We respectfully request Your Lordship and the Honourable Members of the Committee to condone the delay in submitting this statement.

MEMORANDUM 45. SUGGESTED MODIFICATIONS FOR THE BOMBAY PROVINCE.

- (1) Central Division :—
 - (a) Deccan Sardar or Registered holder of an alienated village, 1 seat.
 - (b) Holder of Inami lands assessed at not less than Rs.500/-, 1 seat.
- (2) Southern Division :—
 - (a) Deccan Sardar or Registered holder of an alienated village, 1 seat.
 - (b) Holder of Inami, or Khoti lands assessed at not less than Rs 500/-, 1 seat.
- (3) Northern Division and Bombay Sub-District :—

(a) Gujerat Sardar or Registered holder of an alienated village, 1 seat.

(b) Holder of Inami or Talukdari lands assessed at not less than Rs 500/-, 1 seat.

N B.—Where there are more than one Registered Holder of an alienated village, all the Registered shareholders should have the right to select a delegate from among themselves to record vote for that village.

Total number of seats claimed by the Bombay Landholders is six.

MEMORANDUM 46.

Dharwar (Bombay Presidency),
17th April, 1933.

From H. R. Desai, Esq., B.A., LL.B., M.L.C., Secretary, The Bombay Provincial Sardars and Inamdars' Conference Working Committee, Dharwar (Bombay Presidency), to the Clerk to the Joint Select Committee, House of Lords, London.

SIR,

I have the honour to confirm the following telegram sent to you by me to-day :—

“Bombay Sardars Inamdars Conference Committee offers evidence through M. V. Kibe of Indore.”

The evidence to be submitted on behalf of the Landholders of the Bombay Presidency is on the following points :—

(1) The seats allotted to the Landholders of the Bombay Presidency proper by the White Paper are grossly inadequate. In the present Council, the Presidency proper has only 2 seats for the Landholders, and Sind has 1 seat. In the future Council, with 175 seats, the Presidency proper, with a population of 18 million, will continue to have the same number of seats, viz., 2 for the Landholders, as in the present Council, whereas Sind, with a population of 3.9 million and with a Council consisting of 60 seats will have two seats for Landholders as against one seat allotted at present.

The extent of the interest of the class of Landholders in the Presidency proper has to be taken into account. Nearly one-tenth of the total number of villages in the Presidency proper are held in

Inam, and the "alienated" revenue of all "alienated" holdings (including the Inam villages) is nearly one-fourth the total Land revenue. Further, the importance of this class is specially noted in the Montagu-Chelmsford Report in paragraphs 147 and 148. It may also be noted that the class of Landholders represents almost all the leading castes of the country, viz., Brahmins, Marathas, Lingayats, Jains, and other Hindu castes, including the depressed classes, and also the Mahomedans.

It has also to be noted that questions of land tenure are likely to engage the attention of the Provincial Councils, and it has been regrettable to notice that the tendency of the Councils has been to undermine the position of the Landlords, especially in relation to their tenants. With the large extension of the franchise now proposed, this tendency is likely to be further emphasised in the future, and the Landholders cannot look with equanimity to that future unless they are given sufficient safeguards, of which adequate and separate representation must be one.

There is one more reason why more seats should be allotted to this class. The Presidency proper is comprised of three divisions, the Northern (Gujarat), the Central (Maharashtra) and the Southern (Karnatak, with two Marathi-speaking districts of Ratnagiri and Kolaba). The Sardars and Inamdars of the Northern division have one seat allotted to them, and the Sardars and Inamdars of both the Central and Southern divisions have together only one seat. The Central division includes eight districts, all Marathi speaking, but the Southern division includes six districts, of which four are Kanarese speaking and two are Marathi speaking. Of the four Kanarese-speaking districts one, viz., Karwar, has no Inamdar or Sardar, so that the Kanarese Inamdars and Sardars of the three districts with about 250 voters are always at a disadvantage numerically when they have to compete with the Inamdars of the Marathi-speaking districts, wherein the number of voters for the special constituency is more than 350. The number of voters in the Southern division is equal, if not more, than the number in the Northern division, and there is absolutely no reason why the Southern division should not have at least one seat allotted to it separately, as recommended by the Bombay Government.

(ii) It has to be noted with satisfaction that at page 61, paragraph 134, of the White Paper, reference has been made for the safeguarding of the property rights under Contracts of Sanads or Orders. It is suggested that an illustrative note may be added to the new Government of India Act making specific mention for the safeguarding of the guarantees given by the Secretary of State for India on behalf of the Crown by the issue of Sanads and Orders.

(iii) There should be a Second Chamber in the Bombay Presidency as well. Such a Chamber will, in addition to assuring stability and exerting a steady influence, avert precipitous legislation.

(iv) Agricultural income should not be liable for Income Tax, as it would be a double tax in some cases and would be violating solemn pledges given by express Sanads in others.

The above are the salient points on which evidence is proposed to be given as affecting particularly the class of Landholders of the Bombay Presidency proper.

As regards the selection of the person to submit the evidence, I am directed to suggest the name of Sardar Rao Bahadur Dr. M. V. Kibe, M.A., Ph.D., M.R.A.S., Deputy-Prime Minister of Indore. The Sardar-Saheb had been the President of the third session of the Bombay Provincial Sardars' and Inamdars' Conference held in Dharwar in May, 1931. The Sardar-Saheb had also the unique advantage of having attended the second session of the Round Table Conference, though on behalf of the Indore State, and, while in England for that purpose, had carried on a lot of propaganda work on behalf of the class. It may be mentioned that he has, all along since 1931, been taking an active part in the interests of the Bombay Presidency Sardars and Inamdars and had also been given an opportunity of waiting on His Excellency, the Viceroy, specially for that purpose in 1932. Thus he is eminently fitted to give evidence on behalf of the class before the Joint Parliamentary Committee, and I earnestly pray on behalf of the Conference Working Committee that he should be invited to give evidence.

I have the honour to be,

Sir,

Your most obedient Servant,

MEMORANDUM 47 ON BEHALF OF THE PROVINCIAL CONFERENCE COMMITTEE OF THE SARDARS, INAMDARS, VATANDARS AND TALUKDARS OF THE BOMBAY PRESIDENCY.

1. We present this Statement on behalf of the Bombay Provincial Conference Committee of the Sardars and Inamdars.

The first Provincial Conference was held at Satara under the auspices of the Inamdars' Central Association, Satara. It was due to an idea to widen the scope of the activities of the different Associations for consideration of the problems regarding the class. The Associations are restricted to members and the Conference is open to all.

The second Conference was held at Poona, under the auspices of the Doccans Sardars' and Dumaldars' Sabha, Poona. At the Conference a Resolution was passed creating a constitution and the formation of a working committee. The Committee includes representatives from all the districts.

Most of the Presidents, Vice-Presidents and Secretaries of the different Inamdars' Associations are members of the working body.

The working committee is empowered to carry on the work on behalf of the Conference. The working committee decided at its meeting to present a case before the Joint Select Committee in London.

It is submitted that the extent of the interest of the class of landholders in the Presidency proper has to be taken into account. Nearly one-tenth of the total number of villages in the Presidency proper are held in Inam and the alienated revenue is nearly one-fourth of the total land revenue. Further, the importance of this class is specially noted in the Montague-Chelmsford Report, paragraphs 147 and 148. It may also be noted that the class of landholders represents almost all the castes of the Province including the Depressed Classes and the Mahomedans.

We beg to quote below two extracts from the Montague-Chelmsford Report, paragraphs 147 and 148 already referred to:—

“(1) The natural and acknowledged leaders in country areas are the landed aristocracy. They generally represent the ancient and well-born families and their estates are often the result of conquest or grants from some mediaeval monarchs. By position, influence and education they are fitted to take a leading part in public affairs. Some of them are beginning to do so and our aim must be to call many more of them out into the political list, they are conservative like the ryot but like him they also will learn the need to move with changing times.”

(2) “No men are better qualified to advise with understanding and great natural shrewdness on the great mass of rural question which will come before the Provincial Legislature.”

2. The landed aristocracy of the Bombay Presidency is most important in the history of India. It has founded empires, led armies, fought battles and was chiefly responsible for the Civil and Military administration of this country. This constituency is free from any communal bias as only the special interest is recognised in forming it.

3. The preservation intact of this class is not only a necessity, but solemn engagements made with it by way of Sanads or specific orders by the past rulers, and the British Government ought to be guaranteed in future. It has to be noted with satisfaction that at page 61, paragraph 134 of the White Paper, reference has been made for the safeguarding of the property rights existing under Statutes and contracts. It is further submitted that there should be a specific clause in the future Government of India Act making a definite provision for the safeguarding of the guarantees given by the Secretary of State for India on behalf of the Crown by the issue of Sanads or orders.

4. There should be a Second Chamber in the Bombay Presidency as well. Such a Chamber will, in addition to assuring stability and exerting a steady influence, avert any precipitous legislation. In such a Chamber alone can this class have representation adequate to its status and stake in the country. The second Chamber has been recommended by the Government of Bombay on reconsideration.

5. Agricultural income should not be liable for income-tax as it would be a double tax and would be violating solemn pledges given by express Sanads and orders and would be against the established usage and principle underlying taxation.

6. At present there is no representation of the land-holding class in the Council of State. We propose that a separate constituency of landholders be formed to return at least one member to the future Federal Council of State from every Province in India.

7. The representation of the landholders in the Federal Assembly as proposed in the White Paper, is inadequate. It should be increased in proportion to its increased strength.

8. In the White Paper proposals, only two seats have been allotted to the landholders in the Bombay Provincial Legislative Assembly. This representation ought to have been enlarged in proportion to the enlargement of the present Legislative Council. The Government of Bombay have repeatedly recommended three seats to be allotted to them, one each for the Northern, Southern and Central Division. We hold about one-tenth of the total number of villages in this Presidency as Inam and about one-fourth of the revenue of the Presidency proper is alienated. Though the number of our Inam villages is about 2,075 still the number of voters in our constituency is only about 700 in the three Divisions of the Presidency proper, as the qualification for a voter is to be the sole holder of an entire alienated village both for the Legislative Council and the Assembly. This reason for the smallness of our constituency is lost sight of by the people generally. The removal of this restriction and further extension of the franchise to joint registered holders of an alienated village, to holders of alienated land (apart from an alienated village) assessed at not less than Rs.500/- and to Khots holding lands assessed at not less than Rs.500/-, will considerably enlarge the constituency. This widening of the franchise will, while not impairing its character, increase the number of voters. The variety and vastness of the interests which we have must be taken into consideration while allotting seats to our class. Not only this, but the exigencies of the rules guiding the procedure in the Council must also be taken into consideration for the increase in the number of our seats.

The representations of the Bombay Landholders on the Provincial Assembly compares very unfavourably when we consider the ratio of the landholders' seats to the total number of seats in it, as would be seen in Appendix 3, Part I, of the White Paper.

From this class from 1862 to 1892 one representative was nominated to the Provincial Council. By the Reforms of 1892 the Sardars of the Deccan were enfranchised and given the right to send one representative to the Provincial Council. In 1909 one representative from Gujarat Sardars was taken in addition to one of the Deccan Sardars. As the result of our deputations and representations, in the Reforms of 1919, the constituency was enlarged by the addition of Inamdars and Jahagirdars, but the number of representatives to be sent from the Presidency proper was kept the same, viz., 2, i.e., with all the expansion of the Council from time to time, the Deccan Sardars are in the same position as they were in 1862.

It is often argued that there is no necessity of special representation to the landholders in the Legislatures when they can well be elected through the general constituencies. In this connection, it must be remembered that in the general constituency election, unless the landholder, Sardar or Jahagirdar, champions the cause and goes under the ticket of some Party, such as Communal, Liberal, Nationalist, Congress, etc., there is no chance of his success. He is, moreover, bound by the mandate of his constituency and as such cannot put forward the special view point of the class to which he belongs. Class representation is altogether different from communal representation.

By their position as Inamdars, members of this class are familiar with the difficulties of administration. No class is better fitted to represent the rural areas than this class, as it is the only class with culture and education that comes directly in contact with the rural areas.

9. There should be a specific clause in the new Government of India Act, or in the Instrument of Instructions, regarding the enlistment in higher Public Services—both civil and military—of the landholders' class. This class would most faithfully and loyally play their part in those services, as they have got a real stake in the country and traditions behind them. Their loyalty, which has invariably stood the test, deserves to be regarded, by guaranteeing to them a fair percentage in the Public Services in all departments of the future Government of India and thus they should be called upon to take their proper share in the administration of the country as already proposed by the Right Honourable Sir Samuel Hoare in his Despatch of December last to the Government of India.

MEMORANDUM 48 ON BEHALF OF THE DECCAN SARDARS AND DUMALDARS SABHA, POONA.

We beg to present this Statement on behalf of the Deccan Sardars and Dumaldars Sabha, Poona, in order to put forth the case of the Landholders of India in general and of the Bombay Province in particular.

This class of landholders is the most stable element of the population. The chances of the landholders securing return in the future through the general constituencies is correspondingly less, as the franchise to be introduced in the Federal and provincial legislatures is such that representation will be increasingly popular in character. The existing landholder-electors in different provinces consist, in the main, of men of position, who exercise an important influence in the countryside, who have the means and leisure to travel and acquire experience beyond their own locality. They are well-qualified to speak with authority on matters affecting agriculture and rural life which will inevitably bulk prominently in the business in the provincial legislatures. These are some of the facts which have been unmistakably admitted by all the Provincial Governments, the Provincial Simon Committees and the Government of India regarding the position and status of the landholding class in India.

In the White Paper proposals only two seats have been allotted to the landholders in the Bombay Provincial Legislative Assembly. This representation ought to have been enlarged at least in proportion to the enlargement of the present Legislative Council. At least three seats ought to have been allotted to them, one each for the Northern, Southern and Central Division Landholders, as was originally recommended by the Government of Bombay. We hold about one-tenth of the total number of villages in this presidency as Inam, and about one-fourth of the revenues of the Presidency proper is alienated. Though the number of our Inam villages is about 2,075, still the number of voters in our constituency is only about 700 in those three divisions, the qualification for a voter being the sole holder of an entire alienated village both for the Legislative Council and the Assembly. But this fact is always lost sight of by the people generally. The vastness of the interests which we have got must be taken into consideration while distributing seats to our class.

From this class, from 1862 to 1892, one representative was nominated to the Provincial Council. By the reforms of 1892, the Sardars of the Deccan were enfranchised and given the right to send one representative to the Provincial Council. In 1909 one representative from Gujerat Sardars was taken in addition to the one on behalf of the Deccan Sardars. By the reforms of 1919, the constituency was enlarged by the addition of Inamdars and Jahagirdars, but the number of representatives to be sent by all of them was kept the same, viz., three, that is, with all the expansion of the Council from time to time the Deccan Sardars and Inamdars are in the same position as they were in 1862.

It is often argued that there is no necessity of special representation to the landholders in the legislatures when they can very well be elected through the general constituencies. In this connection it must be remembered that in the general constituency elections, unless the landholder-Sardar or Inamdar, champions the cause of and goes under the ticket of some party, such as communal, liberal, nationalist, Congress, etc., there is no chance of his success. Class representation is altogether different from communal representation.

The presence of this class in adequate numbers will serve as a healthy check on hasty and ill-considered legislation. These representatives having a very big stake in the country will always be persons of balanced views, and their voting will be guided by reason and sense of responsibility.

The landed aristocracy of the Bombay Presidency is most important in the history of India. It has founded empires, led armies, fought battles and was chiefly responsible for the civil and military administration of this country. This constituency is free from any communal bias. Only the special interest is recognised in forming this constituency. This constituency consists of all castes, creeds and communities.

19^o July, 1933.]

Their special advantage is that by their position as Inamdars they are able to understand the difficulties of administration. No class is better fitted to represent the rural areas than this class, as it is the only class with culture and education that comes directly in contact with the rural areas.

We beg to quote below two extracts from the Montagu-Chelmsford Report, paragraphs 147 and 148:—

(1) "The natural and acknowledged leaders in country areas are the landed aristocracy. They generally represent the ancient and well-born families, and their estates are often the result of conquest or grants from some mediaeval monarch. By position, influence and education they are fitted to take a leading part in public affairs. Some of them are beginning to do so; and our aim must be to call many more of them out into the political lists. They are conservative like the ryot, but like him they also will learn the need to move with changing times."

(2) "No men are better qualified to advise with understanding and great natural shrewdness on the great mass of rural question which will come before the Provincial Legislature."

This class of landholders has always stood by the side of Government in keeping law and order in the country, in spite of the odium that they have incurred at the hands of the general public and in some cases even at the risk of their life.

Under the circumstances stated above, we strongly propose that representation to this class in both the legislatures should be increased in proportion to their interests.

At present there is no representation of the landholding class in the Council of State. We propose that a separate constituency of landholders be formed to return at least one member to the future Federal Council of State from every Province in India.

There is no provision in the White Paper for a Second Chamber in the Bombay Province. In view of the recent happenings, agitations and movements in this presidency during the last five years, a Second Chamber is, in our opinion, necessary, which would surely serve to check the hasty and ill-considered decisions of the provincial legislative assemblies.

As the future legislatures are going to be very democratic in character, this class keenly feels the necessity of inserting in the future constitution Act a specific clause of guarantee for the unmolested and undisturbed possession and enjoyment of their Inams, Jahagirs, Votans, cash allowances, etc., which the British Government have recognised, confirmed and continued by issuing their Sanads, Executive Orders, etc. No Indian legislature should have any power to meddle with them or their rights and privileges, hitherto guaranteed to them by the Secretary of State.

We earnestly request you to kindly insert a specific clause in the new Government of India Act or in the instrument of instructions regarding the claim for Public Services of the Landholders' Class. This class would most faithfully and loyally play their part in those services, as they have got a real stake in the country and traditions behind them. Their loyalty, which has so far stood test, deserves to be rewarded by guaranteeing to them a fair percentage in the Public services in all departments in the future Government of India and thus they should be called upon to take their proper share in the administration of the country as already proposed by the Right Honourable Sir Samuel Hoare in his despatch of December last to the Government of India.

We may state here that no representative of the landholders of the Bombay Province was nominated as a delegate to any of the last three Round Table Conferences held in England. The land tenures of the Bombay Presidency are quite different from those of the other Provinces in India. The Zemindari system in Bengal, United Provinces, and Bihar and Orissa and the Malguzari system in the Central Provinces are quite different from the system of alienations in the Bombay Province.

We are, therefore, very much grateful to the Committee for kindly complying with our telegrams and inviting Sardar M. V. Kibe of Indore to give evidence before the Joint Parliamentary Select Committee in London on behalf of the Landholders of the Bombay Presidency.

A215. Do you wish to add anything to your Memorandum and statements before cross-examination begins? — (Sardar Kibe.) Yes, my Lord, I wish to make a statement. I think it is desirable that at the outset I should indicate the broad general principles on which these representations are based. The considerable class which comprises the Bombay Presidency land-holders has no parallel in other parts of India. It consists of Jahagirdars or, to use a local term, Saramdamdars, Taluqudars, Inamdars and Watandars. All these are commonly known as Dumaldars, that is, landowners in respect of whom Government dues are either strictly limited or non-existent. These proprietors of the soil lay claim to the great antiquity of their order as descended from the ancient Hindu kingdoms of Western India. Another class of Inamdars, known as Khots, predominates in the Southern Division and is also to be found in the Central Division of the Presidency. They are the descendants of persons who colonised and brought under cultivation uninhabited jungle. Successive rulers of the land confirmed the status of the old and created new families, conferring rights and leaving limited obligations on them. The British Government has done the same. In old days the Jahagirdar class performed military duties but in these peaceful times in consideration of the surrender by them to the State of some portion of their domains or some such consideration such service has ceased to be obligatory. The only obligation on this class now is to pay the Nazarana or duty on succession. The Taluqudars who are mainly found in Guzarat have sprung from ruling houses and, like the Jahagirdars, differ from the autonomous States only in having no civil or criminal jurisdiction in their estates. The Inamdars are a vast and varied class, being owners of one or more villages or even scattered lands of varying extent. Their full proprietorship is recognised by the Government and no revenue is levied on them except in the form of some mutually agreed sum. The Watandars are a large class of service tenure holders and are remunerated in cash or land or both. In respect to all these landholders, unlike those in other Provinces, there is no question of conflict of interest between them and their tenants. Unfortunately, the act of the Bombay Government in applying the Land Revenue Code to these estates led to serious infringement of old-established rights. Although the tenures of the landholders are governed by different codes such as the Talqudari Code or the Khoti Act, their special interests are not always kept in view when changes are made in the Land Revenue Code. It would be even more unfortunate for the tenants than for the landowners if there were departure from the long accepted principle of the exemption from the agricultural income from direct taxation. The point to be chiefly emphasised is that definite assurances were given when the British Government conquered or annexed the territories now comprising the Presidency proper, mostly from the Peshwa. I quote a high authority, Mr. A. K. Nairne, whose "Handbook for Revenue Officers," first published in 1872, still has authoritative value. He says "The continuance of all Watans, Inam Lands, established pensions, and Annual Allowances was guaranteed by our Government to all those who should withdraw from the Service of Bajirao, while on his surrender all Jahagirdars who had adhered to his cause and all Brahmans and religious establishments supported by his family were likewise secured in their possessions." Further, all these holders of land were separately assured of their rights by the grant of Sanads from the British Government from about 1818 onwards. This historical fact is only too lightly to be forgotten and the nature of relations with Government to be obscured unless there is acceptance by Parliament of the appeal made in the Memoranda I submit for the inalienable rights of the landowners to be embodied in the forthcoming Statute. Writing on this subject, the great Sir John Malcolm, who was the Governor of Bombay (1827-30), laid it down that: "Where any circumstances call for the interference of the British Government or an engagement or guarantee is given no departure from that is permitted. It is indeed by the maintenance of the impression that the signature and seal of the British officer is, to whomsoever granted, the completest of all securities for his rights, privileges or possessions that our power over the multiplicity of States and Chiefships depends, and it is above all others a point upon which we can never with safety admit the slightest evasion, much less deviation." In view of such assurances, it cannot be questioned that the unimpaired preservation of the rights acknowledged or granted to the landholders by Sanads by His Majesty's Government are no less binding than the similar engagement made with the Indian States. While the landed aristocracy of the Bombay Presidency is in complete agreement with the declared policy of the British Government to bring the Indian people to self-government, it cannot but press that its just rights should be guaranteed in the Constitutional Act. All the suggestions or demands made in the Memoranda, I submit, turn on this vital issue. The writers cherish the belief that the justice of the claim will appeal to the Committee.

A216. Thank you, very much?—On a particular point about the representation, Mr. Deshpande wishes to submit a note.

A217. Is that a written note again on the subject of representation?—(Mr. Deshpande) It is a typewritten note.

A218. Would it meet your views equally well if it was handed in, instead of putting you to the trouble of reading it?—It is quite short.

A219. Very well?—(I am a member of the Inamdars Central Association, Satara, and of the Deccan Sardars and Dumaldars Sabha, Poona; I am a member of the Working Committee elected by the Conference; I was a member of the Bombay Legislative Council from 1927-1930.) The comparative table of the number of seats allotted to the landholders' special constituencies in the provinces clearly shows that the Bombay Presidency proper has been very badly treated so far as the number allotted to them in the special constituency is concerned. The reason for this appears to be that the Statutory Commission expressed the view that the owners of the larger estates who are in the electorate of the special landlords' constituencies are at present returned to the Legislatures through the general constituencies in such numbers that "the special protection now furnished can safely be withdrawn." Whatever may be true as regards other Provinces, I submit, with due deference to the Commission, that so far as the Bombay Presidency proper is concerned, the view is not correct. The number of seats occupied by persons who are in the electorate of the Special Landlords' Constituency has seldom gone beyond five or six at any time and, looking to the vast interest they have in the presidency, this number, even in the present Council, cannot be considered large. This is due to the peculiarity of the Landholders' Constituency, which in addition to title holders gives the right to vote to a sole alienee of an entire village. Alienation of the Royal share of Revenue—no matter whether it is coupled with the proprietary right in the soil or otherwise—is the principal feature of the constituency and hence it differs practically from all other similar special constituencies in other Provinces. The Landholders in this Presidency proper, therefore, never got their due share and now their position has gone from bad to worse inasmuch as they are given the same number of seats in a house which is to contain double the present number. The difference in the demand in the number of seats in the two memoranda is to be attributed to this, because one wants its equitable share while the other is content with at least the minimum number of seats. Further, the constituents of the Conference have thought it advisable to increase the number of their votes by extending the franchise so as to include persons who hold alienated lands assessed at not less than Rs. 500 and that the co-sharers of an entire village should have a right to select one from amongst them to vote in the constituency. Both these are quite consistent with the principal features of the constituency. This will substantially increase the number of voters, and the seats claimed by the Central Inamdars' Association would appear quite reasonable. A glance at the proposed representation to this Special Constituency in the Presidency as a whole will show the necessity of the increase. Bombay Presidency consists of four principal divisions. They are Sind, N.D. (Gujerath), C.D. (Maharashtra), S.D. (Karnatak). Two seats are allotted to Sind Division which is admittedly backward than the other divisions in many respects. Next comes N.D., which includes 269 entire alienated villages and is given one seat. And, lastly, come the C.D. and S.D., each of which contains 1,044 and 713 entire alienated villages respectively, but both together are given one seat. It is not known why such an iniquitous division is made in the allotment. The Government of Bombay appear to have noticed the injustice done to C.D. and S.D. and in their Memorandum to the Statutory Commission in 1928, have recommended that three seats should be allotted to the Presidency proper, i.e., one for each Division. This new recommendation also appears to have gone unheeded and the new proposals only reiterate what is still going on. The Landholders' Constituency has, therefore, approached the Joint Committee to place the facts before them with a hope that justice will be done in the allotment of seats and in the increase of seats, as put forward in the Memorandum. There is equally a necessity of giving increased representation at the Centre. Second Chamber. The Landholders of the Presidency are strongly in favour of a Second Chamber in the Province. The Government of Bombay also have recommended the same and, therefore, there should be no difficulty in giving a Second Chamber to this Province.

A220. There is just one point in your Memorandum, which I think it is only fair to you to comment on in one word to begin with. In paragraph 18 of the Memorandum from the Central Association, you refer to Proposal 134 in the White Paper, and you assume that that proposal in the White Paper is intended to give some security to the landholders in respect of their Sanads or privileges. I think I ought to say that, as I understand it, Proposal 134 of the White Paper is not intended to have any such effect; it is intended to be confined only to statutory or contractual rights under contracts with the Secretary of State, and would hardly extend to anything, for instance, like the permanent settlement in Bengal or analogous privileges elsewhere?—(Sardar Kibe.) I should like to submit some observations on this remark.

A221. Certainly; perhaps we can defer that till we have examined you?—Yes.

Sir Reginald Craddock

A222. You represent landholders of great antiquity, you were saying?—Yes.

A223. Some of those grants that were extended to you were found by the British Government in existence and extended to you?—Yes.

A224. Were they all in perpetuity or for a certain life or lives?—Those which are existing at present are for perpetuity; those that were given for life have already expired.

A225. Some of them went on for two or three generations?—Yes. They are all given in perpetuity.

A226. Those that are left?—Yes.

A227. And does Mr. Deshpande belong to the same class of landholder?—(Mr. Deshpande.) Yes.

A228. Or have you got in some Provinces, both in Berar and the Central Provinces, certain Deshpande allowances?—Yes.

A229. Besides the life?—Yes, we have, and there are the Watans and Inam Lands. Now they are all in perpetuity, nothing for life.

A230. Then as landlords of your lands, are your tenants protected at all?—Certain lands stand on quite a different footing from those of the Inamdars. The Watandars have a proprietary right in the soil as well as a royal share in the revenue.

A231. That is to say, that no tenants of your land acquire any rights?—No tenants acquire any rights.

A232. In the case of Inamdars, who have got whole villages?—In the case of villages, the case is somewhat different because in the records the names of such tenants appear in the account books. They are the tenants of the soil and the Inamdar has to recover their dues as fixed by the settlement by Government, from time to time, in the case of villages where survey settlement is extended. There are some other villages to which the survey settlement has not been extended, and there the right is up to three times the assessment thereof.

A233. That is to say, you charge up to three times the assessment?—Yes, but there are very few villages of this kind; but in the Central Division almost all the villages have been surveyed.

A234. That is to say, they are protected tenants?—They are protected tenants.

A235. How can their rent be raised?—In the Southern Division, many of the villages have not been surveyed and there the Inamdars come on their right to increase up to three times the assessment.

A236. That is to say, if you charge a tenant more than three times the assessment on your land, the tenant can secure redress, can he?—No; the position is quite the reverse. The Inamdar cannot charge three times of his own; he has to go to the Revenue Court or Civil Court before he can demand anything more.

A237. But they are protected adequately?—They are protected, yes.

A238. The point I wanted to bring out was: You are asking protection to yourselves for your grants in perpetuity, that the Land Revenue demand should not be increased on yourselves?—That is so.

A239. I just wanted to find out how far your tenants had some protection from the landlord?—There is that protection according to law now.

A240. You do not know the term Mokhasa?—I know it, but it is seldom applied in the Bombay Presidency.

A241. That, of course, is the usual Maratha term?—Yes, I know the term, but it has no legal meaning, in so far as the Bombay Presidency is concerned.

A242. There is a distinction between the Mokhasa and the Mokashi?—Yes. The Mokashi is the head of the village, but that is not legally acknowledged.

A243. Then what you are afraid of is, supposing that you do not get enough representation on the Council, the additional amendment that you ask for, that the future Government will cancel your grants, or what are you afraid of?—They may if they choose to do so.

A244. The whole practice for all these years has been that those Revenue free grants are in perpetuity, and no Government has ever, to my knowledge, forfeited any of those grants, ever since British Rule began?—That is so.

A245. And before that, if there was a Raj, and an Imandar displeased him exceedingly, he might possibly forfeit his grant?—Yes.

A246. But the British Government has not done so?—No.

A247. Are there any other conditions in which you hold your Sanads? Have you the condition of loyalty to the British Parliament?—Yes, there is that.

A248. And you have never made any attempt to cancel it on those grounds, I suppose?—No. We do not want that that condition should be dispensed with; we only want that the condition should be there, as well as the other part of the contract, that it will be continued permanently, should also be there.

Sir Hari Singh Gour.

A249. I understand your contention to be that you want larger representation in the local Council and the Federal Assembly with a view to safeguard your special interests?—(Sardar Kibe.) Yes.

A250. Now the interests that you have acquired are either justiceable or they are not?—Yes.

Sir Hari Singh Gour.] If they are justiceable, you have no grievance at all, because you have the right of recourse to the Civil Courts?

Sir Reginald Craddock.

A251. I do not know whether Sir Hari Singh Gour is aware of the point that Revenue-free grants (at all events, they are in the Central Provinces, and probably also in Bombay) are withdrawn from the jurisdiction of the Civil Courts?—Some of these grants are regarded as political grants.

Sir Hari Singh Gour.

A252. So far as the protection is justiceable, you have no grievance?—That is a question to be argued, we have some doubt about it.

A253. But you must have taken legal advice?—That question has never come before the Courts.

A254. Then it is a doubtful question, at any rate. You have no certain grievance. Subject to what the legal opinion might be, you have no definite grievance?—Exactly.

255. There remain the question of matters which are non-justiceable and which are entirely within the discretion of the Revenue officers. Is that not so?—Yes, with the Government.

A256. With the Executive Government?—Yes.

A257. Now in what way would you be able to influence the decision of the Executive Government by having one extra seat in the local Council?—We want representation in the Council. We have pointed out three reasons for having extra representation in the Council—more than one; that is in paragraph 8 of the Memorandum.

A258. But I am analysing those reasons, and asking you to convince me as to what measure of protection you are likely to get by having an additional seat in the Bombay Council. You have got one seat in the Federal Assembly?—Yes.

A259. You want another seat?—Yes—two at least.

Lord Eustace Percy.

A260. The maximum demand is six?—No, twelve in the Provincial Council.

Sir Hari Singh Gour.

A261. You want four more seats in the Provincial Council?—Yes.

A262. And in the Federal Assembly?—In the Federal Assembly we have one. We want one more, because the number of members has increased.

A263. Now I was dealing with the non-justiceable claims, and I want to know in what way you will be able to protect your non-justiceable claims by having four seats in the Local Council and one in the Central Legislature?—The fact is, as I have stated in my memorandum there are different classes of these Inamdars, and their viewpoints are also different.

A264. I have studied all that question, as you know, I am connected with the same tenure as you are, but my point of view is that you want to have four extra seats in the Local Council and one extra seat in the Federal Council. I want to know in what way you are likely to influence the decision of the Local Council and of the Federal Assembly with regard to the protection of your rights?—Apart from our main request for a guarantee, there are several things which arise as regards the disputes between tenants and Inamdars, and so on, and there have been instances in the Bombay Legislative Council in which new taxes have been imposed on these people. Mr. Deshpande will quote one instance of that, and that is given also in the Report of the Bombay Government to the Statutory Commission.

A265. What I want to know is how will six seats out of 175 improve your position?—We simply wish that all our points of view shall be placed before the Council.

A266. Two members can do as much as six?—Yes.

A267. That depends upon the personality of the members?—The tenures are different.

A268. But you are only represented by your mouthpiece, two are as good as six, provided they represent the special grievance you have in the matter?—We say that one or two members are probably not able to explain all the points of view.

A269. That is all your grievance?—Yes.

A270. Your grievance is that two members will not be able to explain your point of view?—Yes.

A271. But when you have these different tenures, it is only one Executive Officer who decides the question?—Sometimes the collectors decide the question.

A272. You have got two here to represent you?—Yes. An increased number of members have been given to other constituencies.

A273. Your whole point of view is that, because there has been a general increase, your proportion should also be increased?—I would not quite agree to that, but we give reasons for having asked for the increase.

A274. I am trying to examine those very reasons. As regards the Second Chamber, the general view in Bombay is against the establishment of a Second Chamber?—No, the Bombay Government has favoured it.

A275. Do you remember what the Provincial Committee before the Simon Commission said? Do you remember that there was the Provincial Committee which co-operated with the Simon Commission?—Yes, but I think even before that Committee there were some Members who asked—

A276. I am not concerned with individual opinions. I am only concerned with the collective opinion of the Bombay Provincial Committee?—I submit that some Members of the Committee, perhaps the majority, were of that opinion, but there were others who held a different view.

A277. The Committee, as a whole, was against the establishment of a Second Chamber. That is right, is it not?—The Bombay Government has urged that there should be two Chambers.

A278. And the Simon Commission did not recommend the establishment of a Second Chamber?—No.

A279. What fresh facts have since been elicited which justify you in asking the Joint Committee to take a different view?—For that I must refer to the different views which have been expressed by people in different Provinces, also in favour of a Second Chamber.

A280. Those are matters of opinion are they not?—Of course.

A281. And there can be two opinions on the same subject?—Yes, but that will not go against me, I suppose.

A282. Now as regards the claim that the Land Revenue demand should not be increased, is that your claim?—We pay no Land Revenue to the Government.

A283. The Watandars, some of the tenure holders, pay Land Revenue?—It is not Land Revenue, as such, but some agreed sum with the Government.

A284. Let us not call it the Land Revenue, let us call it the due. You say that your land dues should not be increased?—I would not call them land dues, but I would submit that for certain things the Government agree with us that they will take this much and will exempt us from any further service or anything of the sort.

Sir Reginald Craddock.

A285. You have a quit rent?—Yes, only a very small amount out of the Revenue. (Mr. Deshpande.) There are certain cases in which the Inamdars have not to pay anything to the Government and they are quite free.

Sir Hari Singh Gour.

A286. Then whatever you may call it, you may call it a demand or a due or a quit rent—by whatever name you call it, what you say is that whatever you have been paying, you must continue to pay. Now what do you want to say about that right?—(Sardar Kibe.) Perhaps, I should explain one more thing; that is that when the British Government settled with these Inamdars in the Bombay Presidency, for those whose rights were examined by the Shaw Commission, their rights were admitted, but for others, they said, "If you do not want that your right should be examined, then pay us so much every year and we will give you proprietary rights on that account," and that has been done, and no further demand will be made.

A287. That is a historical fact, a very interesting fact, but it does not come near the point I am making. I want you, please, to tell me, if you can, this. You say that a quit rent or a demand that has been up to now payable by you should not be increased, is it not so?—Yes.

A288. How do you want that to be done?—We want to be safeguarded in respect of our general right.

A289. In what way? That something should be inserted in the Constitutional Act, that so many Inamdars and so many Sardars of the Bombay Presidency shall hold their tenure for all time and will not be liable to pay any increased rent?—Yes.

A290. But then altogether you are very much better off on account of railways, post-offices and telegraphs, and the general improvement in the conditions and social life of the people?—Some local cesses have been levied.

A291. Who has to pay for all that?—I should submit that some local cesses have been levied too, but the Inamdars have not objected. For instance, the local fund, and so on, and we pay for these improvements.

A292. Then you are prepared to pay, in spite of your contract, extra sums for the benefits received?—That will be a political question.

A293. But you have said so just now?—Yes, we have hitherto paid.

A294. Then what is your grievance? The Government of the future will only make you pay what is justly due from you?—(Mr. Deshpande.) We are not willing to pay anything more, and why we want a safeguard is for this reason, that there may be some persons who would like to have this Revenue. This has not been given free; they have been given for some consideration already, and for services rendered, so when there is a contract to the effect that this shall be continued perpetually, they may not be prevailed upon to increase their demand on these lands.

A295. But in one sentence, do your rights create a legal obligation or a moral obligation?—(Sardar Kibe.) Both.

A296. If it is a legal obligation, it is justiceable; if it is a moral obligation, it will be considered by the Executive Government?—But I say it is legal and moral.

A297. If it is legal, you are protected?—Protected because we have to go to law.

Lord Eustace Percy.] May I just say, before the examination continues, that we have had, of course, the other landholders before us already, before the full Committee, and you did not attend then, because you could not arrive, I think, soon enough. As we have been over all the general questions of exemption, and so on, before, I think, perhaps, the Committee and the Delegates will feel that we could confine ourselves this morning to the special features of the Bombay case.

Dr. Shafa' at Ahmad Khan.] To the Memorandum itself?

Lord Eustace Percy.] Yes.

Dr. Shafa' at Ahmad Khan.

A298. Sardar Kibe, you said just now, I think, in the statement you read out that you would be prepared and others would be prepared to accept the reform if your rights were safeguarded?—(Sardar Kibe.) Yes.

A299. And you thought, until the Lord Chairman pointed out otherwise, that paragraph 134 of the White Paper adequately safeguarded your right?—If we had that fully, then we would not have made the Prayer to insert a section in the Act.

A300. Now, after knowing that this paragraph does not completely or even partially safeguard your rights, would you suggest to the Committee any alternative proposal whereby your rights could be safeguarded?—Our Prayer is that there should be explicit mention in the Act that the Sanads granted to the Bombay landholders will be safeguarded. The rights given by the Sanads will not come before the Legislatures; that is what we say.

A301. Do you really think that the Constitution could go into the details of the various kinds of tenures held in various Provinces? Is it possible for a Constitution Act to do that? I am not talking of an Act passed by the local

Legislature or the Central Legislature, but I am speaking of the fundamental instrument of Government. Do you think it is possible for the framers of the Constitution to go into all the minutiae of the Land Revenue administration?—Our submission is that our Sanads are in the nature of contracts, and, therefore, they should be safeguarded. (Mr. Deshpande.) If the present Section 134, as it is worded, does not admit of the interpretation which some of us think can be put upon it, then the addition of the word "Sanad" will, I think, probably, remedy the whole thing.

A302. Are you sure that the "Sanad" could be added in the context, which may refer to an entirely different subject altogether?—If "contract" does not include Sanads, then Sanads will have to be specifically mentioned, just as treaties with chiefs and rulers were mentioned. Just as treaties are respected, similarly, Sanads should be respected.

A303. But do you think that if this provision is inserted, you would not be prepared to pay your equitable share in the demands which may be made by the local government in future for the social advancement of the country?—There are so many other demands which we are paying and which we will pay, but not upon the particular land upon which we are exempt. We have to pay for many other things to the Government; there are many taxes we have to pay, and we do pay, but we only want that this very income should not be additionally taxed.

A304. I can only tell you this, that in my own Province the landholders have been obliged to remit several crores of their rent in one year alone, and, therefore, if you insist upon this, I am afraid there will be very little possibility of any law being passed for the improvement of the condition of the tenants. You do not exclude the possibility of legislation being introduced which, while safeguarding your position and giving you adequate compensation if necessary, will also improve the position of your tenants?—The position of the tenants is there according to the Land Revenue Code. Their position has been protected.

A305. I am not talking of the present time; I am speaking of the future. Supposing the Legislative Council of Bombay or the Legislative Assembly brings in a Tenancy Bill with a view to giving them what is called a "statutory" right, a word which is very familiar to us in the United Provinces, life tenures, and convert tenants at will into tenants for life, would you be prepared to concede this right to the tenants?—I say that does exist at present.

Sir Reginald Craddock] It would in the Bombay Presidency.

Dr. Shafa'at Ahmad Khan.

A306. So you are prepared for tenancy legislation being introduced if necessary, if your rights are safeguarded?—Irrespective of this thing, the tenancy rights will be there.

A307. Now in paragraph 9 of your memorandum, you say: "Instances can be quoted where the major party in the Council have tried to rush through anti-landholder legislation, and where the Government at times came to the assistance of the landholders." Have there been many instances of this kind?—(Sardar Kibe.) Yes, I have a note here which will give all the instances.

A308. During the last 11 years?—I have got a note here which gives those instances from 1925, and there are several instances.

A309. I take it that you desire increased representation in the Bombay Legislative Assembly, not because that by itself will completely safeguard your position, but because it will be one of the means of voicing your genuine grievances in the Assembly?—Exactly.

A310. That is not the only way of safeguarding your interests?—No.

A311. But it is one of the means of keeping prominently in view the peculiar and special position you hold in the province?—Exactly.

A312. You say in paragraph 14 of the same memorandum, that: "The Indian Provinces which will constitute the units of a big Federation and which have a population which is divided by acute feelings of caste, communities and religions, the need for a Second Chamber is the greatest." Do you not think that in making a demand for a Second Chamber you should take into account the Resolution or the opinion of the Provincial Legislative Council on this subject, instead of taking the opinion of individuals?—That point was not put before the Bombay Legislative Council, either by the Governor or by any Member of it, but this question was raised in the Legislative Assembly at Delhi.

A313. For Bombay?—Yes, for Bombay, in April, 1933, but as the whole debate, I think, proved abortive, no Resolution was passed upon that.

A314. So there is no organised opinion in the Legislature which is in favour of a Second Chamber in the Province?—The question of Bombay was never before the Legislature. (Mr. Deshpande.) All the same, the Government of Bombay have recommended that there should be a Second Chamber.

A315. That we know, I am only talking of the Provincial Legislative Council?—(Sardar Kibe.) Yes.

Sir P. Pattani.

A316. Only one question. I take it your main contention is that your Sanad rights should remain undisturbed under the new Constitution?—Yes.

A317. That is, that your Sanads should receive the same regard for consideration at the hands of the reformed Councils as they have received from the present Government?—Exactly.

A318. On the ground that they must receive the same respect as the Sanads in the jurisdiction of the Princes, because promises given by the present Government are promises equally binding with regard to the State Sanads and with regard to the Inamdars' Sanads?—That is exactly what we mean.

Mr. Davidson.

A319. I think the Witness said that they were claiming six seats in the Provincial Legislature, but I notice that in paragraph 10 of the Central Association's statement, they say: "we modestly claim 12 seats in the Provincial Legislature and two in the Lower House of the Federal Legislature." Which of the figures is the claim? Is it six seats?—The Central Association of Sardars has been always claiming that, but this Conference of all the Associations and Members considered the matter and said that at least we should have six. The Conference was held at Poona early in June, 1933.

Lord Eustace Percy.

A320. I think that concludes the questions that the Committee wish to put to you. The statements you have laid before us are very clear, and I do not think we need trouble you with any further questions. Is there anything further, you would like to say before the conclusion of your evidence?—Yes, your Lordship. Your Lordship just now mentioned that Section 134 of the White Paper does not cover this. I should like to put some consideration before you about it, although my point has been made quite clear, in answer to the question which Sir P. Pattani put to me, but I know that the genesis of this Section 134 in the White Paper is, perhaps, due to a reply which the Law Member gave in the Legislative Assembly on 10th March, in which he said—I am reading from a newspaper report—"Sir B. L. Mitter said that none of them could anticipate the forthcoming constitution but without betraying anything he could say that the Government of India had recommended that personal and property rights should be safeguarded under the new constitution and under the category of property rights there was place for the landlord and agriculturist." So, perhaps, on the recommendation of the Government of India, as mentioned here, this has been put in, but as we have some doubts whether this will cover our case or not, we are making our representations. Even before the Statutory Commission, we submitted this: "The treaties or engagements with the Indian Princes, the Sanads of lands and villages given to Sardars, Inamdars and Vatan-dars must remain untouched." Then before the Second Round Table Conference also we circulated a Memorandum making the same request, and the Sardars Association made the same request. We are coming before your Lordship and the Committee with the same request; so our submission is that, if it is not covered, as there is some doubt about it, there should be a specific mention in the Act that our Sanads will be respected. That is our submission.

Lord Eustace Percy.] The Committee entirely appreciate that point, I think. Thank you very much.

(The Witnesses are directed to withdraw.)

Khan Bahadur M. A. KHUHRO, M.L.C., is called in and examined as follows:—

Lord Eustace Percy.

A321. Mr. Khan Bahadur Khuhro, you are Vice-President of the Sind Separation Conference, I think?—Yes.

A322. General Secretary of the Sind Muhammadan Association?—Yes.

A323. A Member of the Bombay Legislative Council since 1923?—Yes.

A324. And a Fellow of the University of Bombay?—Yes.

A325. We have your Memorandum before us?—Yes; it is as follows:—

MEMORANDUM 53. SIND'S SEPARATION FROM BOMBAY BY KHAN BAHADUR M. A. KHUARO, M.L.C.

A Short History of Sind's Connection with Bombay.

The beginning of British Government's connection with Sind dates back to 1830 when Sir Alexander Burnes was permitted by the then rulers of Sind to go to Lahore, by boat, through the Indus, to meet Ranjitsingh. In 1838 again the British Army was allowed free passage through Sind on its expedition to Afghanistan, and on its return Sir Charles Napier took the opportunity to annex Sind in 1843.

A study of subsequent events and more particularly of the causes that led to Sind's amalgamation with Bombay will convince any impartial observer of the fact that it was not based on any sound consideration. It was merely an outcome of the quarrel between Lord Ellenborough, the then Governor-General, and the Government of Bombay, that Sind came to be linked up with Bombay. Thus it will be found that this amalgamation was merely an accident.

It is significant to note that in the first few years of its annexation, Sind was placed under a separate Governor. It was only after its first Governor, Sir Charles Napier, had resigned his office, that as a result of the machinations of the Bombay Government, Sind for the first time lost its separate entity and became a part and parcel of the Bombay Presidency.

A reference to the early history of Sind will also show that Sind has always been a separate territorial unit. Even when it owed allegiance to a foreign central authority, it enjoyed full provincial autonomy with its seat of government in the province. The recent excavations at Mohan-jo-daro also show that as early as five thousand years before Christ, Sind had its own civilisation which she could have evolved only as a separate unit.

An Unnatural Connection and its Evil Consequences.

Sind's connection with Bombay is as unnatural as it is unbearable for the people whom it has placed in a distinctly inferior position.

Separated geographically from the Presidency by a wedge of non-British territory—namely the States of Cutch and Rajputana, Sind with a population of nearly 4 millions and an area of 53,000 square miles, lies at a distance of about 800 miles from the seat of Government.

Linguistically, ethnologically, culturally and even climatically Sind has nothing in common with the Presidency Proper. Its affiliation has therefore brought about results which can only be described as catastrophic.

Our ninety years' experience of Sind's connection with Bombay has shown us that the latter has neglected our economic and social development and has checked the growth of Karachi Port which possesses vast potentialities for development, being the nearest port to the West. Our roads and communications are in an extremely undeveloped condition. Our nation-building departments are starving. Education is at its lowest ebb. The present system of Government is highly despotic and the Commissioner's Delegation Act, which raises the Commissioner-in-Sind to the position of a Provincial satrap, has tended to create an atmosphere of autocracy which has always impeded the growth of healthy public life. The present Bombay Legislative Council, which forms a curious combination of heterogeneous elements, is unable to understand our peculiar problems. The Heads of departments who are presiding over our destinies from a distance of over 800 miles are not able to discharge their responsibilities to the people of Sind in a satisfactory manner. Bribery, corruption and official oppression have reached the limit.

Lack of space does not permit the enumeration here of specific instances in support of each of the above statements. The literature which has hitherto appeared on the subject of the Separation of Sind, adequately proves that the grievances of the people of Sind are absolutely genuine. If I am examined orally, I will surely be in a position to convince the Committee of the truth of my statement by adducing concrete examples of the hardships from which we have suffered.

The only solution of these evils lies in the constitution of Sind as a separate autonomous province. That is the only legitimate way of restoring Sind to its rightful place in the future federation of India.

History of the Question of Separation.

Until 1913 Sind put up patiently with the disabilities entailed by her subordinate position. The public feelings for separation were for the first time voiced by a distinguished Hindu leader, viz.:

19th July, 1933.]

Mr. Harchandrai Vishundas, C.I.E., who in the course of his address as Chairman of the Reception Committee of the Indian National Congress at Karachi, put forth this demand in most forceful terms.

In 1918, the 5th Sind Provincial Conference appointed a Sub-Committee of five Hindu and one Parsi gentlemen to consider this question. The Sub-Committee reported that:—

“All the objections that are raised against the autonomy of Sind are, in the opinion of the Sub-Committee, unsatisfactory and unconvincing and the Committee has no hesitation in recommending that Sind should be constituted an autonomous province with its own legislature and executive.” On the strength of this recommendation the matter was pressed further by the deputation of the Sind Provincial Conference which waited on the late Right Hon’ble Mr. Montague and Lord Chelmsford at the time when the Montague-Chelmsford Reforms were on the anvil.

In 1927 the Indian National Congress resolved that a readjustment of provinces on linguistic basis be begun with Sind. This resolution was proposed by no less a person than Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya, the foremost champion of the Hindu cause in India. Subsequently the All India Moslem League, too, gave its enthusiastic support to this demand. Soon after, the All India Moslem Conference adopted it as one of the proposals formulated by it at its first meeting under the Presidentship of His Highness Sir Agha Khan.

Later the All Parties Conference, Lucknow, accepted the principle of separation and so also the Nehru Committee.

On 17th of July, 1928, the Hindus, Moslems and other minorities of Sind entered into a communal pact agreeing to the Separation of Sind.

In 1928 the Royal Statutory Commission commenced its inquiry. The Sind Muhamadan Association in their representation before the Commission pressed very strongly for separation. The Central Committee which worked in collaboration with the Simon Commission also recommended in very definite terms that Sind should be separated. The Statutory Commission itself expressed great sympathy with the claim of Sind for separation in principle.

In 1931 the First Indian Round Table Conference accepted the principle of the Separation of Sind and after the financial side of the question was examined by the Miles Irving Committee and the Brayne Conference the Secretary of State for India announced on 24th December, 1932, the definite decision of His Majesty’s Government to separate Sind.

Sind’s Right to Separation.

We have claimed separation of Sind on the following grounds.—

1. That it will give us the right of self determination which is the birth-right of every people.

2. That it will relieve the Province of numerous hardships under which it has been labouring for the last 85 years.

3. That it will facilitate the Agricultural development of the Province.

4. That it will help in rooting out the evils which have been the outcome of Sind being governed from a distance of 800 miles.

5. That the port of Karachi will be considerably developed, and that by opening a fast train service with Cawnpore and Delhi the whole business of the Northern and Central India will be captured.

6. That Sind will be able to regain its lost individuality. In this connection a mention may be made of the importance of Sind as India’s frontier by sea, land and air.

7. That the Sindhi language which presents all the features of a classical language will receive a fresh impetus rather than die a slow death which at the moment looks imminent.

8. That the Sukkur Barrage lands cannot develop easily and rapidly unless they are placed under the control of a Government which is within easy reach.

9. Barring Burma the Bombay Administration being admittedly the costliest in the whole of India, Sind after its separation will get an opportunity of effecting reasonable retrenchment consistent with efficiency. This will enable Sind to transfer the amount thus saved to nation-building departments which at present are languishing.

Sind’s Capacity to run Separate Autonomous Government.

Having gained sufficient experience in the art of self-government, Sind is quite capable of running a separate autonomous Government. It has had its share in the reforms as a part of Bombay since their very introduction. It has produced and possesses men with excellent brains who can rise equal to any responsibility as efficiently as the people of any other part of India. The province which has produced among others men like His Highness Sir Agha Khan, the late Mr. G. M. Bhurgri, Sir Ghulam Hussain Hidayatullah and Mr. M. A. Jinnah who have occupied eminent ranks in the political field of India, cannot be said to be wanting in talent; nor can it be urged that its people will not be able to shoulder the responsibilities which may shortly devolve upon them. As compared with the North-west Frontier Province, Sind occupies a much superior position; and it will be anomalous to deny to it at this stage of India's political advancement what is contemplated to be granted to the former. For all practical purposes Sind is already a self-contained province. Its language is distinct; its system of agriculture and irrigation is different; its problems are peculiar to it; its cadre of subordinate service is separate, and its life and culture have nothing in common with the rest of the Presidency. Why not then to grant it a separate legislature and a separate Governor?

19° Juli, 1933.]

Sindhi members of the Bombay Council have been known for their solid and unostentatious work and have proved themselves to be quite successful legislators. Their record of service in the Council has indeed been most brilliant. It is a Sindhi legislator who has the unique distinction of being a very important member of the Bombay Governor's Cabinet ever since the introduction of the Mountford Reforms. And it was another prominent Sindhi member who was appointed Chairman of the Bombay Provincial Committee which collaborated with the Royal Statutory Commission.

Sind's Determination to be fully Autonomous.

Sind, as said before, has already had sufficient experience in the art of self-government; and it will therefore be only fair that it should have the same measure of autonomy as other provinces. It is but proper that it should definitely be made known to the British Government that Sind will not be satisfied with anything short of what other Provinces receive. It will be a sheer injustice to deny the fulfilment of this legitimate aspiration of four millions of God's people, because a certain section of the population of Sind has been carrying on an unpatriotic agitation against the separation.

Sind is a Peaceful and a Law-Abiding Country.

If any Province could claim to be the most peaceful and law-abiding in the whole of India, it is the province of Sind; and I am perfectly sure that no one will challenge the truth of this statement. I would request the Joint Parliamentary Committee to examine on this point those of the British officers who have served in Sind. Provided that the consideration of Bombay's suffering a loss of prestige in consequence of Sind's separation does not influence their judgment, I am sure they will bear me out that I hail from a country which has maintained high traditions of unflinching loyalty to the Crown at all times and under all circumstances, never for a moment falling a prey to any anti-British influence. The toll which the Congress movement has taken from Sind is infinitesimally small and that too from the Hindu community which is now raising its voice against separation curiously enough on the ground that Sind is not a peaceful province.

During the Great War the people of my country rendered yeomen service to the Crown under most trying conditions; and if as a reward for those services India claims self-government, why not Sind? The pledges which British Government then gave to India are equally applicable to Sind.

Now to advert to the second part of this question. A group of Sind Hindus which is opposed to separation on communal ground and which entertains the high hopes of governing the Muslims of Sind through the medium of a Hindu Cabinet of Bombay has been trying to make out that if Sind is separated, the safety of Hindu life and property would be imperilled. But the very fact that the Hindus have amassed fabulous wealth, have monopolized all the trade, and have purchased, according to their own estimate, 40 per cent. of the cultivable land in Sind, and have rapidly increased in population, gives a lie direct to this allegation. Those who know Sind conditions will admit that the remotest villages of Sind are certainly safer for Hindus than are the streets of Sholapur, Ahmedabad and even Bombay, for Moslems. Since times immemorial Hindu life in Sind villages has been held by Muslims as dear as their own. On occasions Moslems have even lost their lives in protecting Hindus; and it is certainly the height of ingratitude on their part to suggest that unless Sind continues to remain with Bombay, their life and property will be unsafe.

Undoubtedly, when the Maha-Sabha agitation had thrown the country in the throes of an India-wide communal trouble, Sind too did experience its repercussions, though to a negligible extent. Sind experienced two minor riots which, however, took place several years ago and which do not reflect credit on the Hindus themselves. If the record of the judicial proceedings in connection with these riots is gone through it would be found that the trouble originated with the Hindus; but they did not scruple to institute false prosecutions against innocent Muslims which cost their community several lakhs of rupees for securing justice.

In a country like Sind where moral and cultural progress has been greatly retarded on account of the step-motherly treatment it has received from Bombay Presidency, it is only natural that it should not be altogether free from crime. However, Sind is not more criminal than any other province in India and decidedly it is much less criminal than the so-called civilised America. The only difference between Sind and other countries is that here unfortunately we have got in the person of anti-separationists a batch of regular Drain-Inspectors whose main function in life is to have an eye for dirt.

I might quote here the most pertinent remarks made by the Chairman of the Reception Committee of Sind Separation Conference in his address which read as follows :—

“Granting Sind is not a safe Province for Hindus, what is the remedy? A Government at Bombay or Poona or at Mahabaleshwar can do little from such a distance to help Hindus at once, but a Government at Karachi responsible to a legislature containing about one-third of the Hindus and at a stone's throw from any Sindhi's door can do a lot. Every Hindu knows this to be most correct. Yet when some of them cry against separation their meaning can only be that they want one man's administration under which they presumably assume that they have thrived and will continue to thrive more than their backward neighbours.

If that be so I would make a present of the wise words of the Great American Negro sage Booker T. Washington to such of our Hindu friends whose eyes cannot travel beyond the horizon, ‘one man cannot hold another man down in the ditch without remaining in the ditch with him.’ If we are to remain in ditch Hindus also cannot get out of it, though they may have at best sorry and fanciful consolation of enjoying a warm corner in it.”

The Secret of Hindu Opposition.

The question may pertinently be asked as to why a boisterous group of the Sind Hindus is opposed to the idea of separation. The reply is simple enough. If you look into the history of this question, you will find:

1. That this demand was first put forth by the Hindus of Sind under the leadership of late Mr. Harchandrai Vishindas, C.I.E.

2. That the various predominantly Hindu organisations have from time to time supported it. The Nehru Committee, the All-Parties Conference, the Indian National Congress and the Sind Provincial Conference may be mentioned in this connection.

3. That the pact which was entered into by the Hindus and Muslims of Sind in 1928 provided Sind separation.

4. That the Sub-Committee consisting of one Parsee and four Hindu gentlemen which was appointed by the Sind Provincial Conference strongly recommended Sind's constitution as a separate Unit.

5. That the Hindus are not unanimous in their opposition. There are some amongst them who are no less enthusiastic than the Muslims in their demand for separation.

6. That on the occasion of the Second Round Table Conference, Mahatma Gandhi, the greatest Hindu leader, himself offered immediate and unconditional separation of Sind.

7. It is most significant to note that as recently as the end of last year, the Sind Hindus accepted the principle of separation at the Allahabad Unity Conference and it was only when the Muslims declined to accept some of their most unreasonable demands that they revived their agitation against separation.

19° July, 1933.]

Add to this the consideration that the Sind Hindus have no future in the Government of Bombay and that the separation is bound to benefit them to a very large extent. The Bombay Hindus may help the Sind Hindus to dominate the Muslim population of Sind, but there is not the remotest chance for any Hindu of Sind to enter the Bombay Cabinet. If Sind separates, there is the certainty of finding place for some in the Cabinet where they can make their presence felt.

It was indeed only after the All-India Muslim League lent its support to this question that the Hindu Maha-Sabha considered this to be a purely Muslim demand and started agitation against it with a two-fold object.—

1. Firstly that the Muslims of Sind will be made to remain under the domination of the Hindu majority in the Bombay Presidency and will not be able to secure the rights and privileges to which they are entitled as a majority community in the event of separation

2. Secondly, that even if they fail in their efforts to keep Sind tagged to Bombay, they (Hindus) will be able to extort a heavy price for separation from the Muslims in the shape of extraordinary concessions.

As regards the reasons repeatedly advanced by them against the separation, the less said the better. They are so absurd that it will be a waste of time on my part to discuss them at any great length. I would, however, deal in brief with each of the reasons hereunder in order to avoid misunderstanding:—

1. It is alleged that Sind is being used as a pawn in the game of high Muslim politics. The Muslims have never demanded separation as a mere concession. Times out of number they have made it clear that they claim it on its own intrinsic merits. At any rate, this demand cannot be called a pawn in the game of high Muslim politics, as it originally emanated from the Sind Hindus themselves, and has since been supported by the Hindu Organisation of All-India importance. If it were a purely Muslim demand, why should have the Hindus supported it? In fact they have been doing it all along until very recently, when the more fanatic element among them played a somersault. Even now we have no hesitation in declaring that the question of Sind's separation has always been advocated by the Muslims on its own merits.

2. It is said that His Majesty's Government have not taken the Hindus into confidence while announcing their decision to separate Sind. It is absurd to make such an allegation when it is a matter of common knowledge that they had had their full say in the matter. Through all the stages of the Round Table Conference deliberations, the Maha-Sabha leaders of the type of Dr. Moonje and Raja Narendra Nath were given ample opportunities to put forth the Hindu point of view. On the Sind Sub-Committee of the Round Table Conference also they had had their best supporters in Dr. Moonje, Raja Narendra Nath and Messrs. Jayaker, Jadhav and Sampuransing. In the subsequent two committees, viz., the Sind Financial Inquiry Committee and the Brayne Conference, also the Hindu point of view was fully considered. It may be mentioned here that Professor Chhablani, who is now appearing before the Joint Parliamentary Committee as a witness, was also a member of the Brayne Conference. It is no fault of Government if their reasons have not carried conviction to the Government.

3. It is stated that the conditions on which the Muslims demanded separation have not been fulfilled. The Mussalmans of Sind has never agreed to a separation which may be hedged round with impossible conditions. If these conditions mean those that came up for discussion at the Allahabad Unity Conference, then it must be said that the Muslims of Sind never lent their support to them, and so the question of their fulfilment does not arise.

If, however, the financial aspect of the separation is alluded to, I would state that if only Sind were allowed to cut its coat according to its cloth and if the expenditure on Government machinery were to be so fixed as to tally with the earning capacity of the province, there will be no deficit. Besides, so long as Sind remains with Bombay, it will never become a self-supporting province in so far as there will be no chance of its development to its fullest extent.

4. "There was no question of a subvention from Simla at any time," say our Hindu friends. What we even now want is, in the first place, a mere financial adjustment on equitable basis. And if the Government of India are not prepared to do so, a certain proportion of their revenues from Sind drawn through centrally-controlled departments might be allotted to us.

19^o Julii, 1933.]

5. It is contended that the association of Sind with a first-class Presidency like Bombay means full Provincial autonomy for the former. But this argument cannot hold water, for Sind has also had as much training in the art of self-government as Bombay or any other province, and therefore it is only fair that it should have as great a measure of autonomy as any other province in India.

6. It is simply ridiculous on the part of the Hindus to suggest that invidious distinction will be made in imposing new taxation when Sind separates. In the first place no new taxation is to be imposed since the financial adjustment is expected to be made in such a manner that Sind will not be left in deficit. In any case how can distinctions be made in imposing taxation when a Government is responsible to a legislature and is under the control of a head with powers to safeguard the interests of the minorities? Besides, in the matter of taxation the units have to receive guidance from the centre; and directly or indirectly they have to follow the policy which is to be laid down from time to time by the Federal Government.

7. Our Hindu friends betray a lack of intelligence when they suggest that unless Sind remains with Bombay the future of the Barrage will not be assured inasmuch as its management will cease to be in the hands of experts. It is a novel suggestion, indeed. Do they seriously believe that in the event of Sind being separated, the management of the Barrage will be handed over to raw and untrained people? Sind, as every one understands, will continue to secure the services of experts drawn from the Imperial cadre of services as it is doing now; and thus there will be no change after Sind is separated. It is also suggested that if Sind remains with Bombay, she will have a decent standard of administration and of material and moral progress. This is not correct for the probable retrenchments which have been foreshadowed in the proposals placed by the Muslims before the Brayne Conference, are minor ones most of which have already been given effect to by the Bombay Government. As for the talk of Sind's progressing morally and materially because of its connection with Bombay I may observe that it is merely a mawkish sentiment. Our 85 years experience of connection with Bombay which is called the most advanced Presidency, has convinced us that we have not made much headway either morally or materially. What then about the future?

8. In the matter of communications it has given us not more than 100 miles of Government provincial roads and not more than 30 miles of pucca roads. We have not got a single Arts, Law, Engineering, Agricultural or Medical College maintained by Government. We have received no encouragement in the matter of primary education. The following extract from the Hartog Committee report on this subject makes a very sad reading:—

“In spite of these improvements, the claims of Sind appear to have been overshadowed by those of more fortunate districts. We have been told that some of the Sind Local Boards were amongst the first to impose the Education Cess under Compulsory Education Act and yet the number of new schools sanctioned for Sind was much smaller than the number in other Divisions and that while in 1926-27, as much as Rs. 1,17,000 was paid as grant towards the expansion of Primary Education to the District Board of Satara and Rs. 37,700 to the Board of East Khandesh, all the District Boards of Sind together obtained only Rs. 18,000.” A study of comparative figures of literacy would further prove that the treatment meted out to us in this respect has been far from satisfactory.

The Medical aid that Sind has been getting from Bombay is negligibly small, and therefore the death rate is very high. Malaria, Cholera and such other epidemics have been taking a heavy toll annually from Sind.

The Land Revenue Policy which at present is decided by Government under the influence of a legislature which does not know Sind problems, and which has no sympathy with it, has brought about the ruin of Zamindars.

The administration being far from the immediate influence of the Government has deteriorated considerably. Corruption and high-handedness are the characteristic features of the present administration. Independent and honest public opinion in Sind does not exist at all. The working of the Judicial Branch of Administration too is unsatisfactory. To say the least, nowhere have the prophetic words of Lord Hardinge that “Unequally yoked people do not pull on well together and that the weaker party suffers on account of the contact" have turned out so true as in our Province.

19^o July, 1933.]

In the presence of such overwhelming evidence of Bombay's stepmotherly treatment it will be a height of folly to expect her to provide Sind with more amenities as promised by Sind Hindus in their memorandum, particularly when Bombay has discovered that she is already suffering an annual recurring loss of Rs. 80 lakhs on Sind.

9. Our Hindu friends urge that in Sind's continued connection with Bombay lies the solution of communal difficulties. But this idea does not appeal to us. On the contrary, if this unnatural state of things is continued, instead of bringing about peace and happiness, it is bound to spell our ruin. This arrangement is like tying two wild cats by their tails and expecting that it will promote peace and contentment among them. To link up four million discontented people with a presidency with which they are already fed up, in utter disregard of their feelings, is a novel way of establishing peace.

10. The suggestion that if Sind is separated many new complications may arise is absurd.

If Sind is not Separated Immediately.

I would like to mention here certain difficulties which Sind will have to face if its separation is not forthwith effected.—

(a) Since the Bombay Presidency is labouring under serious financial difficulties at present, it will not be able to give proper attention to Sind with the result that the latter will be all the more neglected, especially in the matter of agricultural development and educational progress. The hopes of the success of the New Barrage Scheme will also not be realised.

(b) As the Presidency people are now given to understand that they are spending as many as 80 lakhs of rupees annually to cover Sind's deficit, they will naturally demur still further to advance the interests of Sind:

(c) After the introduction of autonomy, the entire Ministry will be captured by the Presidency members who do not know anything of Sind and will do it scant justice.

If Sind Separates.

But if Sind is constituted a separate autonomous province, the following advantages will accrue to it as well as to Bombay and to India incidentally —

(a) All the difficulties that have been shown above will be remedied and the grievances of as many as four millions of people will be redressed. The contentment and happiness of millions of God's people is certainly a noble achievement.

(b) Bombay will to a great extent be relieved of her financial worries, and will thus be able to run her own Government with considerable success.

(c) Sind, with its own Government, will be able to give adequate attention to its peculiar problems, such as the Agricultural development, the materialisation of Barrage forecasts, the development of roads and communications, the progress of the port of Karachi, the growth of industries and of all kinds of useful arts and trades, the spread of education, the establishment of Sind's University, the development of the great mineral wealth of the province, the evolution of independent public opinion, which all will be great assets to the cause of Indian nationalism.

FINANCES.

Preliminary Observations.

While considering the financial position of Sind it must be borne in mind that Sind is a country with vast potentialities of development in the matter of agriculture, commerce, minerals, etc.

The Sukkur Barrage has just begun to operate and it will increase the area of cultivation. Within 10 years of its operation, of the total cultivable area of 6,529,705 acres covered by the Barrage, 50 per cent. will be under cultivation; after 20 years 65 per cent. and after 30 years 81 per cent. There will be large cotton cultivation and the province of Sind alone will yield two-thirds of the total cotton product of India. At present India produces three million bales and in 30 years Sind alone will produce two-thirds of that quantity.

This is with regard to cotton alone. When we consider the increase which is bound to come in the production of every kind of raw material and the corresponding growth in population, education and other useful arts and trades, and when sulphur and mineral deposits of Sind are tapped, we can confidently hope that the economic condition of Sind will improve by leaps and bounds.

19^o Julii, 1933.]

Again, if the port of Karachi, which is nearer than Bombay to Europe on the one hand and to Arabia and Mesopotamia on the other, is developed to its fullest extent we will be able to achieve so many things, e.g., we will draw five-sixths of the whole Moslem pilgrim traffic; we will arrange for the direct arrival of the English mail; and we will capture the trade of the whole of Central India (including U.P. and C.P.) by opening a direct fast train service. All these achievements will greatly promote the commercial interests of Sind. It is noteworthy that at present we have not got even sufficient shipping facilities at the Karachi port.

Sind has great possibilities in the matter of Minerals also. In 1857 coal was discovered at Leilan, 27 miles north-west of Kotri, and specimens of it sent to England were found to be highly satisfactory. When the development of the province is undertaken, Sind will have its own coal-fields. Gypsum is abundant in Sind and so is Iron-ore in many places near Kotri and the hills south-west of Jherruck. Petroleum can also be found in Sind, and so can Carbonate of Soda and Sulphur. Sind's soil being rich there are chances of other minerals and commodities being yielded by it.

There are endless methods of producing money which the future will disclose. Nature, it is hoped, will reveal her vast hidden wealth as she did in America when a proper development of Sind's resources is attempted.

Two broad commercial features of Sind still need special consideration. A glance at the imports and exports of Karachi for a period of fifteen years preceding the economic depression will show its steady growth as a prosperous port-city:—

| | | |
|-------------|-------------|-------------|
| 1907-08 ... | 109,000,000 | 327,000,000 |
| 1917-18 ... | 195,000,000 | 595,000,000 |
| 1922-23 ... | 236,000,000 | 708,000,000 |

Let us also cast a glance at the approximate quantities of crop in the Sukkur Barrage area at present and the anticipated yield after final development:—

| Crop. | As grown at present. | Full yield hereafter. |
|------------|----------------------|-----------------------|
| Wheat ... | 68,000 | 935,000 |
| Rice... .. | 280,000 | 515,000 |
| Jowar ... | 52,000 | 190,000 |
| Cotton ... | 300,000 | 575,000 |
| Exports .. | 183,000 | 1,880,000 |

It is significant to find that within this first year of its operation, the Barrage has yielded results which exceed the official forecast. As to the area brought under cultivation the following comparative figures will show that whereas the Kharif cultivation has been raised to the extent of 98 per cent. of what was expected, the Rabi cultivation exceeded by 30 per cent. the figure provided in the forecast:—

| Crop. | Area which was to be cultivated according to the forecast. | Area actually cultivated. |
|------------|--|---------------------------|
| Kharif ... | 1,394,880 | 1,365,947 |
| Rabi ... | 890,000 | 1,155,000 |

Thus it appears that so far as revenues from Barrage are concerned, the results are very much encouraging. Similarly, the land sale programme has also been successful. According to the original programme it was anticipated that during these first two years about 90,000 acres of Barrage land will be disposed of, but as a matter of fact about 1,10,000 acres have been disposed of. The prices which the lands have fetched are also higher than those provided in the forecast.

When we contemplate this tremendous increase in the products and revenues after Sind separates, we cannot help experiencing a sensation of joy.

Sind's Fitness to Become a Self-Supporting Province Within a Short Time.

A province with such vast possibilities of development is bound to become self-supporting at no distant date. It would be desirable here to take into consideration the present financial position of Sind with a view to making a forecast of its future. We can be guided in our calculations by the report of the Brayne Conference. It will be noticed that this report takes for the figure of basic deficit Rs.68.5 lakhs and for cost of separation Rs.12 lakhs, making 80.5 lakhs altogether. Now even if the present standard of administration is maintained and the retrenchment which has already been effected by the Government of Bombay is not taken into consideration, and even if the new sources of income are not tapped nor the leakage of Government funds stopped, Sind's deficit begins automatically to decrease from 1939-40 onwards, until it is completely wiped out in 1944-45, for which year the report estimates a surplus of 4.74 lakhs.

19^o July, 1933.]

After that the surplus goes on progressively growing until it reaches a figure of 89 lakhs in 1961-62.

This is one view of the question. I shall now advert to the other. The scheme which I placed before the Brayne Conference boils down the deficit to 6 lakhs, and by suggesting various sources of increased revenue it points to a surplus of 20 lakhs for nation-building departments. I append that scheme at the end of this memorandum for ready reference. Thus it is quite obvious that Sind's future in the matter of finance is not so dark as the anti-separationists depict. It is absolutely certain that if Sind is allowed to pursue its only line of development independently of Bombay's interference she will be a self-supporting unit within a short time and will ultimately become surplus and prosperous.

Our Right to have Financial Help from Central Government.

While considering the question of financial help to Sind, it must also be borne in mind that it has been paying large amounts into the coffers of the Central as well as the Bombay Governments. It is an established fact that prior to 1920 Sind was a surplus province. This is evident from a statement made by the late Right Honourable Mr. Montague, the then Secretary of State for India, in his Indian Diary: "It is undoubtedly true that Sind gives more funds to Bombay than what Bombay pays to Sind" (Page 151).

The Irrigation works in Sind which are productive commercial undertakings have up to date given a net profit of over Rs 6 crores to the Government of India and to the Bombay Presidency, whereas the Presidency proper Irrigation works which are unproductive ones have swallowed over 5 crores, evidently at the cost of Sind. These figures are available in the Administration Reports of the Bombay Presidency P.W.D. Besides, the Central Government have been getting large revenues from Sind through the departments which are directly under their control, such as Posts, Telegraphs, Railways, Income Tax, Customs, etc. In consequence of the Barrage works also the Central Revenues from Sind have been greatly increased.

I would give the latest figures of the Income from the two of the centrally-controlled departments:—

| | | |
|------------|-----|----------------|
| * Customs | ... | 6 crores. |
| Income Tax | ... | over 21 lakhs. |

The figures of the earnings from the Railway, Posts and Telegraph Departments are fluctuating, though they too yield enormous sums of money.

In the distribution of assets, too, the Bombay Government have done a very great injustice to Sind, as is shown in the Miles-Irving Committee Report.

Coming to the question of financial relief from Central Government, I submit that we demand it on the basis of the same principle which has been enunciated by the Percy Committee that: "All the units of the Federal Government should be treated as integral parts of the Federal Government as a whole and therefore the Central Government revenues should, as far as possible, be so distributed among them that none is left with any deficit." What Sind really demands is, in the first place, a mere adjustment of finances with the Central Government on the same basis as recommended by the Peel Committee of the Round Table Conference and the Percy Federal Finance Committee. They both have, as shown above, emphatically suggested that the distribution of income tax revenues which at present are wholly utilised by the Central Government, should be made in such a manner that every Province big or small is ensured an autonomous existence. In the case of Bombay and Bengal, they have suggested special basis of distribution of Income Tax Revenues in order to enable these two provinces to pay their way. They have further changed the basis of distribution in regard to Behar and Orissa and Assam. We desire to have similar adjustment and similar concessions in the case of Sind as well, which are quite justified in law and equity, and are quite consistent with the theory of Federal Finances.

Under the Government of India Act, 1919, all revenues of British India belong to His Majesty the King Emperor and are in theory controlled by the Secretary of State in Council. Under section 20 of the same Act, all liabilities of any part of British India are charges on these revenues. But in practice, in the interests of efficiency and autonomy, certain revenues have been assigned to the provinces under the Devolution Rules. There is, however, nothing in the Constitutional Law and usage to prevent His Majesty's Government from making any changes in these assignments of revenues in the interest of order, justice and good Government. The only limits to its constitutional power of interference in this respect are those imposed by considerations of administrative efficiency and of the material and moral well-being of the Provincial Units.

As long as the Provinces are not independent sovereign units and the Central Government retains this power of altering their obligations and their share of the revenues, the latter is bound to make necessary reasonable adjustments in order to ensure to the former adequate revenues for normal scales of expenditure. The situation at present is that His Majesty's Government having accepted the principle of separating Sind from Bombay, the Central Government after theoretically resuming the functions, revenues and liabilities which it had allotted to the Bombay Presidency under the Devolution Rules, is reassigning them to two new Provinces of Bombay and Sind in accordance with the Federal principles governing the division of functions and financial resources settled by the Round Table Conference. This does not mean that the Federal Structure Committee and the Federal Finance Committee can write on a clean slate, and run away from existing facts. But this does imply the power and obligation to make some adjustment necessitated by certain intractable facts, e.g., the obligation to cover the "deficit" of Bengal, Bombay, Behar and Orissa, Assam, and of Sind. In re-assigning revenues and liabilities to Sind and Bombay, practical rather than strictly equitable considerations governing the divisions of the assets and liabilities of a partnership, will have to be followed and the constitutional necessity of dispensing, as far as possible, with a subvention will have to be borne in mind.

If Sind is not separated, the Bombay "deficit" would not be 65 lakhs as given on page 22 of the Federal Finance Committee's Report, but 145 lakhs; and that will have to be met somehow by other federal adjustments, if Bombay Presidency is to enjoy autonomous existence. With Sind, Bombay will not have a surplus of 54 lakhs, as it has been anticipated by the Federal Finance Committee, but a "deficit" of 38 lakhs, even after the income tax has been distributed.

In this connection I would like to explain the confusion which surrounds the use of the word "deficit." There can be really no "deficit" Province, as long as a whole joint-family, i.e., India, is financially sound. A provincial deficit only means that under certain artificial conditions of division of revenues and functions, a certain province has a deficit. But these artificial conditions may themselves be the subject of dispute and argument.

The Miles-Irving Committee, which came to examine the financial position of separated Sind in 1931, have rightly remarked that "the charges which are assumed as debitable to Sind represent an equal relief to the Presidency of Bombay. It is the cost of separation alone that imposes a fresh burden on the revenues of India as a whole." It may be mentioned here that according to the finding of the Miles-Irving Committee, the actual cost of separation will be only 11.05 lakhs.

It has been argued by the opponents of the separation that the cost of separation should be borne entirely by Sind. But in practice it has to some extent been already effected. The Tobacco Tax, the Electricity Tax, the charge on transfer of property and the enhancement in the court fees and stamps recently sanctioned by the Bombay Legislature, have automatically increased the revenues of Sind to the extent of Rs. 3 lakhs, even as estimated by the Miles-Irving Committee and the Brayne Conference. In the course of next two or three years, the revenues from these heads are likely to increase to about 5 lakhs. The Sind Conference had suggested some additional reasonable taxation such as Excise duty on cotton at the Karachi port and one anna cess. These two between themselves will yield about 21 lakhs of rupees, which amount will be more than double the cost of separation and the Brayne Conference has accepted the principle of both these taxes.

Even according to the view taken by the Finance Secretary of the Government of Bombay in his note to the Federal Finance Committee Bombay will benefit to the extent of about 75 lakhs by the separation of Sind. Thus the claim of Bombay to the share of Income Tax will proportionately decrease and, to put in the language of Federal Finance Committee, Bombay's contribution to Federal Government will correspondingly increase. I quote here the relevant para. from the Finance Secretary's note:—

"These forecasts, it is believed, make it abundantly clear that if Sind remains attached to the Presidency or, if separated, leaves a burden on the Presidency's Finances in the shape of a contribution, then it is clear that some other method of relief must be found if the Presidency is to start its career of autonomy with any prospect of success."

SUMMARY OF REASONS FOR SUBVENTION.

Granting that the relief we get from the Government of India does not come to us by way of financial adjustment, I submit that it should be given to us under the label of "subvention." The reasons on which our demand for subvention is based are summarised hereunder:—

1. It should be remembered that the province of Sind is contributing large sums of revenue to the Central Government in the shape of Customs duties, Railway, Post, Telegraph charges and the Income Tax. These sums are bound to increase from year to year as the result of the growing success of the Barrage. It has been estimated that Central Government will benefit to the extent of about 75 lakhs a year.

2. Sind has the unique port of Karachi, whose outstanding features have been already discussed. The Government of India even at present are deriving about 6 crores a year in the shape of Customs dues. If Bombay and Bengal give Government of India large sums by way of Income Tax Sind does so by way of Customs; whereas Punjab, U.P., Assam and other provinces do not contribute directly or indirectly to Government of India as much as Sind does.

3. The Government of India have already benefited greatly on account of the launching of the Barrage project in Sind, as they have received large Customs revenues in respect of Machinery imported, etc.

4. Sind is of greater importance to the whole of India than even the North-West Frontier Province, it being the frontier of India by land, sea and air.

5. If, as stated above, Sind receives financial support from the Central Government, Bombay will be correspondingly relieved of its present financial burden on account of Sind; and therefore the latter's claim to the share of Income Tax will automatically diminish and the claim of the Government of India for its contribution from Bombay will correspondingly increase.

6. If Bengal, Behar, Orissa and Assam receive special consideration for financial adjustment, then why not Sind?

7. The claim of Sind for financial help is of a temporary nature, since Sind is sure to stand on its own legs in the near future, as is foreshadowed in the report of the Honourable Mr. A. F. L. Brayne.

AMOUNT OF SUBVENTION.

On behalf of the Sind Separation Conference, I would like to state that in the present circumstances the findings of the Brayne Conference placing the subvention at about Rs.80.65 lakhs are acceptable to us. It has already been made clear that the Government of India will have to part with this sum in any case according to the results of the investigations carried on by the Percy Committee. I mean this amount will have to be paid to Sind in any case, the only difference being that in the event of separation, it will have it directly from the Government of India and in the alternative through the Government of Bombay.

Period for which Subvention is Required.

As estimated by the Brayne Conference this amount is required provisionally for a period of ten years, and after that period the Barrage revenue will, it is hoped, obviate the necessity of going in for this help.

An Important Point.

The Sind Conference is emphatically of the opinion that a statutory provision should be made for the amount of subvention to Sind so that the newly constituted province be not left to the tender mercies of the Central Legislature with its Hindu majority. It can easily be seen that it will be very harmful for a new province struggling to stand on its own legs, to be a pawn in the game of communal politics at the centre at the very beginning of its career.

Constitution.

1. Sind requires full autonomy with the same powers and privileges which the other autonomous provinces are going to have. The composition of the Legislature would take place on the lines of the Premier's Communal Award, which gives weightage to the extent of about 10 per cent. to the Hindus of Sind. Separate Electorates are absolutely indispensable.

2. So far as the Cabinet is concerned a provision may be made to have at least three Ministers. Their number should be decided by a vote of the Legislature, from time to time, according to the requirements of the Province. No statutory reservation need be made in favour of any community in the matter of allotment of Cabinet seats. It should be left to the judgment and the discretion of the Legislature and the Governor.

Statutory Reservations are uncalled for.

Statutory reservations guaranteeing special rights to any particular community in Sind are absolutely uncalled for. The Moslems, being in a majority, do not require them and the Hindus who, according to their own admission "form the most influential and educated minority, and have supplied the bulk of administrative staff and professional talent" and who are the "Pioneers in the field of education and local self-Government and command tremendous influence in all walks of life in Sind" need not clamour for them.

Safeguards are needed only for those minorities which are backward and are numerically weak. But such is not the case with the Sind Hindus. The percentage of literacy among them is much higher than that among the Moslems; and according to their own calculation their population is 26 per cent. On their own admission, the trade of the entire province is in their hands. And according to their own estimate, they possess not less than 40 per cent. of the agricultural land of Sind. The bulk of Government offices are held by them and above all they are a most enterprising community. Safeguards are not meant for such advanced communities; and it will be most unfair to the Moslems of Sind to grant them to the Hindu community, for it is feared that the safeguards may be used to obstruct the smooth working of the future constitution by this hostile minority.

A326. Is there anything which you would like to add to your Memorandum at this stage?—Yes. With your permission, I would like to make a short statement to amplify certain points and to clear certain issues.

A327. Is it a statement which you could hand in to be added to your record rather than that you should read it now?—They are short notes, and they are not in a good readable condition.

A328. Very well?—My Lord Chairman, I would, at the very outset, submit that the question of separating Sind from Bombay and constituting it an autonomous province is of the utmost importance to the people of Sind. They have been anxiously looking forward to the day when it actually happens, ever since the year 1913, when the political consciousness and the practical experience brought home to them the real and practical evils of being governed by a Government which was placed at such a long distance from their Province. The natural consequence of this evil was that the Government took very little interest in the administration of the Province and it began to be almost entirely dependent upon the advice of the Commissioner in Sind who was entrusted with the extraordinary powers under the Special Delegation of Powers Act, 1860. This naturally resulted in the despotic and irresponsible, one-man's rule in Sind. There have been very frequent protests from both Muslims and Hindus about it. The real remedy, of course, lies in granting Sind a separate government of its own, which will be directly in touch with the people and closely connected with the administration of the province. I would, therefore, my Lord Chairman, crave your indulgence to allow me adequate time to deal with this question at somewhat greater length than I am ordinarily expected to. I would like to briefly trace the history of this question, particularly of the recent past, and the manner in which the question has been carefully gone into at the successive stages and how it has been closely and carefully examined under the directions from the British Government and that of the Government of India. I would, in the first place, wish to make it clear that I have come down here in my capacity as the representative and spokesman of the Sind Separation Conference, which body has the largest numerical support in the Province, as it can claim to speak on behalf of 80 per cent. of the people of the Province. The Conference has, by passing a special resolution, desired me to submit before you, with all the emphasis that I can command, that the people of Sind have a firm belief in the solemn pledge of His Majesty's Government that Sind will be constituted a separate autonomous province along with the inauguration of new reforms in India, i.e., simultaneously with the grant of autonomy to other provinces. This decision, as everyone knows, was taken by the British Government after mature and careful consideration. During the course of the last five years, that the detailed inquiry into the Indian political reform has been systematically carried on, this question, too, has simultaneously received its due attention. The Royal Statutory Commission which came down to India in 1928-29 offered the first constitutional opportunity to the people of my Province to place their case for separate government for their Province, before them, and this was done through the Deputation of the Sind Muslims Association which I had the honour to lead, at Karachi. The Simon Commission expressed their sympathy with this question, but they temporarily brushed this question aside by suggesting that a Boundary Commission be appointed to go minutely into the question and make special recommendation about it. The question was again reopened at the time of the first Indian Round Table Conference in 1930-31 when a Sub-committee was set up to thrash out this question and make a specific recommendation. The question with regard to the administrative difficulties and the unsatisfactory method of the present administration of the Province, was fully discussed at this stage and it was finally held that the solution of these practical difficulties lies in making Sind a separate province. As a result of this, the principle of separation was accepted. In the middle of 1931 the Government of India appointed an Inquiry Committee known as Miles-Irving Committee to examine the financial side of the question. This Committee issued their report, and it was duly considered by the British Government. In April, 1932, Government called a Sind Conference, which began its deliberations under the Chairmanship of Mr. Brayne, wherein the representatives of Sind were invited to find ways and means to balance the budget. The Conference came to the conclusion that the extra cost of separation will be at the most Rupees 12 lakhs per annum, although the Expert Committee calculated it to be 11.05 lakhs. The Sind Representatives agreed to make good this amount by extra taxation, and they voluntarily agreed to impose one anna cess in every rupee of the Land Revenue and Water Rate. This will bring in about 11 or 12 lakhs to start with. In addition to that, some other taxations were considered, which can advantageously be imposed to either reduce the deficit or to utilise it in improving the nation-building departments. The Government of Bombay have, with the support of Sind legislators, imposed the Tobacco Tax, the tax on Electricity, the enhancement in court fees, stamps and the transfer of property tax. These taxations will give the benefit of at least three lakhs this year to Sind alone and will rise up to about 10 lakhs in the course of next five years. The ordinary deficit of 80 lakhs debited to Sind means an equal relief to the Presidency of Bombay. This clearly shows that the separation of Sind does not impose any extra cost on the finances of India as a whole. What we may call deficit of Sind is the equal relief to Bombay. The Government of Bombay have more or less acted as agents of the Government of India in this respect, as it is purely the function of the Central Government to so distribute their finances that no province is left with any deficit, and I maintain, the Government of Bombay finds no place in this arrangement. This principle was propounded by the Federal Finance Committee in early 1932, which was presided over by you, Mr. Chairman. This Committee, on page 22 of their Report, clearly show that Bombay, even after the separation of Sind, will be left with a deficit of 65 lakhs, unless a share of income tax is transferred to it by the Central Government. But if Sind continues to remain with it the deficit will mount to about 1½ crores. The Percy Committee have also expressed that in view of the fact that Sind may be made a separate autonomous province, it should receive the required subvention from the Central Government direct, out of the Income Tax, just as the North-West Frontier Province shall have to get. As a result of these investigations, the Government of Great Britain, through the Secretary of State, have in general accepted the conclusions of the Brayne Conference and the statement made by Sir Samuel Hoare on the 6th of December, 1932, while addressing the Third Indian Round Table Conference, is quite clear on the subject. I should like to reproduce a paragraph of his remarks dealing with the subject: "Lastly, there are two questions on which one or two observations should be made before the

Khan Bahadur M. A. KHUHHO, M.L.C.

general discussion begins, viz.: the question of separation of Sind and the separation of Orissa. In the first place, there is the separation of Sind which His Majesty's Government have accepted in principle subject to the discovery of satisfactory means of financing the new province and which the Conference accepted in principle last year. The financial problem has been examined both by an Expert Committee and a Conference of representatives of Sind presided over by Mr. Brayne whose report indicates there will be a deficit of 80½ lakhs from 1933-34 to 1938-39, after which it would be continuously reduced until, in 1944-45, a net surplus of gradually increasing amount would be established. These estimates represent a reasonable working hypothesis." He further goes on to say: "On this basis, after allowing for certain possible economies and for the fact that additional cost of separating Sind is expected to be covered by fresh taxation within the province, there is likely to be an initial deficit on the administration of Sind amounting to about Rupees ¾ of a crore which would be extinguished in about 15 years or earlier if new resources become available." Similarly, the Peel Committee of the Round Table Conference, in their final conclusions, have recommended Sind to be treated on the same footing as the North-West Frontier Province for the purposes of subvention, although they suggest that the subvention should be given only for a specified period, under the Constitution, out of Income Tax that accrues to the Central Government. I reproduce a portion of their recommendations in this respect: "Sind is in a special position in that careful investigations have already been made which show that it will be heavily in deficit for a considerable number of years, but that a surplus may eventually be expected to emerge. The whole financial outlook of the Province depends upon the Sukkur Barrage. In this case, it is suggested that there should be subvention from the Federal Government on a pre-determined programme." The reasons for the subvention in accordance with the recommendations of the Brayne Report are indeed overwhelming, and I have categorically dealt with them in my Memorandum, which is already in your possession. On the 24th December, 1932, the Secretary of State for India, while winding up the deliberations of the Third Round Table Conference, made a statement on behalf of the Government that:

"His Majesty's Government have come to a definite decision that Sind will be constituted a separate autonomous province." Again, in April, 1933, the White Paper was issued by Government, wherein it has been laid down that Sind, along with the rest of the Indian Provinces, will be constituted a separate autonomous province (vide pages 23 and 24). For all these reasons, you will find, Sir, that the decision has not been taken in a haphazard manner, but that all that has been done is with due deliberation and after careful consideration. We, therefore, sincerely believe that the British Parliament will endeavour to redeem the solemn pledge given to the people of Sind and to the people of India as a whole. We rightly regard this question as finally settled. I do not for a moment challenge the Constitutional authority or the competence of this august Committee. It is far from my intention. What I merely mean is that the question, having been fully discussed and decided upon, does not need to be reopened. I am, however, prepared, Sir, to help this Committee in clearing any doubts that may have been created by the misleading propaganda on the part of the anti-Separationists, or any information that I may be called upon to give with regard to the details of the Constitution of the future Province of Sind. I would, however, like to mention a few important points which may have been misrepresented by the anti-Separationists with a view to prejudice the Committee. The first is that it has been alleged that the calculations made by Mr. Brayne in the Conference and the Report that has been issued have already gone wrong by several lakhs and that they will never be realised hereafter. I fail to understand how they come to this conclusion. For three years, viz., 1929-30, 1930-31 and 1931-32, owing to the extraordinary depression and the low prices of agricultural products, the Bombay Government, like other Provincial Governments, allowed special rebates in the Land Revenue, and that, of course, must naturally upset the ordinary calculations that were made. In the year 1932, the Land assessment rates have been revised in accordance with the Barrage programme throughout the Barrage area, and have been considerably enhanced. Besides, the Government have allowed no special rebates to any appreciable degree and none whatever within the Barrage area in the current year. This will naturally bring more revenues to the

Province, and, perhaps, much more than what Mr. Brayne has calculated. Then there is one interesting point to note, that there has been 30 per cent. more cultivation within the Barrage zone in the last Rainy season than was even forecast. For instance, the authenticated figures which I have got from an official record show that the original forecast according to the cultivation was to be 22 lakhs, 84,880 acres, whereas actually in the current year the cultivation has been 25 lakhs, 20,947 acres. That means that there is an excess of 2 lakhs, 36,067 acres. This will give us roughly about 10 lakhs more revenue this year than was anticipated. Then with regard to Excise, the Government of Bombay have now realised the defect of the prohibition policy, and they have allowed them to open more liquor shops and higher bids have been received in the auctions than before, so we anticipate greater Revenues in the shape of Excise as well. It is specially misleading to say that the deficit of Sind is 91.45 lakhs. You have got to take into consideration 12 lakhs, the extra cost due to the separation, which amount is being entirely met from extra taxation. Then, Sir, with regard to the Barrage, some of the anti-Separationists in Sind have been rather circulating misleading rumours, that it will fail, and so forth. From the figures of cultivation, you must have realised that there has been more cultivation than was anticipated by the Chief Engineer himself. I have already said that the cultivation exceeded by 30 per cent. the original forecast. I would like to inform the Committee that there have actually been more land sales than was anticipated according to the programme in the first two years, to the extent of 50 per cent.; the estimate was 125,000 acres, whereas I have got actual official figures from the Revenue Commissioner of the Barrage, under his signature, that they have disposed of 2 lakhs—that means 50 per cent. more than they anticipated, and the rates have been exactly according to the forecast, and the forecast has not been in the least affected by the present depression, so far as the sales of land go. Then another special point in this connection is that they have actually leased out land, 1 lakh, 25,000 acres. This is quite a new item; it never existed in the forecast, and this will give us 8 lakhs per year more. Then it has been said by the anti-Separationists that the capital outlay on the Barrage has increased, and that the rate of interest will affect the borrowing for the Barrage adversely, and the working expenses have increased the land values have tumbled down. These are all false statements, and are absolutely misleading. In the first place, the capital outlay has not increased, but is down by 1 crore of rupees, and the statement of Sir Charlton Harrison, the Chief Engineer, is also very clear on the point and, subsequently, the figures which the Chief Engineer has submitted to the Government also represent an equal amount of saving. The rate of interest does not, one way or the other, affect the Barrage debts, because they were incurred on the specific agreement with the Government of India at the rate of 6 per cent. interest, irrespective of the fluctuating market rate at different times. Then as regards the working expenses, I might inform you that the working expenses have not increased. The Government of Bombay are very carefully looking into this question. The Government have abolished the appointment of Second Chief Engineer; that has effected a saving, and they are looking into the question of still further reducing the expenditure. As regards the land sales, I have already submitted figures showing that there have been more sales than were anticipated. These are the few main points that I wanted to mention at the outset, and I am prepared to give any further information that I am asked for.

Lord Hutchison of Montrose.

A329. I take it from the statement that you have made that you accept the figures as contained in the Brayne Report?—Yes; on the whole, they are satisfactory and reasonable.

A330. You anticipate that in the course of 10 years the Barrage will be a productive concern?—Yes; I think these figures are fairly reasonable, and in the course of about 10 years, as it was anticipated, we shall have no deficit. In about 1944-45 it will not stand in need of a subvention.

A331. You admit, of course, that these figures are based on world prices?—Yes. They have taken into consideration the slump rates. Mr. Brayne has clearly shown that the land assessment rates will be according to the slump rates, for five years, in any case; and, for that reason, he has made three different calculations; he has worked out his own calculations, which include the slump rates; therefore,

19th July, 1933.]

Khan Bahadur M. A. KHUARO, M.L.C.

the slump rates are already taken into consideration. They do not alter the position at all.

A332. But, naturally, the world prices will govern the ability to pay towards the use of water and land?—Yes; but at present the world prices are at the lowest, I suppose; and we do not expect that they will go down. As things stand, the prices are very low at present.

Sir P. Pattani.

A333. You agree, I suppose, that autonomy includes both rights and duties?—Yes, exactly.

A334. And an autonomous province undertakes not only the rights but also its duties?—Certainly, yes.

A335. Therefore, the administration should be in a position not only to administer its rights, but also to carry out its duties?—I am sure it will be.

A336. Do you think that Sind would be autonomous if Sind has to depend upon an outside authority for financial subvention to carry out its duties as an administration? Would you call it full autonomy?—The case of Sind is somewhat different. I would like to point out, as I have said in my statement, that even now Sind—you may call it subvention or whatever you like—receives from Bombay. Originally, when Sind was conquered, it happened to be conquered by the Army, which was of Bombay, but Sind was far nearer to the Punjab, and should, in ordinary circumstances, have been occupied by Northern Army; but circumstances so developed that the Bombay army which went to Afghanistan, while returning conquered Sind. Therefore, Sind began to be linked up with Bombay, but Sind has never been connected with Bombay in the past; or as a matter of fact any country in the south, and at no time has Sind been connected with any other province. It should have in natural way had connections with the North and not with the South. I maintain that this connection with Bombay is purely an artificial one. Besides Sind gives a lot to the Central Government. Sind gives five to six crores a year in the shape of Customs Duties to the Central Government from the port of Karachi. Certain revenues came to be called Central revenues; and others provincial revenues; but, according to the Government of India Act, Section 20, the British Government have a right over the finances; they can distribute them in any manner they like. The division of financial sources and revenues between provinces and the Central Government, according to the Meston Settlement is purely an artificial one and British Government can alter it in any way they like. Therefore, I should call this the financial adjustment or a temporary financial help. There was a good deal of discussion over this point. If you were to take the case of Assam, Assam is a Deficit Province; Bihar and Orissa is similarly a Deficit Province and so is Bengal.

A337. I am applying that to all the Deficit Provinces?—Exactly.

A338. Supposing that the final principle is adopted that Deficit Provinces should have no claim on the Central Government for financial help, would you claim that Sind should be an exception to that?—Yes. I am afraid I should say that Sind has an exceptional case, and can rightly claim to be placed on special footing in that respect.

A339. Can you give any exceptional grounds for that?—Yes. I have just traced out the whole history. I have referred to the difficulties we have and the discrimination linguistically, ethnologically, culturally and even climatically. You know the Bombay Presidency members of the Legislative Council do not understand anything of the Sind Province in regard to its agriculture and irrigation system. Sind is dependent more or less entirely upon irrigation, but the Bombay Presidency depends upon the monsoon. Everything is materially different in all practical aspects.

A340. You have said that Sind has suffered because of its amalgamation with Bombay?—Yes, because the Bombay Government has been very far from Sind.

A341. Do you think that the Barrage would have been possible if Sind had not been with Bombay? May I point out that Bombay has not found that money at all; that money comes from the Government of India. The Government of India has borrowed the money in the market and lent it to Bombay and, through Bombay, Sind has got it.

A342. Do you think that the small Province of Sind could get such big amounts?—I would like to point out that Bombay has not contributed anything towards Sind for the Barrage.

Sir P. Pattani. It has contributed its name and its reputation.

Sir Hari Singh Gour. It has plenty of security.

Witness. That is more or less moral security.

19^o July, 1933.]

Khan Bahadur M. A. KHUARO, M.L.C.

Sir P. Pattani.

A343. Another point I would like to put to you would be this. Do you think that Sind will be able to find money for its full university wherein you can have all the education in Sind that you are now given in Bombay?—There are other Provinces which have not got universities and, besides, a university does not cost much.

A344. There are Provinces that have not got universities. Would you be satisfied with the absence of educational facilities in Sind?—No. We have got our colleges; we have got an Engineering College, a Law College, and an Art College.

A345. What about the Agricultural and Medical Colleges?—Yes, we can have these too in due course of time.

A346. There is no desire to keep Sind arbitrarily linked up. The desire is only to find sufficient means for an autonomous Province in order that the autonomy can be so exercised that it can lead to the development and real progress of the people, and it is from that point of view that I am putting my questions?—I would submit that there are very many important points which do entitle Sind to have a separate Government. There are other Provinces which have not got their own universities, such as Assam, for instance.

A347. That means then that you will be satisfied with lesser educational facilities for the sentiment of being autonomous?—There will not be lesser educational facilities. There are universities in Bombay and other provinces near about to which students may go.

A348. Do you think they will be prepared to take your students?—Yes. Students from Sind have not necessarily to go to Bombay. We have got Arts Colleges and other colleges in Sind. But for any research work or further education they could go to any other place convenient.

A349. They are going to Bombay University because it is cheaper. I must tell you that Bombay University has been refusing, or some of the Colleges have been refusing Indian State students since our transfer to Delhi from Bombay, and I am afraid that these Provinces, when they become component entities, might be tempted to make, first, provision for their own students, and then provision for students from other Provinces. It is from that point of view that I am asking you whether you think it will be in your interest to separate at first, before you got the funds from a Province that gives you educational facilities and irrigation facilities and many other advantages?—I am afraid I cannot hold that view. We have got an Engineering College in Sind. In the whole of the Bombay Presidency there are only two Engineering Colleges, one at Poona and the other in Karachi. We have been admitting students in Karachi College from outside and we would be only too willing to fill up the College

A350. You have given as your main reason that if Sind is separated, by adjustment and by reduction of expenditure, you will be able to meet your financial obligations?—The extra financial obligations only and further development of the province.

A351. Can you give me some idea as to the direction in which reductions will be possible?—There was a long discussion which took place for about twenty days in the Sind Conference, and I will refer you to the proceedings of the Conference. Just to give you an idea, I would state that Sind expenditure is the highest in the whole of India. If you only take general statistics of the Provinces and compare Sind with them, you will find this. I have got here statistics which are authenticated and have been taken from the published figures of Government. Take the case of Land Revenue and General Administration. Sind spends per head Rs.1-1-9 whereas the Punjab spends Rs.0-10-3 per head, Assam spends Rs.0-9-1, the United Provinces spend Rs.0-8-1, Bengal spends only Rs.0-5-5 and Bihar and Orissa spend annas -/4/- only, per head. Take the case of the Police, about which there is a lot of criticism. On the Police per head we spend one rupee and one anna, United Provinces spend annas 6, the Punjab spends Rs.0-8-9 and the Central Provinces spend Rs.0-6-5 only. I will refer you to the Brayne Conference Report, where Mr. Brayne himself has expressed the opinion on page 15: "I therefore share the views of those who maintain that still further pruning of expenditure in Sind could be effected though without a very detailed examination, it is not possible to indicate specific items. The police expenditure, however, is undoubtedly high and requires special examination" That is the opinion held even by Mr. Brayne. We gave him certain figures, and he said that of course it was beyond the terms of reference; therefore, he could not examine those figures, although he held in general

19^o Juki, 1933.]

Khan Bahadur M. A. KHUERO, M.L.C.

that there was considerable room for retrenchment.

A352. By that you mean the salaries of officers?—They too are very high, but there is all round enough room to retrench just as I read out Mr. Brayne's opinion in general.

A353. Under the new scheme, with officers stabilised as they are, how will Sind alone be able to reduce its expenditure?—Much of the expenditure is in respect of the subordinate and provincial services too. Take the case for example of the primary school teachers. I am giving you merely an illustration of the smallest men, who are at the bottom and are paid the least. In Bengal they get Rs.10; and in Sind they get Rs. 20 p.m.

Lord Eustace Percy.

A354. Surely not now? The Bombay rate has been reduced in the last year a good deal?—Yes; but now they get Rs 18. If you will read the Thomas Committee Report which last year sat on this question of retrenchment, they have said a good deal about salaries in Bombay Presidency.

Sir P. Pattani.

A355. You said that in ten years probably by the income from the Barrage you might be able to meet all your financial obligations?—Yes. It can be safely anticipated.

A356. Because of the Barrage income from the Barrage irrigation scheme and by the sale of land, you might be able to balance your financial budget without making any subvention?—I am quite hopeful about that, and the results so far have proved that. I have stated the figures just now about the cultivation and land sales.

A357. Have you ever known any Chancellor of the Exchequer even being able to keep the annual figures of his budget?—No; it is more or less a forecast.

A358. But how can you prophesy any results from now?—You have got to go on a certain basis and on certain calculations. The budgets themselves are the matter of certain calculations. They may sometimes go wrong, but that does not mean that they must always go wrong. The calculations may be better off or worse off.

Lord Eustace Percy.

A359. May I just interpose a question here on Finance? Mr. Brayne's rough calculation was that the basic deficit would be covered by the available Barrage surplus from 1944-45 onwards. That is so, is it not?—Yes.

A360. But he specially said that that did not take into account the question of expansion or development expenditure. He said. "It will be seen that no allowance has been made for normal growth of expenditure on revenue under non-Barrage heads or for the considerable expenditure which must be incurred upon communications, agricultural and other beneficent services if Sind is to reap the full advantage of her resources in the new era of development upon which she has entered." The question I want to put to you is this. Is the development expenditure there referred to, which has not been allowed for, the expenditure which appears in the Expert Miles-Irving Committee's Report, on page 28, as net cost of expansion which is calculated, in 1944-45, to amount to 23 lakhs, and to rise, after that, to as much as 35 lakhs?—The point is this, that the Expert Committee took into consideration all the paper programmes made by the Bombay Government. I would like you to turn to page 18 of the same Report of the Expert Committee. If you would permit me to examine those figures and the items which appear in the Table on page 18, I would show you how difficult it will be to believe that most of them will ever be carried out.

A361. I did not want to go into a detailed examination of these figures, because they are more or less hypothetical?—Yes.

A362. But I gather that your position is that this development expenditure, this cost of expansion estimated for by the Expert Committee, is excessive?—Yes, exactly.

A363. And, therefore, should not be held to invalidate Mr. Brayne's basic estimate that Sind can be self-supporting by 1944-45?—Yes. I want to explain it in one word. The Expert Committee have been guided entirely by the paper programme, whereas Mr. Brayne has been rather more practical in that respect. He has expressed the opinion in his Report that all the normal growth of expenditure should be met from the extraordinary room that the Province has for retrenchment and so many other taxations which have been suggested. All these sources will be found adequate to meet the growth of expenditure. Your Committee, for instance, recommended the tobacco tax which the Bombay Government have already imposed, with our support.

Khan Bahadur M. A. KHUERO, M.L.C

Sir P. Pattani.

A364. If a subvention is granted, would you accept submission of your budget to the Central Government so that they can realise what sort of subvention is really justified?—I think the Central Government will have the Governor as their Agent. He will be quite able to look after their interests.

A365. You will not have any interference from the Central Government which is really helping you by a subvention such as you have asked for?—Yes; but I think I should not express an opinion on that point one way or the other. I would maintain that the province under the guidance of the Governor will be able to take care of itself.

A366. Now when Sind is able, after ten years, to meet its financial responsibilities, supposing the principle is accepted that Sind, from considerations other than finance, should have a claim to separation, but because of the financial difficulties it is decided that it should wait for ten years, when finances are adjusted properly, would you mind that?—Certainly, I should mind that I strongly oppose that view for two very sound reasons. One is that after the enquiry into the finances the Government of Bombay have definitely known that Sind is to receive a sort of subvention from them of about 80 lakhs a year which, naturally, the Government of Bombay will resent. My information is that originally in their Memorandum to the Simon Commission they objected to the separation of Sind, but subsequently they have waived their objection; and, secondly, but why should Sind be made to have that money from Bombay instead of the Government of India, because Bombay even otherwise will have a deficit of a crore and a half, and there is no conceivable method or reason whereby they can make up that deficit. They have already done their utmost so far as retrenchment goes. I think I will give the opinion of the Finance-Secretary of the Bombay Government when he submitted his Note to your committee, my Lord Chairman, when you were touring in India. He said that Bombay will find it very difficult to balance their budget unless they get something from the Government of India for expenditure; and there was a special resolution passed unanimously last year in the Bombay Council when a demand for funds from the Central Government was made in excess of what even the Percy Committee recommended for Bombay. So that I really do not think that is the true position.

A367. Your analogy of the income tax does not hold good, because the income tax is a direct tax?—I do not say income tax at all. I say any subvention from the Central Government, in whatever form.

A368. If the subvention to the Bombay Government from the Central Government is necessitated because the Central Government is pocketing all the income tax, which is a direct tax on its own people, so any amount which might go to that Government is not a subvention, but really their own money re-transferred to them on a certain percentage. Therefore, I do not think your analogy holds good?—That is a mere difference of opinion between us. You might call that own money of the Government of Bombay. I might call certain other taxation as own money of the Government of Sind.

Major Attlee.

A369. The cost of administration in Bombay is higher than that of most other Provinces in India, is it not?—Yes, exactly.

A370. Is it your case that Sind should have a standard of administration more on a level with those of other Provinces than that of Bombay?—Yes, but I may add one point, which is that the administration of Bombay becomes costlier when you include Sind with it. If you separate Sind from it, it becomes slightly cheaper. I will mention two figures: The Administration of Police, for instance, if you include Sind, it becomes as high as Rs. 1—1—0 per head, but for Bombay and Sind together, it becomes only 14 annas per head. The chief reason for that is that in Sind the Government of Bombay have got into the habit of paying special allowances; that is, I mean a special allowance is being paid to officers who come to Sind, and even salary paid in Sind is higher than in Bombay Presidency proper.

A371. Do you contend that, if necessary, you are prepared to pay a price for your separation by accepting a somewhat lower standard than that which they have in Bombay—that is to say, a less provision for universities, and so forth, and lower salaries?—My point is, if you were to take into consideration as a basis the Brayne Conference Report, and the calculations therein, the administration that we will in that case get is almost identical

Khan Bahadur M. A. KHURO, M.L.C.

to what it is at present in Bombay, with the exception of what you call the University of Bombay, or some such minor things. But, it may also be added, that the Brayne Conference and the Expert Committee both have fully dealt with this question of having separate heads for all Departments, and they have provided extra emoluments for the heads. Almost every Department in Sind has a separate head. The Commissioner of Sind is the head of the Revenue, Excise and the Police, he exercises all powers of Inspector-General, Police, and has a power of supervision and control in almost all Departments. Sir P. Pattani said that there should be the Science institution and Medical institution, and so forth, which really does not in any way enhance the reputation or improve the administration of Sind, for all practical purposes

Sir P. Pattani.

A372. My point is quite a short one. My point is that you claim, do you not, that it is not necessary that Sind should have all these things?—Yes. I have just said that all these things that Sind must have, have already been provided in the scheme propounded by the Brayne Conference. I think I can safely say that Sind can afford to do without those things which Sind will not have, to start with.

A373. The next point is, you would agree, would you not, that the future of Sind depends upon the Barrage?—Yes, very largely.

A374. Would you say, therefore, that a judgment on the Finance of Sind must be a judgment over a number of years as Sind is in process of development?—In the future, you mean?

A375. If you want to judge the finances of Sind, Sind is in the position of an undeveloped property which has had a large amount of capital put into it, and you will not get a full return for some time, will you?—Yes, for about 10 years, it has been calculated. After about six years or so, there will be some return and gradually it will rise till in about 1944-45 we shall not stand in need of any outside help.

A376. Would you claim, therefore, that the question whether Sind can stand financially by itself should not be judged on whether it can do it this year or next year or in a year or two, but taken over a period of years?—Sind will ultimately stand on its own footing, after 10 or 12 years.

A377. I was asking you whether you would claim as has been suggested, that Sind should not be separated until she is actually financially sound? Would you say you must take that considering a period of development over a number of years, that if in the future she can become financially self-contained, that, therefore, she has a right to separation?—No. As a representative of the Conference, which, as I said, speaks for at least 80 per cent. of the people, I have to voice their feelings, that we are strongly of this opinion, that Sind must separate immediately, and for that I have given adequate reasons in my original Memorandum, and also for the temporary financial help Sind has to get help from the Government of India for 10 years or 15 years at the most.

A378. Now would you be prepared to accept any special safeguards for the Barrage administration? The whole financial future depends upon that Barrage scheme being properly run, and there being proper payments made for the water provided. Do you agree?—Yes, largely. But I do not see how you can bring in the safeguards.

A379. If, as a matter of fact, that scheme is not wrong, and if the water is not properly distributed, your finances fall to bits?—To a large extent, it does depend upon the proper distribution of water.

A380. You will also agree that the representation in the Sind Council will be largely by people who are elected by agriculturalists who will naturally desire to get their water as cheaply as possible, will they not?—I am afraid, no, because the thing is that the distribution of water is quite a separate thing. It is in the hands of the administration, which is a well organised administration; they have a Chief Engineer at the head of it, and he is a man of Imperial Service. He also has men of Imperial Service directly recruited by the Secretary of State for India as the Superintending Engineers. Then there is a definite scheme. They have got to give water in accordance to that scheme. The duty has been already assigned for all crops, which has been approved by Government; and there could be no variations or alterations in that scheme.

A381. Why not? Suppose that is transferred, and comes under a Minister, you do not think there is any danger of pressure being put upon a Minister by his constituents?—I, personally, feel it will not be so. The White Paper besides says the Governor will have supervisory powers, and the supervisory powers of the Governor in that case will be quite enough.

19th July, 1933.]

Khan Bahadur M. A. KHUHHO, M L.C.

A382. You do not think there is any need for any special powers?—No; the supervisory powers of the Governor in that case are enough.

Lord Eustace Percy.

A383. May I clear up that point? Do you mean that you accept the proposals in the White Paper that the Sukkur Barrage should be a special responsibility of the Governor of Sind?—No; a special responsibility is a very wide word. As a matter of fact, I have no apprehension whatever about the administration of the Sukkur Barrage; and I maintain there will be no difficulty whatever about it. Besides, we do not think that anybody in Sind or anywhere means to do away with such a competent establishment and to institute in its place an incompetent or an inefficient establishment. It is not a practical proposition. But if it is feared at all that the Governor who has the special power of supervising will be misled by the Ministry, that apprehension I am afraid is groundless.

Sir Reginald Craddock.

A384. Khan Bahadur Khuho, you mentioned that you collected at Karachi, I forget the exact figure you said, a certain amount of Customs. You mentioned the figure, did you not?—Yes.

A385. How much was that?—I said it was 6 crores. Of course, it has been now somewhat affected by the present depression. That is according to the figures that I got from the Customs Department themselves.

A386. But as a matter of fact, the Customs collected at Karachi are not confined to the articles consumed in Sind?—No.

A387. All that is not paid by the consumers in Sind?—Exactly. I only said as a general proposition that in the Government of India Act it is provided that all the Revenues vest in His Majesty's Government. There are different kinds of taxations. You call it Customs Duty, Income Tax, Land Revenue, and all that, and they are assigned to the Central Government and some to the Provincial Governments. I said what has been collected in Sind, has been collected within the province of Sind.

A388. That has rather neutralised the effect of a Province receiving the subvention, as a matter of fact. All the Maritime Provinces in India collect Customs which are really paid by people inland, who consume a large part of it?—Quite true. But Punjab and U.P. or C.P. do not pay as much to the central revenues. We have the advantage of Karachi port.

A389. Then to go to another matter, you referred to Sind administration being very expensive?—Yes.

A390. You said that that was due to somewhat higher salaries, and you instanced school teachers?—Yes.

A391. I presume that when the Bombay Government sanctioned these higher salaries in Sind, it was because the cost of living in Sind was at that time, at all events, higher than the cost of living in the Presidency generally?—I do not agree, but the cost of living in Sind now, I think, is hardly as much as it was in 1913.

Lord Eustace Percy.

A392. Surely, there is a misunderstanding here. The school teachers' salaries of 20 rupees a month was the general rate for the whole of the Bombay Presidency, was it not?—Yes, but in Sind they get Rs 5 p.m. over and above that pay.

A393. It is not, in fact, higher than in the Bombay Presidency?—As a matter of fact, I want to point out that in Sind each teacher gets 5 rupees extra, because of Sind conditions.

A394. You mentioned the figure of 20 rupees, which happens to be the salary of a school teacher in the Bombay Presidency generally?—Yes, but in Sind it is 5 rupees higher.

Dr. Shafa 'at Ahmad Khan.

A395. It does not include the Sind allowance?—Yes. Those in Sind get enhanced pay in all departments.

Sir Reginald Craddock.

A396. Are all the teachers local men?—Yes, local men.

A397. They are all local men born and bred in Sind?—Yes.

A398. That is to say, the higher salaries or the Sind allowances are not really due to the unwillingness of people from Bombay to go and serve in Sind, but they are due to expenses, the cost of living in Sind having been in other times higher?—I do not accept that principle, that the cost of living is higher. I accept that those people

Khan Bahadur M. A. KHUHHO, M.L.C.

belong to Sind, but it is the creation of the Government of Bombay that gave them these allowances and higher pay. I will give you an example; in 1924, when I was in the Bombay Council, the question of salaries of tapidars came up. It is the village establishment in Revenue Department; Sind Members very strongly opposed that they should not be given higher salaries than what they were getting. But still the Bombay Government carried it in spite of their opposition. What could you do with such kind of things?

Sir P. Pattani.

A399. May I ask a question. If you had reductions there, possible to be made after Sind becomes autonomous, you think that the Ministry, as soon as it is formed there, should go into these questions of readjustment and reductions of expenditure, so that the amount of the subvention from the Central Government may be reduced?—I do not say that they will necessarily do it immediately. The position is that at present the Brayne Committee has not taken into consideration these savings at all. That does not affect, therefore, this present scheme laid down therein. They will have time enough to do it, later on.

Dr. Shafa'at Ahmad Khan.

A400. Your object is not to establish extremely cheap and inefficient administration but to keep up the standard?—Yes.

Sir Reginald Craddock.

A401. Then you mentioned that the cost of Police was higher in Sind per head?—Yes.

A402. Of course, if you have a large area and a proportionately small population, all those per capita calculations will be higher. I mean, your area is relatively larger than your population compared with other parts of India?—Yes, to some extent, that is right. But if you consider the number of policemen and the entire staff, it is much larger than even in the Bombay Presidency.

A403 But is it not a fact that your records of crime are greater than in most parts of India?—No, it is only on the hillsides or the borders; but Sind is certainly not more criminal than other provinces.

A404. We have had in other evidence that there are a great many dacoities in Sind, and kidnapping of women was prevalent, and on the whole your record as a law breaking Province is rather bad?—I would like to inform the Committee that this is the kind of false propaganda which is being carried on, in order to thwart the legitimate efforts of getting Sind separated.

A405. But those are facts, they can be tested on the criminal statistics?—No. It has been said that there is a lot of communal feelings and dacoities and abductions of women and things of that kind, but the fact is that Sind has been the most peaceful Province, as I can claim, in the whole of India. If you were to see the history of 90 years of her connection with the British Rule, there have only been three instances of communal riots. They too clearly show up the Hindu frame of mind in Sind. While quoting the specific instance of Larkana riot I would refer to what the impartial English Judge says about it. The learned Judge, Mr. Norman, says that the Magistrate who took the initiative in arresting innocent people and the Public Prosecutor who conducted those cases have shown communal bias in this respect and have wrongly involved innocent people. In the case of Sukkur riots, 95 per cent. or more cases were withdrawn by the Government themselves, they being false.

A406. But, if under existing circumstances, there was communal bias in favour of the Hindus, under the new Government may there not be communal bias in favour of Muslims—at least that is what the Hindus are afraid of?—No, I feel it will not be so because there will be responsible government of the people themselves, and they shall have to work together.

A407. You have a very large majority of Muhammadans in Sind, therefore, the great majority of the Members of the Councils will be Muhammadans, and that is what the Hindus are afraid of. Would you object to weightage being given to the Hindus, and their getting a larger proportion of seats than they would have under their numerical standard?—The Premier Award has given them the extra representation, and they will be getting about 33 per cent. The Premier's Award is a very reasonable scheme, and everyone in Sind, whose feelings I voice here, sticks to the Communal Award. Why should there be any particular community objecting to it? There are other minorities in Sind and there are minorities in other Provinces too, but none of them object to the communal award—why should Sind Hindus object?

19th July, 1933]

Khan Bahadur M. A. KHUHHO, M.L.C.

A408. Why are the Hindus apparently so frightened?—I say this is all false propaganda, deliberately carried on to oppose separation of Sind. They do not seriously mean what they say.

Sir Hari Singh Gour.

A409. You complain of the neglect of Sind by the Bombay Presidency, is that not so?—By the Bombay Government, you mean?

A410. In the second paragraph on the second page of your Memorandum, you say: "Our ninety years' experience of Sind's connection with Bombay has shown us that the latter has neglected our economic and social development and has checked the growth of Karachi port which possesses vast potentialities for development, being the nearest port to the West. Our roads and communications are in an extremely undeveloped condition. Our nation-building Departments are starving. Education is at its lowest ebb." This is the essence of your complaint against the Bombay Government which you wish to redress by separation?—Yes.

A411. What would be the cost of improving the condition of Sind in the next 10 years?—The question is of choosing which is the lesser evil.

A412. Have you calculated the cost of these improvements which have been denied to you by the Bombay Government and of which you complain and which have prompted you to ask for separation?—I give you general instance that if you were to take the case of roads, for the last 85 years, the Government of Bombay have only given us 130 miles of provincial roads, and how can you expect that the same Government will ever spend 1 crore and 35 lakhs on the roads which they show in their paper programme.

A413. I admit all that, for the sake of argument, but the question I asked you is, what will be the cost of developing Sind to make up the very heavy leeway that you have to make up in consequence of the neglect of your Province by the Bombay Government?—There is no question of calculating cost on that point. What I would say is that Sind, having its own Government, will be able to devote more attention to the problems of Sind and whatever money they will be able to save they will be devoting to the Province itself. The Bombay Government will not do that. We have to go by past history in their case. Besides there could be no guarantee that Bombay will ever worry about Sind conditions.

A414. According to the Brayne Report, 75 lakhs of rupees are required every year for the next 10 years, and in 1944-45, if the calculations are right, and do not go wrong, which they very often do, then you will be a self-sufficient Province?—By 1944-45. Yes, I expect so.

A415. But suppose if they all go wrong, then do you admit that after 1944 the Province will have to be re-amalgamated with Bombay Presidency?—No. It is a hypothetical case; I cannot answer it. Why should it at all be presumed like that?

A416. Therefore, you are landed in a very difficult position?—I do not think you have sufficient reasons to assume that.

A417. We are launching into a scheme banking upon an uncertainty with no chance whatever of retrieving the position in case the worst happens, and our anticipations do not come true. Is that not so?—No; if I may say so, you are holding a pessimistic view, which is not in the least justified.

A418. No, I am not; I am only looking into the future?—If you were to be guided by these principles which are hopelessly pessimistic, there would be no progress in the world; no scheme would be launched, nothing would be done. You should remember that the whole Barrage scheme was based on calculations. All big schemes are always launched, basing them on certain figures of income and expenditure. The Government of India gave nearly 20 crores for the Barrage scheme which they fairly anticipated would bring out good results. If they were such pessimistic people, they would not have agreed to give 20 crores. Then there would have been no Barrage scheme and no development in Sind, or as a matter of fact on that basis there will be no progress made anywhere in the world. We will permanently be where we are and no further. Will it not be so?

A419. The next point I wish to ask you is: It has been admitted by you that the future of Sind lies on the Barrage?—Yes, to a great extent.

A420. Sir Charlton Harrison, in his evidence before the Simon Commission, and later on, has stated, and it is a fact which cannot be denied, that the water which flows through the Barrage is limited, would you agree that that is so now?—Certainly not. Things have changed since then. You are referring

Khan Bahadur M. A. KHUERO, M.L.C.

to what he said in 1928, but perhaps you do not know the later conditions. The Barrage has, of course, a limited quantity according to the Scheme. The Government of Punjab wanted to launch certain schemes. On this point dispute arose between the two Provinces, and the Government of India as a deciding party invited them to send representatives, and the Government of India decided that for the future the Government of Punjab will not have more water drawn from the River.

A421. The Government of India have held that the Punjab Irrigation Scheme must be held up, because if their Irrigation Scheme was to continue pari passu with the Barrage Scheme, both will suffer?—They have been held up sine die, and if you mean to say that by separation of Sind, Sind will be in an inferior position, I do not hold that view at all.

A422. What I mean to say you will hear presently, but at the present moment what I do say is that there is a limited quantity of water, and there are two Claimants, the Punjab and Sind, or rather Bombay?—Yes.

A423. Influenced by the powerful advocacy of the Bombay Government, the Government of India have overruled the contention of Punjab?—Yes, but I do not agree with the view that that is because of the power of advocacy.

A424. Never mind; that may not be the proximate cause. The Government of India have at the present moment decided that Punjab must hold its hand, because that would imperil the success of the Barrage Scheme?—Yes.

A425. Now Punjab is going to get autonomy, and you cannot stay the hand of Punjab?—No.

A426. And you want autonomy?—Yes.

A427. And now there will be a hand-to-hand fight between you and Punjab for the water?—Why should there be? I cannot see the point at all, because if there is dispute between the two Provinces, naturally the Government of India, or the Governor-General in his discretion, will have power to decide which is right. I maintain that the question has been finally settled between the Government of Bombay and the Government of Punjab by arbitration at the hands of the Government of India. The whole frame is laid down, and the Scheme settled; so that with regard to Sir Hari Singh Gour's suspicion that there will be a hand-to-hand fight, may I say I do not apprehend anything of the kind.

Any question between the two Provinces must be settled by the Government of India. It is not a question of a hand-to-hand fight.

A428. I was using that in a figurative sense; you did not understand me; but let that pass. The fact remains that there are two Claimants to a limited supply of water, which at the present moment flows through the Barrage, and the other claim has not yet been satisfied and may be insisted on in the near future?—I do not hold that view, and I repeat that this question has already been settled.

A429. In which case the future of the Barrage would be very seriously affected?—No, I certainly disagree with that view.

Lord Eustace Percy.

A430. May I interpose one supplemental question here? Do I understand that your position is this, that if there is no provision under the White Paper which would enable the Governor-General in his discretion to settle the dispute as to the diversion of water between the two Provinces, you think that a provision should be inserted in the White Paper giving the Governor-General that power?—Yes. I think, if I remember rightly, there is something like that in the White Paper.

A431. We need not trouble about that at the moment, at any rate, that is what you desire?—That is what I desire.

Sir Hari Singh Gour.

A432. In the introduction to the memorandum you have said that this is a genuine grievance, not only of the people of Sind, but of the people of India in general, with whom the former are closely bound up. What evidence have you that this is a grievance of the people of India generally that Sind is not converted into a separate Province?—I would refer you to the three Indian Round Table Conferences in which this question was discussed, and agreed to and was also finally decided by the Government. Therefore, it is a matter that affects not only the people of Sind but the representatives of India as a whole, to whom the pledge was given, and through them the people of Sind.

A433. That is what you mean by this sentence?—Yes.

A434. Now will you kindly turn to another sentence which I have not been able to understand at page 5. You say about the middle of the page: "For all practical purposes Sind is already a self-contained Province"?—Yes, administratively. I would like to amplify that.

4 A* 3

19^o July, 1933.]

Khan Bahadur M. A. KHURRO, M.L.C.

A435. That is the reason why I have read it to you?—Yes, quite right. My point there is that much is being made by the Anti-Separationist Group that Sind will need this and will need that. What I mean is that Sind at present is governed in such a manner by Bombay that, largely due to the distance between the seat of Government and the Province, almost every important department of Sind has its head in Sind, and the nominal head of the Government at Bombay is merely guided by the advice of the man on the spot.

A436. That is what you mean by saying that for all practical purposes Sind is already a self-contained Province?—Self-contained administratively.

A437. Then what is your grievance? Supposing by a financial adjustment between the Bombay Presidency and Sind, Sind is made a sort of Sub-Province with a Deputy-Governor, would you not be satisfied?—I do not know that it can rightly be made a Sub-Province by having a Deputy-Governor. Perhaps you mean a difference of name?

A438. No; it is made a Sub-Province for the purpose of stamping upon it its own individuality under the Presidency of Bombay?—Do not you see that the Governor will have the elected representatives and the Legislative Council to advise him, and there will be responsibility on the elected representatives of the people as well. Why should Sind have an inferior position where the elected people should have no voice at all in the administration?

A439. It has got an inferior position because it has got no money. Poor people always have an inferior position. You have said that this is a joint family in which Sind should receive money from the rest of India?—That is the principle which is accepted by the expert Committees, for instance the Percy Conference and the Brayne Conference.

Lord Eustace Percy.

A440. Let me intervene. I notice that you have quoted the Percy Committee, but I do not recognise the quotation, and I cannot find it in my Report?—At page 22.

A441. I am referring to the bottom of page 17 of your Memorandum. I do not want to delay the proceedings; I just wanted to put in a caveat that I do not recognise my child?—These are not the exact words I have reproduced; I have only reproduced the sense of the recommendations.

Lord Eustace Percy.] Well, they are in inverted commas.

Sir Hari Singh Gour.

A442. You have said on page 19 in paragraph 3: "There can be really no deficit Province as long as a whole joint family, i.e. India, is financially sound," but where the parent itself is financially in deficit, what are you going to do?—It is an altogether different issue. I should say that that is what the Miles-Irving Committee themselves have maintained.

A443. Are you aware that the Central Government is in financial straits and has been in financial straits for the last 13 years?—Every branch of the Government.

A444. And where is the money to come from?—Well, that has already been gone into and there is a recommendation from the Federal Finance Committee supporting the view held by us.

Sir P. Pattani.

A445. That might mean that new taxation may have to be imposed by the Central Government in order to meet these demands for subvention from all these Provinces?—Yes.

A446. In that event, do not you think that if they impose more taxes Sind and all the deficit Provinces will have in a certain measure to contribute towards those taxes?—The Percy Committee have recommended that if need arises there should be other taxes, for instance, a tax on matches. There have been proposals made by which, if the Government of India want to find money, they could find it. Taxation of matches alone will give them two or three crores of rupees, if I remember rightly, and the Provinces of Sind and the North-West Frontier will not need more than about one crore and a half.

A447. Money will have to be found, but the deficit Province will also have to contribute to finding that money?—The deficit Province has already accepted the tobacco tax and it does not matter much if it contributed a bit by way of duty on matches, which is an indirect tax.

Dr. Shafa'at Ahmad Khan.

A448. In reply to a question of Sir P. Pattani regarding the deficit Provinces—not just now but before—may I refer you to the recommendation of the Third Round Table Conference Federal Finance Committee, paragraph 12, page 52? This is what they say: "We propose accordingly that any proved cases of deficit Provinces should be met by subvention

19th July, 1933.]

Khan Bahadur M. A. KHURRO, M.L.C.

from the Centre on certain conditions ” ”
—Yes.

A449. Further on you will find that they have added. “It is important that the position should be final, as periodic revision could not fail to react on constitutional independence and financial responsibility ”?—Certainly.

A450. While they agreed, therefore, to subvention being paid from the Centre, they also laid it down quite clearly that there should be no impinging of financial autonomy. Therefore, you do not really think that if you get subvention from the Centre according to these proposals, which really are embodied in the White Paper, your autonomy will be affected?—No. Constitutionally it should be limited to that?—

A451. Yes?—Yes; quite right.

A452. And you want the subvention to be incorporated in the constitution itself?—Yes, in the Act of Parliament.

A453. As according to the Report, if it comes up for periodic revision there is a liability of your autonomy being affected?—Certainly.

A454. Your second point was with regard to the standard of administration?—Yes.

A455. Am I right in assuming that you are as eager as anybody else for getting a proper level of efficiency of administration in Sind?—Yes.

A456. And that you are not going to have an inefficient administration solely and simply because you want an independent Sind?—Certainly. We do not want an inferior or incompetent administration.

A457. And therefore any readjustment of service that may be undertaken by the Minister in future must keep in view the basic principle of administrative efficiency in Sind?—Yes.

A458. And such schemes will not allow Sind to fall if not below the level of Bombay, which is the highest standard in the whole of India—at least of other Provinces of India?—Quite right.

A459. My point is this, that no saving should be effected at the cost of efficiency of administration?—Yes, of course.

A460. And you demand separation of Sind distinctly on this condition?—Yes. I have figures to show that Bombay has the highest and most expensive administration, but it cannot be said that Bengal and the Punjab are inefficient or incompetent in administration; they are equally good.

A461. Then another point was raised. May I draw your attention to the fact that there are certain arrangements in Provinces such as the Punjab and United Provinces whereby a certain number of students of the Punjab were annually admitted to the Engineering College at Roorkee which agreed to take at least 40 students every year, because the Punjab Government itself could not make financial arrangements for their own College, so that these arrangements regarding the universities and other institutions which are highly specialised are not only possible but probable?—Yes, exactly. I will give you an instance. The Director General of Police in Sind was talking to me, and he said “It will be cheaper for Sind for their police training to go to the Government of Punjab because they will be able to do it at less cost than Bombay is doing it now”. Bombay training is more expensive than Punjab, but Punjab is no less efficient.

A462. I can give you an example in my district of the training of probationers for the Political Department where you get students from all parts of India.

Lord Eustace Percy.] Are we to have a discussion here as to the degree as to which there is really interchangeability of Provinces in university education.

Dr. Shafa'at Ahmad Khan.] No, my point is this; that it is possible even if a Province does not make arrangements for them to get the benefit of university education in other Provinces.

Lord Eustace Percy.] You remember that Behar and Orissa tried to do that with the Universities of Bengal and did not succeed, and had to establish universities of their own

Sir Hari Singh Gour.] Even the small Province of Delhi had to establish a university of its own because Punjab would not give facilities.

Lord Eustace Percy.] We had better not carry this discussion further.

Sir P. Pattani.] I have never said it is not possible to come to some arrangement with the Province, but I must say this, that what is possible under a Central Government may not be possible when each Province claims to be a separate autonomous Province.

Dr. Shafa'at Ahmad Khan.] May I reply that we advocated inter-provincial councils for many years for co-ordinate education, agriculture and other transferred departments, and I do not see any reason why with the advent of provincial autonomy we should not have provincial intercourse and co-operation more intimate and still more effective.

Sir P. Pattani] It may be possible but it is also possible and probable that it may not be acceptable to the Provinces.

Dr. Shafa'at Ahmad Khan.

A463. I think all these questions were very thoroughly considered by Brayne's Committee, I went through its proceedings last year?—They were considered both by the Brayne Conference and the Miles-Irving Conference.

A464. There was one point put by my Lord Chairman with regard to the actual amount needed for the separation of Sind over and above the basic deficit of 80 lakhs. Am I right in assuming that the Miles-Irving Committee estimated that amount after considering the need of Sind at pages 46 to 82 at 11½ lakhs and that Brayne's Committee practically upheld that, adding only half a lakh, so the basic amount needed is 12 lakhs, and that I suppose will be met by the cess which the Zamindars of Sind have agreed to levy to pay off this amount?—Yes; all the extra cost is to be borne by taxation.

A465. So the net deficit will be 80 lakhs?—Yes; that is the amount estimated.

A466. And it will not be really 92 lakhs at all?—No, not at all, because they debit on one side and do not give credit on the other side.

A467. Now I come to the Sukkur Barrage. Last year we came to a compromise regarding the Sukkur Barrage that the Governor of Sind should have special power with regard to administration of Sukkur Barrage. I stand by that because I feel it is essential. What is your opinion with regard to that provision?—I have said that there will not be much need for it.

A468. But if there is need?—The supernumerary powers provide for that.

A469. You mean that the Governor would exercise supervision in emergencies?—That would be natural, but he cannot manage without the constitutional Government. The only thing is that the appointment of the Chief Engineer will be made by the Government itself, so that he will have the assistance of the Chief Engineer in times of crisis, when and where it is considered necessary, thus the efficiency of the administration is not going to be seriously affected.

A470. Of course the detailed arrangements and the detailed rules and regulations which may be framed by the Governor in consultation with the Minister will have to be discussed later on, the Minister on the one hand and the Governor on the other?—Yes

A471. If a satisfactory compromise is arrived at between the Governor on the one hand and the Minister on the other regarding the spheres of men's influence over the administration of Sukkur Barrage, then you will have no objection at all to it?—In those cases where he thinks there is need to interfere the Governor will interfere.

A472. Therefore, there will be really no difficulty in keeping the administration of the Sukkur Barrage up to the mark and keep at a very high level of efficiency, if these are actually accepted?—I maintain that the administration will not be affected. I do not think any Government or Ministry will be so foolish as to ruin the efficiency of the administration and thereby affect the finances of the Province; they will not do it in self-interest.

A473. No Minister would really ever try to interfere in the day-to-day administration of the Sukkur Barrage?—Certainly not; he would resign rather than do it, because the consequences, if he has got any political career to look to, would be very serious.

A474. So that for all practical purposes the Sukkur Barrage will be practically autonomous, though the line of policy must be indicated by the Minister?—Yes. Of course, I do not associate myself with the view that there should be interference with the Ministry by the Governor. If in any case there is genuine ground to feel that the efficiency is going to be affected, of course, the Governor can intervene, but ordinarily I do not think the Ministry will discharge their responsibility in such an inefficient manner, that they will ruin the administration of the Sukkur Barrage.

A475. And even if they do, it is highly probable that the Governor will come down on the Minister?—Yes.

A476. Do not you think that the Sukkur Barrage scheme is based on the probability of a certain amount of success, if it is well executed and conceived?—Generally, of course. In all the schemes that are launched, you first and foremost make your calculations properly, and they are thoroughly examined. In the case of the Barrage, that went on being

Khan Bahadur M. A. KHURRO, M.L.C.

thoroughly examined since 1907. The idea was mooted then and subsequently again in 1913 and 1914, when the Secretary of State turned it down. Then it was prepared by the Government of Bombay in 1920-21 and it was thoroughly examined by the experts of the Government of India, and experts here in London under the direction of the Secretary of State for India, and in 1923 it was finally passed by the Legislative Council, and it was fully discussed; and thus it was examined previously by the experts in Bombay of the Government of India and here.

A477. My point is simply this: you will agree with me that generally on the lines of policy indicated in the Sukkur Barrage Scheme, the hopes have been realised so far?—Yes, of course, so far.

A478. And there is no reason why in the course of time Sind should not become practically financially a self-supporting Province?—I have every hope of that, and I have no reason to feel otherwise.

A479. There are some objections raised by various bodies that the demand for a separation of Sind is recent in origin, that only dates back to about 1927, or something like that?—Certainly not. I said just now in my opening remarks, that as early as 1913 it was being considered. The late President of the Congress Mr. Burgir and Mr. Harchandrai Vishindas were working hand in hand in this matter, at the time of the Montagu-Chelmsford Reform. In 1918 again the Congress had a Session, and they appointed a Sub-Committee to go into this question. That Sub-Committee consisted of no less than five Hindus, and they unanimously recommended that Sind should be immediately separated. That was in 1918, and that original Report was secured by me, and I had it circulated.

A480. When?—Last year. I got it republished last year for the intelligence of the members, for reminding them of what was done by the Congress. Again in 1927 it was reiterated by the Congress, and later the All Parties Conference at Lucknow accepted the principle of separation.

Sir P. Pattani.

A481. I think in 1918 an essential condition was attached to the recommendation that finance should be found by Sind? Was it conditional or was it unconditional?—I beg your pardon. In 1918 when they appointed a Sub-Committee in Karachi, they recommended that Sind should be separated, irrespective of any condition; no condition whatever was attached.

A482. But you are now attaching the condition of subvention. That means that Sind should be self-supporting?—No; they have not said that. I was saying that in 1918 they never said that.

Sir P. Pattani.] Let me tell you this, that I am not against the separation of Sind. I say that no communal consideration, nor even consideration of administrative efficiency should come in the way of self-determination of any Province of India, but I should certainly wish that autonomy and financial responsibility should go together; that is all.

Dr. Shafa' at Ahmad Khan.

A483. Is there any truth in the statement that this demand is a mere matter of politics?—No. It has its origin in the Province of Sind itself, and all the leading people in Sind Province are in favour of it strongly.

A484. What is the state of communication now between Sind and Bombay; is it very difficult?—It is as bad as ever. From the Sukkur District, where the Sukkur Barrage is, the most important place of Sind, it would take 60 hours to reach Bombay and even more to reach Poona.

A485. Do the members of the Cabinet ever visit Sind at all?—No. We have Ministers who have been in office for three years and have never seen Sind once; there are common instances of that kind.

A486. And does the Legislative Council take a very active interest?—So far as the Legislative Council goes the members do not understand at all the Sindhi problem; they are absolutely ignorant of the conditions. They do not know about irrigation; they do not know about land condition; they do not know anything about the other administrative conditions at all.

A487. Do you think that the Muslims of Sind will be able to run the administration effectively without the help of the Hindu community?—The Hindus, of course, will have a share in the administration. They are 33 per cent, represented on the Legislative Council.

A488. And the Cabinet also?—And the Cabinet.

A489. Can you conceive the possibility of a Cabinet of Sind being constituted in which there is not a Hindu member?

19^o Jullii, 1933.]

Khan Bahadur M. A. KHUERO, M.L.C.

—It is impossible, I consider. There is bound to be a Hindu Minister.

A490. And you think that the parties in Sind will be based mainly upon non-Communal principles?—Yes; I think there will be no Communal Party. Even now in Bombay you have several Parties; you have the Backward and Depressed Classes and you have the Advanced Classes; there are three or four Parties in Bombay.

A491. Was Sind a deficit Province prior to 1919?—No. As a matter of fact I have reported this also, that for five years between 1910 and 1915, for which we had the figures in the Legislative Council, Sind was a surplus Province. The position was that actually the deficit came later on after 1916-17, because at that time the War was terminating, and there had been special allowances for our officials and administration became costly, because everything was dear. Immediately after the War those allowances were amalgamated with the salary, and the salary suddenly increased to an enormous proportion at the time when the reforms were introduced, and since that time the administration has become more costly in that respect.

A492. I gathered from a reply that you gave to another Member that you accept the Brayne Report generally?—Yes

A493. And that if Sind is separated on the conditions indicated there, there is no reason why Sind should not take her place side by side with other Provinces on the same footing?—Oh, yes.

A494. Do you think that after responsible Government had been established in Sind there would become Communal Parties in Sind?—There is less chance of that there than there is now.

A495. Why?—One thing is the responsibility, chiefly. People will have a responsibility of their own, and they will run on more economic lines, and the Communal considerations will not have any important part to play, because the Ministry will have to carry the goodwill of both communities and will need their support.

A496. Do you think it is possible for any Government in Sind to succeed even for 24 hours if the Hindu community is unanimously opposed to it?—The Hindu minority in Sind is a very powerful minority, although it may be 24 per cent. of the population. The thing is that they are a well organised community in the first place, well educated and well to do. They have such good qualifications that they are a community which could not be ignored in any respect, and they will have a very important part to play in the Province. They will have a substantial share in the Legislation and in the Government. It is impossible that you can ignore an important minority of that kind.

Mr. Davidson.

A497. I would like to ask two questions. On page 4 one of the claims you make with regard to the separation of Sind is that the Port of Karachi will be considerably developed and that with a fast train service to Cawnpore and Delhi the whole business of Northern and Central India will be captured?—Yes.

A498. Would it be fair to say that not unnaturally Bombay has been inclined not to look very favourably on any very big development in Karachi?—Yes, that is true. Karachi Port is much nearer to Europe; it will be at least 36 hours nearer by steamer, and in the ordinary course of circumstances, if Sind had its own Government you would have seen all this European connection, steamers and business connections and all that, first with Karachi and then with Bombay. Even up to now we have not got any direct or fast train service with Northern India. From Northern Punjab they are attempting to send a lot of agricultural products even so far as Calcutta and Bombay because it saves time and money, having better facilities to those parts of India than to Karachi, although, it may be nearer in distance and because it would be cheaper for them.

A499. The other question is in connection with the Sukkur Barrage scheme; that scheme of course is a scheme of development?—Yes.

A500. Scientific planning for the bringing into irrigation in stages of large tracts of Sind?—Yes.

A501. When responsible Government is set up, it is possible that in India as in any other countries pressure will be brought by the electors in one constituency claiming that their district has greater needs than other districts, and pressure may be brought upon the Ministry to vary the general layout and development of the scheme. You would not object, I presume, to some safeguard being provided which would enable the scheme as a whole to be developed as it was planned scientifically by the experts who knew their job?—I take objection to that and I would add this that it will not be a practical proposition.

19^o Julii, 1933.]

Khan Bahadur M. A. KHUERO, M.L.C.

What has been designed has been carried out and completed already and there is no practical possibility of effecting any change of that kind.

Lord Eustace Percy.

A502. Just one concluding question. To what extent does the success of the Barrage development scheme depend upon export trade?—I have said something about that in my memorandum too. I have said that Sind will be growing largely cotton and it will be growing almost as much as the rest of India and there is a considerable demand for its produce at present. I was discussing this very recently with the chief agricultural officer in Sind and the representatives of the European Chamber of Commerce at Bombay. There is much demand outside for the products, for instance cotton, oil seed and things like that. With regard to rice, for instance, Sind is one of the most important Provinces that produce rice. Of course Burma rice is cheaper but Sind rice is much better and more appreciated.

A503. All I wanted to get at was this, that Sind will be looking to world markets and not to internal Indian markets, for the marketing of a large proportion of its produce?—That is so, but there is one point I might mention, that there is a growing tendency in India for the consumption of wheat. If you were to see the figures of late you would find that India as a whole is consuming gradually much more wheat than it used to and with that consumption I feel for many years to come that what Sind produces could not be exported, but it will be consumed internally.

Sir Reginald Craddock.

A504. One question I forgot to put; in developing these new acres of land under irrigation of the Sukkur Barrage, will you be dependent on populations coming in from outside, or will the land be taken up by the existing population of Sind?—At present we are concentrating more on the machinery. At present the Chief Agricultural Officer who has been appointed for Sind is carrying on experiments on that line. Perhaps we shall depend upon labour being introduced to a certain extent, but so far there has not been much, and that will depend how the lands are sold, whether they are being purchased by the local people or by outsiders. In those areas where they are purchased by outside people you will have outside labour, but in the greater enterprise you will have mostly machinery used. There is one gentleman who has taken up 40,000 acres for cotton and sugar cane in Sind, and perhaps there will be special sugar cane machines; he is going to make use of machinery mostly for that.

A505. Is it producing long staple cotton, or short staple?—They are trying different things from Egypt, America and Japan, but mostly the Sind local crop.

Lord Eustace Percy.] Thank you very much.

DELEGATES.

Nawab Liaqat Hyat-Khan.
Sir Hubert Carr.
Mr. Ghuznavi.

Sir N. N. Sircar.
Sir Manubhai Mehta.

The EARL of DERBY in the Chair.

Mr. B. N. CHOPRA, Mr. R. P. BAGLA and Mr. K. L. MEHTA are called in and examined.

Earl of Derby.

B1. Gentlemen, you represent the Chamber of Commerce of the United Provinces, do you not?—(Mr. Chopra.) Yes.

B2. Mr. Bagla, you are the Honorary Secretary of the Chamber of Commerce of the United Provinces, and you are a Member of the Indian Legislative Assembly. That is so, is it?—(Mr. Bagla.) Yes.

B3. Mr. Mehta, you are proprietor of the Bharat Engineering Company of Cawnpore?—(Mr. Mehta.) Yes.

B4. Mr. Chopra, you are the Assistant Secretary of the Chamber of Commerce of the United Provinces, and you are Dean of the Faculty of Commerce, Agra University?—(Mr. Chopra.) Yes.

B5. You have submitted to us a Memorandum of your evidence. Is there anything you would like to say to us, in the first instance, to add to it, or with regard to it?—We have nothing to add to what we have said there, but if any statement requires further elucidations we will answer the questions.

B6. You will be ready to answer any questions on the evidence you have put in?—Yes. Memorandum 34 is as follows:—

MEMORANDUM 34 SUBMITTED BY THE UNITED PROVINCES CHAMBER OF COMMERCE, CAWNPORE.

The Chamber was established in 1914. Its present strength is 110 members. All important trades and industries of these provinces are represented in the Chamber. Its representative character was duly recognised under the Montagu-Chelmsford scheme of Reforms and the only seat allotted to Indian commerce on the United Provinces Legislative Council was assigned to this Chamber. In the "White Paper" also the Chamber has been named as the constituency for electing the representative of Indian Commerce on the Proposed U.P. Legislative Assembly.

The Chamber desires to confine its submission to the question of representation of Indian Commerce of the United Provinces on the Central and Provincial legislatures. The points that it wants to make out in that connection are, briefly, as follows:—

(1) The representation on the Provincial Legislature conceded, under the proposals of His Majesty's Government, to the commercial interests of U.P. is inadequate and compares unfavourably with the representation allowed to similar interests in several of the other provinces. From the Statement appended to this Memorandum it will be seen that in the lower Chambers in the provinces 19 out of a total of 250 seats in Bengal, 7 out of 175 in Bombay, 4 out of 192 in Bihar and 11 out

17^o Julii, 1933.] Mr. B. N. CHOPRA, Mr. R. P. BAGLA
and Mr. K. L. MEHTA.

of 108 in Assam have been allotted to Commerce, but in the United Provinces only 3 out of 228 seats have been so far allotted. In population the United Provinces are second only to Bengal and in commercial importance U.P. does not compare unfavourably with one of the Presidencies and with Bihar and Assam. Out of the three Commerce seats in the U.P. Legislative Assembly two are proposed to be allotted to European Commerce and only one in Indian Commerce. This will perpetuate the injustice that was done to Indian Commerce in the Montagu-Chelmsford Scheme of Reforms.

(2) In the Upper Chamber of the provincial legislature no direct representation of commerce has been provided for. Direct representation of commerce is even more necessary in the revising Upper Chambers than in the popular Lower Chambers.

(3) In the Lower Chamber of the Federal Legislature direct representation to Commerce, European and Indian, has been provided in case of the three Presidencies, one seat being allotted to Indian Commerce in each of the Presidencies. Indian Commerce in U.P., however, is to share one seat with the other provinces in Northern India, which presumably included the Punjab, North-West Frontier and Delhi. The Simon Commission in paragraph 141 (Vol. II) of their report commented upon the excessive representation of the Presidencies as compared with the representation given to other provinces in the existing Legislative Assembly. The Commission's criticism would apply with equal force to the proposal of His Majesty's Government regarding the representation of Commerce in the Federal House of Assembly. One non-provincial seat for Indian Commerce in the House of Assembly has been allotted to the Federation of Indian Chambers of Commerce and Industry. In all probability this seat also will generally be filled by a member hailing from one of the presidency towns.

In view of the above the Chamber respectfully submits that the proposals of His Majesty's Government in so far as they relate to the representation of Indian Commerce of the United Provinces may be amended in the following respects:—

(1) In the new U.P. Legislative Assembly at least two seats should be allotted to the United Provinces Chamber of Commerce which, according to the "White Paper," is to be the constituency for Indian Commerce.

(2) In the new U.P. Legislative Council (Upper House) one seat should be provided for Indian Commerce (through the U.P. Chamber of Commerce). This should be possible without increasing the proposed strength of the House as one of the nine seats to be filled by nominations can be allotted to India Commerce.

(3) In the matter of representation of Indian Commerce in the Federal House of Assembly the United Provinces should be treated on the same footing as the Presidencies and a separate seat should be allotted. As in the case of the Presidencies, the constituency for this purpose should be the same as represents Indian Commerce in the provincial legislature, i.e., the United Provinces Chamber of Commerce.

Lord Rankeillour.] I think as some of the delegates from India are here, and it is obvious that they must have first-hand knowledge on these points, I would prefer to reserve any possible questions I might have to ask until they have asked questions.

Sir Manubhai N. Mehta.

B7. Although it is not expressed in your Memorandum I find from other Memoranda that in the Statutory Commission Report there are certain adverse remarks as regards your Chamber of Commerce that you do not really represent the full commercial interests of Cawnpore, but that yours is rather a body of people taking slight interest in commerce. There are several adverse remarks against this body in the Simon Commission Report. Will you kindly tell me if the state of things has now improved?—I would request you to let me know where these remarks are made, because I do not happen to have come across them. Possibly you refer to a certain despatch of the United Provincial Government, or is it to something else? I should like to know what those remarks are before I answer the question.

and Mr. K. L. MEHTA.

Sir Joseph Nall.] Is the reference in the Simon Report available?

Sir N. N. Sircar.] I think you will find that not in the Simon Commission Report, but in the United Provinces Government Report.

Sir Manubhai N. Mehta.

B8. Volume 1, page 271, of the Minutes of Evidence. It was quoted in another Memorandum we had to-day. I will read it to you "Only so recently as 1929 this body did not place any evidence before the Royal Commission on Labour. In striking contrast to this picture the Merchants' Chamber"—that is really a quotation from the other Memorandum, but I will quote from the Simon Commission Report, also the United Provinces Government Report. "The United Provinces Chamber of Commerce has at present one member and the Upper India Chamber two members. The former chamber claims equal representation. The claim is based on the view that the United Provinces Chamber is more representative of the Indian trade and commerce than the Upper India Chamber of Commerce. The original differentiation was based on the ground that the Upper India Chamber controlled far more capital than the United Provinces Chamber and occupied a position of much greater importance. There is little comparison in the capital controlled by the members of the two Chambers. The Upper India Chamber includes all the big commercial and industrial concerns in the Provinces. The United Provinces Chamber, on the other hand, is more representative of small Indian concerns such as piece-goods importers, oil and grain millers, etc." This is the passage I refer to: "It has much less stable membership than the other Chamber and the amount of arrears of subscription written off annually suggests that a considerable number of its members have little or no interests in its work. It has a larger membership than the Upper India Chamber, but it admits to its membership any individual interested in trade, commerce or industry, and quite a number of its members appear to be indirectly so interested. Its representative in the Legislative Council since 1921 has been a lawyer and not a commercial man in the strict sense. There is no doubt that the Upper India Chamber is the better organised and the more influential body and that it represents far wider commercial and industrial interests than the United Provinces Chamber. There is nothing to show that the comparative position of the two Chambers has materially changed since 1919 and we are unable to recommend equal representation." These were the remarks I refer to. I wanted to know if these remarks are still applicable or could you show that there has been any improvement?—In the first place, we are not prepared to accept that this criticism of the United Provinces Government was in every respect justified. When the Simon Commission was taking evidence the chamber, rightly or wrongly, by a majority of votes in the Committee, at that time decided not to lead any evidence before that Commission. I do not mean to suggest that that was the reason why this criticism was made by the United Provinces Government, but, in any case, if we had a chance to reply to that criticism we would have met some of this criticism, and, in fact, I remember it was answered in a communication that was sent by the chamber to the United Provinces Government then. It is mentioned there that, according to our Memorandum of Association, any person who is interested in trade, commerce and industry can become a member. In this connection I would point out that, according to the rules of the Premier Chamber of Commerce in India, that is the Bengal Chamber of Commerce, anyone who is interested in trade, commerce or industry, art, science or literature, can become a member of that chamber. That is the qualifying clause. I do not mean to say that any considerable proportion of their members are not business men, but the criticism was with regard to the qualifying clause, which is as I have just mentioned. As regards quite a large number of members being only indirectly or remotely interested, I have got a list of the members which I believe has been circulated to the Committee just now. A look through that will show that there is not a single member who can be said to be not closely connected with commerce. Another criticism has been made against the representative of the chamber in the Legislative Council. He is one of the premier citizens of Cawnpore and he is no doubt a practising lawyer.

17th July, 1933.] Mr. B. N. CHOPRA, Mr. R. P. BAGLA
and Mr. K. L. MEHTA.

B9. He is not a commerce man; he is a lawyer?—He is a commerce man in the sense I have just pointed out. He is Chairman of the Board of Directors of a big Cotton Mill; he is a director of the British India Corporation, Limited, which is the biggest concern of its kind in the United Provinces or perhaps in India, he is a Director of the Punjab National Bank, Limited, Cawnpore Branch; he is Chairman and Member of the Board of Directors of many joint stock companies. He presided over the Industrial Conference at Sitapur in 1916 and he has been representing the Chamber in the Legislative Council for several years. It is true he is not buying and selling, but if with the qualifications I have just mentioned he cannot be said to be closely connected with commerce and industry, then that criticism is correct. It is not necessary, I believe, in order to be a member of a Chamber of Commerce and a good representative that a man should be actually engaged in buying and selling.

B10. Is he a practising lawyer?—He is a practising lawyer, as I have already said.

Nawab Sir Liaquat Hayat-Khan.

B11. Will you kindly refer to paragraph 3 of your memorandum, the last four lines?—Yes.

B12. There you say: "One non-provincial seat for Indian Commerce in the House of Assembly has been allotted to the Federation of Indian Chambers of Commerce and Industry. In all probability this seat also will generally be filled by a member hailing from one of the presidency towns." What makes you think that?—Our Chamber also is a member of the Federation and I know the entire membership of the Federation. Our experience has been with regard to all elections to various public bodies, and with regard to the election of the Executive Committee of the Federation, that generally it is prominent men from Calcutta and Bombay and sometimes from Madras who occupy all the important places. That is only natural, because they are more advanced in every respect than people in Northern India. That is what makes us think that this seat also will in all probability go either to Bombay or to Calcutta and sometimes perhaps to Madras; but there is very little likelihood of any member from Northern India getting it.

B13. You also ask that you should be given at least one seat in the Federal Assembly from United Provinces alone, instead of sharing a seat with the Northern India Chamber of Commerce?—Yes.

B14. In that event would you agree to the Punjab having another seat also, a separate seat, representing the Chamber of Commerce there?—Certainly; we have no quarrel with the Punjab.

B15. Or would you take this seat, if only one seat was going for Northern India, including the Punjab and the Frontier Provinces; would you claim that should be reserved for United Provinces exclusive of the Punjab?—No, certainly not. Our point is that in point of importance United Provinces does not rank, at least, below Madras. Our point is that each of the three presidencies is given separate representation. United Provinces in point of population comes next to Bengal. In commercial importance we claim that United Provinces is not less important than Madras. Therefore, without saying anything with regard to the representation of other provinces in India, we feel United Provinces is sufficiently important to be represented in the Federal Assembly. As we say in our Memorandum, the Simon Commission felt constrained adversely to criticise the excessive representation of the presidencies and the excessive importance always given to the presidencies with regard to representation. Our point is exactly the same. We feel that United Provinces is sufficiently important to be separately represented in the Assembly. In answer to your other question, in the event of it not being possible to increase this representation, I would suggest, though that will not certainly satisfy us, that the seats should go alternately to United Provinces or to the Punjab, rather than that the whole of Northern India should form one constituency for that seat, because it would be very difficult, in that case, to get suitable representatives; but certainly we would press for a separate seat for United Provinces, and we would be very glad also if the Punjab got a separate seat because the Punjab is becoming, industrially and commercially, very important.

Sir Hubert Carr.

B16. I was chiefly puzzled in reading the Memorandum to find out which Chamber really must best represent

17^o Julii, 1933.] Mr. B. N. CHOPRA, Mr. R. P. BAGLA
and Mr. K. L. MEHTA.

commerce in United Provinces. I do not think it is a question of competition with Upper India, is it?—No.

B17. They are separate. That is a European seat?—Exactly. There is absolutely no quarrel between the Upper India Chamber of Commerce and the United Provinces Chamber. The Upper India Chamber is mostly a European body and the United Provinces Chamber of Commerce represents Indian commerce. As Lord Southborough's Committee reported, the Upper India Chamber represents mainly European Commercial interests, while the United Provinces Chamber of Commerce mainly represents Indian commercial interests.

B18. The Upper India Chamber is one-third Indian?—The position continues to be the same. They are given two seats. It was thought that they control bigger concerns. That is true. We do not question that. Most of the big European-managed mills (they are not entirely European-owned now) are bigger; but we claim that in comparison with the Upper India Chamber, we represent a larger number of interests and a greater diversity of interests. Here is a list of the various industries of the Province which are represented in the Chamber; sugar, oil, textiles (cotton, wool, silk), paper, glass, flour, engineering (machine manufacturing), electric supply, printing, agriculture, brushware, etc. Practically all the industries are represented. In trades, we represent cotton, piece goods and yarn, grains, sugar, paper, oils, hosiery, export and import (general); leather, shellac, automobile, metals, spices, wine, jute and machinery. An analysis of the membership of the Chamber shows these are the interests we represent.

Earl of Derby.] Perhaps you will answer the question.

Sir Hubert Carr.

B19. Coming back to my point, it is not from the Upper India Chamber that you want seats diverted to the United Provinces Chamber?—Not at all.

B20. But I understand the Merchants Chamber is wanting the seats diverted from the United Provinces Chamber to themselves?—Exactly.

B21. Can you help me to understand something of the justice of the claim? As I understand it, the Merchants' Chamber consider you unrepresentative. You have had a seat for some years now, and I should like to get clear in my mind something of what your position remains to-day, if you could help us?—I should personally have very much liked to avoid saying anything with regard to the other Chamber that has recently come into existence, but in answer to this question I will have to go into that briefly. That Chamber, the Merchants' Chamber, was only formed in November, 1932—that is only a few months ago. It did not exist when the Simon Commission visited India, and it was not in existence when the Indian Franchise Committee took evidence.

Earl of Derby.] I think we need not have any further explanation.

Sir Hubert Carr.

B22. It is only to make sure that their Chamber stands where it stood?—As a result of the formation of the new Chamber, 21 members have ceased to be members, but 36 new members have been added. That is the position.

Sir Hubert Carr.] I did not want to find out the position of the other Chamber, but I wanted to know why we should have two claims coming before this Committee from the same place, and I was going to ask whether the people constituting the other Chamber had applied for membership in this Chamber, which would have simplified it, in my mind.

Earl of Derby.] We shall have to ask the Merchants' Chamber when they come why they have formed a new Chamber.

Mr. A. H. Ghuznavi.

B23. You are the Assistant Secretary of the Chamber of Commerce of United Provinces, Mr. Chopra?—Yes.

B24. You are also Dean of the Faculty of Commerce at Agra University, and have been officiating as Principal; teaching is your vocation?—Yes.

B25. We have just got a list of the members of your Association?—Yes.

B26. When did you get these five Muslim members elected?—They were elected recently. I am afraid I could not give you the date.

B27. I put it to you that they were elected in June, before you left India. They were not members before June, 1933. Is that correct?—I am not quite sure about that. As I have said, they were elected recently. I could not give the date, but I can find out and let the Committee know later on from my records.

17th July, 1933.] Mr. B. N. CHOPRA, Mr. R. P. BAGLA
and Mr. K. L. MEHTA.

B28. I see about six names, but my information is that they have no Muslim members at all. They got these elected in June, before they left?—This is forbidden ground, but I have tried to explain the position. Some of the Muslim members, that we had, resigned and were among those who formed the new Chamber, and that is why we had no Muslim members at that time, but since then some new Muslim members have been elected.

B29 Your Chamber was established in 1914?—Yes.

B30. How many members did you have in 1914? I want only the number of Muslim members in 1914?—Out of 42 original members in 1914 six were Muhammadans.

B31. You could not give their names, could you?—I am reading from the official published report of the Chamber.

B32. The names are not printed?—Yes. Hafaz Mohd Halim, the premier hide merchant. As I said, he is one of the organisers of the new Chamber.

B33. I will not trouble you for any more. In 1928 your Chamber passed a resolution boycotting the Simon Commission. That you have said already?—I am not aware of the resolution being passed, but it is true that the Chamber did not give evidence before the Simon Commission.

B34. Do you want to deny that there was a resolution passed?—I do not want to deny it; I am refreshing my memory. A resolution was passed.

B35. You are the Assistant Secretary: you ought to know that?—Yes.

Mr. A. H. Ghuznavi.] What was the trouble in knowing what resolution was put in 1928?

Earl of Derby.

B36. Helped by your Secretary, can you give a direct answer to this question? Did your Council, or did they not, pass a resolution boycotting the Simon Commission?—Yes.

Earl of Derby.] They did pass a resolution.

Mr. A. H. Ghuznavi.

B37. Did your Chamber pass a resolution in 1930 urging its members to boycott British goods?—I do not think any resolution was passed. Such a resolution was brought forward by the persons who are really responsible for the formation of the new Chamber, the Merchants' Chamber.

B38. The Witness knows all about the resolution. Let him say whether it was passed or not?—It was not passed as far as I remember. I remember such a resolution being brought before the Committee, but as far as I can remember that resolution was finally talked out. That is all I can remember about it. I will find out from the actual records and let the Committee know.

Sir Joseph Nall.

B39. Was the Witness a member at that time?—I have not brought the records over with me.

Mr. A. H. Ghuznavi.

B40. He has been Assistant Secretary ever since the Chamber was established?—No, I have been Assistant Secretary since 1918.

B41. I am talking about 1928?—I was Assistant Secretary then.

Earl of Derby.

B42. Surely you can remember an important thing like that—whether it was passed or whether it was not passed?—My own impression is that it was talked out, but I will find out.

Mr. A. H. Ghuznavi.

B43. Your Chamber addressed several letters to the Government of India deprecating this official policy. Is that correct?—What policy?

B44. The Government of India's policy about the reforms, the White Paper, and so on?—No.

B45. Did your Chamber ever address the Government of India on any policy at all?—Yes. When there was the first civil disobedience movement, the Chamber did address a letter to Government suggesting a policy of conciliation—of conciliating public opinion, if that is what you mean.

B46. That is the only letter you say that was addressed to the Government of India?—Yes; nothing with regard to the White Paper, and the first civil disobedience movement was several years back.

B47. You have got about 110 members now, have you not?—The present strength is 131.

B48. When were these last 30 elected; was it in June?—Not 30. When we submitted this Memorandum the strength was 110, and after that some new members were elected, in May and June.

17th July, 1933.] Mr. B. N. CHOPRA, Mr. R. P. BAGLA
and Mr. K. L. MEHTA.

B49 You submitted this Memorandum in April or May?—We submitted it in April.

B50. You got these additional 30 members in May?—Yes—not 30, 21.

B51. Seven of your members are practising lawyers, are they not?—One is R. B. B. Vikramajit Singh, about whom I have already spoken.

B52. Seven of them are practising lawyers?—Only three.

B53. Not seven?—One of them is sole proprietor of several concerns and the other is a director of several concerns.

B54. Four are landlords?—Yes.

B55. Without business connection at all?—They are representing the agricultural industry because we think agriculture is also an industry and perhaps the most important.

B56. Do you say they represent agriculture in your Chamber? In what way—because they are the landholders?—Yes; they have large land interests.

B57. That is what you call commercial representation in the Chamber, because he is a landholder or he represents agriculture?—I should think that agriculture also can well be represented in a Chamber of Commerce.

B58. By the landlord being the holder of the lands, which have been tenanted to somebody else?—Not necessarily in this case.

B59. You had 106 members in 1926?—You have more information that I have at present, because I have not got all the reports with me. I could send the information later if you like.

B60. Your Chamber did not lead any evidence before the Industrial Commission?—It did.

B61. It did?—Yes.

B62. Did they lead any evidence before the Central Banking Committee?—No.

B63. Did they lead any evidence before the Simon Commission?—I have already said no.

B64. The Franchise Committee?—Yes.

B65. They lead evidence before that?—Yes; I was one of the witnesses before the Franchise Committee and -I also appeared before the Fiscal Commission and several other committees.

B66. One of your members is a practising lawyer and has represented your Chamber in the local Council for the last 12 years?—I have already answered that.

B67. And has been Honorary Secretary for the last 14 years?—Now he is the President of the Chamber.

B68. But he was Honorary Secretary for 14 years?—Yes. In view of these questions, will you permit me to make a very important statement in this connection.

Earl of Derby.

B69. Certainly?—Certain questions were asked with regard to the Chamber's attitude towards the Government policy or towards the Simon Commission. I want to state definitely that the members who are responsible for bringing forward those resolutions and advocating that attitude were the very persons who, on account of differences of opinion, later on organized the other chamber.

Nawab Sir Liaquat Hayat-Khan.

B70. Which Chamber?—The Merchants' Chamber. Now that there is a question of representation in the Council they are advocating co-operation and they want to co-operate.

Earl of Derby.

B71. That we can have from them. I do not think we can have evidence from you as to the views of a rival body?—I wanted to remove the impression that this Chamber was responsible for non-co-operation.

Mr. F. S. Cocks.

B72. Can you tell me the total amount of capital you represent?—That is very difficult to say because most of our members are, as you know, Indian firms, and Indian firms would never let anyone know what capital they are really controlling; but if you look at the list and the description given there that I have already circulated to the Committee it will give an idea as to the amount of capital that the Chamber controls, but we can say that it is very large, and that statement will stand any test that the Committee may apply. I think the best way of getting at that will be to make an inquiry through the local government or through other local agencies, because here it will be impossible for us to discuss this.

B73. You cannot give any rough estimate at all?—I think not less than about 20 crores—that is just a rough estimate. I am sure it may be more than that.

Lord Snell.

B74. May I take it that, whatever the past has been, you claim to-day to represent substantially the whole commercial

17th Julii, 1933.] Mr. B. N. CHOPRA, Mr. R. P. BAGLA
and Mr. K. L. MEHTA.

interest in the United Provinces?—Yes; we claim that we are the most representative body in the Province so far as Indian commerce is concerned. I will put it that way.

B75. But in previous times there was a minority on your body that held another view than yours?—I have not followed that question.

B76. Certain resolutions were proposed about which you have been asked?—Yes.

B77. Those were promoted by a minority on your Council, were they?—Yes.

B78. At the present time does the membership of your Council include any of the professions, such as doctors or people not directly engaged in commerce, other than lawyers?—Here is my list of the present Committee.

B79. I mean in your members?—The total number?

B80. Scholarship, the professions, that is to say, are represented in it?—There are only three persons who are lawyers, but, as I have already said more than once, they have got other interests also. They are directors of important concerns.

B81. Can you try to answer the question. Are there, in addition to lawyers, doctors or schoolmasters?—No. There is one exception to that. There is one gentleman who for years represented a commercial firm. He himself is a teacher—as you say, a schoolmaster. He was nominated as a representative of a commercial firm; he was there for several years; he was found very useful. He was taken on the committee and later on became a member in his own right. With that exception, there are no others.

B82. I was only trying to find out what the interest of the Association was. In your claim for greater representation do you also have in mind that if that is granted to you, other sections will also ask for increased representation?—If other sections ask we have no quarrel with that. We felt that both in the Provincial Council and in the Federal Council we have been given inadequate representation.

B83. You are aware, are you not, that the Labour interests feel that they are under-represented with the three special members that are granted to them, and they might make a special claim?—Labour gets as much representation as commerce in my Province, both Indian and European.

B84. May I take it, whatever your previous attitude to the Simon Commission or anything else may have been, you at the present time do substantially represent the commercial interests?—Yes, the Indian interests.

Lord Rankeillour.

B85. Can you tell me what the qualification is for membership of your body?—The qualifying clause is anyone who is interested in trade, commerce or industry can become a member. That is rather unhappy, but I have said that was probably taken from the Memorandum of Association of the Bengal Chamber of Commerce, but, as a rule, only men actually engaged in business are elected as members. The names come up before the Managing Committee, and by a two-thirds majority, if they are elected, they become members. Otherwise, the application stands rejected.

B86. The method of election is by a Managing Committee?—Yes, by the Executive Committee.

B87. And any candidate must get a two-thirds majority to be elected?—Two-thirds of that Committee.

Mr. Isaac Foot.

B88. Is there not in the Year Book, as is customary in this country, a paragraph saying what are the terms of membership? Have you not a paragraph saying who can become members?—Yes. I will read it out. “Any firm, individual, company, corporation or association engaged or interested in trade, commerce or industry shall be eligible for membership of the Chamber. Applications for membership shall be made on the form prescribed by the Chamber. The Chamber in general meeting or the Executive Committee of the Chamber, hereinafter referred to as the Committee, shall have the power to elect members of the Chamber, provided that no member shall be deemed to be duly elected unless a majority of at least two-thirds of the members of the Committee, or of the Chamber present at the meeting of the Committee or at the general meeting, as the case may be, vote for his election.”

Lord Rankeillour.

B89. Do I understand two-thirds of those present at the meeting of the Management Committee must vote for

17th Julii, 1933.] Mr. B. N. CHOPRA, Mr. R. P. BAGLA
and Mr. K. L. MEHTA.

him. Is that right?—Yes, two-thirds of those present.

B90. Are the proceedings by ballot?—Yes.

B91 I understand there are three Chambers of Commerce in the United Provinces?—Yes.

B92. The Upper India Chamber has two seats, and you have one, and you ask for a second?—Yes.

B93. You ask for two?—Yes.

B94. Supposing the body who are coming to see us presently ask for two as well, would you object to that?—Our objection is that that body has only very recently come into existence, and the question of representation of that body should not at all arise. That is our submission. I may also add that they have not yet been recognised as far as I am aware by the Government of India, or by the Local Government, for any purpose.

B95. As to the total numbers you say there should be four, but, if they ask for equality with you, that would make six?—That is for the Committee to decide. We only feel that Indian commerce should have at least as much representation as European commerce. It is for the Committee to decide what shall be the total strength. In that connection I may say that while, in the United Provinces, Commerce, including European and Indian commerce, is to get only three seats in a total Council of 228, Bengal is to get 19 out of 250, and in Bombay seven out of 175; in Bihar four out of 152; and in Assam 11 in a Council of 103 seats are to go to commerce. We find that the United Provinces commerce in this respect has been rather ignored, or unfairly treated.

B96. I suppose the allotment of the seats to commerce would be based on the proportion industry bears to agriculture or other occupations in the Province, would it not, and the United Province, I suppose, is on the whole an agricultural Province—more so than Bengal or Bombay?—I do not know. Take Bihar. I do not quite see that the commercial and industrial interests in United Provinces are less important compared with other interests than similar interests in Bihar where four seats out of 152 are to be allotted to commerce.

B97. Do you say having regard to the amount of industry in your Province (not to the total population) you are under-represented as compared to most of the other Provinces?—Yes, that is what we feel. We feel that commerce has been given less representation in the United Provinces as compared with other Provinces.

B98 What basis can you go upon? The number of industrial workers or what?—No, we go on the number of industrial concerns.

B99. They may be of very different sizes, may they not?—We have some general idea I have not got an industrial census of the various Provinces, but the general idea is that commercially and industrially United Provinces is at any rate more important than Bihar, and certainly not less important than Madras, or Assam, where 11 seats are to go to commerce.

Mr. A. H. Ghuznavi.] Assam has some very big industries.

Lord Rankeillour.] You have no statistics of industrial concerns or industrial workers to base it on?

Sir Hubert Carr.] May I put a question arising out of your question?

Lord Rankeillour.] Please.

Sir Hubert Carr.

B100 You were comparing representation of Indian and European commerce. Is it not a fact that the Upper India Chamber of Commerce have quite a large percentage of Indian members as well as European?—Yes, but the number is comparatively small, and they are most of them members of this Chamber as well. They are members of the Indian Chamber as well.

B101. They get their representation there?—Yes. May I say in this connection that the United Provinces Government in their evidence before the Franchise Committee recommended five seats for commerce, three for Europeans and two for Indians.

Sir John Wardlaw-Milne.

B102. In your Memorandum at the beginning you say you have 110 members. These are all Indian members, I suppose?—Yes.

B103. A little lower down you say: "In population the United Provinces are second only to Bengal and in commercial importance U.P. does not compare unfavourably with one of the Presidencies"; I take it from what you say that is Madras?—Yes.

B104. "and with Bihar and Assam"?—Yes.

17th July, 1933.] Mr. B. N. CHOPRA, Mr. R. P. BAGLA
and Mr. K. L. MEHTA.

B105. Do you claim that commerce and industry in the United Provinces compares in any way in importance with commerce and industry, including things like tea in Assam? Is that your claim?—We know that the tea industry or plantation generally is a very big industry, but it is one single interest after all, while in United Provinces we have a larger number of separate industries.

B106. But taking the total of these industries you have said quite clearly, and we can quite understand that, that you cannot give any figures of the capital engaged?—Yes.

B107. But, leaving that aside, taking the case of the amount of labour that is engaged in commerce and industry, as represented in your Chamber in the United Provinces, with the amount of labour employed in Assam, is there any comparison at all?—Labour is separately represented. We are dealing with the representation of the employers.

B108. As you cannot give us any figures of capital I am trying to get at on what grounds you claim that commerce and industry in the United Provinces is of anything like the same importance?—As in Bihar or Assam.

B109. You yourself mentioned Assam. That is why I have taken that?—In Assam we find it is 11 out of 103, that is 10 per cent. of the entire strength of the Council is allotted to commerce. In the United Provinces it is three out of 228. It is the disproportion which strikes us. We have not gone into any great detail.

B110. That is not my point. In your Memorandum you say: "In population the United Provinces are second only to Bengal" (that is not the point) "and in commercial importance U.P. does not compare unfavourably with one of the Presidencies and with Bihar and Assam"?—Yes.

B111. Is it the case that there is any comparison in commercial importance between the United Provinces and Assam?—I think the United Provinces are commercially and industrially, taken together, much more important than Assam, because we have a tremendous amount of internal trade which Assam has not, because that also is represented here, and we have so many different industries. For instance, sugar is almost entirely concentrated in the United Provinces, because almost half the total production is in the United Provinces, and sugar is at present a most important industry.

B112. In the second paragraph you say: "Direct representation of Commerce is even more necessary in the revising Upper Chambers than in the popular Lower Chambers." Why is that?—Because we take it that the Upper Chambers are to be revising bodies, and you want them to be stabilising bodies, and you want men with stakes who would be rather conservative in outlook, and, for that reason, we think representatives of commerce, who would generally be people with heavy stakes, would be even more necessary in the Upper Chamber than in the popular Chamber where they would be entirely lost perhaps.

B113. In paragraph 3 you say: "The Simon Commission in paragraph 141 (Vol. II) of their report commented upon the excessive representation of the Presidencies as compared with the representation given to other provinces in the existing Legislative Assembly." Does that refer to Commerce?—No, generally.

B114. Nothing to do with commerce?—No, but finally they have said that representation should be as far as possible on a population basis.

Sir Joseph Nall.

B115. I would like to ask the witness whether it is the fact that, if he gets what he wants, the other bodies will be aggrieved, and, if the other bodies get what they want, he will be aggrieved? Is there any possibility of their being satisfied with any scheme?—As far as we are concerned I have already said that we would not resent the representation of the Upper India Chamber being more than that of ours, or equal to that, but, so far as the new Chamber is concerned, our submission is that that is entirely a new body, and has yet to get its position recognised by the Government. It is too early yet for them to have representation.

B116. Can you say how many of your members are members of one or both of the other Chambers?—I think about a dozen firms.

B117. Not more than a dozen?—About a dozen firms are members both of the new Chamber and my Chamber.

B118. Has any attempt been made to secure agreement on this subject?—Not as far as I am aware.

17^o July, 1933.] Mr. B. N. CHOPRA, Mr. R. P. BAGLA
and Mr. K. L. MEHTA.

B119. You would not care to agree?—I think, considering the circumstances under which the new Chamber has arisen it is rather unlikely, because it has arisen because of certain personal differences.

B120. In the White Paper the United Provinces have an Upper House as well as a Lower House for the Provincial Legislature?—Yes.

B121. And provision is made for the Governor to nominate a certain number?—Yes.

B122. Do you think if the Governor included in his nomination a certain number of people who represented commercial interests that would be more satisfactory than your and the other Chambers electing an equal number?—Is that in reference to the Upper Chamber only, or with reference to the Lower Chamber as well?

B123. That would be instead of the Lower Chamber, the point being that if commercial interest is to be properly represented in a Provincial Legislature, would you, in your view, get a proper and more reliable representation of commercial interest, if the Governor nominated certain persons to the Upper House rather than left you to elect people to a Lower House?—We have more faith in election. The other alternative would be acceptable so far as the Upper Chamber is concerned, but not with regard to the Lower Chamber. There is no nominated element at all in the Lower Chamber, and there should not be.

B124. You told me you had more faith in election, but you entirely disagree with the arrangements so far made for election?—Not entirely. We feel that we have not been given adequate representation.

Sir John Wardlaw-Milne.

B125. This Memorandum all refers to the question of the representation of the Chamber?—Yes.

B126. Your Chamber is not in any way a member of the Associated Chambers of Commerce?—No, the Associated Chambers of Commerce—

B127. I am not suggesting that they should be. I only wanted to be clear whether they were or not?—They do not take any Indian members at all. That is a purely European body.

B128. That being the case you cannot be taken as agreeing to the evidence they have given to the Committee?—No.

B129. Is the Committee to take it that, except on this question of representation, you are in favour of these White Paper proposals?—Yes; that is why there is no criticism in this evidence on that part.

B130. You are in favour of them whole heartedly, and have no points to raise?—Exactly.

Sir Hubert Carr.

B131. The units of the Associated Chambers of Commerce have Indian members, have they not? The component members of the Associated Chambers of Commerce have Indian members?—No. There are two bodies. One is the Associated Chambers of Commerce of India and Ceylon.

B132. You said the Upper India Chamber of Commerce had a certain number of Indian members?—Yes.

B133. And the Upper India Chamber of Commerce is a member of the Associated Chambers of Commerce, is it not?—In that sense, yes. But there are very few like this. The Upper India Chamber of Commerce is an exception.

Earl of Derby.

B134. In your first paragraph you say. "In the 'White Paper' also the Chamber has been named as the constituency for electing the representative of Indian Commerce on the proposed U.P. Legislative Assembly" Whereabouts in the White Paper do we find that?—That is on page 96.

Mr. A. H. Ghuznavi.

B135. What paragraph?—Paragraph 2 (b) "Franchise for Special Constituencies," Appendix V.

Earl of Derby.

B136. That is on page 107 of the White Paper, paragraph 2 (b) "Persons being ordinary full members of the Upper India Chamber of Commerce or of the United Provinces Chamber of Commerce with a place of business within the United Provinces, or being entitled to exercise the rights and privileges of such membership on behalf of and in the name of any firm, company, or other corporation are qualified as electors for the constituencies comprising their respective Chambers" That does not say that you are designated as the constituency for Indian commerce?—The point is that when they have allotted seats on the Council they have given three for commerce, and here they

17th July, 1933.] Mr. B. N. CHOPRA, Mr. R. P. BAGLA
and Mr. K. L. MEHTA.

define what will be the constituency for those seats, and they say "persons being ordinary full members," and all that.

B137. I quite see that, but you say that in the White Paper you are designated as a constituency for Indian commerce. As a matter of fact, the White Paper only reproduces the existing electorate. Is not that so?—We took it to mean that We thought that was the intention because in the Indian Franchise Committee they also took that view.

Earl of Derby.] You may have thought so, but that is not so in the White Paper.

Mr. F. S. Cocks.] May I call attention to the footnote where it says they shall be regarded as provisional?

Earl of Derby.

B138. Yes, entirely provisional?—We understand it is provisional.

B139. Through a misunderstanding you have made a claim which I do not think can be entirely substantiated?—That may be so We thought it meant that.

Nawab Sir Aliqat Hayat-Khan.

B140. You have just stated in reply to a question by Sir John Wardlaw-

(The Witnesses are directed to withdraw.)

Mr. S. M. BASHIR and Mr. K. M. PURKAYASTHA are called in and examined.

Earl of Derby.

B142. Mr. Bashir, you are Vice-Chairman of the Merchants' Chamber, Cawnpore, Municipal Commissioner and late Vice-Chairman of the Municipal Board of Cawnpore, and you are an Honorary Magistrate of Cawnpore?—(Mr. Bashir.) Yes, my Lord Chairman.

B143. Mr. Purkayastha?—(Mr. Purkayastha.) I am Secretary to the Mer-

Milne that you are in favour of the White Paper scheme as it stands. May I take it that is the opinion of your Chamber, or your own personal opinion?—The Chamber as a Chamber has not considered the White Paper in its entirety, but that is the general feeling of the members of the Chamber, because there was a proposal to discuss it, but it did not come to anything, and the views that were generally gathered from the members were that, subject to certain criticisms with regard to the financial and commercial safeguards, which were also criticised by the President in his last address to the Chamber, they are for working the Constitution as outlined in the White Paper. That is what I thought was meant by being in favour of the Government proposals, not that they are accepted in their entirety by any person or member of the Chamber, but the general opinion is that we should work the Constitution for what it is worth rather than not co-operate with it.

B141. Work the Constitution as outlined in the White Paper?—Work the Constitution as outlined in the White Paper, subject to such improvements as could be suggested by the Joint Select Committee, or after further consultation with Indian interests.

chants' Chamber of the United Provinces, Cawnpore.

B144. You have given us a Memorandum and a second Memorandum on behalf of the Merchants' Chamber of the United Provinces?—(Mr. Bashir) Yes, my Lord.

B145. Is there anything you would wish to add to what you have put in?—Not at this stage, my Lord. Memoranda 37 and 36 are as follows:

MEMORANDUM 37 FROM THE MERCHANTS' CHAMBER OF UNITED PROVINCES, CAWNPORE.

On behalf of the Council of Merchants' Chamber of United Provinces, Cawnpore, I beg to refer to the provisions made in the White Paper (His Majesty's Government proposals for Indian Constitutional reforms) dated March 15, 1933, regarding the representation of commerce and industry of India in general and the United Provinces in particular in the Federal House of Assembly and the local Legislative Assembly. The tables set out on pages 76 and 79 of the White Paper read with the respective sections regarding United Provinces in Appendices IV and V thereof indicate that while there is no provision for representation of commercial and industrial interests of these Provinces as such in the federal lower house, the number of seats allotted for these interests in the provincial lower houses remains at three, two for Europeans Commerce and one for Indian Commerce, the same as allotted in the electoral scheme adopted under the Government of India Act, 1919.

2. The Council of the Merchants' Chamber of United Provinces consider such a position of representation in the legislative bodies under the reformed constitution as wholly inadequate and unfair, particularly to the great and growing Indian commercial and industrial interests of these Provinces.

3. Turning first to the number of seats allotted to commerce and industry in the local Legislative Assembly, the Council of the Chamber would point out that there are strong grounds why the size of representations should be increased. The Council have noted the observation of the Lothian Committee recorded in paragraph 322 of their report that the extent of the commercial and industrial representation in the local Councils should be maintained in their present dimensions irrespective of any augmentation of the size of these Councils as a whole under the next revision of the constitution. In the first place, His Majesty's Government in their Award of August 17 of last year was not guided entirely by this recommendation of the Franchise Committee. In Bengal, for instance, the number of these special seats was increased from 15 to 19 and in Assam from 6 to 11. Moreover, the size of the provincial lower Councils has not increased in uniform proportion, and the recommendation of the Lothian Committee that status quo was to be maintained was in all probability based on the presumption of uniform increase of size of the Legislatures. Actually, however, this presumption has not proved correct, as can be seen from the following figures:—

| Province. | Present Allotment to Commerce and Industry. | Seats in Present Council. | Proposed Allotment of Commerce and Industry. | Total Seats Proposed. |
|-----------------------|---|---------------------------|--|-----------------------|
| Madras | 6 | 132 | 6 | 215 |
| Bombay | 8 | 114 | 7 | 175 |
| | (including Sind). | | (excluding Sind). | |
| Bengal | 15 | 140 | 19 | 250 |

It will be observed that in four Provinces out of eight, the size of the lower house has increased more markedly than in others. They are Assam, United Provinces, Punjab and Bengal. In Assam and Bengal the commerce and industry groups seats have been increased from 6 to 11 and from 15 to 19 respectively. The case of Punjab is exceptional and it seems that in order to adjust the numerical strength of the three major communities in a desired proportion, the commerce and industry has now been allotted only one seat. The United Provinces thus remain the only Provinces in which the size of the lower house of the provincial legislature is proposed to be augmented by as much as 85 per cent. and yet the number of commerce group seats has been left exactly as it was under a much smaller Council. The great importance of Indian Commercial Interests of these Provinces has been shown in Appendix A.

4. My Council would submit that while emphatically disowning any desire for reduction in the number of seats allotted to the European Commerce, it is necessary to point out for the consideration of the Parliamentary Committee that Indian commercial interests not represented by the Upper India Chamber of Commerce are now of equal, if not of greater importance. The representation allowed to the Upper India Chamber of Commerce was primarily intended for the benefit of the European commercial and industrial interests in the United Provinces. During the last fourteen years there has been very considerable expansion of commerce and industry in the United Provinces, mostly under Indian control and management, as will appear from the figures given in Appendix A. It is under the circumstances only just that the Indian Commerce and Industry should have at least equal representation with the European

Commerce and thus should have at least two seats allotted to it in the provincial assembly along with the two seats allotted to the European commerce and industry.

5. If, however, an increase in the commercial representation in the local Council is not considered feasible, then the Council of the Merchants' Chamber would most emphatically ask for a fresh delimitation of the seat for Indian Commerce and Industry. It is necessary to stress here the fact that the electoral scheme outlined in Appendix V of the White Paper so far as commerce seats are concerned, is purely provisional. Of equal importance is the clear recommendation of Lothian Committee (made in paragraph 324 of their Report) that in the event the bodies or institutions are found no longer representative of the interests assigned to them, the continuance of their franchise should be re-considered. The Council of the Merchants' Chamber would candidly aver that the case for such disfranchisement exists in these provinces as far as the United Provinces Chamber of Commerce is concerned and accordingly the Council of the Merchants' Chamber would submit that owing to its greater representative character it is entitled to get preference over the other Indian Provincial Chamber of Commerce as representative of Indian Commercial interests of United Provinces. In this connection the Council of this Chamber in support of its claim will give the following extract from the report of the U.P. Government on the working of the system of Government of United Provinces during 1921 to 1928 presented to the Simon Commission—the comparison being between the Upper India Chamber of Commerce and the United Provinces Chamber of Commerce.

"The United Provinces Chamber of Commerce has at present one member and the Upper India Chamber two members. The former chamber claims equal representation. The claim is based on the view that the United Provinces Chamber is more representative of the Indian trade and Commerce than the Upper India Chamber of Commerce. The original differentiation was based on the ground that the Upper India Chamber controlled far more capital than the United Provinces Chamber and occupied a position of much greater importance. There is little comparison in the capital controlled by the members of the two Chambers. The Upper India Chamber includes all the big commercial and industrial concerns in the Provinces. The United Provinces Chamber, on the other hand, is more representative of small Indian concerns such as piece-goods importers, oil and grain millers, etc. It has much less stable membership than the other Chamber and the amount of arrears of subscription written off annually suggests that a considerable number of its members have little or no interest in its work. It has a larger membership than the Upper India Chamber, but it admits to its membership any individual interested in trade, commerce or industry, and quite a number of its members appear to be indirectly so interested. Its representative in the Legislative Council since 1921 has been a lawyer and not a commercial man in the strict sense. There is no doubt that the Upper India Chamber is the better organised and the more influential body and that it represents far wider commercial and industrial interests than the United Provinces Chamber. There is nothing to show that the comparative position of the two Chambers has materially changed since 1919 and we are unable to recommend equal representation."

As a result of considerable dissatisfaction which had been felt for some years past with the manner in which the United Provinces Chamber of Commerce was functioning and the predominance of the legal element in it, and as efforts to improve that body were unsuccessful the leader of Indian mercantile community in these provinces thought it desirable to establish an Indian Chamber of Commerce which will truly and effectually represent the great and growing Indian Commercial interests of the United Provinces. Accordingly the Merchants' Chamber of United Provinces was incorporated in November, 1932, and in the brief period of its existence as many as 109 members from all over the province have joined the Chamber, and these include representatives of sugar, hide, grain and piece-goods trade as also cotton, woollen and jute mills, sugar factories, tanneries, oil mills, glass and ice factories, etc., etc. The capital represented comes to about twenty crores and is nearly ten times the capital represented by other Indian Chamber of Commerce.

6. No less clamant is the need for representation of the Indian Commerce of these provinces in the Central Legislature. Unfortunately this claim seems to have been systematically ignored throughout the discussion on the constitutional revision. The Lothian Committee, while it recommended specific representation in the federal assembly of the individual Indian Chambers of Commerce of Bombay, Bengal and Madras, omitted to recommend any seat to Indian commerce of these provinces. In the White Paper proposals, although the representation of European Commerce in Bombay and Bengal have been strengthened beyond the Lothian recommendations, the case of the commercial representation of this province has remained unheeded. The Council of the Merchants' Chamber cannot regret too keenly this undeserved neglect of the commercial interests of these provinces, and they would therefore urge strongly that at least one seat in the Federal Assembly should be reserved for purely Indian commercial interests of these provinces. The interests to be represented are vast, and the Council of the Merchants' Chamber of United Provinces would go so far as to state that the commerce and industry represented by this Chamber in every way equal to that represented by Indian Chambers of Commerce in Bengal and Madras which were recommended by the Lothian Committee for recognition as electorates of the Central Legislature.

Accordingly the Merchants' Chamber of United Provinces would respectfully submit that the Joint Parliamentary Committee will be pleased to recommend that:—

(a) separate representation should be allowed to Indian Commerce and Industry of United Provinces on the same footing as that of the three Presidencies in the Federal Legislature.

(b) increased representation be allowed to Indian Commerce and Industry in the United Provinces Legislative Assembly.

(SECOND) MEMORANDUM 36. MERCHANTS' CHAMBER OF UNITED PROVINCES, CAWNPORE.

I.—Introductory.

In course of a representation submitted early in May the Council of the Merchants' Chamber already stated at length their case for enlarged representation of Indian Commerce in the Lower House of the Provincial Legislature and in the Federal Assembly under a revised Constitution of India and of the specific representation of this organisation in both of these legislative spheres. It is now proposed to follow up the observations made in the original representation by this memorandum strengthening further the arguments adduced in the original representation and bringing forward such additional facts and considerations as were not embodied therein. It is the submission of the Council of this Chamber that this memorandum may be regarded as an essential part of their case placed before the Select Committee.

2. Apart from the question of representation of Indian Commerce in the Lower House of the reformed U.P. Legislature and the Federal Assembly, the Council now beg leave also to bring within the scope of this memorandum the case for institutional representation in the Upper Chamber of the U.P. Legislature. There are, besides, one or two questions of provincial finance to which also the Council of this Chamber desire to invite the attention of the Parliamentary Committee and to lead evidence before them thereabout. The Council have no hesitation in thinking, however, that this widening of the scope suggested will be readily admitted by the Committee. It will be observed that the Council of the Chamber have made no endeavour to cover a large constitutional ground, as they might have. This decision, however, must not be construed as an indication of the Chamber's lack of interest in larger issues. On the other hand, should the Select Committee desire to hear Chamber's views on larger issues, its representatives will be only too glad to tender evidence on them, only if suitable opportunity is provided to them.

3. In pursuance of the extended scope of the memorandum explained above the Council will allow their observations to fall under four heads, one dealing with Provincial Assembly, one with Provincial Council, one with Federal Assembly, and the last containing considered suggestions regarding some aspects of the U.P. Provincial Finance.

II.—Provincial Assembly.

4. The Council in their original representation stressed the point that the four Provincial Assemblies the membership of which is proposed to be increased by a proportion much higher than that in the case of the rest, the U.P. Provincial Assembly is the only one in which the number of seats for commerce and allied interests have not been raised. The inadequacy of commercial representation in Provincial Assembly can also be studied from another point of view, viz., the number of industrial labourers employed in the large industrial establishments of each province. The position can be indicated statistically thus (data from the "Large Industrial Establishments," 1932, a Government of India publication):—

| Name of Provinces. | Labour employed in large industrial establishments. | Number of Commerce seats proposed to be allotted. |
|--------------------|---|---|
| Madras ... | 138,000 | 6 |
| U. P. ... | 90,000 | 3 |
| Bihar and Orissa | 68,000 | 4 |
| Assam ... | 45,000 | 11 |
| C. P. ... | 70,000 | 2 |

It will be observed that Assam, with only half the number of industrial labourers, has been given as many as 366 per cent. the number of seats for representation of commerce and allied interests in comparison with the similar representation in U.P. A comparison with other provincial figures set out above also brings home the hardship of U.P.'s case of commercial representation under the proposals that so far hold the field. The Council are no doubt aware that industry, the size and importance of which alone is measured by the number of works-people, is only one of the interests which are embraced in the commerce group of constituencies. But both the planting and mining establishments have been included in the figures of labour population used in this table. As regards the general commercial interests, it need hardly be stressed that U.P. is not far behind Madras despite the fact that the latter is a province with one of the major ports situated within it. At all events, the superiority of U.P. over Assam and Bihar and Orissa is most decided in this respect. And the proposition will be little disputed that if Bihar and Orissa has 4 seats given for representation of her commercial interests, U.P. should have at least 8 seats given to her for such representation. The statistics on this point are not easy to obtain. Yet the following figures of what are returned as "unclassified" assesses in the income-tax returns and which include chiefly limited liability companies paying "corporation tax" afford a clear indication as to the extent of the commercial activity of provinces other than Bengal and Bombay.

| Name of Provinces. | Number of "unclassified" assesses in 1931-32. | Total income of Companies taxed in 1931-32. |
|--------------------|---|---|
| Madras ... | 855 | 1.56 Crores. |
| U.P. ... | 1,614 | 1.72 " |
| Punjab ... | 381 | 0.39 " |
| Bihar and Orissa | 632 | 0.14 " |
| C.P. ... | 155 | 0.71 " |
| Assam ... | 76 | 0.59 " |

5. In their original representation, the Council also cited full statistical data to prove that the expansion of commerce and industry has been marked enough in U.P. during the years covered by the present reforms. The measure of progress can be further illustrated with reference to the following figures of income-tax and super-tax collection in the various provinces in 1923-24 and 1931-32.

| Name of the Provinces. | 1923-24. | 1931-32. |
|------------------------|--------------|--------------|
| Madras | 1.70 Crores. | 1.59 Crores. |
| Bombay... .. | 5.34 " | 4.24 " |
| Bengal | 6.03 " | 4.59 " |
| U.P. | 0.89 " | 1.09 " |
| Punjab | 0.76 " | 0.75 " |
| Bihar and Orissa | 0.47 " | 0.63 " |
| C.P. | 0.57 " | 0.42 " |
| Assam | 0.14 " | 0.20 " |

It is remarkable that during the seven years while the collection of income-tax and super-tax has marked a fall almost in every province, U.P. tells a different tale; and this fact which bears striking evidence of the business expansion of U.P. during the years of reforms is itself a ground why the number of seats for commerce and industry for U.P. should be raised from what was allotted 14 years ago.

6. The Government of U.P. have themselves recognised the need for increasing the number of commerce seats in the Legislature. It is also important to recall here the circumstances under which not more than three seats came to be allotted for commerce and industry even under the reforms of 1919. The Southborough Committee in 1918 were supplied with a note by U.P. Government which in fact was the genesis of the number of seats at present allotted to commerce and industry. The Local Government put the number of these seats at three on the basis that the total number of seats in the Council would be 100 (vide Southborough Report, p. 198). Unfortunately the total number was eventually raised to 123 or by about 25 per cent, but the number of commerce and industry seats was left at the figure originally proposed by the Local Government.

7. In the recent years when the opportunity presented itself, the Local Government, however, did not fail to urge an increase of commerce seats in the Legislature. In their memorandum submitted to the Central Franchise Committee, the U.P. Government observed that "in order to provide for the possibility of the changes in the composition of the Chambers and also for the increase in the size of the Legislative Council, they would prescribe the seats representative of commerce as five in number and would give to the Governor power to nominate from time to time the bodies which should be allowed to elect the members" (vide Franchise Committee Report, Vol. II, p. 300). The recommendation of the Provincial Franchise Committee, which was made independently of the note of the U.P. Government to the Central Franchise Committee, urged that the number of commerce seats should be raised from three to four in the reformed Assembly (vide Franchise Committee Report, Vol II, p. 402). It will be seen, therefore, that the official recommendation has systematically been in favour of raising the number of seats for commerce and industry.

8. There is still one more special consideration of a general character which points to the need for strengthening the commercial element in the U.P. Legislature. The economic life of the province is in need of urgent transformation along a commercial and industrial direction. The essential weakness in U.P.'s economic position is revealed from the following figures of income tax collected in various provinces in the year 1931-32.

| Name of Provinces. | Tax collected (in Crores of rupees). | Tax paid per capita (in rupces and annas). |
|--------------------|--------------------------------------|--|
| Madras | 1.52 | 0 5.4 |
| Bombay | 3.53 | 1 15.3 |
| Bengal | 3.40 | 0 10.8 |
| United Provinces | 0.98 | 0 3.2 |
| Punjab | 0.71 | 0 4.9 |
| Bihar and Orissa | 0.54 | 0 2.7 |
| Central Provinces | 0.48 | 0 5.1 |

The Council are aware that the income-tax figures are not a measure of the agricultural wealth of the Province. But these figures studied along with the figures of the average deposit per head per each co-operative society in various provinces go only to confirm the impression that U.P. has a large economic leeway to make up. Later in the memorandum the Council will point out that compared to the other provinces her industrial interest is large enough, but judged in terms of her own needs for the proper economic sustenance of a very large population, productive enterprise of the province in the non-agricultural sphere has hitherto been inconsequential. It is necessary, therefore, that public opinion be educated in favour of expansion of business enterprise, new plans be laid for this and new atmosphere created therefor. And in no way can such efforts be more fruitful of success than by the presence of a sufficient number of representatives of commerce and industry in the highest councils of the province. With a solitary Indian member representing commercial interests in the Provincial Council, his would be a cry in the wilderness of uninformed public opinion. It would be pertinent in this connection to point out that during the twelve years of the working of the reformed constitution not a single Indian business man could be returned to the U.P. Legislative Council from any of the general constituencies.

9. The Council have hitherto argued for an extension of representation of the commercial interests. They fully trust it will be possible for the Select Committee to respond to such a request, either by increasing the total size of the House or by relieving two seats from the general constituencies. In the interest of maintaining communal proportion, the Council will have no objection under the latter event to accepting one seat for a Moslem candidate and one for a non-Moslem. A revision of the composition of the Lower House of the U.P. Legislature seems also to have been urged from other quarters, and the Council feel that the composition of the House as announced in His Majesty's Government's award of August last year will have to be modified, at least for some minor adjustments. In the event, however, of such an adjustment in favour of the extended representation of commercial interests in the U.P. Legislative Assembly not being considered feasible, the one seat for Indian commerce should be given to this Chamber by abolishing the present constituency for Indian commerce.

10. Reluctant as the Council would ordinarily have been, they are constrained for their present purpose to institute a comparison between the Indian Chamber which now returns one member to U.P. Legislative Council and this organisation. The opinion of the Local Government as regards the domination of non-business element in an institution designed to represent business interests has already been quoted in the original statement. It now remains for the Council to point out that out of the total membership of that Chamber, about 50 per cent. are represented by those who had actually tendered resignation, but whose names are being still maintained in the membership list, by the practising lawyers, by those whose firms have been closed, by those who are members of teaching or other professions and by those who even, though severally enrolled, are actually related to one firm only. Even though there are some merchants and still fewer industrialists on the roll, the tradition of work is such as the body can hardly be said to function at all. The organisation returning the Indian commerce representative to U.P. Council since 1921 did not think it worth while to officially lead evidence before the Industrial Commission in 1917 (vide Commission Report—Minutes of Evidence, Vol. I, p. 271). Only so recently as 1929 this body did not place any evidence before the Royal Commission on Labour. In striking contrast to this picture the Merchants' Chamber is a live organisation of active business men representing a capital of about 20 crores of rupees (20,00,00,000). On the industrial side, it has on the roll members who are employers of not less than 25,000 labourers in the province. The varied character of the industries and trades represented by the Merchants' Chamber will appear from the classified list of the members attached to the original representation and the supplementary list annexed to this memorandum.

III.—Provincial Legislative Council.

11. The Council will now turn to an examination of the composition of the Legislative Council in U.P.

Part II of Appendix III of the White Paper indicates in broad outlines the composition of the proposed U.P. Legislative Council. It appears that in striking contrast to the composition of the parallel machinery of Bengal and Bihar and Orissa, there is no provision for the election of members to the Upper House of this province by the Legislative Assembly (Lower House). The Council consider this as a rather unfortunate omission. It must not be understood, however, that the Council favour as a matter of general principle a system of indirect election to the preference of direct election. No such preference is at all intended to be conveyed. But in the constitution of the Upper House of the Legislature which is designed to serve as the representative organ of special interests, a system of indirect election, such as by the Lower House, would have probably been in accordance both with the political thought and practice in other countries. The view that the Council of this Chamber take is that if, as proposed, out of the 60 members of the U.P. Legislative Council as many as 51 are to be returned by a system of direct election from general constituencies, the real object of an Upper House will not be fulfilled. The Honourable Ministers in their note on the Second Chamber accompanying the letter* of the Government of U.P. remarked "We think that the Second Chamber should consist of members mainly elected by recognised Landholders' Association and similar bodies." With this plea of institutional representation the Council of the Merchants' Chamber are in entire concurrence. Even if institutional representation may not be made the "main" plank, it should nevertheless find some scope in the scheme of the composition of the Upper House. For such a scheme not only ensures the representation of those special interests which may not be represented by a system of general election, but would also secure to the debates of the Upper Chamber opinion that is at once well organised and well informed. It is felt that the effect of these suggestions may be given by reducing the number of seats to be filled by election from general constituencies, three from Moslem constituencies and six from general constituencies. It need hardly be added that of the nine seats thus suggested to be set apart for institutional representation, not less than two seats should be reserved for representation of this Chamber.

IV.—Federal Assembly.

12. The Council had already in their first representation pointed out how the case of Indian commerce for representation in the Central Legislature was ignored by the Franchise Committee and how His Majesty's Government in their proposals of March last, even though strengthening the representation of commerce of Bengal and Bombay in the Central Legislature, failed to make good what was in effect a total omission of representation of Indian commercial interests of U.P. The unfairness of such an omission cannot be sufficiently emphasised. Figures have been adduced earlier in this memorandum to indicate how the number of companies assessed to income tax in U.P. is higher than in Madras and is, in fact, the highest of all provinces barring Bengal and Bombay. The province is par excellence the seat of the sugar industry. In regard to it U.P. has the same predominant share as Bengal of jute or Bombay of cotton industry. It is estimated that 75 per cent. of the sugar product of India is now contributed by this province, and, taking India's consumption of sugar at 1.2 million tons, U.P. will in the course of another year develop an industry turning out food products estimated at over 15 crores of rupees in value. In regard to cotton textile industry, U.P.'s place is only second to that of Bombay, as would be seen from the following statistics of cloth and yarn products in 1931-32.

million pounds. | Cloth in million
yards. |
|---------------|-------------------------------|-------------------------------|
| Madras | 87 | 68 |
| Bengal | 37 | 79 |
| U. P. | 89 | 144 |

Other provinces need not enter the picture, as their share in the cotton textile industry is inconsequential. There is, moreover, a whole host of other industries in the province, e.g., leather, wool, glass, flour and oil industries. But the real commercial importance of U.P. lies, apart from her sugar and cotton industries, chiefly in the internal movements of her rich crops. The following table will serve to bring home the point:—

Estimated yield of principal crops in various provinces in 1931-32 (in million tons).

| | Wheat. | Linseed. | Rape and Mustard. | Seasamum. |
|------------------|--------|----------|----------------------|-----------|
| Bombay | ·6 | ·01 | ·02 | ·08 |
| Madras | — | — | — | ·1 |
| Bengal | ·03 | ·2 | ·1 | ·03 |
| U. P. | 2·6 | ·2 | ·4 | ·1 |
| Punjab | 3·2 | — | ·2 | ·03 |
| B. and O. | ·5 | ·09 | ·1 | ·03 |

All these grains and seeds are export crops, the movements of which from producing centres to the ports give rise to an extensive trade. The United Provinces being the granary of grains and seeds has the largest share in their internal trade movements. But owing to an absence of any internal trade statistics, the extent of U.P.'s contribution to the foreign and internal trade cannot be accurately measured. But that their size is large follows from the figures of crop tonnage set forth above. A non-agricultural export trade in which U.P. has the most important contribution is that in raw hides and skins.

13. Having described at length the space which U.P. fills in the commercial canvass of India, it remains for the Council to emphasise that the interest represented by this organisation is no less large than those Indian Chambers of Commerce of Bengal and Madras for whom the Franchise Committee recommended seats on the Federal Assembly. From a detailed examination of this point the Council of the Chamber deliberately refrain. While it is far from Council's mind to suggest that they grudge their sister organisation the electoral privilege, the Council only claim that such a privilege be extended to this Chamber as well.

V.—Provincial Finance.

14. The Council would next turn to invite the Committee's attention to a matter of provincial finance and would in this connection refer in the first place to paragraph 139 of the White Paper of May last. This paragraph read with paragraph 57 of the Introduction to the Proposals raises a point of vital interest to the financial aspect of the future constitutional advance of this province, viz., the extent to which the receipts from income tax should be distributed among the provinces and the basis on which such distribution should proceed. The former is an aspect of the case which affects all the Indian provinces equally and as such does not call for any special attention from any one particular province. But the basis of distribution of the available resources of income tax in the future federation of India is a matter which should evoke the maximum interest of all those who have the good of the province in their heart.

17^o July, 1933.]

15. The fact need hardly be stressed that United Provinces is one of those two Indian provinces whose income per capita is the lowest under the present financial arrangement. A glance at the following table of expenditure of Provincial Governments per head of population based on the budget estimates for the year 1929-30 will bring home the observation:—

| | | | |
|------------|---------|------------|---------|
| Madras ... | Rs. 4.1 | U. P. ... | Rs. 2.7 |
| Bombay ... | Rs. 8.2 | Punjab ... | Rs. 5.5 |
| Bengal ... | Rs. 2.5 | C. P. ... | Rs. 3.7 |
| | | Assam ... | Rs. 3.9 |

This financial plight of the province is all the more remarkable in view of the fact that during the working of the present reforms, U.P. is one of the provinces in which spending power was increased in the most marked manner owing to the complete remission of the provincial contribution in the year 1927-28, the province gaining no less than by 2.40 crore of rupees on this score. It is scarcely arguable, on the other hand, that the financial poverty of the province is attributable to the deliberate policy of keeping taxation at a low level. In point of land revenue, the mainstay of the provincial resources, U.P. is decidedly the heaviest taxed province. The land revenue of this province per acre is the highest according to the acreage figure of 1927 and the actual revenue of 1929-30. The following figures are in this respect instructive:—

| (Figures in rupees) | | |
|---------------------|-----------------------------|--|
| | Based on total land accord- | Based on cul- |
| | ing to Survey. | tivated land including current fallow. |
| Madras .. | .57 | 1.2 |
| Bombay ... | .61 | 1.1 |
| Bengal ... | .65 | 1.2 |
| U.P. | .88 | 1.6 |
| Punjab ... | .43 | .9 |
| B. & O. ... | .32 | .5 |

The Council of the Merchants' Chamber do not consider it necessary for them to emphasise the point further. The need will be well recognised that if the new constitutional machinery that is now being envisaged were to work with anything like a success in this province, its financial resources must be particularly strengthened. The serious set-back which the financial prospect of this province has undergone in the last three years of protracted discussion on constitutional revision make the Council look upon the position with the greatest anxiety.

16. The position briefly stated is this: In the Layton Report prospects were held out that apart from a dole from income-tax receipts the provinces would benefit by sharing the proceeds of such national excise as on tobacco, matches and salt. Unfortunately the prospect of a plethoric Provincial Fund has since receded into the horizon and the only source of augmented provincial revenue is for all practical purposes now confined to the share of income-tax receipts made available to the province. The point of supreme interest—and it is here that the Council of Merchants' Chamber must lay the greatest stress—is that while according to the Layton recommendation the Provincial Fund was to be distributed among the provinces according to population, the point is now still undecided as to how the provincial share of the income tax is to be doled out among the provincial claimants. The ground for the gravest apprehension arises from this, that the Federal Finance Committee definitely recommended that the bulk of the income-tax revenue (six-sevenths of the personal tax) should be distributed not according to population but on the basis of collection. The difference in the effect of the Layton and Percy Committee recommendations in the matter of new revenue for the provinces may be read from the following Table:—

| (Figures in crores of rupees) | | |
|-------------------------------|---------------|--------------|
| | Layton Award. | Percy Award. |
| Madras ... | 6.24 | 1.83 |
| Bombay ... | 4.76 | 3.43 |
| Bengal ... | 7.70 | 4.05 |
| U.P. ... | 6.09 | 1.23 |
| Punjab ... | 3.51 | .91 |
| B. & O. ... | 4.24 | 1.07 |

17. The table is sufficiently instructive and the Council do not consider it necessary to comment on it at length. The United Provinces is the second most populous province in India. With the material and moral well-being of over 48 million population committed to her, her administrative responsibility is proportionate to the heaviness of her charge, and it is clear as daylight that if any new resources can be made available to 17th July, 1933.] Mr S. M. BASHIR and Mr. K. M. PURKAYASTHA.

the Provincial Governments, they should be made to share them proportionately to their respective population. Any other basis of distribution would be a grievous wrong to this province and would result in the transfer of new revenue to quarters where they are less urgently required. Without any intention of exaggerating their statement, the Council of Merchants' Chamber may well observe that with it is very largely bound the success of an autonomous government of this province as is being worked out for the near future.

18. One more proposal remains to be put forward. According to paragraph 138 of the constitutional proposals in the White Paper of March last, the terminal tax receipts even though intended to benefit the provincial revenue were suggested to be pooled on an all-India basis. In other words, while provinces are expected to benefit from the levy of such a tax, no province can resort to such a taxation on its own initiative, or can claim for itself the exclusive benefit of a tax on its outward or inward traffic, rail or river-borne. The Council of the Merchants' Chamber find themselves in opposition to such a proposal. U.P. is one of those provinces in which a terminal toll and tax are already in force in 48 municipalities out of 85. A terminal tax system may thus be considered to be fairly developed in this province. Should the Provincial Legislature be induced to replace these resources of municipal authorities by a direct local tax, it would be easy in this province to have a full-fledged system of terminal tax on a provincial basis. It is not necessary here to enter into a detailed examination of this question. It is enough to recognise that such financial developments are at once possible and plausible. In view of such developments, the Council would suggest that terminal tax should be recognised as a source of revenue exploitable at the option of each province on a par with other sources mentioned in paragraph 136 of the White Paper proposals. In the assignment of a part of the Jute export duty to the producing units the principle has been recognised that when the produce of a province is exported out of the province of its origin, such export is amenable to taxation for the benefit of the province. A land-locked province like U.P. should have the identical right to tax the demand for her goods. It is no doubt recognised that a terminal tax indiscreetly levied re-acts adversely on the taxing province itself, but where suitable commodities are available for such treatment, the field should be left open to the desiring province to operate in.

B146. I think I am right in saying that at the end of paragraph 5 of your first Memorandum you give as the reason for the formation of your body, which is a comparatively recent one, that "As a result of considerable dissatisfaction which had been felt for some years past with the manner in which the United Provinces Chamber of Commerce was functioning and the predominance of the legal element in it, and as efforts to improve that body were unsuccessful the leader of Indian mercantile community"—is that one particular leader?—It should be "the leaders."

B147. Were they members of the other Chamber? Did you leave the other Chamber of Commerce so as to form this?—There were a few who came out of the other Chamber, but there were others who came in the new Chamber afterwards.

B148. Was there any particular thing that made you take the decisive step of forming a new Chamber?—There were so many factors connected with that.

B149. Would you state what they were?—To be brief, that body was really not functioning as a commercial body at all. It was dominated by people who were not businessmen in the real sense. The tradition of the work of that body had all along been such that it could not be said to have functioned. For example, it never took any interest in matters of commercial importance. It merely acted as a sort of post office, if I may put it that way, to distribute the communications from the Government. They never initiated anything of commercial importance. Matters which were very important were not dealt with by that body at all. For example, that body did not appear before the Industrial Commission, Royal Commission on Labour, the Central Banking Committee, the Franchise Committee, or the Tariff Board regarding sugar protection. It was really an inert body in the strict sense. It was not working at all, and the business community naturally felt that it was high time that with the growing development of the Province, the commercial community should be organised in such a way that it could, really speaking, safeguard the interests of the commercial community.

17^o Juhi, 1933.] Mr S. M. BASHIR and Mr. K. M. PURKAYASTHA.

Nawab Sir Liaqat Hayat-Khan.

B150. You are asking for special representation on the Legislatures?—Yes, Sir.

B151. Assuming that you get it, do you think the other body which calls itself the Chamber of Commerce of the United Provinces would have a legitimate grievance at being omitted, or not given special representation, or do you think the representation given to you would adequately represent that Chamber, too?—I think that if a body which I have described in so many words just now can keep on enjoying the privilege of being an electorate for safeguarding commercial interests, the very principle of safeguarding commercial interests falls through.

B152. My question was slightly different from what you have understood it to be?—I am sorry.

B153. Supposing you were given the special representation which you are asking for, do you think the other body which calls itself the United Provinces Chamber of Commerce will be satisfied that your representative does represent commerce in the United Provinces adequately in the Legislature, or do you think they will have a just grievance that their Chamber has not been given a chance, whereas you have been given a chance and are not adequately representing the Province?—I do not think they ought to have a grievance. It is a question of the representation of the commercial community as a whole.

B154. You think any representation given to you would satisfy the commercial community in the United Provinces?—Yes, Sir.

Mr. A. H. Ghuznavi.

B155. Mr. Bashir, from your Memorandum No. 2 I find that you are Senior Vice-President of the Merchants' Chamber of the United Provinces?—Yes, Sir.

B156. You are a barrister-at-law?—I am a barrister, but I am not practising at all. I am not even enrolled in the High Courts. I am an active business man. I took law only with the intention that it would help me in my business.

B157. What is your business?—My main business is hide and skin export. I am interested in sugar, cotton-ginning, a boot factory and in tanneries.

B158. You gave in answer to the Lord Chairman the reason why it was necessary for you to establish this new Chamber?—Yes.

B159. Will you elaborate it a little more—what other reasons were in your mind when you formed this Chamber than what you have said already? Was it not a fact that they had not any Muslim members of that Chamber when you contemplated the organisation of this Chamber?—Up till then they had not many Muslim members. Moreover, the membership of that Chamber has not been stable at all. People have been coming in and going out. To quote just one case for example, they had about 106 members in 1926. If their present list is seen now it will be found that there are only 33 members of those 106 on the roll of that Chamber. People have been added and are falling out, but I cannot say that the commercial interests in which the Muslims are interested have been duly represented in that Chamber. (Mr. Purkayastha): A very large number of business men kept away from that Chamber of Commerce, but after this organisation started a very large number of them came into it. The Muslim business interest of the United Provinces is a very large. The hide and skin trade is practically in the hands of the Muslim business men, but it is a striking fact that these Muslim gentlemen and firms did not at all join the older organisation, and they have come and joined us only after we have started. Still more striking is the fact that the hide and skin organisation, which is a fairly old body, have thought fit to affiliate themselves to our body.

Sir Joseph Nall.

B160. Might we know, as this community question has been raised, do the 109 names in the original Memorandum 37 include members of both communities?—Both.

B161. Can you say approximately how many of each?—(Mr. Bashir): For example, on page iii of that Appendix there are about six which are all Muslims. Then on page iv there is another.

Mr. A. H. Ghuznavi.] There are nine in the first place.

Sir John Wardlaw-Milne.

B162. What proportion of your members are Hindus and what proportion are Muhammadans—very generally?—

17th July, 1933.] Mr S. M. BASHIR and Mr. K. M. PURKAYASTHA.

About 20 to 25 per cent. in the Chamber are Muhammadans.

B163. The rest are Hindus?—Yes, Sir.

Mr. A. H. Ghuznavi.

B164. Will you give us an idea of the various interests that are represented by your Chamber?—We have given an idea in the list already.

Earl of Derby.] There is a list here which I think is very clear.

Mr. A. H. Ghuznavi.

B165. Thank you. You have given a list which is Appendix B of your Memorandum, showing the names of the firms and the industries they represent?—Yes.

B166. From that list it appears that you have got 114 members. Is not that so?—Yes.

B167. And it represents both the Hindu and the Muslim merchants?—Yes.

B168. In the Second Memorandum, Annexure A, you have given a supplementary list of your members?—Yes.

B169. Two important industries in the United Provinces are represented by the two registered associations, namely, the Glass and Bangles Industrial Association and the Hide Merchants' Association?—Yes.

B170. Both these are registered bodies who have become your members?—Yes. That is one of our special features, and we do not go in just for increasing the number of individual members. If associations can affiliate with the Chamber, consisting of a good many members themselves, it carries a great weight. For instance, the Bangle Industrial Association has about 60 members. Similarly, the Hide Merchants' Association is a very important association and has about 60 or 70 members. The Kapra (Cloth) Committee has about 800 members and if these bodies can affiliate with the Chamber it gives very great strength without increasing the number of members.

B171. These bodies which are separate associations are also members of your Chamber?—Yes.

B172. But they have never been members of the other Chamber?—No, Sir.

B173. Mr. Chopra, who has just given his evidence, said that the Government of the United Provinces and the Government of India have not recognised your Association; is that true?—No, it is not. They have recognised us in the same way as any other Chamber of Commerce has been recognised. We have two letters from the local government and a letter from the Central Government.

B174. Will you please read those two letters?—This is letter No. 421 dated Allahabad, the 15th May, 1933, from the Secretary to Government of the United Provinces, Industries Department, to the Secretary of the Merchants' Chamber of United Provinces, Cawnpore "Sir, With reference to your letter dated December 22nd, 1932, to the Chief Secretary to this Government, I am directed to say that your request that the Chamber may be supplied with such publications and communications as are usually sent to other chambers of commerce in this province has been noted for compliance. A copy of the annual report of the Department of Industries will be supplied to your Chamber free of charge in future." This is another letter from the Government of India Simla, the 25th May, 1933, No. 56-C (1)/33, the Officiating Secretary to the Government of India to the Secretary of the Merchants' Chamber of United Provinces, Cawnpore. "Sir, I am directed to refer to your letter dated the 30th December, 1932, and to say that your Chamber has been included in the list of commercial bodies which are supplied with important press communiques and other matters of commercial interest."

B175. From the Government of India?—Yes.

B176. Mr. Bashir, in your Memorandum you seek representation of your Chamber in the Central Legislature?—Yes.

B177. But you know that the various commercial interests have been represented by all-India organisations? Why do you seek separate representation for your Chamber?—We have shown in our Memorandum the importance of the United Provinces as a Province as compared with the other Provinces, and I feel that the United Provinces cannot be unfavourably compared with other Provinces so far as commercial importance is concerned. It is proved in the Memorandum that the United Provinces have not been treated in a fair way. There are various interests of the Provinces and there may be conflict at times between some of them and the others. To quote one ordinary instance, the export duty on hides: that question was brought up in the Assembly, and the United Provinces was not represented, but Madras had been, with the result that the duty was not taken off which, of course, hit very badly the exporters of that trade in the United Provinces, whereas the interest of the Madras tanners was that the duty should be retained. (Mr. Purkayastha.) The position is that, in spite of the representation of the All-India organisation, in Madras, Bengal, and Bombay, special representation has been allowed to the three individual Chambers of Commerce. If this could be done, our claim is that a similar privilege should be extended to the United Provinces also. Secondly, there are cases of incipient conflict of interest, and a striking instance is the hide duty, when in 1926 the Government brought in a Bill for the abolition of Hide Export Duty. By the casting vote of the President the duty was allowed to remain, and the result of the continuation of the duty has been disastrous. Only just recently we have addressed the Government on the subject.

17^o Julii, 1933.]

Mr S. M. BASHIR and Mr. K. M. PURKAYASTHA.

B178. Would you give us what your attitude would be towards the United Provinces Chamber if an additional seat were found for you?—(Mr. Bashir.) I have already submitted that we are the really truly representative body of commercial interests there, and if a body does not truly represent the commercial interests the principle of safeguarding those interests falls through.

B179. Give us some of the distinctive features of your Chamber?—I have given one, that the associations are affiliated to our Chamber. All the Members of this Chamber are in active business. They are not merely indirectly interested in business, or people who are not in business at all.

B180. You mean to say they are not directors or ex-directors of certain companies, as has been the case with the other Chamber? All your members are in active business?—Yes.

Mr. F. S. Cocks.

B181. Do you say you represent purely Indian commercial interests?—Yes, Sir.

B182. Have you any membership under European control?—There is one member, the Delta Hide Company.

B183. Only one?—Yes.

B184. The capital represented by your Chamber is about 20 crores?—Yes.

B185. You say it is nearly ten times the capital represented by any other Chamber?—Yes.

B186. If you heard that another Chamber also claimed that they represented 20 crores, would you say that was slightly optimistic?—Yes, I would say that, and there are ways and ways of putting things.

Sir John Wardlaw-Milne.

B187. How do you get at an estimate of 20 crores?—It is really just an estimate. It is very difficult to find out.

B188. Would it be too strong to say it was guesswork?—I would not say it was mere guesswork.

B189. Do most of these firms represented upon your Chamber publish accounts? Are there companies?—There are many like that.

B190. In which you can get at the amount of the capital?—Yes.

B191. Is that usual in Indian trading concerns?—It is not usual, but there are some about which we have got that information and there are some in which we have been particularly careful in putting down figures and adding them up.

Mr. A. H. Ghuznavi.] The witness meant they had many limited liability companies as their members.

Sir John Wardlaw-Milne.] I understood.

Lord Snell.

B192. If I understand aright, your claim to justify the starting of your Association was that the other Association did not cover the whole of the commercial interests of the United Provinces?—It is not merely that they did not cover the whole, but if they did cover certain of the industries or the trades it was really through very minor people who were not, really speaking, very big people in the trade.

B193. I thought I heard you say that there was only a small proportion of Muslim members in the other Chamber?—No, my Lord; there are none at all.

B194. I put it the other way. Therefore you felt there was a real reason for your starting this new organisation?—No it was not because Muslim members were not there that we felt that we really ought to start this Chamber. It was the dissatisfaction on all other matters that really made us start this Chamber.

B195. But also because it was not, as I suggest, fully representative?—No, it was not fully representative.

B196. What I now want to ask you is: Is it true that your Association represents what we may call smaller business concerns than the other?—No, my Lord.

17^o July, 1933.] Mr S. M. BASHIR and Mr. K. M. PURKAYASTHA.

B197. It is not?—We have small concerns. We have very big ones indeed.

Mr. A. H. Ghuznavi.] I would refer you to Memorandum No. 36.

Lord Snell.] What proportion of the small commercial people belong either to your or to any other Chamber of Commerce?

Sir John Wardlaw-Milne.] Do you mean out of the total number of traders in the Province?

Lord Snell.

B198. Yes—a very small number, presumably?—Yes, a very small number.

B199. The Chambers of Commerce tend to be made up of people who have substantial business interests?—(Mr. Purkayastha.) We have on our roll the solitary jute mill of the United Provinces, and a fairly large number of big sugar factories. Most of them are with us, and besides there are a number of small firms of dealers—people who are interested in the movement of agricultural crops from the producing centre of the port, people who are importers of piece goods, commission agents of mills. We have on our roll the entire or a very large part of the commercial life of the United Provinces, of which Cawnpore is the principal focus.

B200. How much of a commercial man must a member of your Society be; how big a capital must he have? Could small commercial men employing five, 10, or 20 persons be members?—(Mr. Bashir.) That is not what we have been trying to do.

Earl of Derby.

B201. Do you make any distinction in your membership between the size of the businesses that want to join you, or do you accept them as a business, regardless of size, if you think that business is representative of the particular industry?—We try to be careful that we do not have just ordinary people or ordinary business men or very small business men just dealing in that trade. For example, we had before three or four hide merchants. Now that the whole of the Hide Merchants' Association has become a member we will probably not enrol anybody individually at all because the whole of that trade would be represented by that Association. Similarly, the Kapra Committee, the Cloth Committee: once they come in we would probably not enrol individual members at all because the whole of that trade would be represented by that Association:

B202. If my friend Mr. Ghuznavi were in that trade in a very small way would he be eligible to join your Chamber?—Probably there would be no bar, but we would not take him if he was a very small man.

Mr. A. H. Ghuznavi.

B203. You have no rules restricting taking in small men?—(Mr. Purkayastha.) No; but we are not keen on swamping our membership.

Lord Rankellour.

B204. Have you any definite qualification in your rules which a man must have, of any kind?—(Mr. Bashir.) I have with me my Articles of Association: "All persons, associations, firms or corporations (incorporated in India) directly engaged, interested in or possessing expert knowledge of trade, commerce, manufacture, industry, transport, banking, finance, or insurance, and having a place of business in the United Provinces of Agra and Oudh, who shall be duly nominated and elected and shall pay their subscription as hereinafter provided, shall be deemed as ordinary members."

B205. Did you say something that led me to think that there was some unfair discrimination in the election, or the failure to get elected, of persons in the other body of the United Provinces? I thought you suggested there might be some unfair discrimination in the election of persons to the other Chamber?—There was no unfair discrimination, but they took in people who were probably indirectly interested in trade.

B206. You do not think they rejected people who ought to have been elected? You do not suggest that?—No.

B207. Would you be satisfied if you had one seat and the other body had one seat, or do you think that would not suit you?—If I have to make a definite answer I will certainly say no.

B208. Have you got the White Paper, page 107, Section IV, Appendix V 2 (b): "Franchise for Special Constituencies" in the United Provinces?—Yes.

B209. We know it is provisional, but it suggests there that there should not be a constituency of any Chamber of Commerce but that persons belonging to either of two Chambers of Commerce should be entitled to vote. For all we know, they might vote for all the three seats. Would you be satisfied if your Chamber were added to those two, that is to say, all members of your Chamber, the United Provinces Chamber, and the Upper India Chamber, were all made electors to vote for the three members? Would that satisfy you—or possibly four members, with one register of electors for all the Chambers?—The other Chamber which the commercial community thinks is not really a representative body comes in there still.

17^o July, 1933.]Mr S. M. BASHIR and Mr. K. M.
PURKAYASTHA.

Lord Rankeillour.] Would you disqualify the members of that body from being entitled to vote on one register of commercial people, because that seems to be what is contemplated there?

Sir Hubert Carr.] The Upper India Chamber of Commerce is largely European, and you will remember the Franchise Committee went into the question of perhaps joint electorates for Indian and British commerce, and they decided that the present time was not ripe for it and that European commerce should have a separate constituency from Indian commerce.

Lord Rankeillour.

B210. So I thought, but this does not seem to bear it out. It seems to be merely one register?—(Mr. Purkayastha.) No. That is not the present position.

Sir Joseph Nall.] The last line of subsection (b) of paragraph 2 of Appendix V on page 107 of the White Paper, says: "are qualified as electors for the constituencies," in the plural, "comprising their respective Chambers."

Lord Rankeillour.

B211. We will leave the Upper India Chamber out. You would not like to be on one register with members of the United Provinces Chambers?—(Mr. Bashir.) No, my Lord.

Mr. Isaac Foot.

B212. Would a lawyer who was interested in commerce not be entitled to be a member of your Association?—No, because he will not be in active business.

B213. Do I understand that in India you may not have a lawyer who is a director of a company or a firm?—That is not active business.

Sir Joseph Nall.] You mean that is not active practice. He is not practising as a lawyer if he is in business.

Mr. Isaac Foot.

B214. No, I do not think he means that. You are a lawyer interested in commerce?—No, I am not even enrolled in the High Courts for practice.

B215. Take a lawyer who may be giving some part of his time to the practice of his profession, but who devotes a large part of his time to the conduct of a business, or is a director of a firm: would not he be eligible for membership in your Chamber?—If his profession really is law he would not be eligible for membership in our Chamber.

B216. You have some members of your Merchants' Chamber who are also members of the other Chamber of Commerce, have you not?—The United Provinces, do you mean?

B217. Yes?—They have all resigned from that Chamber and their resignations have not been accepted. That is how they are on the roll there. It is the other way. There are about 12 people who have resigned from their Chamber and they are our members, but they have not accepted their resignations because it would have brought down their roll.

B218. As soon as their resignations have been accepted you will have an absolutely distinct membership of your Association?—Yes.

B219. There will be no one on your Association who is a member of the other Association?—That is so.

B220. Is there anything more than commerce behind this? Has there been some personal quarrel or disturbance that has given rise to these differences between you?—No, Sir.

B221. Is there a difference between two big men or are there two big men who are fighting over this business?—No.

B222. It is purely commercial matters?—It is purely commercial.

Sir John Wardlaw-Milne.

B223. I want to ask you in connection with your remarks in paragraph 4 of your first Memorandum where you say: "During the last 14 years there has been very considerable expansion of commerce and industry in the United Provinces, mostly under Indian control," and you refer us to Appendix A to show the number of industries working there. I notice there you say in Appendix A there are 12 cotton mills under Indian control and 11 under European control; and 114 ginning and pressing factories under Indian control and 12 under European control. Taking these two items, are ginning and pressing factories comparatively small capital concerns as compared with the cotton mills?—Yes; they are much smaller.

17^o Julii, 1933.] (Mr S. M. BASHIR and Mr. K. M. PURKAYASTHA.

B224. You estimated the representation in your Chamber in capital to be something like 20 crores. Have you made any estimate of the amount of European interests in commerce on the same basis?—No.

B225. You have no idea whether that would be five crores or 50?—No, Sir.

B226. You have not any idea at all?—No, Sir.

B227. In another part of your Memorandum you refer to the necessity for representation of commercial interests, but, speaking generally, would you say that the Indian commercial interests in the United Provinces compares in size, or in any way, with the Indian commercial interests, say, in Bengal or Bombay, or any other of the great Presidencies of India (I am speaking purely for the moment of Indian commercial interests), the amount of capital engaged, the amount of labour employed; taking all these things together, would you agree, not in detriment to the United Provinces, but from the conditions of the United Provinces, the United Provinces has a comparatively small interest as compared with Bengal and Bombay?—(Mr. Purkayastha.) We would not say that, barring Bombay, the Indian interest in the United Provinces compares very favourably with that in Bengal and Madras.

B228. Would you agree the interests were comparatively small in the United Provinces taking Indian and European interests together?—Yes, taking the Indian and European interests together; for this reason, that in Bengal there are certain very large industries, things like jute mills, and in Bombay there is the cotton mill industry. Even then we would be before Madras.

B229. I would ask you to refer to the foot of paragraph 6 of your first Memorandum. There you go so far as to state "that the commerce and industry represented by this Chamber is in every way equal to that represented by Indian Chambers of Commerce in Bengal and Madras"—you are merely referring there to a comparison of Indian interests?—(Mr. Bashir.) Exactly. These are the bodies recommended by the Franchise Committee for a seat to the Central Legislature, and these are the bodies we have in view, the South India Chamber of Commerce and the Bengal Chamber of Commerce.

B230. Your first Memorandum deals purely with representation, but your second Memorandum goes a little further, and you say in paragraph 2 of the introduction: "Should the Select Committee desire to hear Chamber's views on larger issues, its representatives will be only too glad to tender evidence." I am not prepared to say that the Select Committee desire to hear evidence, but you have not thought it necessary to put forward any very direct evidence on any matters except those mentioned here, and, leaving aside such questions as Provincial finance, may I take it you are in general agreement with the White Paper proposals of the Government?—No, Sir, we would not say that, but our only idea was that we took it for granted that the Committee would not like to hear us on the all-India issues, but if we were asked on the spot we would formulate our views and lay them before you.

B231. Your Chamber has not considered the general proposals of the Government?—No, and we have no instructions to lay them before the Committee just now.

B232. And you have very wisely emphasised the importance of sound finance in the Provinces?

B233. I see in paragraph 16 you refer to the serious setback which the Province has undergone. But you will realise that if there is an extended franchise such as you desire for commerce it may mean an extended franchise generally—larger Councils—and that means more money, more expenditure?—Yes.

B234. It is hardly in favour of more economical lines in finance, is it?—Our point was that the new Government would be more expensive, and that is why we had better improve financial resources for the Province.

B235. You think the advantage of the advice of your members would go far to counteract any extra expenditure incurred by a larger Legislature. I will not press you on that. In paragraph 18 of your Second Memorandum you refer to the Council of your Chamber being in opposition to the treatment of the terminal tax. I take it it is not too strong to say that you are in favour of a continuation of these taxes?—Out of the 185 municipalities they are in force in 148.

17th July, 1933] Mr S. M. BASHIR and Mr. K. M.
PURKAYASTHA.

B236. Do I understand your Chamber as a Chamber of Commerce are in favour of terminal taxes, or do you oppose them?—If they can be avoided certainly, because they tend to act as a sort of barrier to the free movement of trade. But this has been a feature of local finance in this Province for a fairly long time.

B237. This paragraph 18 rather reads on the whole as though you favoured these taxes. I was asking whether as a Chamber you were in favour of such taxes or not?—If such taxes are there they should go to benefit the Provinces.

B238. But you do not wish us to understand that you are in favour of them?—No, but if such taxes are there they should go to benefit the Provinces.

B239. I quite understand that, but that is rather a separate point. My point is that it is not to be taken that you are in favour of terminal taxes at all?—Of course not, Sir. I did not understand that the question was being put hypothetically and as a general proposition.

B240. I had never heard of any other Chamber that was in favour of them, and that is why I asked the question. On Annexure A. on the Second Memorandum you enclose a further list of members. These are members who have been elected or appointed since the first Memorandum was printed?—(Mr. Bashir.) That is so.

B241. Has this sudden election of members been rather a feature of recent months in the Upper India and United Provinces Chambers of Commerce?—Yes, in the United Provinces Chamber of Commerce?

B242. There has been a rather sudden election?—Yes, within a month and a-half they have enrolled 20 members.

Sir Joseph Nall.

B243. The other Chamber?—The other Chamber. I have here a cutting from the "Leader" of the 27th May, 1933, giving the Minutes of the Executive Committee of the United Provinces Chamber of Commerce in which at the end they say: "Ten new members belonging to very important trades were also enlisted members to-day." They advertised the same thing in the first meeting which was held about a month before, so 20 out of their 118 were enrolled within such a short time. It has been such a distinct feature of their Chamber, but not ours.

Sir John Wardlaw-Milne.

B244. May I suggest that Annexure A of your Second Memorandum rather shows you have followed that?—We have not been in existence for very long. As far as our Chamber is concerned our membership goes on increasing.

Sir John Wardlaw-Milne.] Theirs is an unnatural growth, yours is a natural one.

Sir Joseph Nall.

B245. On the question of the terminal taxes you are an inland Province, are you not?—(Mr. Purkayastha.) Yes.

B246. You have no port?—No; it is entirely land locked.

B247. Are you at all apprehensive that any other Provinces, given the right to impose terminal taxes, might prejudice your trade?—It is very difficult to anticipate developments.

B248. Do you desire each Provincial Government to be able to do what it likes with terminal taxes, or do you want the All-India Government to have the supervision over it?—That raises an administrative side of the question which we have not considered, but I would add that if the products of a particular province were to be taxed then the benefit of taxation should go to the Province itself.

B249. That is quite clear, but have you any views as to whether the Bombay Presidency, say, should be at liberty to impose terminal taxes on goods passing through the Province to and from your Province?—Probably the Government of India should have the supervision. That is the view the Government of India themselves expressed, and we find ourselves more or less in accordance with them.

B250. On the question of representation you have indicated that your Chamber was formed solely for commercial considerations to look after commerce?—(Mr. Bashir.) Yes.

B251. I understand your representation regarding membership of Legislative bodies is entirely concerned with getting efficient representation of the commercial interests in the Government of the Province?—It is not the sole object of forming the Chamber.

B252. No; your representations now to this Committee for a place in the sun (it is suggested), or regarding places in the Houses of Assembly, Legislative Council, and so on, are based on a desire to get adequate representation for the views of the commercial interests?—Yes.

B253. Do you think you will get that better by electing people, or would you get it done better if the Governor nominated important commercial people to one or other House?—(Mr. Purkayastha.) The difficulty about nomination is that the gentleman nominated is not answerable to the constituents.

B254. Do you think one who is not answerable to a constituency is less likely to deal properly with the business than one who is elected?—The chances certainly are that way.

B255. Do I understand you prefer, in spite of all the risks and differences such as you have been dealing with in your Memorandum, that these representatives of commerce should be elected by somebody?—Yes, Sir. (Mr. Bashir.) Yes, Sir.

B256. Rather than that they should be nominated?—(Mr. Purkayastha.) Yes.

Mr. Cocks.

B257. What do you think of the suggestion that Indian and European business organisations should elect their representatives by a joint electorate, or would you prefer that they should be separate?—(Mr. Bashir.) At present as things are, I think, if it is separate it will be better.

B258. You prefer that it should be separate?—Yes.

Sir John Wardlaw-Milne.

B259. If they were joint electorates would a European representative ever be elected?—(Mr. Purkayastha.) Why not? (Mr. Bashir.) I should think so.

B260. You were asked if you favoured a joint electorate to both Houses?—(Mr. Purkayastha.) What we stand for is institutional representation.

(The Witnesses are directed to withdraw.)

Raj BAHADUR P. MUKERJEE is called in and examined.

Earl of Derby.

B261. Mr. Mukerjee, you were Chairman of the Punjab Chamber of Commerce from 1927 to 1931?—Yes, my Lord.

B262. You have been a member of the Punjab Legislative Council since 1930?—Yes, since 1930.

B263. You have handed in a précis of evidence that you wish this Committee to consider. Is there anything you would wish to add to that précis?—No, my Lord. Memorandum 35 is as follows.

MEMORANDUM 35. EVIDENCE ON BEHALF OF THE PUNJAB CHAMBER OF COMMERCE, DELHI, AND THE NORTHERN INDIA CHAMBER OF COMMERCE, LAHORE.

NOTE.—Both the Punjab Chamber of Commerce, Delhi, and the Northern India Chamber of Commerce, Lahore, are members of the Associated Chambers of Commerce of India. The witnesses on behalf of the Associated Chambers will give evidence before the Joint Select Committee on various subjects, such as commercial and financial safeguards, federal finance, etc. Therefore, the evidence which the representative of the two Chambers desires to give will be confined to the question of representation of Commercial interests of Delhi and the Punjab in the Central Legislature, owing to the peculiar position in which the Chambers are placed in this respect.

The Punjab Chamber of Commerce was established in 1905 with headquarters in Delhi, when Delhi was included in the Province of the Punjab. It has got branches in Amritsar and Lahore. The present membership of the Chamber is about 70 and the constitution of the Chamber provides that both the membership of the Chamber and its Managing Committee must have equal numbers of Europeans and Indians. It includes all the leading commercial, industrial and financial interests of Delhi and the Punjab.

The Northern India Chamber of Commerce with its headquarters in Lahore was founded in 1923. Its present membership is about 56 in approximately equal numbers of Europeans and Indians, embracing the leading commercial, industrial and financial interests in the Punjab.

17^o Julii, 1933.]

In 1909 with the inauguration of the Morley-Minto reforms the Punjab Chamber of Commerce was accorded the privilege of electing a Member to the Punjab Legislative Council, when the number of elected seats was only 11, and the total strength of the Council 29. In 1920, under the Montagu-Chelmsford reforms, out of a total membership of 97 in the Punjab Legislative Council, the Punjab Chamber of Commerce was allotted a seat jointly with the Punjab Trades Association. Thus the privilege of independent representation enjoyed by the Punjab Chamber for over 10 years was practically halved for, and the Chamber at once protested.

On representations made to the Government, the Punjab Chamber was given to understand that this diminished representation of commercial interests was due to an oversight and hopes were held out that the Chamber's "claim for increased representation on the Local Legislative Council would be fully considered." The words under quotation were the words of a distinguished Viceroy and the following extracts from the letter, dated the 9th April, 1923, from the Chief Commissioner, Delhi, to the Punjab Government, will further explain the position:—

"The arguments for direct and separate representation on the Punjab Legislative Council by the Punjab Chamber of Commerce are put so fully and cogently by the Chamber that I have nothing to add beyond lending the claim my strongest support.

"I trust that steps can now be taken to rectify the omission and provide the Chamber with the two seats it asks for."

The commercial community in the provinces of Delhi and the Punjab, as represented by the Punjab Chamber of Commerce and the Northern India Chamber of Commerce, have been for the last several years labouring under a grievance in the matter of representation in the legislatures. With and since the introduction of the Montagu-Chelmsford reforms their privilege of representation has been gradually restricted and the Proposals for Indian Constitutional Reform, so far as the provincial council is concerned, practically extinguish it. Three main points in this connection deserve special mention. The first is that, although with the introduction of each successive stage of reforms, the Punjab Legislative Council has been enlarged, commercial representation instead of being proportionately increased has been actually curtailed. The second point is that, while in every other Province the number of commercial and industrial seats has been increased, except in the case of the United Provinces and the Central Provinces, where it has been retained, it is only in the case of the Punjab that it has been diminished as will be evident from the statement given below:—

Even Orissa, the proposed new Province, with a population of 6.7 millions, has been allotted one Commerce and Industry Seat, and Sind, with a population of 3.9 millions, two such seats in the respective provincial assemblies.

17^o Julii, 1933.]

The third point is that Labour in the Punjab Legislative Council has hitherto been represented by one nominated seat but under the Communal Award Labour is to have three seats. It is not the concern of the Chambers to point out the difficulties of obtaining proper representation of Labour in its existing unorganised condition in the Punjab, nor do they object to increased representation of Labour, but they certainly protest against commercial and industrial interests of the Province being granted a very much smaller representation in the provincial legislature as compared to Labour. It will be observed from the tabular statement given in Appendix III (Part I) of the Proposals for Indian Constitutional Reform (page 79, Indian Edition) that in no other Province, except in the Punjab, Commerce, Industry, etc., the employers of labour as such, have been awarded a less number of seats than Labour itself.

The grievance of the two Chambers has from time to time been brought to the notice of the Government, both Central and Provincial, as well as the Right Honourable the Secretary of State for India. The Chambers, however, note with gratification that in the proposals for Indian Constitutional Reform one seat has been reserved in the Federal Assembly for "Northern India Commercial Bodies," and the Chambers pray that this seat be reserved for the Punjab Chamber of Commerce and the Northern India Chamber of Commerce, either jointly or by rotation, on the following amongst other grounds.

The first is that the Punjab Chamber is representative of the commercial, industrial and financial interests of the Punjab, and so is the Northern India Chamber of Commerce; and in addition the Punjab Chamber represents these interests in the Delhi Province. It is well known that Delhi is the largest up-country commercial centre and that the trade which passes through it, or is distributed by it, is of immense volume. Statistics for accurately ascertaining its commercial importance are unfortunately not available, but the following statement may serve to illustrate its industrial position:—

| Province. | Area in
sq. miles. | Population. | No. of industrial labourers. | Percentage of industrial labour to population. |
|-------------|-----------------------|-------------|------------------------------------|---|
| Madras ... | 142,260 | 42,318,985 | 143,217 | 0.3 |
| Bombay ... | 123,621 | 19,348,219 | 366,029 | 1.9 |
| Bengal ... | 76,843 | 46,695,536 | 589,860 | 1.5 |
| U.P. ... | 106,295 | 45,375,787 | 91,188 | 0.2 |
| Punjab ... | 99,846 | 20,685,024 | 49,875 | 0.2 |
| B. & O. ... | 83,161 | 23,330,288 | 68,726 | 0.3 |
| C.P. ... | 99,876 | 13,912,760 | 69,291 | 0.5 |
| Assam ... | 53,015 | 7,606,230 | 45,834 | 0.6 |
| Delhi ... | 593 | 488,188 | 10,109 | 2.0 |

It will be observed that, though the smallest, Delhi has an industrial importance proportionately greater than that of any other Province in India. The Chambers would mention that almost the whole of this industrial labour is in the employ of firms and companies who are members of the Punjab Chamber of Commerce. These industrial interests and the admittedly enormous commercial interests of the Province, find no representation in any legislative body. Having no separate legislature in which to be represented, as the Province is under the direct control of the Government of India as one of the Centrally administered areas, these interests have a strong claim to representation in the Central Legislature.

The second consideration which the Chambers would urge is that for the loss of representation which the Punjab Chamber has sustained at each successive stage of the reforms, it may be compensated by the award of a seat in the Federal Legislature. The Punjab stands out as the one exception where representation of Commercial interests, far from being proportionately extended with the enlargement of the Councils, has actually been restricted.

The third consideration to which the Chambers would respectfully solicit the attention of the Joint Select Committee is that the grant to the two Chambers of a seat in the Federal Legislature will not interfere with the balance of representation of either European or Indian Commerce at the Centre by reason of the fact that under its constitution the Punjab Chamber is composed of an equal number of European and Indian firms and companies, and so is the Northern India Chamber of Commerce in practice. Indeed, a seat given to the two Chambers would meet the view expressed by some Members of the Franchise Committee that if Indian and European commercial interests could agree to combine for the purpose of representation in the legislatures, effect should be given to this arrangement.

Sir Hubert Carr.

B264. Mr. Mukerjee, your representation, as I understand it, is not only with regard to representation, but also the make-up of the Constituency?—Yes.

B265. I would like to get this clear about the difference of opinion which I believe exists in the Punjab as to the make-up of the constituency. In Appendix II of the White Paper in the Table you will notice there are 11 seats reserved for Commerce and Industry?—Yes.

B266. Six are expected to be European and five are expected to be Indian?—Yes.

B267. If you would turn to Appendix IV, Section 14 (that is page 102 in the English edition), you will notice there that a seat is reserved for the Northern India Commercial Bodies?—Yes.

B268. You know that the claim put forward by the Associated Chambers and the European Association is that this seat for the Northern India Commercial Bodies should be reserved for a constituency formed of the Punjab Chamber of Commerce, the Northern India Chamber of Commerce, and the Trades Association?—I have heard of it.

B269. Would that constituency be agreeable to you?—No, Sir.

B270. What is the objection?—The objection is that we do not want trades to come into that constituency—the Trades Association.

Sir Joseph Nall.] I do not follow. What trades?

Sir Hubert Carr.

B271. There are three Associations. The Trades Association in that constituency has been in that constituency for some years, I understand?—The Trades Association has been in that constituency since the Montagu-Chelmsford reforms. That we were given to understand was by an oversight, and we have been objecting to it for the last 12 years or more; that trades should not be in that constituency. If you will kindly look at the Franchise Committee's recommendation they say (although we do not exactly agree with them), "Our object is essentially to make expert knowledge available in the Legislatures, and not to give any particular voting strength to individual interests. It is unnecessary to emphasise the importance of securing the presence in these Legislatures of Indians and Europeans qualified to speak with authority and knowledge before the Legislatures." You cannot expect the representative of a Trades Association to come before the Central Legislature or any Legislature to give views on such broad subjects as industry, economics, and so on. The Trades Association is composed of small traders selling their goods from the counters, tailors, haddressers, and the like. You cannot expect them to come into the constituency.

B272. They are largely European, are they not?—They are not only largely, they are exclusively European—perhaps there may be one or two Indian or Parsee members.

B273. Since this claim was originally made for a seat for these Northern India Commercial Bodies that seat has been accepted as a European seat, has it not, although sometimes filled by an Indian representative; yet it has been accepted as a European seat?—I think I have made it clear in my Memorandum that that seat was not reserved originally either for an Indian or a European. We are talking now about the Provincial Legislature. It was given under the Morley-Minto reforms to the Punjab Chamber of Commerce. It was never said whether it was a European or an Indian seat.

B274. It was originally made for the Punjab Chamber only?—It was originally made for the Punjab Chamber only.

B275. Which is constituted of British and Indian commerce?—British and Indian.

B276. The three chief considerations are put forward in your last paragraphs. They apply particularly to the Punjab Chamber?—The Punjab Chamber mainly, but the Northern India Chamber of Commerce also.

B277. Would you be content if the Punjab Chamber alone were the Constituency?—Naturally, personally, I should be very content because I am a member of the Punjab Chamber of Commerce.

17^o July, 1933]

RAI BAHADUR P. MUKERJEE.

Personally I shall be content, but here I am representing both the Chambers.

B278. Would you be content if the Punjab Chamber and Northern India Chamber joined?—Certainly. That is my mission here.

B279. The only difference between your claims and the claims put forward by the Associated Chambers and the European Association is as to the inclusion of the Trades Association?—That is so.

B280. There is no other?—No.

B281. Is it correct, Mr. Mukerjee, that since this claim was put forward the other claims have only arisen since a seat was promised in the White Paper?—Yes. What happened was this. When we saw the communal award we conferred. Although a great injustice has been done to us, as has been explained in the Memorandum, we accepted it as a settled fact. Then we went to our Governor in the Punjab and placed the matter before him, and he received us very sympathetically. His Excellency the Acting Governor at the time promised that he would do his best to give us representation in the Central Legislature. Whether he recommended it or not we do not know. Then we sought the help of the Associated Chambers; they said they would help us. Then we went to His Excellency the Viceroy. He was very much struck with our case. He said, "I have not seen such a strong case on paper as this is. I shall do whatever I can." It is through our efforts that this Northern India Commercial seat has been granted, and we shall be satisfied if it is restricted to us.

B282. That clears the point as to the difference in the Constituency?—Yes.

B283. Do you deny the United Provinces Chambers any representation? They are wishing to join with you in getting representation on the Federal Assembly on this Northern India Commercial Bodies seat. In the Northern India Commercial Bodies Constituency the United Provinces have commercial bodies which wish to join?—This is just what I hear from you. May I know what they are? May I know who these people are who are putting in their claim for this seat, because I can explain to you that the United Provinces will be very well represented out of the seats that have been granted to the Associated Chambers of Commerce and the Federated Chambers of Commerce and Industry in India. In recommending seats to them the Franchise Committee has made it clear that the port Chambers will not be represented in the one seat that has been given each to the Associated Chambers and the Federated Chambers of Commerce. By a process of elimination, therefore, if this Northern India seat is given to us, United Provinces will come through either of those bodies. You follow me?

B284. Yes. On that basis you wish to restrict the Northern Commercial Bodies Constituency to the Punjab Chamber of Commerce and the Northern India Chamber?—Yes, and one very strong reason that we have put forward is that Delhi has not got a Provincial Council of its own and the Delhi Merchants cannot, therefore, ventilate grievances in any Legislature. If you consider the commercial importance of Delhi, you can very well give Delhi commerce a seat, but the Delhi members are prepared to share it with those of Northern India.

B285. Just one last question: With regard to the Trades Association, your objection to including them in your Constituency is not based at all upon whether the seat would ultimately be an Indian seat or a European seat, but simply on a basis of the business they conduct?—That is right.

Mr. F. S. Cocks.

B286. The two Chambers you represent are composed approximately of equal numbers of European and Indian business firms, are they not?—Yes.

B287. You have a joint electorate?—We have not got a joint electorate at present. The position is that we have not got any representation except through the Associated Chambers of Commerce in the Central Legislature. We have only one seat now in the Punjab Legislative Council, which is shared by the Punjab Chamber of Commerce with Headquarters in Delhi, and the Punjab Trades Association, with their Headquarters in Lahore. That is the position at present.

B288. The members who have been members since 1919 have not been elected by you?—No.

Sir John Wardlaw-Milne.

B289. In the fourth paragraph of your Memorandum you refer to the curtailment of representation. That is the same thing as you refer to higher up, the question of halving it ten years ago?—Yes.

B290. In the last paragraph you say: "The Punjab Chamber is composed of an equal number of European and Indian firms and companies, and so is the Northern India Chamber of Commerce in practice"?—Yes; we have said that by Constitution. We framed a rule—

17^o Julii, 1933.]

B291. In their case it is not by Constitution, but it is in practice?—They have got an equal number of members on the Committee.

B292. Otherwise your views on general questions agree with the Associated Chambers?—Except that the Trades Association should not be put into this Constituency.

B293. On matters other than representation?—That is what I put in my note.

B294. I only want to get it on the notes. You are in favour of the representation made to the Committee by the Associated Chambers?—We have to be, because we are a part of that Association.

Earl of Derby.

B295. Your Memorandum is very clear indeed. I do not think we need trouble you any further. There is nothing further you wish to say, is there?—No, my Lord. I am very much obliged to you.

Earl of Derby.

B296. Mr. Ghose, you are, I think, Honorary Assistant Secretary of the Bengal Mahajan Sabha?—Yes.

B297. You are also a Member of the Executive Committee of the Bengal Hindu Sabha?—Yes.

B298. You are a Member of the Bengal Provincial Congress Committee?—No, not now. It is now an illegal body. I cannot continue to be a member of it. I have been connected with the Congress for a long time. From 1906 onwards there was some connection.

(Memorandum No. 38 is handed in and is as follows):

MEMORANDUM 38 ON BEHALF OF THE BENGAL MAHAJAN SABHA BY ASWINIKUMAR GHOSE, ESQUIRE.

1. Status of Indian Federation.

All Indian politicians from the Rt. Honourable Srinivas Sastri to Congress leaders believing in Gandhi-Irwin Pact have condemned the Proposals of the White Paper as falling short of their expectation, specially as there is no mention of "dominion status" for India. Politicians of all shades of opinion were expecting that after Lord Irwin's solemn declaration with the sanction of His Majesty's Government and the announcement of the Rt. Honourable Mr. Ramsay MacDonald himself on behalf of the same Government at the conclusion of the First Round Table Conference, some reference to this most important constitutional phrase would find a mention in the White Paper. On the other hand, there is a school of thought avowing Independence for India free from British connection and control. Shortly stated, the destiny of India according to those who strive for dominion status lies within the British Empire, while the school of Independence is opposed to Empire idea and Imperialism. "Dominion status" is therefore repugnant to the feelings of this school, as the words "Empire, Imperialism, Dominion" which are legacies of Roman ideas of Government mean "rule"—specially rule of one nation over another as opposed to self-rule. A reasonable reconciliation of the two ideals lies in that of a Commonwealth being substituted for that of an Empire. But even in that case, Indian sentiment would not be completely satisfied if the nomenclature adopted in the constitution of the Free State of Ireland be not appropriately altered, the equal partnership of India in the Commonwealth of Free Nations now known as the British Empire being recognised by naming it henceforward as the Indo-British Commonwealth of Nations.

19° Jui, 1933]

There seems to be one other consideration why the Federation of India cannot be a dominion. The States of India form no part of His Majesty's dominions (White Paper, paragraph 3)—far less British dominions. They merely own the paramountcy of His Majesty the King by certain treaties. They cannot part with their rights for the sake of coming into line with British India or other British territories. By the treaties of accession they will not be converted into British dominions. So the expression "dominion status" cannot apply to them unless they give up their rights.

The clause hereby proposed to be inserted in the Constitution Act should be in the following terms:—"The Federation of India shall have the same status in the Comity of Nations called the Indo-British Commonwealth of Nations as Canada, Australia, South Africa, Free State of Ireland, etc."

The insertion of this fundamental clause would be nothing beyond a recognition of the right that India (Indian India and British India) already enjoys as one of the original members of the League of Nations. The Federation of India will not evidently be British India. The expression "Dominion Status" cannot therefore be applicable to the Federal Constitution when it comes into being. The only solution is to have a fundamental clause like the one herein proposed to disarm as much as possible opposition to the use of the phrase from different points of view.

In any event the status of India must be statutorily recognised to make the new constitution acceptable to the people.

2. The Oath of Allegiance.

The oath of allegiance proposed for the Federal Legislatures as well as the Provincial Legislatures should contain a clause declaring allegiance to the Federal Constitution as well, as in the case of the Free State of Ireland. This will make for the promotion of the Federal Idea which is the pivot of the whole constitution proposed in the White Paper.

3. Defence and External Affairs, etc.

While reserving the administration of Defence and External Affairs in the hands of the Governor-General during the transition period on the basis of devolution of responsibility in the centre with safeguards for the present, His Majesty's Government has provided in the White Paper that Defence should form the increasing concern of the Indian people. On the same principle External Affairs also should be gradually transferred to the Indians to initiate them into self-rule from the inauguration of the new constitution. The subjects of Defence and Foreign Affairs go together, and if the first is to form the increasing concern of the people, there is no reason why the other should not. Moreover, without this sort of part responsibility with a view to the transfer of full responsibility the new Reforms will be considered to be illusory, however well intentioned they may be. The best way of making a beginning is to appoint suitable Indians as Counsellors for these departments.

The Ecclesiastical Department should be abolished and ecclesiastical matters should form a part of the Foreign Department.

A time-limit should be fixed for the complete transfer of responsibility in all these reserved subjects to the Legislature.

19^o July, 1933.]

4. Central Responsibility.

The salary of Ministers in the Central Government should be votable in order that they may be fully responsible to the Legislature. This is the ordinary constitutional machinery for making the Minister responsible to the Legislature understandable as such by the people. In the alternative some other suitable constitutional machinery for registering a vote of no confidence should be provided in the constitution so that the Ministry must resign on such a vote of no confidence.

5. Financial Safeguard.

One of the safeguards under which the Finance of the Federation has been proposed to be transferred to the people is to endow the Governor-General with emergency powers to step in in certain contingencies, one of which is to preserve the credit of India in the money markets of the world. The "special responsibility" of the Governor-General in this behalf should always be exercised in the interests of India first and last. Just as in the administration of justice, not only is it necessary that justice should be done, but that it should be made to appear to the common people that justice is being done, so it is not sufficient that the interests of India should be served, but it should be made to appear that the interests of India have been looked after in the first place. As a good deal of misunderstanding exists in the matter, the "special responsibility" of the Governor-General in this behalf should, if occasion arises, be administered in such a way as to inspire confidence in the measures taken.

6. Prevention of Commercial Discrimination.

Such discrimination in commercial matters, as among the units of the Commonwealth, is implied in the now established convention of fiscal autonomy and as such vested in the Legislature. This vested right should not be taken away by legislation. Such commercial matters should be regulated by commercial treaties and growth of conventions which should be fostered on the principle of reciprocity. A conference of the commerce and trade associations of the Commonwealth should take place to prepare the ground for the conclusion of such commercial treaties.

7. Ordinances.

The power of making ordinances by the Governor-General or Governor should be limited to the period when the Legislatures concerned are not sitting. None of them should have the power to embody the provisions of one Ordinance in a fresh ordinance so as to continue rule by Ordinance for a period extending beyond that limited by the statute.

8. Royal Proclamations and Instruments of Instruction.

Many important provisions of the constitution will be relegated to the Royal Proclamations and Instruments of Instruction to the Governor-General and Governors. These should be made binding on the Courts of Law in the interpretation of the Constitution Act and the administration of justice.

9. The Judiciary and the Executive.

As recommended by the Simon Commission, the recruitment to the Judiciary should be absolutely from the Bar and the Judiciary should be entirely separated from the Executive.

10. The Railway Board.

The Railway Board should not be freed from the control whether general or special of the Legislature. All important commerce and trade associations should be represented on the Board.

11. Reserve Bank.

Opinion on the establishment of the Reserve Bank and the Currency and the Exchange policy of the Government of the Federation cannot be expressed without knowing the provisions proposed for its constitution. All important trade and commerce chambers as well as bankers' associations should be represented on the Committee of Inquiry from as early a stage as possible.

12. Recruitment of All-India Services and the Secretary of State's Control.

Nothing is more likely to stultify the provisions of the New Constitution Act as the proposals of the White Paper in this behalf excepting the All-India Services from the control of the Federal Government either at the time of their recruitment or their dismissal. The recommendations of the Lee Commission are in themselves unsatisfactory and they will be out of harmony with the provisions of the New Statute to be passed. A fresh Commission should explore the possibilities of a better arrangement with the inauguration of the Reforms instead of waiting for five years more.

19^o July, 1933.]

The central services also should be fully under the control of the Federal Government.

13. Representation of Trade and Commerce.

The allocation of only 5 out of 19 seats in the Bengal Legislative Council to Indian trade and commerce disturbs the old proportion of such seats as between Europeans and Indians and overlooks the increasing importance of Indian Trade, Commerce and Industry. In any allocation of seats on the proposed basis also the Bengal Mahajan Sabha being the only representative association of trading interests of Bengalee merchants is entitled to two seats out of the five allotted to Indian trade and commerce.

In the Federal Assembly the Bengal Mahajan Sabha is entitled to one independent representation for each term, inasmuch as the Bengal National Chamber of Commerce and the Bengal Marwarī Association will not be unrepresented in any term as they are members of the Federated Chambers of Commerce which will be represented every term. If the Bengal Mahajan Sabha is given representation by rotation with the other bodies named above, it can enjoy the franchise once in 10 years now and the voice of the trading interests of Bengalees will not be heard in the Assembly for a whole decennium, whereas in the present constitution they enjoy the right once in six years, by rotation with the above-named associations which also do not enjoy any additional representation now through other channels as proposed for them in the White Paper.

14. Trade Representation in the Upper Chamber in Bengal.

No provision has been made for separate representation of trade in the Upper Chamber of the Bengal Legislative Council. The principle of nomination of a certain number of seats by the Government is not in keeping with the representative character that has been proposed to be given to the provincial constitution. Trade and Commerce ought to be directly represented in the Upper Chamber as interests having stakes in the country. As legislation affecting local banking interests of Bengal is likely to be passed by the Lower House, the Upper House should have the local bankers' view represented before it through their representatives, whose opinion is likely to carry some weight with the House in that particular question.

15. Inadequate Representation of Zemindars in the Bengal Legislative Council

The number of seats given to the landholders' constituencies in Bengal is inadequate considering the importance of their special interests. Moreover when the number of seats for other special electorates has been increased in view of the increased size of the Legislatures, the landholders who are likely to be affected along with indigenous bankers by hasty legislation by the entirely popular councils that will come into being should be adequately represented on the new Councils to place their case from different points of view before them.

16. Provincial Boundaries.

The Simon Commission recommendations in this behalf have been carried out in the case of Orissa and Sind. But the case of the Bengali-speaking areas have not been taken up as yet, and the White Paper has no provision in this behalf. This will stand in the way of the proper working of the Reforms. The Bengal Mahajan Sabha having some members carrying on business in the Bengali-speaking districts of Assam and Bihar urges the delimitation of provincial boundaries of Bengal, Assam and Bihar on linguistic, racial and cultural basis with a view to the formation of a homogenous unit of Government in the province.

17. University Representation.

The Calcutta University Constituency should be given two seats in view of the larger number of voters on its rolls, as compared with the other university constituency in Bengal.

18. The So-called Communal Award and Bengal.

The communal question is a very delicate matter to deal with by a non-communal trade-chamber like ours, but the grievous wrong done to the Hindus* of Bengal has so agitated the minds of the politically-minded people that the new constitution will have very little chance of being successful unless the decision of His Majesty's Government is modified in the light of the existing facts of the situation. But apart from that consideration, justice and equity demands its revision and an equitable allotment of seats among the Mussulmans, the Hindus and the so-called depressed classes (if any) in Bengal.

SUPPLEMENTARY MEMORANDUM 38A ON BEHALF OF THE BENGAL MAHAJAN SABHA BY ASWINIKUMAR GHOSE, Esquire.

THE BENGAL MAHAJAN SABHA.

This Association is registered under Section 26 of the Indian Companies Act (Act VI of 1882).

MEMBERS.

"Every Chalaní or other merchant or Banker of Bengal and Eastern Bengal carrying on business in Calcutta and elsewhere shall be eligible for election as a life or ordinary member of this Sabha." (Article 2 of the Association.)

The Bengal Mahajan Sabha consists of Members who are merchants, either Chalaní or otherwise, and indigenous bankers carrying on business in Calcutta and in the Mofussil. Most of them have their head offices or purchasing centres in Calcutta with branches in different districts of Bengal.

Inland Trade and Indigenous Banking are the two main trading interests which are represented by this Association. It is not too much to say that the entire inland trade and indigenous banking is entrusted directly and indirectly with the class of traders who represent The Bengal Mahajan Sabha.

THE BENGAL MAHAJAN SABHA AS DISTINGUISHED FROM OTHER COMMERCIAL ASSOCIATIONS.

There is a good deal of distinction between The Bengal Mahajan Sabha and other commercial Associations of Bengal. The commercial Associations, such as the Bengal Chamber of Commerce, the Bengal National Chamber of Commerce, etc., are mainly concerned with the Export and Import trade, and Industrial organisations of the Province and their activities are mainly restricted within the metropolis of Calcutta and other important ports. But The Bengal Mahajan Sabha has no such limitation.

INLAND TRADERS.

The inland traders carry the imported goods from the Ports to the doors of the villagers, and also the products of the Province from the agricultural centres to the Ports for Export. The Chalaní merchants who are the constituents of the Sabha take their goods from the wholesale dealers and importers in Calcutta and also carry the same to the Ports from the Mofussil for Export and it necessarily implies that they must have their offices or purchasing agencies in Calcutta and also in the Mofussil. Here lies the main point of distinction with the constituents of The Bengal Mahajan Sabha and other commercial Associations. The Importers and wholesale dealers need not necessarily have any organisation in the Mofussil. On the other hand the Members of The Bengal Mahajan Sabha cannot do without different disposing centres in the Mofussil. They are thus the true representatives of inland traders in rural Bengal.

INDIGENOUS BANKERS.

The other important class of traders represented by The Bengal Mahajan Sabha are the indigenous Bankers or Mahajans. They play a very big part in financing the agriculturists of Bengal. The Mahajans or moneylenders are the customary financiers of rural Bengal from time immemorial. Every village in Bengal has its own Mahajan, big or small, and their number and resources being unlimited, the village cultivators, traders, zemindars and others generally depend on them in their financial difficulties. Banking on western lines is still undeveloped in India. Though we have got some very big Banking concerns in Calcutta and Provincial towns, the entire Banking system is still left in the hands of persons who are called the indigenous Bankers or Mahajans. The Land Mortgage Banks and Joint-Stock Banks are not developed in Bengal, the big banking concerns are not easily approachable by the common people and the activities of the Credit Societies and Co-operative Banks are very limited, so the part played by the indigenous Bankers or the Mahajans in supplying the financial needs of the people is very considerable.

WHO ARE REPRESENTED BY THE BENGAL MAHAJAN SABHA.

In each District there are innumerable market places, where the local merchants have their Arats and shops for the local sale and in each village there are moneylenders to finance the people of Bengal in their needs. These are the constituents of The Bengal Mahajan Sabha and they are the true inland traders who are responsible for the major portion of the internal trade of the Province.

19^o July, 1933]

THE PRESENT STRENGTH OF THE ASSOCIATION.

The Association at present consists of above 300 Members, and each of these 300 Members are the proprietors, on the average, of about 10 business firms in different trading centres, and thus the Association is directly concerned with about 3,000 trading houses in Bengal. All merchants carrying on trade on similar lines in the Province are also indirectly represented by this Association. In fact the facilities afforded by the activities of the Association are equally shared by the vast number of inland traders and indigenous bankers in Bengal.

VALUE OF TRANSACTIONS OF THE INLAND TRADERS AND INDIGENOUS BANKERS OF BENGAL.

(a) Inland Trade

In order to have an idea of the internal trade in Bengal it is necessary that the subject should be studied from different points of view. The value of crops produced annually in the Province may give us an idea of the inland trade. Though a portion of the produce is consumed by the cultivators themselves, the major part of it changes hands, and that, at the first instance, through the agency of the inland traders.

We get the following figures regarding the area under cultivation and the price of the products from the Government Statistics(*)—

| | |
|---|-----------------------|
| Total area cropped in Bengal in 1928-29 | |
| (Rice, wheat, barley, jowar, bajra, maize, gram, sugarcane, cotton, jute, linseed, rape, mustard seed, tobacco, etc.) | ... 28,702,700 acres |
| Price of the above produce | ... Rs.2,48,80,65,500 |

(*) The Provincial Banking Enquiry Committee's Report—Page 28.

|---|----------------|
| To this may be added the price of other subsidiary products such as cocoanut, betel-nut, lac, poultry, spices, etc., which is not less than another | Rs.7,00,00,000 |
|---|----------------|

| | |
|--|---------------|
| This gives us a total figure of near about | Rs.250 Crores |
|--|---------------|

As for the value of the cultivators' own consumption and the portion given to the landlord in lieu of rent, one-fifth or 20 per cent. of the total product or Rs.50 Crores is not an unreasonable figure. If we deduct the above from the entire product we have about Rs.200 Crores left. This is the price of the crop which remains for the internal trade and the export.

The next point we are to consider is the seaborne and coastal imports. In the year 1928-29 the value of the same trade was estimated at Rs.123 Crores.

| | |
|--|--------------|
| To this should be added the value of inter-provincial imports (other than seaborne and coastal) such as piece-goods from Bombay, oil from Cawnpore, etc. | Rs.40 Crores |
|--|--------------|

To summarize the above we get the total figure of internal trade in Bengal as follows—

- | | |
|--|---------------|
| (a) Value of Products consumed in the Province and exported to foreign countries and other Provinces | Rs.200 Crores |
| (b) Imports (Seaborne and Coastal) | Rs.123 Crores |
| (c) Imports from other Provinces besides Coastal and Seaborne | Rs.40 Crores |

| | |
|-------|---------------|
| TOTAL | Rs.363 Crores |
|-------|---------------|

(b) Indigenous Banking.

Though there are different loan agencies, such as the Zemindars and other rent-receivers, loan offices, Government and Co-operative Societies, etc., the rural population of Bengal mainly depend on the indigenous bankers or Mahajans for all sorts of loan and credit. It may be safely asserted that 75 per cent. of the agricultural loan is due to the village moneylenders, and if the agricultural indebtedness of Bengal be estimated at Rs.100 Crores (according to the estimate of the Bengal Banking Enquiry Committee's Report) the value of the Mahajans' investment therein comes to Rs.75 Crores.

19^o July, 1933.]

Besides the agriculturists there are other kinds of borrowers such as the Zemindars and middle-class people, traders, industrialists and labourers, etc., whose indebtedness is in no way less than that of the agriculturists. These classes of non-agriculturist borrowers are equally, if not more, dependent on the Mahajans for their financial needs. As a rough estimate, if the non-agriculturist loan be calculated at the same figure of Rs.100 Crores and the moneylenders' share therein be calculated at at least 75 per cent. the figures come to another Rs.75 Crores.

The total value of indigenous bankers' investment may be calculated at the following figures:—

| | |
|---------------------------|--------------|
| Agricultural loan ... | Rs.75 Crores |
| Non-agricultural loan ... | Rs.75 Crores |

| | |
|-----------|---------------|
| TOTAL ... | Rs.150 Crores |
|-----------|---------------|

To sum up we get the following as the value of transactions of the inland traders and indigenous bankers:—

| | |
|------------------------|---------------|
| (a) Inland Trade ... | Rs.863 Crores |
| (b) Indigenous Banking | Rs.150 Crores |

| | |
|----------|---------------|
| TOTAL... | Rs.513 Crores |
|----------|---------------|

CONNECTION OF ABOVE TRADE WITH THE BENGAL MAHAJAN SABHA.

The figures quoted above are the general trade accounts of Bengal. Though it is not the actual value of transactions of the Members of this Association, this trade at one time or other passes through the hands of the traders who are represented by The Bengal Mahajan Sabha, and obviously the Sabha can claim these figures as the value of their direct and indirect trade. To say that each individual inland merchant and indigenous banker would be a member of the Association is absurd, but there is no denying the fact that the Sabha is the representative Association of this class of traders, and the results of its activities on their behalf are equally shared by them.

VALUE OF TRANSACTIONS PARTICULARLY OF THE MEMBERS OF THE ASSOCIATION.

Now to make an exact estimate of the value of transactions particularly of the existing Members of this Association is a very difficult task. It requires an enormous amount of labour and a long period of time to consult the books of these traders, and, moreover, the books and accounts are not always available in any particular place for inspection. As an experiment I attempted in this connection to ascertain the exact figures of the transactions of a few members of a particular trade centre, viz., Bhairab Bazar in the district of Mymensingh, and the result is noted below:—

The annual value of merchandise sold by 17 Merchant members of The Bengal Mahajan Sabha in the year 1927 ... Rs.1 Crore, 15 Lakhs.

This does not include the investment in money-lending of the above traders which, if added, will raise the figure much higher. Still on the basis of this a rough idea of the value of transactions of 300 Members of the Association may be guessed.

B299. You have handed in a paper which I will ask you in a few minutes if you have anything to add to. If not, we will ask you questions. I have read your paper through very carefully, and, putting it briefly, there is absolutely nothing in the White Paper that you agree with. You do not agree with the White Paper?—We agree subject to the points that we have taken.

B300. Subject to a complete alteration and substitution of some other scheme you are prepared to accept the White Paper? Are you prepared, if the White Paper is passed as it is, to assist in working it?—Certainly. If it is placed on the Statute Book it will be the duty of statutory bodies like ourselves to work it, but before it is passed I think it is up to us to make our suggestions to the Committee for the alteration of the scheme on the lines indicated in our Memorandum.

B301. Will you tell me exactly what your Society is. What does it mean exactly?—It is a Society of traders of Bengal who carry on business in the countryside, and have their general offices in Calcutta—in the Metropolis. These are the people who are the distributories of the goods that are imported from outside among the people in the country as, for example cloths, salt, corrugated iron and kerosene. All these things are distributed by them. They also have the ancillary business of money lending in the countryside. They finance agriculture as well as industry.

Mr. ASWINIKUMAR GHOSE.

B302. They are in no way manufacturers? They are only distributors?—Only distributors, and they are the promoters and financiers of certain industrial concerns as well as of agricultural operations by the peasants.

Sir H. Manubhai Mehta.

B303. I have only two or three questions to ask. May I ask this question on paragraph 13 of your Memorandum "Representation of Trade and Commerce"? You say, Mr. Ghose, that out of five seats allotted to Bengal Commerce in the Bengal Legislative Council you claim at least two seats for your Bengal Mahajan Sabha? I gather that besides the Bengal Mahajan Sabha there are the Bengal Marwari Association and the Bengal National Chamber of Commerce. If you take away two out of five seats how would you distribute the remaining three seats between the Bengal Marwari Association and the Bengal National Chamber of Commerce?—The Bengal National Chamber of Commerce already enjoys the benefit of two seats in the present Council, and we enjoy the benefit of only one seat, and, in view of the importance of our Association, which we submit should be taken into consideration by the Committee, we submit we are entitled to one more seat in the Bengal Council.

B304. By your capital? Have you a larger capital than the Marwari Association?—It is very difficult to determine whose capital is greater. Ours is a body registered under Section 26 of the Companies Act.

B305. In membership are you larger?—Yes, our membership is 300 strong, regular members. May I hand to the Committee the present list of members, excluding, of course, the defaulters, who number about 50.

B306. Are you not affiliated with the Federated Chambers of Commerce?—No.

B307. Is there any prevention?—The prevention is this, the Federated Chambers of Commerce is more or less a political body, and it is distinctly, if I may say so without any offence, a more or less non-co-operating body—the Federated Chambers of Commerce.

B308. Congress was not a political body?—Our chief concern is not politics except in the way that we have not representation in the Council to put forward our views, and except in the way in which we are to express our views on certain questions submitted to our Committee by the Government, but the Federated Chambers of Commerce has a greater political tinge, and last time the Federated Chambers of Commerce adopted a more or less non-co-operating attitude.

B309. Am I to understand that the Marwari Association is also a political body?—No, the Marwari Association is not a political body.

B310. Yet it is affiliated to the Federated Chambers of Commerce?—I do not remember exactly; I think it is, but the Bengal National Chamber of Commerce is.

B311. You are Assistant Secretary. You are connected with the Congress, and yet you claim your Association to be a non-political body?—I was associated with the Congress in my private capacity, but, as a business man I have been in the Mahajan Sabha, and my past political connection has nothing to do with the character of the Mahajan Sabha.

B312. I want to understand the first few lines of the second paragraph of paragraph 13: "In the Federal Assembly the Bengal Mahajan Sabha is entitled to one independent representation for each term, inasmuch as the Bengal National Chamber of Commerce and the Bengal Marwari Association will not be unrepresented in any term as they are members of the Federated Chambers of Commerce."?—Yes.

B313. If, on that ground, they get one seat, I wanted to know whether there is anything to prevent your being affiliated to the Federated Chambers of Commerce?—Our inclinations are not quite in that way. That is how I should put it.

B314. I will now turn to paragraph 10, the Railway Board. You say: "The Railway Board should not be freed from the control whether general or special of the Legislature"?—Yes.

B315. "All important commerce and trade associations should be represented on the Board." I should like to know what you mean by "All important commerce and trade associations." Would not you have industrial associations also represented?—Yes. I should modify it to that extent.

19th July, 1933.]

Mr. ASWINIKUMAR GHOSE.

B316. Agriculture?—Agricultural associations, whether they exist or not I cannot say. There may be certain co-operative organisations somewhere, but I am not quite sure of their existence.

B317. Railway companies: Should they be represented or not?—Railway companies would be industrial associations.

B318. Yet you would like them to be represented notwithstanding that they have identical interests. For instance, say Martin and Company, or Bird and Company; would they be represented on the Railway Board? Would not they be primarily a little inclined to their own interests?—Yes, they are likely to be.

B319. So you would rather exclude them?—Yes, to that extent.

B320. So this is not quite justifiable?—But while on this subject I should like to submit to this Committee that the White Paper says that the Secretary of State was to have placed the proposals about the Railway Board before the Joint Committee.

B321. They are being placed before the Joint Committee?—We do not make any suggestions about the details of the scheme because we have not got them.

B322. So if the proposed Railway Board Committee came to the conclusion that important trade interests and railway interests should have nothing to do with the Railway Board, would you be satisfied with that?—Provisionally I should not be satisfied, but unless we get the details and consider them, and submit a separate Memorandum on this Railway Board and Reserve Bank also, we cannot give any opinion definitely here on that.

B323. But in principle you would not?—In principle I would not.

B324. You would not like a trade interest to be represented on the Railway Board?—A railway interest.

B325. An industrial interest?—Railway industrial interests.

B326. Should not be represented?—No, at least not predominantly.

Sir Hubert Carr.] I have only two questions just to assist me to understand what this Society is. I notice you suggest the British Empire should be renamed the Indo-British Commonwealth of Nations.

What is the name you suggest for India in the future?—The Federation of India. I submit that the name is not entirely mine. The name was given by Colonel Wedgwood in a book he published in 1920, I believe at the time of the Nagpur Congress.

B327. I think your adoption of it is quite as good as your origination perhaps, but could you tell me with reference to paragraph 3: "A time-limit should be fixed for the complete transfer of responsibility in all these reserved subjects to the Legislature," what time-limit would your Society suggest?—15 years.

Sir N. N. Sircar.

B328. I did not exactly appreciate your answer to the Lord Chairman. Supposing the White Paper constitution is adopted by Parliament, and there are no improvements in the sense in which you make suggestions, and if the Congress decides not to have anything to do with the Constitution, will you run it loyally?—Not in spirit. It may be in form we shall have to carry on, but the great majority of the people of Bengal will not be satisfied—

Earl of Derby.] I will ask you to answer only for yourself and your own Society, and not for Bengal. You are answering for one particular Society, and in that your answer is quite correct that, if it is passed as it is, although you will have outwardly to support it, inwardly you would not and will not work it?—We shall not be satisfied with it.

B329. You have said you would not work it?—It would not satisfy our aspirations.

Sir N. N. Sircar.

B330. No one is satisfied in this world. Would you work it loyally?—Outwardly we shall have to work it loyally.

Earl of Derby.

B331. There may be no outwardly and inwardly. Will you work it loyally? Answer yes or no?—Once it is on the Statute Book I think it would be the duty of the citizen to work it for the time being.

B332. Please answer the question. If this is passed as it is—you can say yes or no; that is all the answer that I want. Will you work it loyally?—We shall work it for what it is worth. That much we can say.

19^o Juhi, 1933.]

Mr. ASWINIKUMAR GHOSE.

Earl of Derby.] I think you can put the answer down as no.

Sir N. N. Sircar.

B333. If the Congress, or some Congress Dictator asks you to work it only for personal obstruction, I think you would do that?—Obstruction is not an unconstitutional method, and, within the limits of the Constitution we shall be at liberty to obstruct it or not to obstruct it. Ours is more or less a responsive policy. We obstruct when it is necessary. We do not obstruct when it is not necessary. But, we have ourselves proposed on oath of allegiance to the Federal Constitution in paragraph 2 of our Memorandum.

B334. When it is necessary, or when it is not necessary, the Dictator will decide for you?—No; we are not bound to go by the Congress dictation. We shall, of course, decide for ourselves on the merits of the question on the constitutional issue before the House.

Sir N. N. Sircar.] I quite appreciate that attitude.

Mr. A. H. Ghuznavi.] Mr. Ghose, when was this Bengal Mahajan Sabha established?—As long ago as 1905 under the present name, when it was registered under Section 26 of the Companies Act.

B335. Who started it?—It was started by certain merchants of Eastern Bengal. At that time the Association existed under the name of Eastern Bengal Mahajan Sabha, and about that time merchants of other parts of the country also came to the Association, and so it was registered as the Bengal Mahajan Sabha.

B336. You said in answer to the Lord Chairman's question that your number of members was 300?—Three hundred.

B337. They are all Hindus?—No. We have a Muhammadan Vice-President and there are four or five Muhammadan members also. We do not restrict it to Hindus at all. Anybody who is a trader of Bengal is entitled to come in.

B338. Will the Muhammadan members' names appear in the list?—Yes, if not defaulters.

Earl of Derby.] Perhaps you will hand the list in? (The list is handed in.)

Witness.] If you will have it, this is the Articles of Association of that Sabha. (Document is handed in.)

Mr. A. H. Ghuznavi.

B339. My Lord Chairman, I only find one Muslim name in this list?—There are life members and ordinary members. There are two lists.

B340. As regards this particular Muslim member, when did you elect him?—What is his name?

B341. Rezaur Rahaman Khan?—I cannot tell you offhand when he was elected, but perhaps when he came to Calcutta as a Member of the Legislative Council from Eastern Bengal he was elected member. When he came to have his residence in Calcutta he got interested.

B342. There have been residents of that name in Calcutta for the last 60 years?—When he became a Member of the Bengal Legislative Council; that is my answer.

B343. I put it to you that the members of your Mahajan Sabha are all petty dealers?—Not at all.

B344. Most of them are petty dealers?—Not at all.

B345. That will appear from the list?—How can it be ascertained from the list?

B346. I say, most of them?—In an Association which has 300 members, as many as 175 are Life Members, and Life Members are supposed to give 500 rupees at the time of becoming Life Members. They cannot at all be petty dealers. People who can pay down 500 rupees at a time cannot be petty dealers.

Mr. Isaac Foot.

B347. Do they pay it? You said they were supposed to pay it?—They have I should say, required to pay. Otherwise, they would not have been on the list.

B348. Do they pay it or are they supposed to pay it?—No, they have paid actually. This list is of members who have actually paid and who are not defaulters. We have as many as 50 defaulters this present year, because this year has been a year of depression and their names are not there.

Mr. A. H. Ghuznavi.

B349. Your answer is that if a man can pay 500 rupees he is not to be taken as a petty dealer?—That is not a complete answer, but this is to be taken as one of the implications. There are members

19^o Julii, 1933.]

Mr. ASWINKUMAR GHOSE.

on this list who are landholders of Bengal.

B350. They are members of the Landholders' Constituency?—Not all of them. Some of them are.

B351. Not most of them?—Not most of them certainly: only some of them. Out of 300 some 50 or 30 may be members of landholders' constituencies.

B352. And they have a vote also in the Landholders' Constituency?—That is the situation in Bengal. Some of us have votes in the University Constituency. Some of us have votes in the special constituencies. But the number is very limited.

B353. Members of your Mahajan Sabha are also members of the Bengal National Chamber of Commerce?—Some of them.

B354. Most of them?—No, only a few. I think not more than five.

B355. Did your Sabha lead any evidence before the Industrial Commission?—The Industrial Commission of 1930?

B356. Yes?—I do not remember. I was not there at that time.

B357. Before the Central Banking Committee?—Yes, they must have if invited. That is also subject to correction, because I have been connected with this Sabha only for the last two years.

B358. So you do not know?—No.

B359. The Simon Commission?—The Simon Commission was also before that.

B360. So you do not know that?—No. What I can speak of is the Franchise Committees, the Jute Inquiry Committee, the Provincial Committee set up by the Government of Bengal for gathering materials for franchise, and delimitation of constituencies. These are the matters about which I can speak personally, but whether any evidence was led before the Simon Commission or any other body is more than I can say without notice.

B361. What do you mean by the word "Mahajan"?—"Mahajan" means chalani merchant; it is defined in the Articles of Association.

Earl of Derby.

B362. I am afraid that does not explain it to me. What does it mean?—"Mahajan" in Bengali generally means a local banker, an indigenous banker and wholesale trader.

Mr. A. H. Ghuznavi.

B363. I would say the word is translated as a moneylender—nothing else?—An indigenous banker and wholesale trader.

Earl of Derby.] Do not you think we can leave it at that—that what he represents is a body of small distributors and moneylenders? That is really what it means.

Mr. A. H. Ghuznavi.] Yes.

Earl of Derby.] It is no use going into the details of membership. I do not know whether you agree with me.

Mr. A. H. Ghuznavi.

B364. I do, my Lord?—I invite your Lordship's attention to Section 2 of the Articles of Association which says that "every chalani or other merchant or banker of Bengal and East Bengal carrying on business in Calcutta and elsewhere shall be eligible for election as a life or ordinary member."

Earl of Derby.] You will excuse me for saying that "being eligible for election" is not exactly the same thing as being a member.

Lord Snell.

B365. Let me get a little clearer as to the position of your Society. Does it include farmers?—No.

B366. Nor any workers?—No.

B367. It is therefore exclusively made up of these small traders, financial or otherwise?—They are not small traders. That is what I do not subscribe to at all. There are big wholesale traders as well as some small retail traders.

B368. Is it restricted to Indians, or are there Europeans as well?—It is restricted but not by the Articles of Association.

B369. But in practice?—As a matter of fact, it is restricted to Bengalis pure and simple. Formerly Marwaris also were members of this Association, but now they have set up a separate association called the Marwaris Association.

B370. In your oral evidence to-day are you speaking as the servant or the representative of the Mahajan Sabha?—Yes.

B371. And not in your personal capacity?—Of course, in this sense it may be in my personal capacity. I drafted the Memorandum to be submitted before this Committee and then had it passed by a Committee appointed by the Bengal Mahajan Sabha. So it has the full approval of the Bengal Mahajan Sabha.

B372. If you are speaking for anyone besides yourself you are aware that some of the words you have used to-day will have a significance that they would not have if you were speaking purely as a private person?—Certainly. I am submitting this Memorial now, as your Lordship will see from the heading, on behalf of the Bengal Mahajan Sabha.

19^o Julii, 1933.]

Mr. ASWINIKUMAR GHOSE.

B373 I am not thinking of the Memorandum, but you have said this morning, presumably, on behalf of your Association, that you would work these reforms only up to the extent that you felt you could go. That is equal to a statement of non-co-operation. You are aware of that, are you not?—No, it is not a statement of non-co-operation, but we reserve to ourselves the right of acting according to the exigencies of the situation.

Lord Snell.] I want to get that clear. Are you in the same position as I am personally in relation to the House of Lords of which our Chairman is a Member? I, too, have a limited enthusiasm for the House of Lords, but I work it as far as I can loyally and completely as long as I am there.

Lord Rankeillour.] And effectively.

Lord Snell.

B374. I want to know whether you are in that position, or if not, exactly what you mean?—Yes, I am exactly in that position.

B375. As far as these reforms go, you will accept what they propose and co-operate in the working of them, whilst reserving your desire for further extensions? Is that what you mean?—We shall not stay away from the Legislatures. To that extent we shall work it out loyally, but, of course, what methods we shall adopt to bring about a reform in the Constitution on strictly constitutional and legal lines, we cannot say at the present moment.

B376. I do not ask you to say that. I shall not reveal to you my own methods in similar circumstances. All that I want is that you should not give a false—not a false—but an unfair or misleading interpretation of the purposes of your Society?—I beg your lordship's pardon; I could not exactly follow.

B377. I was only anxious that you should weigh your words and review your words in regard to the matter of non-co-operation?—Yes. We are not going to non-co-operate. I have made that clear at the very beginning in answer to a question as to why we did not join the Indian Federated Chambers of Commerce, because that body does not take part in the constitutional struggle as it should do. If we were non-co-operators we would not be here.

Lord Rankeillour.

B378. I am not quite clear, from what you said, whether your Members are mostly actual retailers or whether they are distributors to the retailers?—They have wholesale as well as retail business. In Calcutta, they buy wholesale from importers and some of them are importers themselves, then in the Muffassil they have their Arots, as they are called, that is, depots, where they sell both wholesale and retail.

B379. Do these retail places belong to the individual members or to the society at large?—No; the society is merely a society for settling certain trade disputes or regularising certain standards and doing other things. We are like any other trade chamber there.

B380. They are distributors who are in some cases retailers. Is that right?—Yes.

B381. You also make advances—lend money?—Yes. The members are that.

B382. Do you lend much on mortgage—on land?—Yes, that we do.

B383. Have you any particular views as to what is known in Bengal as the permanent settlement?—No. We have not come to any decision upon that question because that is a controversial question. We have not considered that so I am not in a position to give your Lordship any idea as to what the association will think of the permanent settlement.

B384. They have not considered it with a view to the security of their mortgages?—No.

B385. I think there is only one other question I want to ask you. In the very last line of paragraph 18 of your memorandum, you say: "But apart from that consideration, justice and equity demands its revision and an equitable allotment of seats among the Mussulmans, the Hindus and the so-called depressed classes (if any) in Bengal." What do you mean by those words in brackets "if any"?—The question is a very large one, and I should submit it before the Committee in this way: The Franchise Committee laid down certain tests for determining who the depressed classes are. Now, the Government of Bengal was not ready with any list of their own, so the Franchise Committee could not offer any suggestions as to which classes of castes should be depressed classes.

Mr. Foot.

B386. The boundaries are indistinct?—But afterwards there was a communal award by the Prime Minister, and by

19^o Julii, 1933.]

Mr. ASWINIKUMAR GHOSE.

hat communal award some 10 seats were provisionally reserved for the depressed classes.

B387. Thirty, I think?—At first it was 10. All of a sudden the Poona Pact was sprung upon us, and, without any consultation with Bengal public opinion, and the Bengal Hindus generally, it was arbitrarily fixed that 30 members—up from 10 to 30 members—should be reserved out of 80 for the depressed classes. Now, our contention is that in Bengal there are no depressed classes according to the tests laid down by the Franchise Committee. If there are any, they are such a handful that they do not deserve 30 seats at all.

Lord Rankeillour.

B388. When you are talking of the Franchise Committee, do you mean Lord Lothian's Committee?—Yes.

B389. You say according to the tests laid down, there are no depressed classes in Bengal at all?—That is the contention. According to those tests no depressed classes have been ascertained, but after the Poona Pact, when 30 seats were given to the depressed classes by the Premier's modified award, the Government of Bengal was then called upon to find out the depressed classes who deserved those 30 seats. What was the Government of Bengal to do? They drew up a list of what they called the Scheduled Classes, and these Members of the Scheduled Classes are not, certainly, depressed classes, if the Committee will undertake an examination according to the tests laid down in the Franchise Committee's Report. They are classes which are not depressed classes at all.

B390. You imply that the term "depressed classes" as applied to Bengal is a misnomer altogether?—Exactly so.

B391. And do you say you could not really identify who was meant?—Yes; except one or two classes who do actual unclean work—some sweepers, or Mehtars, as they are called; or Chamars, that is, those who flay dead animals. Except for one or two classes who do actually unclean work, these tests of untouchability do not apply to any class in Bengal.

B392. Thank you, I did not understand what you meant?—I think that question will come up before the full Committee and I have been informed by the Secretary of the Joint Committee that a certain application was made, in order that full facts and figures might be placed before the Committee, that I might be examined, along with other Hindu delegates from Bengal, on this question. I think the Committee has not yet decided whether I shall be examined on this question before the full Committee along with other Bengal parties.

Mr. Foot.

B393. You may be called as a witness in relation to some other evidence. Is that so?—No. With regard to paragraph 18, I think that question is coming up before the full Committee.

B394. Do I understand that your society felt so keenly about the proposals submitted that they desire representation through yourself before us?—Yes.

B395. Are they bearing the expense of that representation?—The expense of that representation?

B396. Yes. Do you come specially to give evidence in relation to your memorandum?—I have been invited to give evidence. The association has been invited by the Parliamentary Committee to give evidence, and some provision, of course, has been made for expenses, about passage money and so on.

B397. Is your society bearing any of the expense?—All the extra expense I am incurring here, and for loss of profession, etc. They are bearing that.

Earl of Derby.

B398. What is your profession?—I am a lawyer. I am also a business man having connection with a big trading firm and book trade.

Mr. Foot.

B399. How long have you been in this country waiting to give evidence?—Only three weeks. With regard to these questions about the Railway Board and the Reserve Bank, the Secretary of State will place the proposals before the Joint Committee. Shall we be entitled to submit a separate memorandum?

Earl of Derby.] I cannot answer that question for the moment. I understand you are not going to be called before the General Committee but you have handed in the Papers and questions have been asked by members of the Committee which have, I think, elucidated all the points we wished to know from your documents.

Earl of Derby.] Before I ask our next witnesses to give us answers to any questions, I should like to ask you this, Mr. Joshi: You were put down as one of the representatives of the National Trades Union Federation, but I understand you are not going to appear as a representative.

Mr. Joshi.] No. I am going to work as a delegate here, on the Committee.

Earl of Derby.] You have been put down as being one of the authors of Memorandum 54. I do not think it is possible to act in the two capacities, both as a delegate and as a witness. Therefore, if you like to go into the witness box and give any explanation you like of the papers you have put forward, we shall be delighted to hear you, but I am afraid I could not allow you to question the witnesses.

Mr. Joshi.] I am quite willing to submit to your ruling, but I should like to make one point clear. They put my name down as a witness before I was appointed a delegate. The date on the memorandum is the 10th June.

Earl of Derby.] On the 10th June, as I understand it, your name being there meant that as far as you were concerned that was the evidence you would have given?

Mr. Joshi.] Yes.

Earl of Derby.] Under those circumstances I feel it would not be possible for you to be present in the two capacities, and while I am quite ready—and I imagine the Committee will agree with me in this—to allow you to go into the witness box, it would not be possible, if you do not go into the witness box, for me to permit questioning by you.

Mr. Joshi.] I certainly do not mind going into the witness box. I will do that.

Mr. B. SHIVA RAO, Mr. AFTAB ALI, Mr. K. C. ROY CHOWDHURY and Mr. N. M. JOSHI are called in and examined as follows:

Earl of Derby.

B400. I understand you gentlemen represent two distinct bodies—one is the National Trades Union Federation, of which Mr. Shiva Rao is a Vice-President?—(Mr. Shiva Rao.) I am a Vice-President.

B401. Mr. Shiva Rao, you are Vice-President of the National Trades Union Federation?—Yes.

B402. You were a delegate to the International Labour Conference in 1929 and 1930?—I was an adviser to the delegates. I was on the delegation.

B403. You were a delegate to the First and Second Round Table Conferences?—That is right.

(Memorandum 54 is handed in and is as follows):

MEMORANDUM 54—NATIONAL TRADES UNION FEDERATION.

This Memorandum derives its authority from the Indian Trades Union Federation which represented before 10th May, 1933, 78,600 industrial workers organised in 41 trade unions affiliated to it—seven of them in Bengal, one in Bihar and Orissa, nine in the Bombay Presidency, four in the Central Provinces, 15 in the Madras Presidency, four in the Punjab and one in Mysore State. Its membership was drawn from many of the important trades and industries, such as transport, cotton and jute, chemicals, sugar, mining, engineering, paper and printing and leather. In its Special Session held at Calcutta on April 19 and 20, 1933, this Federation and the National Federation of Labour, which was organised in February of this year by some of the office-bearers of the All-India Railway-men's Federation, decided to amalgamate themselves under the name of the National Trades Union Federation comprising the affiliated unions of both the organisations. The strength of the Railway Unions, as represented in the All-India Railwaymen's Federation, is over 100,000; and this membership, or at least a large majority of it, which was provisionally affiliated to the National Federation of Labour, is now in the process of being transferred to the National Trades Union Federation which formally came into being on 10th May, 1933. It may, therefore, be stated that the new Federation represents a much larger number of organised industrial workers than that represented by the Indian Trades Union Federation which was given, under the terms of the amalgamation, authority to carry out the obligations decided upon by it and its General Council before the amalgamation took place.

2. This Memorandum is confined mainly to such matters as are covered by the resolution on the White Paper which was passed at the Special Session of the Indian Trades Union Federation at Calcutta in April last and a copy of which is enclosed with this Memorandum as Appendix A. This does not, however, mean that the Federation supports the other Proposals which are not dealt with in this Memorandum. The general view of the Federation on the White Paper as a whole is contained in part (a) of its resolution which characterised the Proposals as "disappointing, undemocratic and even reactionary in certain essential and fundamental respects," and as holding out "no prospect of the Indian masses and the working classes ever securing an adequate and effective voice and control in the legislatures and administration of the country." The resolution further stated that "they (i.e., the Proposals) contain less of transfer of power from British into Indian hands and more of reservations and safeguards which breathe the spirit of distrust of Indians, and are not only not demonstrably in the interests of India, but are much more in the interests of the United Kingdom." In making this criticism the Federation had particularly in view the Proposals such as those dealing with the "processes" involved in the formation of the Federation (including the organisation and establishment of the Reserve Bank), the "date and conditions" for its inauguration, the vast special powers and responsibilities of the Governor-General and the Governors, the nature and extent of the reservations in respect of defence and foreign affairs, and retention of the Secretary of State's Advisers, the peculiarly privileged position of the Imperial Services, the constitution of the Statutory Railway Board—to mention only a few—which, in the opinion of the Federation, are gravely unsatisfactory and require to be radically modified in many essential respects if they are to be made acceptable to Indian public opinion. Part (b) of the resolution emphasises that "no scheme of reforms can meet the requirements of the Indian masses and the working classes, or satisfy their legitimate aspirations or allay the present political or economic discontent, which is not designed to endow India with the status of a self-governing democratic country," and that "if the proposals of reform are to achieve any purpose, they should be so liberalised as to bring them into conformity with the democratic constitutions of self-governing countries, only the irreducible minimum of reservations being made for a short transitional period to be fixed by Statute." The Federation notes with the deepest regret that the White Paper Proposals fall far short of the assurances given by His Majesty's Government at the end of the first Round Table Conference and reiterated at the end of the second Session. Messrs. N. M. Joshi, M.L.A., B. Shiva Rao and V. V. Giri, who represented Indian labour at Sessions of the Round Table Conference, have, in their speeches and written memoranda, pointed out in detail the various directions in which the Constitution for the future Government of India should be liberalised so as to make it acceptable to the masses and the working classes; and as this Memorandum supports the views expressed by them, it is not necessary to repeat them in so far as the general character of the White Paper Proposals is concerned.

3. Part (c) of the resolution deals with certain proposals which, the Federation insists, should be incorporated in the scheme of reforms. An attempt is made in the following paragraphs to elaborate them in the order in which they have been set down in the resolution.

(A) Fundamental Rights.—The Constitution Act should contain a declaration of fundamental rights guaranteeing to all citizens of the Federation, inter alia, freedom of speech, freedom of the press, freedom of association, and, in the case of workers, the right to strike, the right to work, and provision against old age, invalidity, etc. In view of the experience that the Indian workers have had with regard to the treatment meted out to them and their organisations during industrial disputes, the Federation is convinced of the necessity of insisting upon such fundamental rights being guaranteed, in the interests particularly of the working classes. The Federation is not impressed with the plea put forward in paragraph 75 (Introduction) of the White Paper against the inclusion on any large scale of fundamental rights in the Constitution Act. It fails to understand the recognition, on the one hand, of the fundamental right of property which applies, comparatively, only to a small minority, viz., the propertied class, and refusal, on the other, to recognise the fundamental rights of a vast number of the working class population (vide Appendix B) which affect their very existence. The Federation, therefore, urges that fundamental rights, such as those stated above, should be recognised in the new Constitution and incorporated in the Act.

(B) Nomination vs. Election. — The Federation is opposed to the principle of nomination and wants all the legislatures in India of the future to be constituted on the principle of election. The Indian Franchise Committee, over which the Marquess of Lothian presided, has discarded the view of many of the Provincial Governments in India that the method of nomination should be adopted for the representation of certain classes or communities and interests. And in its report (page 94, para. 243), the Committee is emphatic that "it has been generally agreed that the method of nomination is inappropriate under the system of responsible government, for the reason that it may give to the nominator the power to make or unmake governments, while it affords no choice to the members of the community concerned, and gives them no training in political affairs." Even in the case of aboriginal and hill tribes, where fixing the franchise qualifications and forming constituencies are not so easy as in the case of other sections of the community, the Committee "strongly recommended the adoption of some method of election, if found to be practicable, in preference to nomination" (page 135, para. 341). With this weighty opinion expressed by an authoritative Committee to guide His Majesty's Government, the Federation is surprised to find that the White Paper contemplates nomination to both the Houses of the Federal Legislature for sending representatives from Baluchistan and has definitely recommended 10 nominated seats (pages 6 and 36, paras. 18, Introduction and 26, Proposals) in the Federal Upper House and 10, 9 and 5 nominated seats (page 78, Appendix III, Part II) in the Legislative Councils (Upper Chambers) of Bengal, the U.P. and Bihar respectively. In the case of Baluchistan, no authoritative enquiry has been, so far as the Federation is aware, held about the possibility of evolving a suitable machinery for election; and it is unfair to the people of that area to deny them the right of election when other provinces are enabled to enjoy it. The argument that the ten nominations to the Council of State are meant to enable the Council to have "a small group of the elder statesman type" is not convincing. The Federation, therefore, urges that these nominations should be done away with.

The Federation is also emphatic that there is no justification whatsoever for reserving 15 per cent. of the seats in the case of Bengal and the U.P. and 16.6 per cent. of the seats in the case of Bihar for nomination. Past experience serves as a warning against the power of nomination being retained, for it is likely to be abused and prove detrimental to the growth of responsibility. It is difficult to comprehend the object for which these nominations are provided. If it is suggested that nomination is intended to secure representation for commercial interests, the view of the Indian Franchise Committee is against this course. It says in para. 421 (page 168) that "in future all commercial representation should be concentrated in the Assembly." What applies to the Federal Legislature applies equally to the Provincial Legislatures. The Federation therefore, strongly recommends that the method of nomination should be entirely abolished and the method of election should be universally adopted.

(C) Federal Upper House. — The Federation is opposed on principle to the establishment of the Federal Upper House. It is unnecessary and will act as an impediment to the growth of a sense of responsibility in the Federal Lower House. The latter is based upon a restricted franchise, and its powers are severely limited; further, it will contain an appreciable number of members who will represent an essentially conservative outlook, such as representatives of commerce and industry, landholders and Indian States. There is thus hardly any risk of the Federal Lower House passing any hasty legislation. And even assuming that it does, there are the overriding powers of the Governor-General—though the Federation is very far from suggesting that all of them are desirable or necessary—which are more than adequate to check the hasty tendencies of the Federal Lower House, if and when it begins to show any. Under these circumstances, the Federal Upper House will, apart from the cost it entails, be a clog on the wheel of progress and a source of perpetual friction with the popular House.

If, in spite of these considerations against the establishment of the Federal Upper House, it is decided to have it, the Federation strongly recommends that Indian labour should have adequate and effective representation therein. The White Paper has, in giving representation to the Europeans as a community, set aside the recommendation of the Indian Franchise Committee that all commercial representation should be concentrated in the Assembly, because the Federation holds that the position of Europeans in India is, for all practical purposes, such that representation given to them, whether as a community or as a commercial interest, amounts to representation given to European commerce. The allocation of seven seats for Europeans, under the guise of communal representation, is, therefore, in the opinion of the Federation, an injustice both to Indian commerce and to labour. But independently of this unfair discrimination, which becomes an additional consideration in demanding representation for labour in the Federal Upper House, the Federation is of opinion that Indian labour is entitled to special representation on its own merits. In the immediate future, the Federal Legislature will be called upon to deal with labour legislation to even a greater extent than in the past; and the absence of labour representatives from the Upper House which is bound to be more conservative and less democratic than the Lower House, will prove to be a serious handicap to the passage of such legislation. The number of labour representatives in the Provincial Legislatures is so small that there is hardly any likelihood of these Legislatures returning any labour representatives to the Federal Upper House. The Federation, therefore, strongly urges that it should contain an adequate number of labour seats to be filled in the manner proposed in (F) below. It further suggests that labour should be given sixteen seats, which is equivalent to 10 per cent. of the total number of seats for British India, and that in no case should they be less than those given to Europeans as a community and other capital interests, if any.

(D) Indian States' Representation.—The representation of the Indian States in both the Houses of the Federal Legislature should be by election. The Federation is opposed to the proposal in the White Paper that the State's representatives "will be appointed by the Rulers of the State-Members of the Federation." There are to-day a few Indian States which have their Legislative Councils on an elective basis and others will follow suit if the principle of election is insisted upon by His Majesty's Government. Otherwise, the Federal Legislature will be a hybrid product consisting of nominated members from the Indian States and elected members from British India—a combination which will affect seriously the efficient working of the Legislature and render difficult the passage of any popular legislation.

Closely allied to the method of representation of the States there are two questions of importance which deserve consideration. One is the quantum of representation and the other is the sphere of their jurisdiction in the Federal Executive and Legislature. The Federation holds strongly that the States should be given representation in the Federal Legislature strictly on the population basis and no weightage is justified. It further holds that no representative of the States should be appointed a Federal Minister unless he is an elected—and not merely an appointed—member of the Legislature, and that the States' representatives should not be allowed to vote except on federal matters. If the Princes are going to be given the sole authority to define, in their Instruments of Accession, their powers and jurisdiction in respect of those matters which they are willing to recognise as federal, it is only logical that in the Federal Executive and Legislature their right of vote should be restricted only to such matters and there is no justification for allowing them to vote on purely British India subjects. The same remark should apply to motions of no confidence in the Federal Executive.

(E) Strength of Labour Representation in the Federal Assembly.—In the Federal Assembly labour should be given at least 10 per cent. of the total number of seats; and in no case should the number of seats for labour be less than that given to capital as a whole, including commerce and industry, landholders and Europeans as a community. The table attached (Appendix B) to this Memorandum indicates the approximate size of the working class population, a vast majority of which, under the franchise qualifications recommended by the White Paper, will go not only without representation, but also without a vote. It is, therefore, urged that the representation given to labour should be adequate enough to safeguard the interests of the working classes in India. The 10 seats allotted to labour, which work out at only 4 per cent. of the total seats from British India, are too inadequate to enable its representatives to discharge their duties efficiently and satisfactorily. The Federation, therefore, insists that labour should be given 25 seats in the Federal Assembly.

Another point of considerable importance is that labour representation should not be less than that given to capital as a whole. The Franchise Committee recognised the principle of equality of representation between labour on the one hand and commerce and industry on the other and, therefore, recommended "a number which will give it (labour) a representation equal in strength to that proposed in the case of commerce" (page 169, para. 422). While the Federation acknowledges the partial recognition by the Committee of the equality of claim as between labour and commerce and industry, it holds that a correct and a fairer comparison would have been between labour and capital as a whole. It has already been pointed out in paragraph (C) of this Memorandum that the Federation considers the representation given to Europeans as a community to be, for all practical purposes, a commercial and industrial representation; and it needs no arguments to prove that landholders also are a capitalist interest. It may be added here that labour has a far more direct interest in and concern with the work of the Federal Legislature than landholders. The experience of the last thirteen years has shown that the representatives of commerce and industry, landholders and Europeans have often combined in opposing legislative measures affecting working class interests. To compare, therefore, labour representation with only a part of the entire capitalist interests is, in the opinion of the Federation, to place the former at a serious disadvantage. And even the partial equality of representation recommended by the Lothian Committee has been destroyed by the White Paper by recommending 11 seats to commerce and industry as against only 10 for labour. Under the White Paper proposals the representation for capital and labour in the Federal Assembly is as follows:—

| Representation to Capital. | | | | Labour
Representation. |
|----------------------------|-------------|------------|--------|---------------------------|
| Commerce and Industry. | Landholders | Europeans. | Total. | |
| 11 | 7 | 8 | 26 | 10 |

The disparity between the representation given to these two special interests is very glaring and should be removed by increasing the labour seats to 25—which means one seat less than the number allotted to capital.

(F) Method of electing Labour Representatives.—Labour seats in the Federal Upper House should be filled by an electoral college consisting of labour representatives of the Provincial Legislatures by the method of the single transferable vote. This is the method which the White Paper has recommended for electing representatives of Europeans, Indian Christians and Anglo-Indians, and the Federation would urge its adoption in the case of labour representatives as well. For the Federal Lower House the election for labour seats should be by an electoral college or colleges consisting of the representatives of registered trade unions, and the allocation of these seats should be based primarily on an industrial basis with due regard to the claims of the different provinces. It is inexplicable why the White Paper should contain definite proposals for the method of representation of commercial and capitalist organisations and leave those in regard to labour open to further consideration. Appendix II (page 75) of the White Paper dealing with the Assembly says that "the special seats allotted to labour will be filled from non-communal constituencies; the electoral arrangements have still to be determined"; while Appendix III, Part I, dealing with the Provincial Legislative Assemblies, after repeating the above remarks, adds: "but it is likely that in most Provinces the labour constituencies will be partly trade union and partly special constituencies" (page 78). The absence of any definite indication in the case of the Federal Assembly has created serious apprehensions about the intention of His Majesty's Government with regard to this matter. If they decide to set aside the recommendations of such authoritative bodies as the Royal Commission on Indian Labour and the Indian Franchise Committee which had given considerable thought to the subject of labour representation, the Federation fails to understand which other authority they propose to accept for determining the electoral arrangements. The Whitley Commission says on page 464 of its report:—

"If special representation is to be given to industrial labour, the method which, in our view, is most likely to be effective in securing the return to the legislatures of the best representatives of labour is that of election by registered trade unions. The working of this method should also exercise an important influence on the healthy development of trade unionism."

The Lothian Committee, after carefully considering the alternative methods of (1) election through trade unions, (2) special labour constituencies, and (3) the combination of both, unanimously decided in favour of the first method, namely, election through trade unions (page 170, paragraph 423). The argument that trade unions are at present too weak and, therefore, not sufficiently representative of the working classes, is sometimes advanced only to prejudice their case and is not convincing. In the first place, it should be noted that labour representation has been recognised only as being functional, and, therefore, is not based upon the numerical strength of the trade unions. Secondly, if institutional representation is to be given to capital, irrespective of the numerical strength of the commercial and industrial organisations, there is no reason why labour should not also be similarly treated. Thirdly, considerations other than that of numbers are sometimes taken into account in giving representation to communities such as to Europeans, and it is difficult to understand why a similar consideration should not be extended to the working classes and their trade unions. The Federation, therefore, strongly urges that, as recommended by the Whitley Commission and the Lothian Committee, trade unions only should be made constituencies for electing labour representatives to the Federal Lower House.

Equally important is the question of the distribution of labour seats. The Whitley Commission suggested, on page 464 of its report, that "where more than one seat was allotted to labour, the unions could either be grouped for the purpose in separate constituencies, possibly according to industries, or they could elect the members jointly." The Lothian Committee also stated (page 170, paragraph 424) that "it has been suggested to us that the following interests deserve special consideration.—jute, transport (including railways), textiles, seamen, planting and mining." These quotations indicate that these two authorities showed an inclination in favour of the distribution of labour seats on an industrial basis, and the Federation supports that view, though it recognises that the claims of the provinces should not be lost sight of. If the number of labour seats is sufficiently increased to the extent recommended in this Memorandum, it should not be difficult to divide the seats on an industrial basis, without, at the same time, giving any ground to the provinces for complaint. The advantage in preferring an industrial basis combined with provincial claims to the White Paper proposal is that the Legislature will be able to secure the best men belonging, as trade union officials or members, to important trades and industries and possessing an adequate knowledge of the working conditions therein, so as to enable them to speak with authority and information when labour questions are discussed. Again, there are certain industries and trades, such as textiles and railways, which are distributed over more than one province; and if the seats are distributed only on a provincial basis, the result may either be that there will be over-representation of some trades and industries to the disadvantage of others and, what is more important, there is a risk of some of the best men not being returned at all. It is, therefore, urged that the provincial basis adopted in the White Paper (last column of the Table, Appendix II, page 76) should be so altered as to secure labour representation on an industrial basis with due regard to provincial considerations.

It may be pointed out further that the White Paper has given (Table of Appendix II, page 76) only one non-provincial seat to labour to be filled by its central organisation, as against three given to commerce and industry. This is unfair and should be remedied by giving labour the same number of seats as are given to commerce and industry. The Franchise Committee has recommended (page 170, para. 424) that the All-India Trade Union Federation (now the National Trades Union Federation) should be given one seat. The Federation suggests that this number should be increased at least to the same number as has been and may be given to commerce and industry, and that the claims of the All-India Railwaymen's Federation should also be recognised for this purpose.

(G) Franchise for the Federal Assembly.

—The franchise for the general and communal seats in the Federal Assembly should be the same as that for the future provincial Legislative Councils. The Franchise Committee was not unanimous on this question, and the minute of dissent to the report of that Committee, signed by Messrs. S. B. Tambe, C. Y. Chintamani and R. R. Bakhale, has dealt fully with the objections raised by the majority of the Committee against adopting a common franchise for the Federal Assembly and the Provincial Councils, and made out a strong case in support of a common franchise (page 228, paras. 38-39). The Federation whole-heartedly supports the view in the minute of dissent and urges that a common franchise should be adopted for the Federal Assembly and for the Provincial Councils.

As regards the qualifications for voters and candidates from trade union constituencies for the Provincial Legislatures and the Federal Assembly, the Federation supports the proposals contained in paragraphs 247, 248, 249 and 423 of the Indian Franchise Committee's Report.

(H) Provincial Second Chambers.—The Federation is opposed to the establishment of Second Chambers in any of the Provinces in India. It should be noted that the Franchise Committee refrained from making any specific recommendation in their favour. But the minority of the Committee in its minute of dissent (page 227, para. 35) emphatically opposed the establishment of provincial Second Chambers. The arguments against the Federal Upper House apply with equal force to provincial Second Chambers and the Federation strongly supports the view of the minority of the Lothian Committee in this respect. The Federation is aware that the White Paper proposes the establishment of Second Chambers only for Bengal, Bihar and the U.P. On the first-named of these provinces a Second Chamber has been thrust in spite of the clear and emphatic verdict of the Legislative Council against its establishment. The Federation takes strong exception to the proposal in the White Paper (page 48, para. 74 (b)), that at any time, not less than 10 years after the commencement of the Constitution Act, any legislature can present an address to His Majesty praying that it be endowed with two Chambers, and proposes that this provision should be deleted.

If, however, it is decided to retain Second Chambers in any of the provinces, labour should be given adequate and effective representation therein. Apart from one seat reserved in the Bengal Council (Upper Chamber) for Europeans as a community (Part II, Appendix III, page 78), which is really a seat given to European commerce and industry, there are, as has already been pointed out, 10, 9 and 5 nominated seats respectively in the Bengal, U.P. and Bihar Upper Chambers; and it may be that some of these seats may go to capitalist interests, including commerce and industry. Labour has thus a claim for special representation. Again, the Federal and Provincial Legislatures have concurrent jurisdiction over labour legislation, and subjects like health insurance, old age and invalidity pensions are included among exclusively provincial subjects. Labour will thus be considerably handicapped if it has no representatives in the Second Chambers which will be predominantly conservative and contain representatives in large numbers of vested interests. As the Whitley Commission has pointed out on page 462, "the presence of representatives able to voice the desires and aspirations of labour, and to translate these into concrete proposals is essential for the proper consideration of measures specially affecting labour." The Federation, therefore, claims that labour is entitled to adequate and effective representation, as indicated in (I) below, in Second Chambers wherever they may be established.

(I) Strength of Labour Representation in Provincial Legislatures.—In the Provincial Legislatures (Lower and Upper where the latter exist), labour should be given at least 10 per cent. of the total number of seats; and in no case should the number of seats for labour be less than that given to capital as a whole, including commerce and industry, landholders and Europeans as a community. In the Bengal, U.P. and Bihar Second Chambers, the number of seats allotted to labour on the 10 per cent. basis, will come to 7, 6 and 3 respectively. As regards the Provincial Lower Chambers, the Federation desires to point out the equality of representation between labour and commerce and industry, recognised by the Lothian Committee in all the provinces, except Bengal and Assam, has been disturbed by the White Paper in the case of two other provinces, viz., Bihar and Sind, by giving labour 3 and 1 seats respectively, as against 4 and 2 to commerce and industry; and further, that the inequality in Bengal and Assam has been accentuated by increasing the seats for commerce and industry from 15 to 19 in the case of Bengal, and from 6 to 11 in the case of Assam. The Federation takes very strong exception to this treatment meted out to labour and urges that not only should these inequalities be removed, but also that labour should be put on a footing of equality, not merely with commerce and industry, but with capitalist interests as a whole, including landholders and Europeans. The Franchise Committee had recommended 38 seats to labour in all the provinces, as against 46 to commerce and industry. The White Paper has increased the disparity by giving 56 seats to the latter. The disparity looks still more marked when the seats for landholders and Europeans are added to commerce and industry, as may be seen from the following table:—

| Province. | Representation to Capital | | | | Labour Representation. |
|---------------------------|---------------------------|--------------|------------|--------|------------------------|
| | Commerce and Industry. | Landholders. | Europeans. | Total. | |
| 1. Madras | 6 | 6 | 3 | 15 | 6 |
| 2. Bombay | 7 | 2 | 3 | 12 | 7 |
| 3. Bengal | 19 | 5 | 11 | 35 | 8 |
| 4. U.P. | 3 | 6 | 2 | 11 | 3 |
| 5. Punjab | 1 | 5 | 1 | 6 | 3 |
| 6. Bihar | 4 | 4 | 2 | 10 | 3 |
| 7. C.P. | 2 | 3 | 1 | 6 | 2 |
| 8. Assam | 11 | 0 | 1 | 12 | 4 |
| 9. N.W.F. Province | 0 | 2 | 0 | 2 | 0 |
| 10. Sind | 2 | 2 | 2 | 6 | 1 |
| 11. Orissa | 1 | 2 | 0 | 3 | 1 |
| Total | 56 | 37 | 26 | 119 | 38 |

If labour seats are increased from 38 to 119, it will have no ground for complaint that it has been treated unfairly in comparison with capital. The Federation, however, claims that, because of its numerical strength and importance, labour is entitled to 10 per cent. representation. On this calculation it should get the following number of seats for each province.—

| Province. | Labour Representation. |
|---------------------------|------------------------|
| 5. Punjab | 17 |
| 6. Bihar | 15 |
| 7. C.P. | 11 |
| 8. Assam | 11 |
| 9. N.W.F. Province | 5 |
| 10. Sind | 6 |
| 11. Orissa | 6 |
| Total | 157 |

| Province. | Labour Representation. |
|------------------|------------------------|
| 1. Madras | 21 |
| 2. Bombay | 17 |
| 3. Bengal | 25 |
| 4. U.P. | 23 |

These two tables show that if the second table is accepted, as it should be, labour will get more seats than capital. But it must be remembered that capital will secure some more seats than those allotted to it, through general constituencies, while labour has hardly any such chance.

19^o July, 1933.]

(J) Method of Election.—As in the case of the Federal Assembly, so also in the case of the Provincial Legislatures (including Upper Chambers, should any be established) the labour seats should be filled by constituencies formed of the members of registered trade unions, preferably on an industrial basis. The White Paper says on page 78 (Appendix III, Part I) that “it is likely that in most Provinces the labour constituencies will be partly trade union and partly special constituencies.” If this indication is not made more specific, there is, in the opinion of the Federation, a risk of the local authorities which are not, generally speaking, friendly to labour, preferring special to trade union constituencies, and the object of securing labour representation will be, to a large extent, defeated. The Federation urges that preference should be given to trade union over special constituencies, and that only where trade unions do not exist or are too weak, not necessarily from the numerical point of view, special constituencies may be set up. In urging this claim, the Federation has the support of both the Whitley Commission and the Lothian Committee. The former in its report (464) says that “we recognise that this (the trade union) method may not be everywhere applicable under present conditions, and if it was found to be impracticable in any case, recourse would be necessary for a time to some other method (italics ours). In Assam, for instance, where more effective representation of plantation workers is required, different methods will be necessary”. The Franchise Committee makes the position equally clear when it says on page 97, para. 246:—

“As we have already indicated, subject always to the conditions laid down by the Royal Commission, we are prepared to accept the proposals of a number of provinces for the establishment of trade union seats in their legislatures, and this action will no doubt give an impetus to the development of unions of a satisfactory character. It would, however, in our view be contrary to the interests of the labouring population as a whole to prescribe representation through trade unions as the sole method of representation of labour and to offer them no alternative. There are cases where trade unions do not exist, or are too weak to be entrusted with the function of representation In these circumstances, there is a real risk that, in the absence of any alternative, a large body of industrial labour might, for a considerable time, fail to secure any representation other than that which it might be able to obtain through the general constituencies. We think, therefore, that it is necessary to provide, in addition, another form of representation through special labour constituencies of the type described in paragraph 250”.

It is thus clear that both the Whitley Commission and the Franchise Committee suggest the other form of representation only in those cases where trade unions do not exist or are too weak to be entrusted with that function. This is quite different from saying that labour representation will be partly through trade union and partly through special constituencies. It should be made clear that the labour seats would be filled only through trade union constituencies, and special constituencies may be set up only at those places where trade unions do not exist. The Federation draws the attention of the Joint Select Committee to the opinion of the Franchise Committee that “we wish to emphasise the extreme importance of avoiding any overlapping between trade union and special labour constituencies, whether in the same industry or in the same geographical area” (page 99, para. 253). This recommendation is highly important and should be accepted by His Majesty's Government. As regards the formation of trade union constituencies, the Federation considers that it should not be difficult to form them on an industrial basis, as no question of inter-provincial claims arises as in the case of representation for the Federal Assembly.

(K) Franchise for Provincial Legislatures.—Adult franchise should be the basis of election for the provincial legislatures. The Federation is aware that the Franchise Committee rejected adult franchise on many grounds, one of which was the administrative difficulty that might be experienced in preparing the electoral rolls and managing the elections through vast electorates. As adult franchise is now the accepted goal to be reached as early as possible, the administrative difficulty must be faced sooner or later; at least a beginning in that direction should be made—which can be done by adopting the suggestion of the minority of the Lothian Committee, viz., the introduction of adult franchise in all cities with a population of 100,000 and above. The number of such cities is not more than 30 in the whole country. Such a beginning will familiarise administrative officers and the public with the system, thereby facilitating its early extension over larger areas, with the ultimate object of reaching adult franchise as quickly as possible.

If, however, universal adult franchise is not immediately introduced the Federation insists upon a wage-earning qualification being included in the general scheme of franchise. The case in favour of this proposal has been ably argued by the minority of the Lothian Committee in its minute of dissent from which the following extract (with which the Federation is in complete accord) is taken:—

“In paragraph 68 of the report, it is stated that property has been taken as the main foundation of the franchise and that the property qualification has been lowered so as to bring on the roll the great bulk of the landholders, the tenants and the urban rent-payers and a considerable section of the poorer classes. The omission here of wage-earners will be noticed. Yet, following the recommendation in this behalf of the Franchise Sub-Committee of the Round Table Conference, the questionnaire issued by our own Committee invited witnesses to understand the term “property” “in its widest sense as including . . . wages, whether in cash or coin.” The considerations given to the subject of labour representation and the special recommendations on behalf of the Depressed Classes do not make up for the omission to recognise wages as one of the general qualifications for franchise. The numbers affected are vast. Including agricultural and non-agricultural labour, the total in the nine Governors' provinces is no less than 48,755,382 out of an aggregate population of 254,955,378. That is, about 20 per cent. of the whole. In some provinces “agricultural labourers” are actually more in number than “tenants”, for example, in Madras, Bombay, Bengal and the Central Provinces. Those who are not adults being left out, the numbers affected are still very large. Almost every Local Government and Provincial Committee have admitted that their proposals for the extension of the franchise leave out very large numbers of these, the poorest of the people. This has been sought to be justified on the two grounds that there are practical difficulties and that many of these labourers are themselves, tenants or sub-tenants and will, therefore, come in under these categories. We do not know to what extent the two are mixed up in the separate columns of tenants and labourers, but we cannot think that more than a small fraction of the large numbers of agricultural labourers are also tenants. As regards practical difficulties, they do not exist in the case of organised occupations, while they are far from being insurmountable in respect of others. Besides, a wage census is both practicable and desirable. In our opinion, every labourer, rural or urban, who has been in receipt of wages of Rs. 10 a month, or its equivalent in kind continuously for the six months preceeding the preparation of the electoral roll, should be brought on the register.

(L) Power of passing Labour Legislation.—The Federal and Provincial Legislatures should have concurrent power of passing labour legislation. The Federal labour laws should be made applicable to all the units of the Federation, including the Indian States. The Federation is aware that List III (page 111) of Appendix VI of the White Paper invests the Federal and Provincial Legislatures with concurrent powers over labour subjects, such as (1) regulation of the working of mines, but not including mineral development, (2) regulation of the working of factories, (3) employers' liability and workmen's compensation, (4) trade unions, (5) welfare of labour, including provident funds and industrial insurance, and (6) settlement of labour disputes. This provision is, in theory, satisfactory so far as it goes, since it ensures the greatest possible measure of uniformity in labour legislation. But the utility of this provision is very considerably marred by a serious qualification which occurs in para. 111 (page 56) of the White Paper. It says:—

“Laws so made (by the Federal Legislature) will be operative throughout British India, but in the States which have acceded to the Federation only in so far as the Ruler of the State has by his Instrument of Accession accepted the subject with which the law is concerned as a Federal subject.”

This qualification makes a grave deduction from the powers of the Federal Legislature, if the application of Federal labour laws to the Indian States is to be made dependent upon the Ruler of each individual State—a proposition which puts British India at a great disadvantage, apart from the lack of any protection to labour in the States. Industries are rapidly developing in some of the Indian States, and British India has already begun to feel the effects of unfair competition between those States where there is hardly any labour legislation or little or no administration of such legislation, if any, and British India where labour legislation has made some headway in recent years. The competitive character of present day industries makes uniformity of labour legislation essential. And if this is not achieved under the new Constitution, the pace of labour legislation, even for British India, cannot but slow down. The Federation urges that labour legislation should be made applicable to all the units of the Federation.

When many of the labour subjects, such as those stated above, are made both Federal and Provincial, the Federation is surprised to find that such important subjects as health insurance, invalidity and old age pensions should be made in the White Paper (No. 69, List II, Appendix VI, page 109) exclusively provincial subjects. It is difficult to appreciate the discrimination that has been made between one set of labour subjects and another. In fact, health insurance, old age and invalidity pensions are subjects predominantly of a national character and importance and, therefore, deserve to be made federal subjects. They are social services for which either the employers, or the State, or both will have to contribute towards their maintenance and administration. If they are made exclusively provincial subjects, the employers, on the ground of costs which will not be borne by their competitors in other provinces, and the Provincial Governments, on the ground of inadequacy of funds, may not agree to pass legislation of this kind, and Indian workers will not have the benefits of health insurance and old age and invalidity pensions. The Federation, therefore, strongly urges that these subjects, in fact, all labour subjects, should be both Federal and Provincial.

(M) Ratification of I.L.O. Conventions.—The Federal Government should possess the power of ratifying the Conventions and Recommendations of the International Labour Organisation without taking the consent of the federating units separately. It may be pointed out that under Article 405, Part XIII, of the Peace Treaty, “in the case of a federal State, the power of which to enter into conventions on labour matters is subject to limitations, it shall be in the discretion of that Government to treat a draft convention to which such limitations apply as a recommendation only.” It will thus be seen that a federal State escapes more easily from its international obligations on labour matters. The practical effect of this Article of the Peace Treaty to the disadvantage of the workers may be judged from the fact, which Mr. Joshi pointed out at the first Round Table Conference, that, while even a backward country like India, under a unitary form of Government, could ratify eleven Conventions of the International Labour Conference, advanced countries like Australia and Canada, under a federal form of Government, have ratified only four Conventions each. To remove this limitation of a Federal Government, it is essential to make a specific provision in the Constitution Act that the Federal Government shall possess the power of ratifying the I.L.O. Conventions without having to take the consent of the federating units separately; and the Federation urges upon such a provision being made.

4. With regard to some of the other proposals contained in the White Paper, the following observations are offered:—

(a) A definite date should be fixed for the inauguration of the Federation. It is very unsatisfactory that the White Paper does not contemplate this. There is no need for fresh Parliamentary action before the Federation can begin to function.

(b) In order to prevent friction between the two halves of the Government and to promote a sense of collective responsibility among members of the Executive, the Prime Minister must be consulted before the appointment of Ministers and Counsellors.

(c) The salary of the Financial Adviser should be subject to the vote of the Federal Assembly.

(d) There should be a separate Department of Labour in charge of a Member of the Cabinet, in view of the many problems concerning labour that are awaiting solution.

(e) There should be specified in the Constitution a date by which the provisions of the Statute of Westminster will apply to India. The period of transition being thus fixed, it should be laid down that the control of Parliament will be strictly limited to the field of reserved subjects through the Secretary of State for the Dominions.

(f) There is no need whatsoever for entrusting the Governor-General with such vast powers in regard to his "special responsibilities." Such a provision gives him (and, correspondingly, to Governors of Provinces) immense authority over practically the whole field of administration which seems easily capable of being abused, and this will seriously interfere with the growth of responsibility.

(g) With regard to Defence, there should be a scheme prepared for the nationalisation of the army within a fixed period of time and for the complete withdrawal of British troops from India; recruitment to the Indian Army should be open to all classes and in all provinces. Arrangements should be made from time to time, during the period of transition, for a revision of military expenditure in which representatives of the Federal Legislature shall have an effective voice. The Federal Assembly should have the right of discussing the whole of the Defence policy of the Government, including expenditure, and of voting funds in excess of the amount agreed upon.

(h) The strength of the Federal Assembly should be increased at least to 450, the Indian States being entitled to representation only on the basis of population without weightage.

(i) The Federal Executive should be responsible only to the Assembly and not to both Houses.

(j) The Federal Upper House should not have the power of considering demands for grants and Money Bills. Its powers over ordinary legislation should be recommendatory and not co-equal with those of the Assembly.

(k) The Governor-General should not have power to recommend the passing of a Bill or part of a Bill in any particular form, or that a Bill or any part of it should not be proceeded with, or of certifying a measure so as to make it a law without the consent of the Legislature. Nor should the Governor-General have power to certify a demand or any part of a demand, or to restore a grant, after it has been rejected by the Assembly.

(l) The proposals in the White Paper are seriously defective in that they do not include provision for the alteration of the Constitution, and therefore, as they stand, there is no room for automatic growth towards full responsibility.

(m) The Constitution should also contain a provision for a periodical extension of the franchise so as to reach universal adult suffrage within a specified period of time.

(n) The emergency powers of the Governor-General for making and promulgating Ordinances (in paragraph 53 of the Proposals) together with the provisions for what will be known as "the Governor-General's

19^o July, 1933.]

Acts," endow him with autocratic powers, over both the Federal Executive and the Federal Legislature, of so sweeping a character that it is impossible to see what is left of responsibility.

(o) With regard to Governor's Provinces, practically the same observations apply to the executive, legislative, financial and administrative proposals as to the Federation. "Provincial autonomy" will be reduced to a shadow without any reality, if the safeguards and emergency powers are brought into operation.

(p) The proposals in paragraphs 106 to 109, in regard to "Excluded and Partially Excluded Areas," are open to grave objection. It is not clear why power should be retained for declaring any area within a province to be wholly or partially excluded and taking it out of the jurisdiction of both the Federal and the Provincial Legislatures. It obviously is not meant to cover the so-called backward tracts, because an area cannot suddenly become backward after the inauguration of the Constitution. It will be open under these proposals for the Governor of a Province to declare a particular district or districts as an excluded area, and to prohibit the discussion of resolutions and even the asking of questions in the Federal and Provincial Legislatures pertaining to that area. Such a power is dangerous and liable to gross abuse.

(q) With regard to the so-called backward tracts, it is wrong to deny millions of aborigines and hill tribes the right of direct and effective representation and participation in the work of the Legislatures; where special organisations of their own exist, they may be given the right of electing their representatives, both to the Provincial and the Federal Legislatures.

(r) There is danger in the proposal in paragraph 122 of the White Paper regarding discriminatory legislation in that the proviso which grants the Governor-General or the Governor of a Province power to declare valid a discriminatory measure in the interests of peace and tranquillity may be used for penalising members of a particular community or race or an economic class.

(s) If political power is really intended to be transferred to the people of India subject only to transitional safeguards, there is no need for the appointment of the Secretary of State's advisers. Parliamentary control over the reserved subjects may be exercised through the Secretary of State for the Dominions.

(t) It would be anomalous and extremely undesirable that under the new Constitution the Secretary of State should have any control over recruitment to the Civil, Police or any other service. All power over the services, in regard to recruitment, discipline, pay, pensions, etc., should be vested hereafter in the Federal Government in the case of the All-India services and in the Provincial Government's in the case of the provincial services.

(u) Considering the importance of the railway system in the economic structure of India, the many thousands of workers that are engaged in the railways, it is not right that the Federal Legislature's control over the policy and administration of railways should in any way be weakened by the creation of a Statutory Railway Board. Such a Board may be brought into existence by an Act of the Federal Legislature and should contain an adequate number of labour representatives.

5. This Memorandum has dealt mainly with such of the proposals in the White Paper as are of direct or indirect concern to labour, and does not claim to cover the entire field. The inauguration of a Constitution on the lines of the White Paper will bring no relief to the Indian workers, and they are one with other sections of public opinion in India in condemning the proposals as reactionary. The Federation earnestly trusts that the Joint Parliamentary Committee will so amend the proposals as to make them acceptable to the workers of India, and thus encourage them to seek their happiness and prosperity through action under the new Constitution.

APPENDIX A.

Resolution on the White Paper.

(a) "This Special Session of the Indian Trades Union Federation is of opinion that the Proposals of His Majesty's Government for Indian Constitutional Reform embodied in the White Paper of

19^o Julii, 1933.]

March 18, 1933, are disappointing, undemocratic and even reactionary in certain essential and fundamental respects. They hold out no prospects of the Indian masses and the working classes ever securing an adequate and effective voice and control in the legislatures and administration of the country. They contain less of transfer of power from the British into the Indian hands and more of reservations and safeguards which breathe the spirit of distrust of Indians, and are not only not 'demonstrably in the interests of India,' but are much more in the interests of the United Kingdom."

(b) "This Federation desires to emphasise that no scheme of reforms can meet the requirements of the Indian masses and the working classes, or satisfy their legitimate aspirations or allay the present political and economic discontent, which is not designed to endow India with the status of a self-governing democratic country and it urges that if the proposals of reform are to achieve any purpose, they should be so liberalised as to bring them into conformity with democratic constitutions of self-governing countries, only the irreducible minimum of reservations being made for a short transitional period to be fixed by statute."

(c) "This Federation insists upon the following, among other, proposals being incorporated in the scheme of reforms:—

(1) The Constitution Act should contain a declaration of fundamental rights guaranteeing to the workers, inter alia, the freedom of speech, freedom of press, freedom of association, the right to strike, the right to work and provision against old age, invalidity, etc.

(2) The Federation is opposed to the principle of nomination and wants all the future legislatures in India to be constituted on the principle of election.

(3) The Federation is opposed to the establishment of the Federal Upper House. If, however, it is to be retained, Indian labour should be given adequate and effective representation thereon.

(4) The representation of the Princes in both the Houses of the Federal Legislature should be by election.

(5) In the Federal Assembly, labour should be given at least 10 per cent. of the total number of seats; and in no case should the number of seats for labour be less than that given to capital as a whole including commerce and industry, landholders and Europeans as a community.

(6) Labour seats in the Federal Upper House should be filled by an electoral college consisting of the labour representatives of the Provincial Legislatures by the method of the single transferable vote. The labour seats in the Federal Lower House should be filled by the electoral college or colleges of the representatives of registered trade unions, based preferably on industrial basis with due regard to the claims of the different provinces.

(7) The franchise for the general and communal seats in the Federal Assembly should be the same as that for the future Provincial Legislative Councils.

(8) The Federation is opposed to the establishment of Second Chambers in any of the provinces in India. If, however, they are to be retained, Indian labour should be given adequate and effective representation thereon.

(9) In the Provincial Legislatures (Lower and Upper where the latter exist) labour should be given at least 10 per cent. of the total number of seats; and in no case should the number of seats for labour be less than that given to capital as a whole, including commerce and industry, landholders and Europeans as a community.

(10) The labour seats in the Provincial Legislatures should be filled by constituencies formed of the members of the registered trade unions, preferably on industrial basis.

(11) Adult suffrage should be the basis of franchise for provincial legislatures. If, however, that may not be possible, the Federation insists upon wage earning qualification being included in the general scheme of franchise.

(12) The Federal and Provincial Legislatures should have concurrent power of passing labour legislation with a proviso in the Constitution Act that the federal legislation shall prevail over the provincial legislation. The federal labour laws should be made applicable to all the units of the Federation, including the Indian States. This Federation protests against the proposal in the White

ROY CHOWDHURY and Mr. N. M. JOSHI.

Paper to make health insurance and invalidity and old age pensions an exclusively provincial subject, they should be made both federal and provincial subjects.

(13) The Federal Government should possess the power of ratifying the Conventions and Recommendations of the International Labour Organisation without having to take the consent of the federating units separately.

(d) "This Federation records its strong conviction that the White Paper Proposals, as they stand at present, cannot satisfy the legitimate aspirations of the Indian people and will, far from appeasing and allaying discontent, aggravate the present unhappy conditions, will further alienate public opinion and greatly intensify the present acute and widespread discontent. A generous and far-reaching measure of reforms granting substantial power to the masses and the working classes will alone meet India's requirements and satisfy the national self-respect of India."

(e) "This Federation authorises the General Secretary to inform the Joint Select Committee and the Government of India that its representatives should be given facilities to appear before the Joint Select Committee to give evidence on behalf of this Federation and it appoints for this purpose Messrs. N. M. Joshi, M.L.A., Aftab Ali and B. Shiva Rao to form its delegation. The General Secretary is further authorised to send a copy of the resolution on White Paper to the Joint Select Committee and the Government of India and prepare, in consultation with the President, a detailed memorandum on the lines of the resolution to be submitted to the Joint Parliamentary Committee."

B404. Mr. Aftab Ali, you are a Vice-President of the National Trades Union Federation?—(Mr. Aftab Ali.) Yes.

B405. I understand you have been Secretary to the Bengal Trades Union Federation since 1931?—Yes.

B406. And you have been General Secretary of the Indian Seamen's Union, Calcutta, since 1928?—Yes.

B407. Mr. Chowdhury, you are, I think, representing the Bengal Trades Union Federation?—(Mr. Chowdhury.) Yes.

B408. You are a Vice-President of the Bengal Trades Union Federation?—Yes.

B409. You are Labour Member of the Bengal Legislative Council, and a Member of the Executive Committee of the National Trades Union Federation?—Yes, and I was a Delegate to the International Labour Conference in 1923.

(Memorandum No. 55 is handed in and is as follows):

MEMORANDUM 55. THE BENGAL TRADES UNION FEDERATION.

Containing the British Government Proposals on Indian Constitutional Reform from the point of view of Representatives of workers employed in large industrial undertakings in Bengal, viz., Jute, Maritime, Transport, Engineering, etc., addressed to the Members of the Joint Select Committee, House of Lords, London, by Bengal Trades Union Federation as per the letter dated 24th April, 1933, of Mr. Aftab Ali, Gen. Secretary of the Federation and of the Indian Seamen's Union, Calcutta and Indian Workers' Delegate, International Labour Conference, held at Geneva in June, 1933, submitted to the Joint Committee through the Government of Bengal, nominating Mr. K. C. Roy Chowdhury, Vice President of the Federation (Labour Representative, Bengal Legislative Council and Calcutta Corporation, Indian Workers' Delegate International Labour Conference, Geneva, 1923, ex-assessor, International Court of Justice, Labour Branch, Geneva, member of Bengal Provincial Franchise Committee and ex-member, Amalgamated Society of Engineers, Manchester) as a witness to give evidence before the Joint Select Committee, and invited by cable from London No. 104 dated 19th May, 1933, by the Secretary, Joint Select Committee.

This memorandum is based on the items transmitted to the Joint Select Committee on 24th April, 1933, and mainly deals with White Paper proposals as affecting Labour in Bengal.

1. Declaration of Fundamental Rights.—The socio-economic conditions of the poorer and working classes in India are indeed depressing. Manual labour according to time-honoured traditions and century-old practices is despised as menials' function (Coolie work). An honest peasant, living on the sweat of his brow is called a "Chotologue" (mean or low class fellow) in contrast with a Bhadrilogue (educated and gentlemanly class). There exists an in-born prejudice of upper and middle class Indians against manual labour which is often exploited, sweated, underpaid and is forced (compulsory labour or Begar is known throughout India and specially in Feudatory and Princes' states) and is robbed of its wages with impunity. It is necessary for its protection that certain Fundamental rights of the Working classes should be specifically declared enjoining that Indian Parliament should make suitable laws to ensure fair rent and fixity of tenure to agricultural tenants from whom industrial workers are recruited, for the maintenance of the health and fitness of workers, securing a minimum wage for them, the protection of motherhood, welfare of their children and the economic consequence of their old age, infirmity and unemployment.

19^o Julii, 1933.]

The Indian Parliament should also pass laws to ensure sanitary Housing for Industrial workers. A number of Committees and Commissions have described the Housing conditions in mill areas in and around Calcutta, Cawnpore, Ahmedabad, Bombay and other industrial cities as most appalling, productive of disease, debility and morbidity and consequent abnormal mortality of the workers and their infants as the following official statistics show.

Ahmedabad, the largest cotton mill centre outside Bombay Island has its Birth rate of 47, Death rate 50 per 1,000 and Infant mortality 331 per 1,000 infants born. Cawnpore, the industrial hub of United Provinces, has Birth rate 36, Death rate 52 and Infant mortality 420. Repeated recommendations of responsible Enquiry Committees to provide sanitary Dwellings for workers have been ignored by Municipalities, Public Bodies and Industrial Organisations.

Nothing short of Statutory obligations (Housing is a fundamental right in the German and other post-war constitutions) will remove this grave menace to the Indian workers' health. The Parliament should also enact for the creation of Industrial Councils in each industrial Province in India. The Whitley Labour Commission has made the following definite and specific recommendations regarding this important scheme to ensure industrial harmony. "In the framework of the future Constitution provision should be made for an organisation (the Industrial Council) which would enable representatives of employees, of employers of labour, and of Government to meet regularly in conference, to discuss labour measures and labour policy." The Federation disagrees with the views expressed on page 63 of the Proceedings of the Third Round Table Conference. "In the agenda of the Conference the question of fundamental rights was purposely linked up with the question of the powers of legislatures because it was felt that it had been insufficiently realised that the effect of inserting provisions of this kind in the Constitution must inevitably be (if they are to be more than an expression of a political ideal which have never yet found a place in English constitutional instruments) to place Statutory limitations to the powers of the new Legislatures."

This British conception of constitution will not hold water in an Oriental country like India, where social and socio-economic conditions of the poorer and working classes are positively different and where brutal practices exist that should be swept out of existence by Statutory instruments. All post-war constitutions for Germany, Zecko-Slavakia and even Ireland do include Fundamental Rights. However, if the Joint Committee is unable to re-open the question of Fundamental Rights of millions of India's working classes and masses whose trusteeship, under the new Constitution, is proposed to be transferred from the British Parliament to the Indian Legislatures, and if such rights cannot be fitted in with the act of Constitution, they should find a place in a Royal Proclamation or even in the instruments of instructions the Governor-General and the Governors will receive from the King.

2. Second Chambers.—(a) It is very doubtful if the Federal Upper House will benefit the working classes as the franchise for that House is restricted and will to a large extent ensure return of Representatives of moneyed and propertied classes traditionally antagonistic to aspirations of labour. If the Upper House is retained, the Bengal Federation strongly urges for a definite number of seats to be reserved for labour.

(b) Provincial Second Chamber in Bengal.—The same remarks apply. In fact the Bengal Legislative Council has by a small majority voted the Second Chamber down, although consensus of Hindu public opinion is not opposed to it. If it is retained and vested interests of landlords and moneyed classes were given representation as proposed in the White Paper, Labour should have at least four seats in the Second Chamber.

3. Labour Seats in Federal and Provincial Lower Houses.—(a) Bengal.—An unjust distinction between the relative importance of representation of labour and that of commerce and industry is proposed in the White Paper. Labour is to have only 8 seats, whereas the Employers are to have 19 seats. The Lothian Committee in para. 320 of its report says: "Functional representation is assuming increasing importance under modern conditions and the argument in favour of making special provisions for the presence in Legislative bodies of business and economic experts is in our judgment a strong one." Surely labour is functional and some of its Representatives in Councils, in Assembly, in International Labour Conferences, who have specialised in economics from the labour point of view have proved their capacity as exponents of labour economics. Owing to attraction of intellectuals towards Indian labour movement their number will increase and some "Philip Snowdens" and "Pethick Lawrences" will be forthcoming to represent labour in Indian Legislatures. Strong arguments in favour of increasing labour seats will be found in the note on "Special Electorate of Labour," by Mr. Roy Chowdhury, a member of the Bengal Provincial Franchise Committee, on page 248, vol. II, of the Lothian Report. The following statistics of wage earners in Bengal are taken from that note.

| (a) Operatives employed in registered factories, including 320,000 jute mill hands | 560,000 |
| (b) Seamen, including inland navigation | 120,000 |
| (c) Tea garden labour in Dooars, Terai, Dargeeling, Tippera and Chittagong | 90,000 |
| (d) Coal miners in Bundwan District | 45,000 |
| (e) Clerks | 60,000 |
| (f) Railwaymen (Bengal employees of the East Indian, Eastern Bengal, Arsam Bengal and Bengal Nagpur Railways systems and of Light Railways) | 120,000 |

In Bengal there are 28 registered Trade Unions with a membership of 75,756, including women (vide para. 245 of the Lothian Report). The combined membership of the following Employers' Organisations who are to return 19 members in Bengal Legislative Council under the White Paper proposals, hardly exceeds 3,000. The Bengal Chamber of Commerce, the Indian Jute Mills Association, the Indian Tea Association, the Indian Mining Federation, the Calcutta Trades Association, the Bengal National Chamber of Commerce, the Bengal Manajan Sabha, the Bengal Hardware Association and the Indian Mining Federation.

Arguments are frequently advanced by Employers that Indian labour movement is in its infancy as judged from the small number of trade unionists all over India. The Western conception of trade unionism based on mere numerical strength of paying membership does not apply in India. The present membership, say of Bengal, viz., 75,000 out of, say, one million industrial workers, would have been five or six times that number but for the opposition of employers to their workers joining unions and for the positive and determined resistance of jobbers and overseers who cannot tolerate the idea of losing their hold on men under them, their milk-cows yielding pecuniary gain to them, going out of their hands. There exists and will exist for some years to come, as was the case in Britain in the early sixties, the mortal fear in workers' minds of losing their jobs by joining unions. In spite of this and its deterrent effect on trade union membership, large bodies of workers employed, say, in the jute industry of Bengal or in shipping, do follow the directions and advice of their few honest trade union comrades flying the trade union flag in somewhat difficult circumstances. This applies with equal force to organisations other than labour, e.g., political, commercial, religious and communal bodies in India with poor paying membership but with strong following within their respective groups.

(b) Provincial Differentiation about Labour Seats.—It is most unfortunate that Bengal, admittedly the premier Industrial Province in India with 589,000 factory operatives (as per official return of 1929) and at least 500,000 more employed in Ocean and Inland Shipping, Printing Presses, Coal Mines, Tea gardens, Docks, etc., is allotted only eight seats, whereas Bombay Presidency with 366,029 factory operatives as per Official Return of 1929 and not even 100,000 employed in other organised industries is allotted seven seats and Madras with not even a fourth of Bengal's organised labour strength and of third class industrial importance is allotted six seats. No explanation is found anywhere in the Lothian or other Constitutional Reports regarding this inequitable weightage given to Bombay and Madras. The Bengal Trades Union Federation for reasons explained above claims at least twelve seats in the Lower House and four seats in the Upper Chamber of Bengal Legislative Council.

(c) Labour Seats at the Centre.—The Lothian Committee admits in para. 422 of its Report, "Under the new Constitution Labour will be to a large extent a central subject under the general control of the Federal Legislature, and it is of great importance in these circumstances to secure representation for it as a special interest in that body." The number of seats allotted to Labour in the Federal Assembly under the White Paper scheme, viz., ten, which cannot by any means be said to be adequate at all for representation of millions of Indian Industrial Labour.

In 1922, India obtained recognition by the League of Nations as one of the eight chief industrial States in the world, and India Office officially supplied the following informations to illustrate India's industrial importance. "28 millions agricultural workers, 141,000 Maritime workers, second only to that of the United Kingdom—over 20 million workers in industries, including cottage industries, Mines and Plantations, and Transport with Railway mileage in excess of that in every country except the United States." The Railways of India alone, according to official figures, employ very nearly a million workers, directly under the proposed Federal Government, Plantations nearly three quarters of a million, and All India Factories Report returns 1,553,169 Factory operatives in 1929 and Bengal with 589,860 factory labour leads all the other Provinces. The 10 seats allotted to Labour in the Federal Assembly works out at only 4 per cent. of 250 British India seats. Labour, according to the Lothian Report and to the White Paper proposals (Appendix VI), will be principally a central subject, and all Labour Legislations affecting one million Railway workmen, Air navigation, Inland Waterways, Maritime, Major Ports, Post, Telegraph, Telephone and Wireless Services will be exclusively Federal, and the Federal Legislature will have concurrent powers over working of Mines, Factories, Trade unions, welfare of Labour, and settlement of industrial disputes. Above all, and perhaps most important of all, that the Federal Government is given the power of ratification of Labour conventions and recommendations of the International Labour organisation constituted under the Treaty of Versailles.

All the facts stated above unmisstakably indicate that the future destiny of millions of Indian workers will lie in the hands of the Federal Legislators, and ten Labour seats out of 375, including 125 seats reserved for the nominees of the Princes, is hopelessly inadequate. The 125 nominees of the Princes, the Bengal Federation apprehends, may often form a solid block of opposition to many Central Labour Legislations, including International Conventions, for various reasons. The Western India (Bombay) Industrialists, owing to a persistent policy of Protection against British and foreign goods, are, with the financial assistance of some of the wealthy Princes, rapidly multiplying their factories. (This will be still more rapid under the new Constitution, imposing unrestricted Tariff freedom.) Their tendency is and will be selection of mill sites in Indian states adjoining Bombay Presidency, where Factory laws and other Labour laws, viz., Workmen's Compensation Act, do not operate, and where cotton and cheap and sweated labour are available, and the odds are very strong that they will influence through the Nominees of the Princes, formidable opposition to passing of humane labour laws and adoption of International Labour Conventions.

The Bengal Labour Federation strongly urges that Federal Labour seats should be increased from 10 to 15, and that at least four seats, instead of only two, proposed in the White Paper, should be given to Bengal. Here again Provincial jealousy, borne out by bare facts and figures, comes into play, and the Federation deplores that no justification exists for treating Bengal and Bombay on equal footing, or, in other words, giving Bombay a weightage, by allotting two

Labour seats for either of these Provinces. The larger industrial importance of Bengal over Bombay has already been touched. Labour statistics show that Bombay employs less than half of what Bengal employs. The second and still more important factor is that almost all the different varieties of India's important industries are produced in Bengal, and they require different types of Labour Legislations, e.g., Coal, Iron and Steel (two of the three Iron and Steel Works are in Bengal), Tea Plantations, Inland River Transport, a network of Light Railways, Jute Mills (the biggest of all industrial undertakings in India). None of these exist in Bombay. There is still another and most significant factor, viz., population. Bengal has 50 millions and Bombay only 18 millions, and it can be safely assumed that the proportion of the numerical strength of working classes in these two Provinces is commensurate with their population ratio. Hence from every point of view (political, statistical, economic and constitutional) Bengal is entitled to at least double the number of Labour seats at the Centre arbitrarily allotted to Bombay. This and other kinds of political partiality towards Bombay is deprecated and openly criticised by every Bengalee, be he a Hindu or a Moslem, a Liberal or an Extremist, and even by Government, excepting perhaps the Government of India and its fortunate Portegees representing Bombay interests in Committees and Councils.

4. Trade Unions as Special Labour Constituencies.—The Whitley Royal Commission on Labour recommended "It special representation is to be given to industrial labour, the method in our view is most likely to be effective in securing the return to the Legislatures of the best representatives of labour in that of election by registered trade unions." The Lothian Committee clarifies the position in para. 243 of its report. "We found in the course of our discussion with local Governments and Provincial Committees a readiness in the majority of cases to agree that where Trade unions in India are properly organised and reasonably representative they would, subject to the qualification proposed by the Royal Commission on Labour from a suitable basis for the special representation of labour." In para. 246 of the same report, "we are prepared to accept proposals of a number of Provinces for the establishment of Trade Union seats in their Legislatures, and this action will no doubt give impetus to the development of unions of a satisfactory character. It would, however, be in our view, contrary to the interests of the labouring classes as a whole to prescribe representation through Trade unions as the sole method and to offer them no alternatives. There are cases where Trade unions do not exist or are too weak to be entrusted with functions of representation. We think therefore that it is necessary to provide in addition another form of representation through special labour constituencies of the type described on page 250."

The Bengal Trades Union Federation fully endorse the above suggestions with the proviso that discrimination should be made between genuine trade unions and those unions formed and registered for political and personal purposes or unions subsequently captured by politicians or self-seekers. The history of our 12-year-old trade unionism in India is a chequered one. Mr. A. R. Burnett-Hurst, a Professor of History and Economics in a United Provinces College, who made a special study of Indian labour problems, says, "Trade unions have been led by professional lawyers and others who have not perhaps in all cases made a distinction between political and economic consideration." In the words of Professor Burnett-Hurst (vide page 523 of the Indian Year Book, 1932) "social workers did not take the initiative, but allowed the lawyer-politician to capture and control these bodies. Many of the so-called leaders of Indian labour were drawn from the lawyer-politician class, who often exploited the ignorance and credulity of labour force for their own material advantage or for the propagation of their own pet political doctrine in addition to looking after labour." The rise in 1920 and the fall of the All-India Trade Union Congress in 1929 or its capture by politicians and its conversion into a political weapon is a glaring example. There are many more instances of this kind of exploitation of labour unions, specially in Bombay, and a few in Bengal. That the so-called Trade Union Congress would be used as a tool by the politicians was almost anticipated since its creation in Bombay in 1920 by a politician or two, innocent of trade union experience and unconnected with a single labour union in India. The real objective was to secure free trips to Geneva and London as Indian Workers' Delegates and incidentally help labour to organise. Successive Presidents of this body were All-India political leaders. The bubble burst at Nagpur in 1929 and its books and papers were seized by the Communist agents of Bombay and the Revolutionaries who fomented strikes and sabotage and passed resolutions in favour of its affiliation with the League against Imperialism, boycott of the international labour organisations in Geneva. This body, some time after its inception, was rescued from self-seekers and utilised by trade union leaders for the good of labour and was recognised for some time by the Government of India as the sole medium for recruiting International Labour Delegates until its downfall at Nagpur. The actual workers, with some exception, had little or no idea about the functions of Geneva Conferences or about the activities of their delegates. Honest trade unionists had to secede from that body and they set up the All-India Labour Federation which, after functioning all right for the last three years, was suddenly changed in April last, at its Calcutta sitting, into the National Trade Union Federation to give it perhaps a national complexion. One or two prominent Bengal trade unionists strongly objected to this, apprehending a repetition of the former history. The Bengal Trades Union Federation is naturally opposed to the principle of the sole method of representation of Indian labour and to the grant of monopoly or charter to any particular labour organisation to return labour representatives.

This method may be possible when the movement attains vigour and when political influenza raging all over the country subsides and when self-seeking is eliminated and a genuine spirit of service to fellow-workers which characterises the British and other labour movements, is generated. Special labour constituencies, with the franchise proposed in the Lothian Report, paragraph 250, almost approaching adult suffrage as well as Trade union constituencies composed of trade union members should both be given a fair trial in the Provinces. There should be at least four seats allotted to the Upper Chamber in Bengal and a number of seats should be reserved in the Council of State for labour. The franchise for the Federal Assembly should be membership of registered unions and the constituency to be an electoral college of such members, although there is some danger that individual unions with very large paper membership may swamp the rest. There can be no objection to the proposal that franchise for non-trade union or special labour constituency should be based on wage-earning qualification irrespective of sex, with or without age limit or a prescribed period of employment.

In paragraph 247, the Lothian Committee suggests "that in order to qualify as an electoral unit for the purpose of voting for a special trade union constituency a union should have been registered for a minimum period of one year and have a minimum strength of 100. In the case of first election under the new Constitution the period might be reduced to six months," we find it difficult to accept the last suggestion about six months period, as we fear that large number of mushroom unions will be floated for personal purposes just before the new election. In paragraph 252 of the same report regarding qualification of candidates for election in a special labour constituency "some of us consider that no restrictions should be placed on candidates. Others would require a candidate to be an elector in the special constituency or to be a paying member, an honorary member or an official of a registered trade union." Bengal labour unions strongly support the latter view as it is almost certain that influential employers of labour as well as wealthy landlords of working-class tenants will contest labour seats and will offer concessions to working-class electors to catch their votes as was the case in England in some of the Lancashire industrial constituencies before the British Labour Party was formed. This restriction is necessary during the period of transition, as contemplated by some members of the Lothian Committee. This appears to be a fundamental drawback of adult suffrage during the transitory period and is not sufficiently realised by Labour representatives in the Round Table Conference and Lothian Committee who advocated adult suffrage as a panacea for all evils.

The Provincial Franchise Committee in Bengal of which the witness was a member has unanimously recommended in favour of enfranchisement of manual workers only be they members of trade unions or not. We support this view as there exists in India a number of unions composed of non-manual workers who do not come under the Factories and other labour Legislations.

5. Concurrent Power of passing Labour Laws.—The Bengal Trades Union Federation agrees with the White Paper proposals investing both Federal and Provincial legislators with concurrent power to pass labour laws subject to this proviso that Federal labour laws should be made operative in the Princes' States to avoid unfair competition and ensure protection of States labour.

6. International Labour Conventions and Recommendations.—The Federal Assembly and Government should have the power of ratifying the Conventions and recommendations of the International Labour Conference and the consent of the Federating units should be taken only and solely when these international measures affect certain specific industries, say, coal mining, iron and steel, plantations which lie exclusively within those units. Take, for example, the coal mining, a key industry of vital importance, which looms very largely in International Labour Conferences and which is declining in India due to competition of hydro-electricity and oil fuel. It is geographically situated within the adjoining provinces of Bengal, Behar (including Orissa) and Central Provinces with the exception of very small mines in Assam and elsewhere, and it is only rational that consent of these Provinces solely responsible for its labour welfare should be taken by the Federal Government before ratification of coal and other conventions affecting a particular.

6. Special Powers and Responsibilities of the Governor-General and Governors.—Mr. Joshi and other Indian Labour Delegates to the Round Table Conference have pressed hard in successive Conferences for full measure of protection for Indian Labour. Labour in an agricultural country like India is treated as a piece of cheap merchandise, to be acquired in open markets according to its supply and demand, without taking into consideration a labourer's cost or standard of living, especially in urban areas. As we have stated above, it is being, and has been for centuries, exploited, sweated and underpaid and forced (compulsory labour in Begari or well known throughout India and flourishes well in Feudatory and Princes' States). Hindu Public opinion has most unfortunately stamped it as "low class," as labourers are recruited from the so-called lower classes. The Whitley Labour Commission has condemned many of the shocking conditions under which Indian workers eke out their miserable existence, e.g., deduction from wages, unrestricted supply of intoxicants in industrial areas, perpetual indebtedness, irregular wage payments, extremely insanitary housing and its effect on health and mortality, iniquitous system of recruitment, unrestricted exaction of Jobbers, absence of any schemes to provide against sickness, old age, unemployment or death. The Indian workers, or the intelligent section of them have keenly watched the progress of self-government in India since 1921, and its benefit or implied benefit to labour through protective legislations and prospective measures foreshadowed by the Whitley Commission and reports of various industrial unrest and Strike committees, as well as adoption of International Labour Conventions. They realise the consequences of Provincial Autonomy and Central Responsibility and the transfer of power from British to the Indian Parliaments, and appreciate the grim determination of the British Government to see that Labour is represented in Legislatures through special or Trade union constituencies during the period of transition. The workers' feeling is, however, mingled with pessimism, drawn from bitter experience of the last ten years' activities of the Extremist politicians, who have consciously or unconsciously rendered dis-service to the cause of Labour they took up earnestly. With the rising tide of the extremist movement and of political excitement the leaders made use of industrial labour as tools in their various experiments for mass action, promoted and encouraged strikes and deadlocks, captured Labour unions, vilified humble trade union organisers unconnected with politics, with the sole object of advertising their claim for working class or mass leadership, and acquiring a good deal of limelight at the expense of Labour. Very few of them have had the faintest idea of the guiding principles of trade unionism and collective bargaining, nor any practical experience of trade union work. Consciously or unconsciously they were unfortunately instrumental in throwing thousands out of employment by engineering or encouraging strikes without sufficient economic grounds.

In Bengal these deadlocks (Assam-Bengal Railway and River Steam Service strike, and the stoppage of work in Chargola Valley (Assam) Tea Gardens and the sensational exodus of Sonthal Tea workers, and many more stoppages on other Railways, public utility services and industrial concerns), have rendered thousands of workers' families destitute. In Bombay untold miseries were inflicted on textile workers in 1929 by Politicians of the Moscow brand, International Agents of Communists who "floated" Red unions with Moscow money. They captured temporarily the Girni Kamgar Textile Union and the Great Indian Peninsular Railway Union. In Behar activities of Politicians in connection with Tinsplate workers' strike at Tatanagor ruined hundreds of Bengalee and Assamese well-paid Bhadrologues (educated) workers, who were thrown out of jobs. The Extremists preach wonderful reforms from platforms and they even adopted the famous Soviet plan at Karachi Congress in 1931. However, when came their time to translate their words into deeds—the practice of their preaching Daraidra Naraynism (serving the Poor is service to God), in Calcutta Corporation, which is under the control of the Extremists, it proved a veritable mockery. That Daraidra Naraynism was put to the test during the big strike, in 1928, of several thousand workers in the Conservancy staff of the Corporation for fair wages and bonus, and proved an "eye wash." Even the lump sum of Two Rupees (three shillings) as gratuity, sanctioned by the Corporation as far back as 1928 after two or three days' acrimonious debate, has not been paid even now.

The attitude of the extremist majority party in that Corporation towards the poor conservancy workers, belonging exclusively to the depressed classes is best illustrated by the following speech of one of their mouthpieces—a well-known Corporation Councillor, Babu Jitendrya Nath Bose—who in the course of the debate in the Corporation on 16th July, 1928, regarding that strike said: "They have been playing fast and loose with their poor comrades whom for years they call scavengers. They ought to have removed the grievances of these men in 1924. What had they been doing? They had been trying to shelve the question all these years. The Corporation was responsible for this strike and not any outside agency, not Miss Das Gupta, nor Mr. Daud, nor Mr. K. C. Roy Chowdhury. The Corporation sat tight on the grievances of these scavengers, who had waited from March, 1924, to March, 1928. These men went on strike in March, 1928, when having obtained an assurance they resumed work. Then the Corporation had to shelve the matter and bluff. After committing repeated breaches of faith on this question with those comrades of theirs, it was just and proper that the Corporation should make some penance and they should not grudge this small sum of strike pay. Having committed repeated breaches of faith in the past, it was now up to the Corporation to make amends and not deviate in the least from the very wholesome recommendation before you. It was a question of congratulating themselves that they had been able to settle the matter so cheaply. The Corporation went to the length of requesting the Commissioner of Police in order to break the strike to arrest and prosecute some of the strikers and their leaders as the following resolution passed at the meeting of the Corporation on 16th July, 1928, shows: "That the chief Executive officer be directed to send a letter to the Commissioner of Police requesting that all cases, pending in criminal courts against these scavengers and their leaders be withdrawn." There was a fresh strike of the Corporation cartmen who remove refuse from the streets in the fourth week of May this year. The Police Commissioner was called to the spot and the Police were obliged to shoot and wound one or two workmen. Take the case of Ahmedabad (Bombay) mill-owners, the Western India leaders of Swaraj movement, who ordered in May, 1933, on the plea of depression, a huge cut in wages of their operatives in face of the facts that British textiles are tabooed and protective duty increasing to 75 per cent. has been imposed on Japanese fabrics and that Swadeshi cloth is in great demand with the inevitable result—a big strike called by Ahmedabad Labour Union, reported to be one of the best unions in India, and under the direct influence of Mr. Gandhi, who acted all along as an arbitrator between Ahmedabad mill-owners, who are his political followers, and their operatives and established the principle of Joint Industrial Council there.

Trade unionists all over India have reasons to believe that the prosecution of some of the innocent Trade unionists of Bengal, Bombay and the United Provinces before the Historical Tribunal known as Meerut Trial and their subsequent acquittal was instigated principally by the Mill owners of Bombay. For reasons based on actual facts stated above in this paragraph and further reasons stated below the Trade unionists in

Bengal are justified in their apprehension that the new Constitution as sketched in the White Paper transferring trusteeship of the masses from the Parliament to the Indian legislatures without definite safeguards for protection of labour will not be helpful. There are scores of cases where Employers frequently sought the assistance of Police to break ordinary strikes (e.g., the strike of workmen of the East Indian Railway workshop at Lilloah, near Calcutta, in 1928, the famous deadlock of Steelworkers at Tatanagor in 1930, and the Police were obliged to resort to shooting workmen. Trade Unionists in Bengal have reasons to apprehend that under Provincial autonomy with an Executive fully responsible to the Legislature, pressure will be most frequently brought on the Ministry of Police to break legitimate strikes and deadlocks by shooting and taking punitive measures notwithstanding the presence of seven or eight labour representatives in council. Past experience indicates that there will be frequent repetition on purely economic grounds of the big Corporation scavengers' strike in 1928 in Calcutta and complete stoppage of removal of refuse and other municipal work for days together, endangering public health and human lives, the Police under the Ministry will be more readily utilised and there will be more shooting than ever. The reaction on the workers' minds after shooting will be more determined than ever. The Governor under the White Paper scheme will be powerless to intervene and the result will be chaos. There is still another reason why workers demand safeguards. Not infrequently Speculators in Bombay and specially in Calcutta have directly or indirectly promoted industrial strikes and financed strike leaders for gambling purposes, e.g., during the big strike at Tata steel works in 1930, the Share market Operators of Bombay supplied funds. The most glaring case of speculators engineering and financing industrial strikes was the devastating Jute mill strike in 1929 affecting more than 150,000 mill hands for weeks and causing huge loss of their wages—the biggest Jute workers' strike in History without real economic grounds. Facts about this, viz., the connection of the Hessian speculators of Calcutta who operate in the Fatka Buraas (Futures market gambling booths) with that strike, were placed before the Whitley Royal Commission in 1930. Many thousand Jute workers left factories for their village homes and the industry was dislocated, causing untold misery on all connected with and dependent on the Jute industry. The chances are that there will be recrudescences of this type of deadlocks and lightning strikes at the instigation of gamblers who will join hands with politicians having personal motives, to grind the poor mill hands and deprive them of their bread and depress their standard of living. Neither the Ministry of Labour nor the Council will be of much use to check this evil. In a case like this and in all cases where workers are victims of either the Employers, or the Police or the politicians or the gamblers the Governor alone can act and act swiftly if he has a special responsibility to act, to take prompt action to call immediate Conferences, to forbid Police interference and above all to proclaim to the workers his intention to intervene in the workers' interest and thus restore industrial peace and harmony. In the same manner and for identical reasons, the Governor-General should have a special responsibility for the protection of nearly a million of Railway workmen, Post and Telegraph employees and Maritime workers and others employed in public utility services under the Federal Government. We have bitter experience in the past of strikes on the G.I.P. Railway, E.I. Railway, not to speak of the famous strike on the Assam-Bengal Railway and Steamer Service, already alluded to, as specific instances of direct action purely for political purposes. There are indications that the future tactics of Revolutionary politicians will be the wholesale use of railway and other labour as pawns in their political games and their subversive actions. It is already in their air that the Irish method, viz., direct action and Larkinism, will be resorted to, at the expense of tens of thousands of Railwaymen, Dock and Maritime workers, having no direct interest in the political issues. It is therefore all the more necessary that the Governor-General should have a special responsibility "for effective protection of the economic interests of Indian working classes." It is perfectly true that the Governor-General and Governors under the White Paper Scheme will have a special responsibility "for the prevention of grave menace to the tranquillity of India or of any part thereof." The Bengal Trades Union Federation is very doubtful whether large-scale Railway or industrial strikes, engineered or encouraged for political and personal purposes, unaccompanied by violence or sabotage, will at all come under this head of special responsibility. Neither will a Municipal Scavengers' stoppage, unassociated with violence, come under that category. On the contrary, Employers will press Governors to intervene in their interest on the plea of prevention of menace when a deadlock and its incidental minor breaches of peace occur and continue for some time.

Indian Trade unionists have reasons to fear that Labour will fare badly with the immediate prospects of rapid industrialisation under Protective Tariffs. Many more lakhs of peasants will be lured from their healthy village homes to factory towns with its demoralising and devitalising environments, and the power of wealth in few hands will grow immensely and will be utilised to suppress Labour. In fact, even the Nehru Report on Indian Constitution, published in 1928, page 48, says, "That there is no doubt that the power of wealth is great in the modern state. It is so great that it seldom troubles to contest seats in the Legislatures, as it can pull the strings from behind." The strings will be pulled from behind all right, and more vigorously under the new Constitution, as proved by our past experience of Montagu Councils and Assembly when Bengal Tenancy Amendment Bill in Bengal Council, Salt Duties Amendment Bill and Certain Industries Bounty Bill in the Assembly were taken into consideration. Hence the imperative necessity to provide safeguards, during the next few years of transition, for effective protection of the economic interests of millions of India's working-class subjects of His Majesty—the real backbone of the Indian nation—whose good—the good of the largest majority—should be the primary object of framing the new Indian Constitution.

B410. Is it in order, Mr. Joshi, that questions should be addressed to you or to Mr. Shiva Rao?—(Mr. N. M. Joshi.) I think to Mr. Shiva Rao.

Earl of Derby.] You will make any statement you like, Mr. Joshi.

Sir Manubhai Mehta.

B411. I will confine my questions to Mr. Roy Chowdhury. In paragraph 1 of your memorandum, you refer to Fundamental Rights?—(Mr. Chowdhury.) Yes.

B412. You say "This British conception of constitution will not hold water in an Oriental country like India where social and socio-economic conditions of the poorer and working classes are positively different and where brutal practices exist that should be swept out of existence by Statutory instruments." You advocate the adoption of a plan that has found favour in the modern constitutions of the Soviet Republic and certain other modern constitutions like those of Czecho-Slovakia and Germany?—And Ireland.

B413. May I ask you if the inclusion of fundamental rights in the constitution of Germany has safeguarded those fundamental rights?—To a great extent.

B414. They have safeguarded them?—Yes. May I give you an instance: Articles 151 to 165 of the German Constitution provide what they call the Economic Council—the Economic Division of the Constitution.

B415. I am not referring to the Economic Council?—They are under that head, and it provides that primary education shall be compulsory—No. 1; No. 2, that the workers and employers shall co-operate on an equal footing through the Factory Workers Council, through the Reich Council and so forth.

B416. You are more for such declarations of rights as freedom of speech and freedom of association. Are those respected in Germany any more?—As a matter of fact those are the usual rigmarole of rights, if I may say so, but what we really need in India, are, as you may say, the bona fide rights, the right to have an old age pension, the right to have sickness benefit, the right to insurance, the right to have compulsory and free elementary education and a workers industrial council, as was strongly recommended by the Whitley Commission.

B417. You would claim enumeration only of those fundamental rights which are ordinarily claimed by labour?—By labour, and the peasants; both. For example, I claim the right of fixity of tenure and fixity of rent for the peasant.

B418. You would consider that more advisable than the personal liberty and safety of property?—Yes; I should think so. In paragraph 5, you say "The Bengal Trades Union Federation agrees with the White Paper proposals investing both Federal and Provincial Legislators with concurrent power to pass labour laws subject to this proviso that Federal labour laws should be made operative in the Princes' States to avoid unfair competition and ensure protection of States labour." ?—Yes.

B419. So you deny to an Indian State the right which you would give to a Province?—I do not deny the right. I want the States to have the same rights as the Provinces.

B420. The States may have their own laws and you want the Federal laws to be applicable to the States?—Yes.

B421. So you deny the right of the States to make their own laws?—They are coming into the Federation and they should abide by its laws passed by the Federal Assembly on which their nominees will sit.

B422. My question is that when you are prepared to allow the Provinces their autonomous rights of making laws as regards labour, you deny that same right to the States?—The Central Legislature is given certain rights and the Provincial, but in the States they are the Central and they are the Provincial, both combined. I want to treat the States as Provinces

B423. As to the Federations, they are in the position of Provinces?—Yes, the powers of legislation are divided into Central and Provincial. The Central powers do not include the powers of the State; they do not include anything to do with the State.

Sir John Wardlaw-Milne.

B424. As I understand the witness, his submission is that in regard to all Federal subjects under the White Paper the States should give up all rights?—Yes; that is my point. It is quite clear.

B425. I do not ask you that, but that is your point?—That is my point.

Sir Manubhai N. Mehta.

B426. The States should not have those concurrent rights which you are prepared to concede the Provinces?—No; let the States have the same concurrent rights as the Provinces have.

Earl of Derby.] Will you put questions on Memorandum 54 at the same time?

Sir Manubhai N. Mehta.

B427. Yes. (To the Witness): You say in paragraph 3 (D) of your Memorandum 54: "If the Princes are going to be given the sole authority to define, in their Instruments of Accession, their powers and jurisdiction in respect of those matters which they are willing to recognise as federal, it is only logical that in the Federal Executive and Legislature their right of vote should be restricted only to such matters and there is no justification for allowing them to vote on purely British India subjects." May I first remind Mr. Shiva Rao, even in matters of treaties of accession, the Princes are not going to be given the sole right to define their jurisdiction or the extent of the subjects. You know if the Princes' demands are not reasonable the paramount power is in a position to refuse to accede to the treaty of accession from that state?—(Mr. Shiva Rao.) Yes, that is so.

B428. I should like to know what you regard as matters purely affecting British India. Suppose there is legislation for an increase in the marriageable age of girls, it is a British-Indian question because it is not federal, but would not you say that the States are equally interested in matters of social reforms?—Yes, they may be equally interested in matters of social reform. (Mr. Joshi.) May I say it is true that the States are equally interested, but the legislation will not affect their subjects at all.

B429. I have explained to you, Mr. Joshi, that the demarcation between one State and British India does not put a stop to inter-marriages. A bridegroom from British India may marry a girl from a State and the law will operate to the extent that it will prevent the marriage?—True, but the marriage will have to be celebrated in British India.

B430. So it is not merely upon the forum that the law will apply, but you say it is a personal law?—May I say that on the same analogy, any law passed by an Indian State will affect British India, and we are not claiming any rights of interference with the States.

B431. But we have not denied you the right to come into our Legislature. There are many British Indians who come to our Legislature and we have not denied them the right of asking questions?—Similarly, our Constitution is going to provide that a subject of an Indian State may become a candidate in British India. The same right is given to the subjects of the Indian States.

B432. Yet you say he should not be entitled to vote on such subjects?—We say a representative of the States should not vote because the legislation will not apply to the Indian State.

Nawab Sir Liaquat Hayat-Khan.

B433. Mr. Chowdhury, I want to ask you a question. Will you please refer to paragraph 2: "Second Chambers" in your Memorandum No. 55, where you suggest that a certain number of seats should be reserved for Labour over and above what is provided for in the White Paper. How do you propose that these seats should be filled up? Do you suggest that these Labour representatives should be nominated by the Governor-General, or should this be by election?—(Mr. Chowdhury) Are you speaking of the Provincial Chamber?

ROY CHOWDHURY and Mr. N. M. JOSHI.

B434. No; I am talking of the Upper Chamber, the Second Chamber, where you ask for extra seats for Labour?—Yes.

B435. How do you propose that these extra seats should be filled up—by nomination by the Governor-General or by election?—Nomination has been generally tabooed in India. The investigation of the Lohian Committee shows that nomination is looked upon with great disfavour, but I shall give this reservation, that in the case of any experts the Government may require they will have to get them through nomination—labour experts, just as economic experts are nominated in other Legislatures. In the case of experts I would favour nomination, not otherwise.

B436. My question was whether the extra seats you are asking for in paragraph 2 you would desire to be filled in by means of election or by means of nomination?—By means of election.

B437. If they are to be filled up by means of election would you then alter the franchise qualifications for the filling up of those seats, because you add in the same paragraph that for the Upper Chamber the franchise qualifications are harder than those for the Lower Chamber? It is intended to send representatives from the propertied classes and all that sort of thing?—Yes.

B438. How do you reconcile that franchise with a Labour candidate?—I want to see the franchise lowered.

B439. You want a complete alteration in the franchise?—No, not a complete alteration. Let me clear my position. We think that so far as the Labour seats in the Upper Chamber of the Central Legislature are concerned there should be an Electoral College composed of, say, members of registered Trade Unions, just as in the case of the seats for commerce and trade in the Upper House it is the Bengal Chamber of Commerce; it is the other Chambers of Commerce. They send their representatives by election among themselves. Individually they have no property qualification. Individually, for example, my friend Sir Hubert Carr, if he wants to go to the Upper Chamber, may not hold any property at all, but he is a member of the Chamber of Commerce, so I say Labour representatives must be members of an organised Labour body in order to enjoy the franchise.

B440. Then they should depend for their election to the Upper Chamber on this Labour organisation—this Labour Chamber; that is what you propose?—Yes.

B441. Not the ordinary method?—No.

B442. Would you turn to paragraph 3 of your Memorandum?—Yes.

B443. There you mention that "Owing to attraction of Intellectuals towards Indian labour movement their number will increase and some 'Philip Snowdens' and 'Pethwick Lawrences' will be forthcoming to represent labour in Indian Legislatures"?—Yes.

B444. When that happens do not you think men of that position will be able to secure their election through general electorates? Why should they seek special electorates in order to go into the Council if they were men of that character?—Because how are the voters in the general electorates to know whether they have sympathy with our movement unless they join our Unions? I was a member of a Trade Union in Manchester.

B445. Am I to understand that distinguished representatives of Labour will not have a fair chance in a general electorate?—No.

B446. Will the people hesitate to vote for them in a general electorate if they are men of the position that you mention here?—Exactly, because the general voters will go either on the Communal ticket or on some other ticket, but those who come to our Unions will have to go on our ticket.

B447. I suppose you mean the general electorate would not vote on merit at all?—That will happen during the transitory period, I suppose.

Sir N. N. Sircar.

B448. I want to put two questions to Mr. Chowdhury. On the last page of your Memorandum you conclude by suggesting that there should be more safeguards: what do you want exactly?—The safeguards for the protection of the economic interest, as distinguished from Communal, as distinguished from other interests—

ROY CHOWDHURY and Mr. N. M. JOSHI

B449. Instead of indulging in that kind of general language, will you just give us a draft of a safeguard that you want?—Exactly. I will give the same draft as in the White Paper, where they talk about the protection of minorities and so forth. I would simply say “The protection of the economic interests.” In fact, that appears in one of the Constitutions of Czechoslovakia. I can quote it here.

B450. I do not want to go to Czechoslovakia. Would it satisfy you if we put “for the safeguarding of economic interests”?—Yes.

B451. That is what you mean by the last two pages of your Memorandum?—Yes. (Mr. Joshi.) I think I should make it clear that on this point we have our own views, and the second point which I desire to state is this, that the Indian organisation, which three of us represent, is the National Trades Union Federation and the Bengal Trades Union Federation, which Mr. Chowdhury represents, are affiliated, and the Memorandum which we have submitted is a Memorandum which is approved even by the members of the Bengal Trades Union Federation. So far as I can see, the proposals of our Memorandum in this respect are acceptable to the Bengal Trades Union Federation.

Mr. Isaac Foot.

B452 Memorandum 54 also really covers Memorandum 55?—(Mr. Chowdhury.) Let me make a counter-explanation of what Mr. Joshi said. It is perfectly true that some of the members of the Bengal Trades Union Federation have approved of the points in the Memorandum that you are discussing—the National Federation.

Sir John Wardlaw-Milne.

B453. Memorandum 54?—Memorandum 54, but subsequently, after those resolutions were passed, our Members, Members of the Executive Committee, thought of not subtracting but adding something to this. That is all; we have added that portion.

Nawab Sir Liaquat Hayat-Khan.

B454. Yours is really a supplementary Memorandum to the Memorandum with which this organisation is concerned?—It is an additional suggestion from the Provincial organisation.

B455-6. That being the case, Mr. Joshi, will your organisation accept those additional suggestions as yours also?—(Mr. Joshi.) No. It is for that reason I made a statement that we are not responsible for any statement which may be made which is inconsistent with the Memorandum which the larger organisation has submitted.

Sir John Wardlaw-Milne.

B457. Or which goes further. You say, “which is inconsistent.” Do you add to that, “which goes further than 54”?—I will not say forward or backward, because it is very difficult to say which is forward or which is backward.

Mr. Isaac Foot.

B458. Your responsibility is only for your own Memorandum?—Yes.

Earl of Derby.

B459. As your two Associations have agreed to come together in response to a suggestion by me, we should continue now asking questions of both of you, and, at the end, if there is anything in the evidence given by the other body to which you take exception, the Committee, I am sure, will be glad to hear your explanation and your submission?—Yes.

Sir N. N. Sircar.

B460. One more question. In Mr. Chowdhury's Memorandum you are referring to the Trade Unions. In the present Indian conditions, is it not a kind of thing which can be easily got up, these pocket Trade Unions?—(Mr. Chowdhury.) Some of them have been got up.

B461. Will you accept my suggestion that it is easy to get them up? There is not much difficulty in getting up these pocket Trade Unions?—It depends on the bona fides and the standing of the Trade Unions that you can get up.

Sir Hubert Carr.

B462. May I get clear in my mind the difference between the two Unions? Taking the Memorandum of the National Trades Union, I was going through it carefully, and I see, taking paragraph 4, that 19 out of 21 points are purely political, and of no particular interest to labour. I was wondering whether one might draw the deduction from that that perhaps the National Trades Union is more interested in politics whilst the other Union is more interested in the sociological side of labour. Would that be a fair deduction?—(Mr. Joshi.) I can say this, that every Union which is included in the Bengal Trade Unions Federation is included in the larger body.

B463. You take more the political side, and the other Union the sociological side?

ROY CHOWDHURY and Mr. N. M. JOSHI.

—No. I think the point is that our Memorandum is a fuller Memorandum. It deals with many more points than the Bengal Memorandum deals with.

B464. If I have not overlooked it, in the National Trades Union Memorandum I was surprised to find that there is no reference made, as far as I know now, to an Industrial Council. The Royal Commission on Labour, on page 467, and the following pages, was very strongly in favour of it, and taking page 467, they say: "We recommend that when the new Constitution is framed the Council, whether it has been established by that time or not, should find a place within the Constitutional structure." I notice the Bengal Trades Union has referred to this. I was wondering whether you could throw any light as to the attitude of Labour on the Industrial Council. Would Mr. Shiva Rao tell me whether it interests his Association or not, or am I correct in saying it is neglected altogether by them?—(Mr. B. Shiva Rao.) No, it is not neglected at all; we attach very great importance to that.

B465. Is it mentioned in your Memorandum?—I do not think it is mentioned, but we have suggested in paragraph 4 (d) that we must have a separate Department of Labour in charge of a Member of the Cabinet. (Mr. Joshi.) May I supplement that reply? I was a signatory to the Report which Sir Hubert Carr has quoted. The point is that that Commission recommended the establishment of an Industrial Council. We did not put it in this Memorandum dealing with the Constitution for the reason that it is quite possible for the Indian Legislature itself to establish an Industrial Council without taking power from Parliament to do that specially. The Indian Legislature can establish an Industrial Council without taking special power from the Parliament to establish such a Council. That is the reason why there is no special mention in our Memorandum of the Industrial Council.

B466. I recognise it can take the power, Mr. Joshi, and the Royal Commission on Labour presumably, of which you were a member, recognised the power, but at that time you thought it should find a place within the Constitutional structure, did you not? You were not sure, in fact, whether the Indian Legislature would set up a body such as was visualised by the Royal Commission on Labour?—Yes, but now when we are going to have a Federation where even the Princes will be represented it will be quite possible for the Federal Legislature to establish a Council where, if the Princes choose to join, they can join.

B467. Yes, but there is no certainty that they will. Mr. Shiva Rao, I understand, suggests that a Labour Department should be established?—(Mr. B. Shiva Rao.) It is in paragraph 4 (d).

Earl of Derby.

B468. Paragraph 4 (d)?—Yes, that is right.

Sir Hubert Carr.] That hardly takes the place of an Industrial Council. I do not want to press it, but it will be a very different body. The Labour Commission attaches so much importance to this that it is rather significant that your Association should have taken no notice of it at all in a Memorandum dealing with the future constitution.

Sir Joseph Nall.

B469. What is the reference to it in Memorandum No. 55?—(Mr. Chowdhury.) It is in paragraph 1, the fourth sub-paragraph of our memorandum.

Sir Hubert Carr.

B470. It is in paragraph 1, about six lines down the fourth sub-paragraph?—(Mr. Shiva Rao.) We took the view that it would be open to the Minister in charge of Labour in the Federal Government of the future to see to the setting up of such an Industrial Council, with the consent of the Federated States. (Mr. Joshi.) May I supplement that reply, my Lord Chairman? Personally we shall be very glad indeed, if the Joint Committee comes to the conclusion that the Indian Legislature will not have the power to set up an Industrial Council, then that Parliament should provide for it in the Constitution itself, but the view which we took, and personally I took, was that an Indian Legislature will be able to set up a Council, but, if the Joint Committee comes to the conclusion that the Indian Legislature will not be able to do it, then certainly we urge that the Constitution itself should provide for a Joint Industrial Council.

Earl of Derby.

B471. In other words, you adhere to the proposal of an Industrial Council. Your personal opinion is that that can be set up without its being actually placed in the Constitution, but, if it is found that it cannot be so set up, then you ask that it should be placed in the Constitution? Is that your position?—Yes.

19° July, 1933.] Mr. B. SHIVA RAO, Mr. AFTAB ALI, Mr. K. C. [Continued.
ROY CHOWDHURY and Mr. N. M. JOSHI.

Sir Hubert Carr.

B472 In paragraph 6 of the Bengal Trades Union Memorandum it is suggested that the Governor should have a special responsibility with reference to the economic condition of labour. Could you help me? How would that be exercised? In what conditions?—(Mr. Chowdhury.) It would be exercised when, say, the Minister in charge of Labour and Industry does something which is not for the protection of Labour, and the Governor interferes. I will give you a hypothetical case of which we have bitter experience. In many of these industrial strikes the police is called to break the strike by shooting. I will give authenticated instances here, and I think some friends on this Committee know. In the future Legislature of the country the Minister is responsible to the Legislature all right, but that Legislature has only eight Labour members there. The majority are not Labour. Far from being a majority they are in a hopeless minority. When the employers want to use the Ministry of Police or the Ministry of Labour, they will do it easily. Therefore, if there is a special power vested in the Governor it may not be that that power will be exercised always, but the presence of that power will act as a deterrent.

B473. I have not heard of the process of breaking the strikes by shooting.

Mr. A. H. Ghuznavi.

B474. It happened once?—I gave an instance in the Memorandum. That is the usual practice of breaking strikes.

Nawab Sir Liaqat Hayat-Khan.

B475. Does not that happen when a strike develops into a violent mob?—When the people are on strike, there is a bit of starving, there is a bit of picketing—(Mr. Aftab Ali.) On this particular point I feel it my duty to speak, because this is being said on behalf of the Bengal Trades Union Federation of which I have been Secretary since 1930. (Mr. Chowdhury.) He was.

Earl of Derby.

B476. Are you the Secretary now?—(Mr. Aftab Ali.) Yes, I am the Secretary, but another is acting in my place. When I go back I will be the Secretary automatically. Our membership is 21,900. The Seamen's Union consists of 15,000 members, that is to say, almost double the rest of the Unions altogether, and I have been general Secretary of the Seamen's Union since 1928. I was the Delegate to this year's International Labour Conference at Geneva, I take objection to the suggestion which has been made by Mr. Chowdhury with regard to the special powers. The Bengal Federation has never wanted it, and this Memorandum, as far as I am aware, is not the Memorandum prepared by the Bengal Trades Union Federation. Mr. Joshi.) May I give a counter explanation?

Earl of Derby.

B477. I do not think we can have differences of opinion between you two. We have to decide for ourselves. I think we can hear the evidence?—Yes.

Sir Hubert Carr.

B478. There is a substantial number who require special responsibility for the Governor, and I was wondering from that, how you think with regard to nomination as opposed to election? If you require the Governor's special responsibility, that is to say, you cannot trust entirely to your Ministers, are you not prepared to trust to your Governor making suitable nomination to the Council?—(Mr. Chowdhury.) I think the question of nomination has been ruled out altogether, and it would be too late in the day to reopen it.

B479. Are you nominated?—Yes, I have been, because there is no election for Labour seats.

B480. Would you consider that you satisfactorily represent Labour?—Mr. Joshi is also nominated.

B481. I take it all you gentlemen satisfactorily represent Labour. If you go for election you are discontented with the number of seats given, which is eight in Bengal. May I suggest that there are eight given to Labour Constituencies, and I understand, 30 to the depressed classes who are also very largely labourers and 119 to the Muslims, who again to my knowledge, supply a tremendous number of the labourers of Bengal? Would you consider Labour interests are entirely restricted in representation to the eight extra, as I think Mr. Chowdhury called them? I will address that to Mr. Shiva Rao?—(Mr. B. Shiva Rao.) The election of Muslims or of the depressed classes will be entirely on a communal basis, and I think, at any rate in the first few elections in the new Constitution, the chances are that amongst the depressed classes and the Mus'lims, those who are well-to-do, and who do not represent Labour, will get into the new Legislatures, and with them communal considerations rather than economic considerations will come first.

ROY CHOWDHURY and Mr. N. M. JOSHI.

B482. Would you agree with, what I think Mr. Chowdhury admitted, that in the present embryo state of trade unionism in Bengal unions can be got up very easily?—I cannot speak of Bengal but I will speak of Madras. It is not by any means easy to get up trade unions for the simple fact that members of the executives of trades unions stand a risk of being dismissed by their employers, and I can give you instances where every member of the executive of a registered trade union has been dismissed, and no one has come forward to protect him, certainly not on the side of the Government.

B483. In that case would not you expect that, perhaps, the Governor, knowing those conditions, would nominate a better representative of labour than those who do not organise or else are organised in the way in which Mr. Chowdhury explains?—I would rather leave it to the trades unions' organisation to choose their representatives in whom they have most confidence.

B484. Leaving the others unrepresented?—For the time being. (Mr. Joshi) May I supplement this reply? It is true that it may be possible for some people to start a registered trade union because registration of a trade union requires only seven members, but it is not easy for anyone to get large membership for a trade union and the right of election which we are seeking would be given to all the unions together, either in one industry or in one Province, so that although it may be possible for any outsider to get together seven members and to get a union registered, he will not succeed in an election unless he builds up a large membership for that trades union, which is not very easy for any outsider, unless he has sympathy for labour.

B485. You will understand that I am not trying to whittle down the representation of labour, but I do suggest that your recommendations with regard to election are not likely to get those people who are really interested in the sociological side of labour as opposed to those who are interested in the political side, and the power which the political use of the unions would give to members?—We take the view that taking all the circumstances into consideration, we shall get better men to represent labour interests by election, than by nomination. That is the view which we have taken so far.

Sir Hubert Carr.] In view of the witness's answer, I find it difficult to accept that, but that finishes my questions.

Mr. G. H. Ghuznavi.

B486. Mr. Chowdhury, will you refer to paragraph 3 of your memorandum, No. 55? You say that workers do not join trades unions owing to the opposition of their employers?—(Mr. Chowdhury.) Yes.

B487. Do you know of any case where a worker has been penalised by an employer for joining a trades union?—Yes; I know of two or three cases.

B488. Give us those cases?—There are so many Bengal jute workers' unions, but one I have particularly in mind. The employers have a rather poor idea from their point of view about the bona fides of those jute workers' unions. They thought that the unions, of the type I have in view, which did function more or less for a time, were more or less political bodies.

B489. A communist body?—Call it anything you like, not exactly functioning as an economic body, but the workers did not know the difference between the political side and the economic side, and as soon as they had joined they were told that they had got to give up their connection. That is one of the cases I know.

Sir John Wurdlaw-Milne.

B490. May I ask a supplementary question on that? Are you aware that there are employers in this country who still refuse to recognise trades unions?—Yes; I am quite aware of that.

Sir Hubert Carr.

B491. Might I also put a supplementary question? Do you know of any case where employers have started unions and encouraged them?—They did not actually start unions but they did encourage unions.

Mr. Ghuznavi.

B492. What do you suggest should be done if an employer penalises a labourer for being in a trades union?—I suggest some amendment in the Trades Union Act of India. I demanded a penalty on any employer or his agent if he victimises a workman because he is a member of a trades union.

ROY CHOWDHURY and Mr. N. M. JOSHI.

Sir John Wardlaw-Milne

B493. Again, may I ask a supplementary question? Such legislation would be going further than any other legislation of the kind anywhere in the world, would it not? Is there any such legislation anywhere else in the world?—The Indian Trades Disputes Act to which I am referring does penalise certain labour, for example, for going on strike without notice.

B494. With great respect that is not an answer to my question. My question is—Is there in the world, that we know of, any example of similar legislation to that which you suggest?—No; I did not suggest it, but I was asked the question I did not suggest such a thing.

B495. May I put it clearly, because you were asked what you would suggest to prevent victimisation, and your answer was, as I understood it—the Committee will correct me if I am wrong—that you have suggested or did suggest that there should be some amendment of certain Acts which would force an employer to recognise a Trades Union?—Yes.

B496. Who refuse to engage a man who was a member of it. I ask you is there to your knowledge in the whole world any such legislation?—No; I do not think there is any such legislation. I admit that.

Mr. Ghuznavi.

B497. Will you please turn to paragraph 4? Whom do you suggest will discriminate between what you call genuine trades unions and unions formed and registered for political and personal purposes, or unions subsequently captured by politicians, or self-seekers?—The electoral officer—when the officer prepares the electoral roll of the members of the trades unions. That is what was suggested by the Whitley Commission, how to set about it. It is for the electoral roll preparing officer to find out the bona fides, or otherwise, of the trades union, the members of which he was putting on the electoral roll.

B498. You suggest that the officer in charge of the electoral roll should discriminate?—Yes.

Sir John Wardlaw-Milne.

B499. I only ask these supplementary questions to save time. Are you seriously suggesting that one individual, whoever he may be, should decide what are the political opinions of an enormous body of people?—No; I have never suggested that.

B500. I only want to be clear what your answer is. I am not putting words in your mouth?—The Constitution provides a machinery for preparing the electoral roll of special labour constituencies. I am not here to suggest whether that is the only method to give the power. There may be some other method and I would rather omit that portion of my answer when I said that the electoral roll preparing officer should have the power. I say a Commissioner or Tribunal should have the power as suggested by the Whitley Commission.

B501. I understand you wish to withdraw your previous answer?—Yes. (Mr. Joshi.) May I explain in order that there may be no misunderstanding on this point. What the Whitley Commission recommended was that there should be a tribunal in each province not to decide whether a union is a political union or an industrial union, but to decide matters of detail as regards membership, because certain unions may claim that they have 10,000 members, say, and there may be a challenge given that that union only includes 9,000, and this difference may be settled by the trades union, but every union that is registered should be given the right to vote.

B502. May I put it to Mr. Joshi that all that is perfectly correct, if I may say so, but it has nothing to do with Mr. Ghuznavi's question? His question was this. In this document it is stated that trades unions should not be recognised, if they become purely political. He asked who was to decide whether they were political or not. His first answer was that it should be the electoral officer. That is now withdrawn and there is now another answer to that question.

Mr. Ghuznavi.

B503. I think afterwards he said it should be a Commissioner?—(Mr. Chowdhury.) I really meant the tribunal. That question does not arise now. My answer is that it is for the legislature or for the Constitution to devise any machinery they like.

Sir John Wardlaw-Milne.

B504. You have not any views but you think something should be done?—Yes.

19th July, 1933.] Mr. B. SHIVA RAO, Mr. AFTAB ALI, Mr. K. C. [Continued.
ROY CHOWDHURY and Mr. N. M. JOSHI.

Earl of Derby.

B505. Perhaps we could ask the other body. (To Mr. B. Shiva Rao.) Have you an answer to that question? (Mr. B. Shiva Rao.) I do not understand what is exactly meant by a political union. The claim is for electoral powers to be vested in registered trades unions, and before a trades union is registered it has to go through certain formalities. It has to send up its list of applicants its constitution and the objects for which the trades union has been formed, to the Registrar of Trades Unions in its province. The Registrar must satisfy himself first that those objects are legitimate objects and that the people who have applied for registration are in fact workers, before he gives a certificate of registration. I do not see how exactly the difficulty would arise. (Mr. Chowdhury.) I do not say anywhere in my memorandum that the political union should be excluded. You will see that there is no mention of that. I said there are certain unions which are of a distinctly political complexion. I never said they should be excluded from the enjoyment of the Franchise.

B506. I did not say "exclude"; I said distinguish between a political and a non-political union. There are organisations which you do not consider to be true trades unions, you say, and then I put this question, whom do you suggest will discriminate to find out?—Some of these unions openly declare it. We have half a dozen Indian labour unions who openly declare themselves to be Communists, so their declaration is there. They do not register.

Sir John Wardlaw-Milne.] I suggest we have had the answer, that they have nothing to suggest but it should be done.

Earl of Derby.] Yes. I do not think we will take that any further.

Mr. Ghuznavi.

B507. On paragraph 2, in your Memorandum, what is the view of labour with regard to the Upper House? Have there been any resolutions passed by your Federation or any labour organisation upon that subject?—Generally speaking, the labour organisations do not favour a Second Chamber; they have not studied the point, because they have heard that a Second Chamber is associated with hereditary property and all that sort of thing. They have not given very serious thought to it. British citizens for half a century could not distinguish between hereditary and elective Chambers, so you cannot expect Indian labourers to make the distinction.

B508. I asked you if you had passed any resolution on that subject in your Trades Unions Federation in Bengal. You have not?—(Mr. N. M. Joshi.) May I suggest that we have passed resolutions on that subject? We have passed a resolution in Appendix A: "The Federation is opposed to the establishment of the Federal Upper House. If, however, it is to be retained, Indian labour should be given adequate and effective representation thereon." We have passed a similar resolution about Provincial Upper Chambers.

Earl of Derby.

B509. That is Appendix A, in paper 54?—Yes. "The Federation is opposed to the establishment of Second Chambers, in any of the provinces in India. If, however, they are to be retained, Indian labour should be given adequate and effective representation thereon." Those are our views with regard to Upper Chambers.

Sir John Wardlaw-Milne.

B510. Perhaps you will allow me to ask a supplementary question on that. I noticed that resolution in Appendix A. Are your associations aware that in this country for probably hundreds of years, but certain for many years, legislation in favour of labour, from time to time, has been initiated by the House of Lords?—I have read something of the history of labour legislation in Great Britain.

B511. I did not say labour legislation; I said legislation which was in favour of the improvement of conditions of labour?—Yes. Such legislation has been initiated sometimes and whatever legislation has been passed has been passed with the consent of the two Chambers. I am quite aware of that fact. What we feel is that, considering the Constitution of the Second Chamber, labour legislation will make a slower progress than it can make without the Second Chamber.

Mr. Ghuznavi.

B512. Mr. Chowdhury, out of eight labour seats in Bengal, the local Labour Committee of the Bengal Government has allotted two seats for election by Trades Unions and six seats by direct vote?—(Mr. Chowdhury.) Yes.

B513. Do you consider that this is a fair division or do you suggest that the seats allotted to registered trades unions should be altered?—We spent a lot of time in discussing this and we found in certain areas there were no trades unions and in those areas big industries existed. Therefore we thought as there were no trades unions in coal mining districts and in the Tea Garden districts the best thing is to have a special constituency.

ROY CHOWDHURY and Mr. N. M. JOSHI.

B514. Do you consider this a fair division?—I was agitating for half and half, four for special constituencies and four for trades unions. In my opinion, it should be half and half (Mr. Shiva Rao.) This was considered by the Bengal Trades Union Federation when Mr. Joshi was sitting as an associate member. We do not want that there should be special constituencies. We want all the eight seats to be given to labour and divided according to that. Mr. Joshi was instructed by the Federation to press accordingly. Therefore the Bengal Trades Union Federation I am sure, although I am not speaking in its name now, welcome the alteration and change that has been done by the Bengal Government. Naturally they did not want the labour members to be returned.

B515. Your point is that they should all come back through the trades unions?—That they should all come back through the trades unions because the trades unions are working for the labouring class as a whole.

B516. You want all these eight seats to go to the trades unions?—(Mr. Shiva Rao.) That is also the view of the National Trades Union Federation, and in this they are supported both by the Whitley Commission and by the Report of Lord Lothian's Committee, wherever there are trades unions existing. We hold, as has been pointed out by the Whitley Commission, that if trades unions are given that right, it will stimulate the springing up of trades unions on a proper basis.

B517. You say in your memorandum No. 55, "An honest peasant living on the sweat of his brow is called a 'chotologue' "?—(Mr. Chowdhury.) Yes.

B518. That means an inferior person?—Middle-class people.

B519. There is an Hindu chotologue, is not there?—I am sorry to admit that is so. (Mr. Aftab Ali.) I fully agree with Mr. Chowdhury but you do not find any differences among the Muhammadans and Hindus so far as this social question is concerned. I have seen Muhammadans who are highly placed who considered the Muhammadans, who were poor, as chotologues. I come from a Muhammadan family myself and we have found no differences between the rich Hindus and the rich Muhammadans, although they fight so much outside.

Mr. A. H. Ghuznavi.

B520. In your Memorandum, under the heading of "Special Powers and Responsibilities of the Governor-General and Governors," you say: "Trade Unionists in Bengal have reasons to apprehend that under Provincial autonomy, with an Executive fully responsible to the Legislature, pressure will be most frequently brought on the Ministry of Police to break legitimate strikes and deadlocks by shooting and taking punitive measures, notwithstanding the presence of seven or eight labour representatives in council." What do you suggest we should do?—(Mr. Chowdhury.) Special powers to the Governor. That is my suggestion.

B521. Is it your suggestion not to transfer Law and Order?—No; not a bit; it is not a question of the Law and Order. It is a question of the protection of the economic interests of Labour. It has nothing to do with Law and Order.

Sir John Wardlaw-Milne.

B522. Is it your claim that strikes should be allowed whether they became inimical to the public welfare or not: that is to say, whether they develop into violence; or do you consider that the powers of the Police, whoever may be in charge of them, should not be adequate to deal with a case of violence or other menace to the public peace?—That is a question for the Judiciary, whether the strikers exceed what is described in our Trades Disputes Act—legitimate picketing and that sort of thing; that must be left to the discretion of Police officers. and when it comes to court, the court will decide that.

B523. Before it comes to court there may be action being taken of which the Police must take notice. Somebody must be responsible for the public peace. Mr. Ghuznavi's question to you is: What do you want to take the place of the Police powers to keep order?—I say the Police are not at all necessary when there is a legitimate strike, but it is employed and it will be employed more in future.

B524. The business of the Police has nothing to do with strikes; it is to keep order, is it not?—I think my friend Mr. Ghuznavi has admitted before that the

ROY CHOWDHURY and Mr. N. M. JOSHI.

Police function most wonderfully during strikes.

Earl of Derby.

B525. What it means in your opinion is that, suppose Law and Order is given to Provincial autonomy, you are not satisfied that such a government, although it is autonomous to the Province, is strong enough, and you want the Governor to have special powers to go in over the head of his Ministers and declare that the strike must not be in any way dealt with, even on the question of law and order, by the Police?—Yes. (Mr. Joshi.) I do not want to go against your ruling, but it is somewhat disadvantageous to us that Mr. Chowdhury should be allowed to make a statement of which we do not approve at all. We are not asking for any special powers to the Governor in the way Mr. Chowdhury is asking, because we hold the special power given to the Governor is more likely to be used against us than in our favour. Therefore, we are not going to ask for that special power at all.

B526. In response to my ruling it was decided that after the evidence you should be allowed to make a statement which would deal with any questions which had been put forward by the other body which were contrary to your wishes and to your will, and you will be allowed at the end to make such a statement?—Thank you very much.

Mr. A. H. Ghuznavi.

B527. At the end of your Memorandum No. 55 you have suggested that the Governor-General should have a special responsibility for the effective protection of the economic interests of the working classes?—(Mr. Chowdhury.) So far as it is within his jurisdiction.

B528. Should not the Governor also have a special responsibility?—Yes, I have said so, both in the Province and at the Centre.

B529. What is your opinion with regard to the setting up of machinery for looking after the welfare of Labour by appointing a Labour Welfare Board in every Province that might look after housing, wages and other problems connected with welfare, and at the same time arbitrate in labour disputes?—That is all covered by the Industrial Council. That is one of the objects of the Industrial Council.

B530. Mr. Ali, do you know anything about the method of recruitment in the Shipping Department?—(Mr. Aftab Ali.) Yes.

B531. Is there much jobbery there?—Yes, there is corruption from the top to the bottom.

B532. Will you illustrate what you mean?—If a seaman is to get a job he must part with the first month of his wages.

Sir John Wardlaw-Milne.

B533. To whom?—To the Shipping Broker. Government has kept brokers; they are always taking care of the first month's wages of seamen.

Mr. A. H. Ghuznavi.

B534. What he means is that the Shipping Companies employ brokers to get their crews?—No, a Shipping Company cannot employ a broker unless he gets a licence. The Government of India, by the Merchant Shipping Act, have a system of licensing brokers and they issue a licence to a certain individual who is in town and employed by the shipowners to recruit seamen for them. That broker is there and whenever the seamen are signed they have to give him the wages for a month and sometimes much more.

Sir John Wardlaw-Milne.

B535. Without in any way appearing to defend the system, may I ask you this question. Is not it usual for the person who acts as a broker in securing employment in every walk of life to get remuneration in some form or other?—At least for a job it may be given by those who are outside, but if the Government have a system of recruitment amongst the seamen and gave effect to the recommendations of the Geneva Labour Conference there would be no possibility of such a corruption going on at all now.

B536. Leaving aside the question of corruption, is not it usual in all walks of life for persons who seek employment to pay somebody to get them a job?—That is why this wrong should go. That is why I ask you that you must find some way out that this wrong should go.

B537. Your answer is that is usual, but it is wrong?—It is not usual. It is only while there is no other way; but for the workers to get jobs they do this. If we can put more union members into one ship, they do not pay. If we cannot do that, they pay.

B538. Leaving aside questions of unions or non-unions at the moment, is it not usual in India and in this country and in every other country for people to go to an employment agency of some kind if they want work?—Exactly. That is a question of advantage and disadvantage. It is easy to stop and we can stop it.

ROY CHOWDHURY and Mr. N. M. JOSHI

B539. You do not deny the system, but you think it is a wrong one?—Yes.

Mr. A. H. Ghuznavi.

B540. Do not you think it is advisable that the Seamen's Trade Unions should be allotted a specific seat in the Federal Legislature and in the Provincial Legislatures where there are such trade unions?—We as a Seamen's Union have no desire to make any special demand outside the common demands we are putting up with our national Trades Union Federation. (Mr. Joshi.) May I explain that our demand is that the Labour representation should be divided industrially; that if there are eight seats in Bengal we are quite prepared, and we consider a right way of giving representation, is that certain seats should be given to seamen; that certain seats should be given to the jute industry; and that certain seats should be given to railways; and in that manner the Labour representation should be divided according to industries. That is our suggestion.

Sir John Wardlaw-Milne.

B541. Who is to decide that? Do you want that kind of Act or do you want to leave that to the trade unions to distribute?—(Mr. Aftab Ali.) To the trade unions. (Mr. Joshi.) There are two methods recommended by the Royal Commission.

B542. It is quite simple; I only want your view?—I think it would be much better if you left it to the trade unions because the distribution will be by industries.

Earl of Derby.

B543. You say certain seats should be given to the trade unions and they should allot them as they think proper between the different industries?—We are in favour of dividing them industrially.

Mr. A. H. Ghuznavi.

B544. On page 114 of the White Paper in relation to shipping where there are mechanically propelled ships, that is made exclusively a Federal subject?—(Mr. Shiva Rao.) Item 17.

B545. Mechanically propelled ships is made an exclusively Federal subject. Are you satisfied with this, or is it your view that it should be a provincial or concurrent subject? I am asking Mr.

Aftab Ali?—(Mr. Joshi.) I quite realise that Item 17 is Federal, and if, after keeping it in the Federal list—

B546. In Bengal there are a lot of inland navigations with ships all mechanically propelled?—(Mr. Aftab Ali.) Yes.

547. That is the reason why I said, do you suggest it should be, in your view, provincial or concurrent?—It should be concurrent; it should be Federal as well as provincial.

B548 Mr. Shiva Rao, is not it a fact that the Indian masses in the main are agricultural?—(Mr. Shiva Rao.) A large number of them are agricultural, but it is also true that India is getting rapidly industrialised and is among the eight industrial Powers of the world according to the International Labour Organisation.

B549. Is it not a fact that many of those who work in, say, the jute mills, and other industries have an interest in land in their own villages?—Some of them have. I cannot speak about the jute industry because that is mainly Bengal. (Mr. Chowdhury.) Yes, most of them are agricultural people.

B550. They go back to the country?—Sometimes they go back. (Mr. Shiva Rao.) A very large number of workers are also becoming exclusively industrial. (Mr. Joshi.) Although I do not come from Bengal, I studied this matter as a member of the Royal Commission and I suggest a large proportion of the workers working in the Bengal jute mills do not belong to Bengal. They come from outside.

Mr. A. H. Ghuznavi.] That is so. They go back to the country, and they have got lands there.

Lord Snell.

B551. Mr. Chowdhury, in sub-paragraph 3 of paragraph 1 of your Memorandum No. 55, you draw attention to the death rates in various parts of India?—(Mr. Chowdhury.) Yes, in the industrial areas.

B552. May I assume that you desire that an Indian Parliament should be such as would secure such an advance in the social services as would bring about a reduction in the death rate in certain areas?—Yes, I do.

B553. That is your chief demand?—Yes.

B554. In the third paragraph you show certain signs of apprehension about the influence of Intellectuals in the Parliament representing Labour. Your fear there is that they may not understand Labour problems quite as closely as people who were born in and belong to the Labour classes?—I did not exactly say "apprehension." I said a certain amount of Intellectuals do come into our movement.

ROY CHOWDHURY and Mr. N. M. JOSHI.

B555. Yes, but you draw attention to that with the view of stating that there ought to be an increased number of Labour seats?—Yes.

B556. Therefore, I assume, that you would prefer Labour representatives to the Intellectuals?—Yes, certainly, that is so.

B557. On the ground that they would have a closer knowledge?—Yes.

B558. It is not unfair to say, is it, that the Intellectuals, Indian and European, have been, in great part, responsible for the awakening of national consciousness in India, and, to that extent, they are not outside your gratitude?—No, they are not outside our gratitude. I admit that.

B559. In the last sub-paragraph of paragraph 6 you draw attention to the question of Tariffs?—Yes.

B560. Your fear is that this device of Tariffs, whatever benefit it may bring to the wealthy classes of India, those benefits will not extend, in fact, to the workers?—Yes.

B561. Therefore, to that extent, you are suspicious of them?—Yes.

B562. Mr. Shiva Rao, may I ask one leading question first of all? As far as anyone has any right to speak on behalf of the workers of India, the National Trade Union Federation has that right?—(Mr. B. Shiva Rao) It is the biggest organisation at present in India.

B563. And we may therefore take it that the views expressed in your Memorandum are in the main representative of the great mass of the workers of India?—That is our claim.

B564. From north to south and from east to west?—That is so.

B565. Your National Trades Union Federation is a definitely co-operative body; you want to co-operate with the Government in making a better and more prosperous India?—Quite.

B566. But, while doing that, you are disappointed, as expressed in paragraph 2 of your Memorandum, at the extent of the reforms proposed?—We feel that in several respects the White Paper proposals do not go far enough.

B567. In your own words they "fall far short of the assurances given by His Majesty's Government at the end of the first Round Table Conference and reiterated at the end of the second Session"?—That is our view.

B568. That also is the representative view of your organisation?—That is so.

B569. You ask, so far as I understand it, for certain fundamental rights?—Yes.

Earl of Derby.

B570. What paragraph is this?—Paragraph 8.

Lord Snell.

B571. Paragraph 3 and Appendix A. You want certain fundamental rights secured as inalienable to the workers of India?—Yes.

B572. May I take it that those rights that you ask for are for the main purpose of minority safeguards against any contingencies that may occur?—Yes; they are safeguards from the point of view of the working classes.

Lord Snell.] The reason I asked you that is that there is another side to that. If fundamental rights are granted to the workers, if your governing class are at all like those in other countries, they will make on their account a similar demand for certain rights against striking, and other things.

Earl of Derby.

B573. They may make them. (Lord Snell.) They may make them?—Our feeling is that the White Paper does recognise the fundamental rights of property.

B574. Yes, I know?—And we feel we have on our side equal right to claim fundamental rights for the labouring classes.

B575. I am not denying that, but if it is conceded it does weaken the argument against the withdrawal of those rights which guarantee privileges to property. I will not pursue that because I have got your answer to that as far as possible. You are opposed to the principle of nomination?—Yes, we are opposed to it entirely.

B576. And would prefer that such representatives as you have were chosen by your own organisations?—Quite.

B577. Subject to removal and recall, and all the rest?—In the ordinary way.

B578. In any case, you ask us in the second paragraph of E for increased Labour representation?—Yes.

B579. The Franchise Committee, as you point out, recommended "a number which will give Labour a representation equal in strength to that proposed in the case of commerce"?—Yes.

ROY CHOWDHURY and Mr. N. M. JOSHI

B580. You would be satisfied with that? —Yes, because we point out in that same paragraph that capitalist interests are sub-divided into commerce and industry, landholders and Europeans, who, for all practical purposes will be voting, on questions which arise in the Legislature, on the side of the capitalists, and we claim that we should have the same amount of representation as these three interests put together.

Sir Hubert Carr.

B581. Might I ask a question as to whether the Witness would include a proportion of the depressed seats amongst Labour representation in comparing the total with your representation to capital as given in your Memorandum?—A few among the depressed classes may be there; it is rather a risk, but, especially in the first few elections, the landlords amongst the depressed classes will stand a very much better chance of election than the workers in the depressed classes, because elections in India are very expensive, as I know to my cost.

Earl of Derby.

582. And elsewhere?—Very much more in India than anywhere else. (Mr. Joshi) May I say a word in reply to Sir Hubert about the depressed classes. Theoretically it is true that the representatives of the depressed classes to a large extent should be the representatives of labour, but that is only theory. The difficulties are these. In the first place, the representatives of the depressed classes will be elected on communal electorates, with the result that social grievances will form the main plank for election. Secondly, as Mr. Shiva Rao said, it is the landlord among the depressed classes who has the better chance because he has the money to fight the election, but there is a third, and very important, reason why to-day we cannot afford to have them as Labour representatives, and it is this, that the depressed classes educationally are extremely backward. Any representatives whom they may send to the Legislature are not likely to understand the Labour point of view at all, and will not understand it for a long time to come. I do not suggest that the depressed classes should not get representation; I think they deserve it, because they have been kept down by the other classes so long that I should give them representation under any condition, but they are not likely to be useful for Labour representation, because they will not understand the ordinary Labour point of view, and they will not have the ability to put forward that point of view in the Legislatures. That is really our greatest difficulty.

Sir Hubert Carr.

B583. Do I understand that the man who comes from the depressed classes, and is thoroughly capable of looking after his interests with regard to water supplies, temple entry, and so on, is not able to look after his interests in a factory?—I am suggesting that for a long time to come the representatives of the depressed classes will not be able to fight with ability the strong and powerful capitalist representatives in the Legislatures. I shall give you a few instances.

Earl of Derby.] I think you have made your case quite clear. I think we quite understand it.

Lord Snell.

B584. May we now return to the question of Labour representation, Mr. Shiva Rao. In asking for this increased Labour representation you are trying to follow the findings of the Whitley Commission, which said: "The presence of representatives able to voice the desires and aspirations of Labour, and to translate these into concrete proposals, is essential for the proper consideration of measures affecting Labour"?—(Mr. B. Shiva Rao.) Yes.

B585. That is to say, you conceive an increased Labour representation as adding strength to the Indian Legislature in every way?—Absolutely, but I would urge just one other point, and that is this: During the last 12 years practically all the Labour legislation that has been put through at Delhi has had the support of the Government, and the Government has naturally used all its votes to back up its own proposals. We are not sure who will be in power when the Federation comes into existence, but, from present indications, it will certainly not be very pro-Labour in its tendencies, so we want to safeguard the interests of Labour by additional representation in view of that change.

B586. I will finish at that, Mr. Shiva Rao, and just ask you another question which rather troubles me. That is to say, you are apprehensive as to what the

ROY CHOWDHURY and Mr. N. M. JOSHI.

Provinces might do in regard to the implementation of International Labour Conventions that have been agreed to at the Centre?—That is in paragraph (M). That is our fear.

B587. If the Provincial Legislatures hesitated a great deal on these points, would it not be, on the whole, for financial reasons—questions of financial embarrassment to a Province—and would that not be met if some form of sub-Convention from the Centre to the Provinces could be made for the purpose of implementing the Conventions of that kind?—Yes, we should have absolutely no objection to that method being adopted not only in regard to International Conventions, but subjects like Health Insurance, Invalidity and Old Age Pensions, which have been made exclusively Provincial subjects and which we want to be made both Federal and Provincial with concurrent powers for both Legislatures.

B588. You draw attention to the under-representation of labour so to speak in the Upper House?—There is no representation at all in the Upper House.

B589. No. I mean, moved perhaps by the pathetic loneliness of Lord Ponsonby and myself, say, in the Upper House here, you feel that labour ought to be well represented in the Upper House?—We will not feel so lonely if we get 10 seats.

B590. Only just one more point, and that is about strikes. The question of disorder has been mixed up with strikes; it always is here, but there is no necessary connection between men who strike for an increased wage and public disorder, is there?—Absolutely none.

B591. And in most cases where there are strikes, there is no public disorder?—I can give you a concrete instance. For instance in Madras City, whenever there is a strike organised by unions, with which I am connected, first of all, I give notice to the employer, and I also give notice to the police, and the Commissioner of Police gets into touch with me and arranges how many police constables, inspectors, or sergeants, should be placed outside a mill. There has certainly never been any trouble in Madras City from the point of view of law and order. I can give you an instance of Madura, where there was a big lock-out in 1921, because an employer put up a notice that the registered trade union should be dissolved by a particular date, otherwise there would be a lock-out, and the men thought it would be better to defy the employer on principle, so they decided to be locked out. For seven weeks that lock-out lasted and 8,000 workers were in that lock-out. The Government refused to appoint a Court of Inquiry under the Trades Disputes Act although we asked for one. A sub-committee was appointed and the sub-committee unanimously reported, that, whereas before the union came into existence, whenever there was a strike there was always looting of shops, and the police had to be told to do special duty, after the union came into existence in spite of the fact that the lock-out went on for seven weeks there was not the slightest indication of any disorder.

B592. My last question is: Do you agree that it is unfair—not intentionally so, but, still, unfair—always to attach strikes to disorder?—I would say, there is singularly little trouble during a strike. Very occasionally when a strike or a lock-out has been prolonged for months there may be a little trouble here and there. I will give you the latest instance of the Madras Southern Mahratta Railway strike which lasted seven weeks last year when there was never any trouble.

Sir John Wardlaw-Milne.

B593. If I may say so, you did not in a sentence answer the question that was asked you, whether not taking Madras or Madura as special cases, but taking India as a whole, it was true that strikes had not been in the past generally associated with disorder of some kind?—Not generally.

B594. Your answer is No?—No.

Mr. Cocks.

B595. You said just now that you represent the largest Trades Union organisation in India?—Yes.

B596. I see you mention the Railway Unions in paragraph 1 of your memorandum?—Yes.

B597. Have they joined you now?—They are joining up. The new Federation—it is an amalgamated body—came into existence on the 10th May, and I left India on the 10th June, but even within those four weeks I know that four of the bigger unions had applied for affiliation.

B598. That would double your membership?—No; the actual membership given here, of Railway Unions is over 100,000. As a matter of fact, their latest Report gives 129,000 as the actual strength of the All-India Railwaymen's Federation.

Roy CHOWDHURY and Mr. N. M. JOSHI.

B599. Your numbers will be enormously increased; they will be doubled or trebled?—Yes.

B600. Is there any large trades union organisation outside your Federation?—There are local organisations like the Bengal Trades Union Federation. There is the Madras Central Labour Board. Those are organisations more for local purposes, if I may say so.

B601. You include in your members Hindus, Muslims and the depressed classes?—We make no distinction at all.

B602. The growth of the Trades Union movement in India, apart from any economic benefits it may bring, will have the effect of breaking down communal differences?—It has had, I claim, a considerable effect already in South India, where the depressed classes problem is probably more acute than in any other part. We make it a special rule in our unions, that we should have a certain number of depressed class men elected as our representatives.

B603. So it is having the effect of breaking down not only communal differences but class distinctions also?—To a very large extent I should say so.

B604. What would you say are the labour conditions in India, industrially; are they good or bad?—Only a few days ago there did appear a cabled summary of what the housing conditions are in Bombay City, and I must say they are not much better in the main industrial cities of India.

B605. Apart from the housing conditions; I am thinking more of factory conditions, the hours and conditions under which the workers work?—We are claiming now at least that the recommendation of the Whitley Commission, of a nine hours day, should be put into effect and also that there should be some safeguard to prevent wages being driven down as they are now being driven down, in the textile industry.

B606. Those things have not been brought about yet; you are trying to get them?—We are trying to get them.

B607. Is there any limitation of hours at all in India?—In the factories, yes. There is a 10 hours day in the factories. I would like to point out that there are many industrial establishments which do not come under the definition of "factories" where there is no regulation at all. For instance, in what we called the beedi factories, that is, the indigenous cigarette.

B608. What is the position regarding industrial and factory legislation in India? Is India backward there?—It is certainly very much backward in comparison to what you have in this country. There has been a certain amount of labour legislation put through during the last 10 years.

B609. But you have not made anything like the progress you would have liked to?—No.

B610. That is one of the reasons why you want legislation?—We hope the recommendations of the Whitley Commission will be put through.

Sir John Wardlaw-Milne.

B611. Is it not the case that the Factory Acts are extremely strict in India?—Strict in what sense?

B612. In regard to the hours. Are not they very strictly applied? I agree there may be some factories outside the Acts but so far as the Acts apply they are strictly applied?—I think the inspection of factories leaves a great deal to be desired, because many factories only receive one visit a year and I think, then, employers have previous warnings of it.

B613. It is not the Act but the application of it?—For violation of the provisions of the Factory Acts we hold that the punishments are far too light to be a deterrent.

B614. Again I say it is not the Act but the application of it?—Yes.

Mr. Cocks.

B615. In paragraph 2 of your memorandum, 54, I see you say, that your Federation has passed a resolution that this Constitution holds out "no prospect of the Indian masses and the working classes ever securing an adequate and effective voice and control in the legislature and administration of the country." When you say that, you are referring, are you not, not so much to the safeguards, but to the question of the franchise and the composition of the Chambers?—The restriction of the franchise and the utterly inadequate representation we shall have in the new legislatures.

B616. That is what you were thinking about; even if all the safeguards were swept away, you would still hold to that view?—We would still hold to that view.

ROY CHOWDHURY and Mr. N. M. JOSHI.

B617. On the question of the franchise you are in favour of adult suffrage, I understand?—Yes.

B618. There are certain administrative difficulties, you would admit?—Yes. That is why we have supported the view of the majority of Lord Lothian's Committee, that, at any rate, a beginning should be made in cities with a population of 100,000 or more.

B619. There are 30 of those, I understand, from your memorandum?—Yes, according to the latest census.

B620. Another suggestion you make is that in addition to the property qualification for a vote you think there ought to be a wage-earning qualification?—Yes. We attach very much importance to that.

B621. What sort of wage would you suggest should be the minimum?—We have suggested a wage of about 10 rupees a month.

B622. You suggest that that should be the qualification?—(Mr. N. M. Joshi.) That is in cities.

B623. Is that what you mean? That is failing getting adult suffrage?—(Mr. Shiva Rao.) If adult suffrage is not granted.

B624. You are also in favour of having a provision in the Constitution, for periodical revision of the franchise in the way of extending it?—Yes.

B625. What sort of period would you suggest—every 10 years?—About 10 years. That would be about two elections.

B626. Now about the Chambers themselves. I want to get this quite clear in my mind, because I am not clear at the moment. Let us take, first of all, the Provincial Chambers. As far as the First Chamber is concerned, where there are two Chambers in the Provinces you find it difficult to get representation even there in the ordinary way, do you not, because of the large size of the constituencies?—The size of the constituencies and the cost of fighting elections make it practically impossible for candidates who adopt the labour programme to get into these legislatures.

B627. What do you suggest in the way of altering that for the Provincial Lower Chamber?—That is why we have asked for special representation for labour—for adequate representation.

B628. Through Trades Union constituencies?—Through Trades Union constituencies.

Mr. Cocks.] Now about the Second Chamber in the Provinces—what do you suggest there?

Mr. Foot.

B629. None?—In the first place, we are against the establishment of Second Chambers in the Provinces.

Mr. Cocks.

B630. Yes; I understand that, but assuming the existence of them?—In the three Provinces where they have been proposed at present—

Sir John Wardlaw-Milne.

B631. I think it is stated that they want adequate labour representation?—Through an electoral college of the trades unions in those Provinces.

Mr. Cocks.

B632. That is for the Second Chamber?—Yes.

B633. Now for the Federal Assembly; you want more representation there?—Yes; we have asked for 25 instead of the 10 proposed.

B634. They would be elected by the Trades Unions themselves?—They would be elected by the Trades Unions.

B635. Now with regard to the Second Federal Chamber, you hold the view that at the present moment it is absolutely impossible for a single labour man to be a Member of that?—Yes; that is our view, because we are only very small in numbers in the various Provincial legislatures. The highest is in Bengal—eight—and we fear that those men will not be able to secure the return of even a single candidate from those legislatures to the Federal Upper House.

B636. As Factory Labour Legislation will have to go through that Chamber, you want a voice there?—Absolutely.

B637. What do you propose exactly for that Upper Chamber?—We have suggested that there should be an electoral college or colleges. We have asked for 10 seats in the Federal Upper House.

B638. Thank you very much. You heard what Mr. Chowdhury said about wanting safeguards for labour—special powers—but I understand you are against that?—We are absolutely against it, because we think that far from helping it, it is really a danger to labour. If law and order are transferred—(Mr. Chowdhury.) I never objected that law and order should be transferred. (Mr.

19° Julii, 1933.] Mr. B. SHIVA RAO, Mr. AFTAB ALI, Mr. K. C. [Continued.
ROY CHOWDHURY and Mr. N. M. JOSHI.

Shiva Rao.) Our difficulty at present is that labour is a reserve subject, and even if the members in the legislatures take up these questions with regard to labour in the Provinces, there is no real pressure put upon the Member in charge of labour, but if there is Provincial autonomy, I think we shall be able to safeguard our interests on the whole better through our own representatives in the legislatures, than through vesting special powers in a Governor, which we feel may be used against us.

B639. I do not understand what is the meaning of paragraph (r), the one about discriminatory legislation. Could you explain that a little. You are referring to paragraph 122 of the White Paper?—Our fear here is this. In the White Paper in small type at the bottom it is said "Without a qualification of this kind, legislation such as, e.g., the Indian Criminal Tribes Act, would be invalidated by the provisions of this paragraph" I can give you one or two instances where members of criminal tribes have been placed under certain disadvantages in strikes.

Sir John Wardlaw-Milne.] Are not we really on different things? Is that what the question is about? You are looking at the White Paper.

Earl of Derby.] We are talking of paragraph (r) of your memorandum.

Sir John Wardlaw-Milne.

B640. This is a question of discriminatory legislation?—Yes. It deals with paragraph 122 of the White Paper and our sub-paragraph (r) deals with the proviso to that. I can give you one or two instances.

Earl of Derby.

B641. Give us one instance. I think that will be sufficient?—I spoke of the lock-out in the Madura Mills in 1921. There are about 500 workers belonging to a criminal tribe working in that mill, I know the police put very great pressure upon those 500 workers to go into the mill and resume work, when the rest of the workers were standing out. What we fear is that that pressure will enable the Government of a Province to utilise the provisions of the Indian Criminal Tribes Act to break industrial strikes and lock-outs.

Mr. Cocks

B642. You are afraid that it will enable the Government to bring in what are known in this country as blacklegs?—Yes, and I mention this particularly because at Geneva the representatives of the Government, when they were speaking of the convention of forced labour sought exemption for the India Criminal Tribes Acts of the various Provinces—exemption from the application of the convention of forced labour. (Mr. N. M. Joshi.) As a matter of fact, in several strikes, these people who are under the Criminal Tribes Act are used as black-legs.

B643. They are criminal tribes, are they not? They live by thieving and things of that sort?—I beg your pardon.

B644. The criminal tribes are people who live by thieving and things of that sort. That is their habit?—These criminal tribes are under special legislation. Either they have to report themselves to the police or some of them have to live in a place called Criminal Tribes Settlements, and they have to do whatever work the Government order them to do.

Sir John Wardlaw-Milne.

B645. They are in process of being reclaimed?—(Mr. Shiva Rao.) It is wrong to say that all these tribes are criminal in their habits. They provided first-class material for the armies of the India Company in the 18th century. It was with the help of the tribes that are now criminal that they conquered large parts of South India, at any rate.

Mr. Cocks.

B646 Some of them are not really criminal in the sense in which the word is usually used?—No; they make excellent soldiers, I think.

B647. I want a little explanation of paragraph 4 (u) about the Railway Board. What is the full implication of that sub-paragraph? You do not want a Railway Board at all?—(Mr. Joshi.) We are suggesting that a Board should be established by the Indian Legislature and not by Parliament.

B648. Not by this Parliament?—No.

Sir John Wardlaw-Milne.

B649. This paragraph refers to the fact that Labour interests will be weakened, and will not be benefited by the establishment of a Statutory Board. It does not say "If the Statutory Board is established by an Indian Legislature it will be all right; if it is established by the White Paper it will be all wrong."

ROY CHOWDHURY and Mr. N. M. JOSHI.

Do I understand you have no objection to the Board, but it is a question of who appoints it. That is the answer you have just given?—If it is to be created it should be by the Indian Legislature, so that we can get the Constitution changed whenever we are strong enough.

B650. Meantime you object to the whole thing?—Yes.

B651. You object to the fact of the Statutory Board being appointed at all?—We first object to that, but if the Board is to be established it should be established by Indian Legislature.

B652. Leave the second part out, that is a minor matter. You are against the establishment of the Board. Why do you tell us a Board, however, established, would not be in the interests of Indian labour? Why should not a Board composed of experts be just as much in favour of Labour as persons who have no knowledge of railways?—It will depend on the creation of the Board. At present we feel if the Board is created under the present constituencies, when the claims of Labour are not sufficiently recognised, that Board is not likely to be favourable to Labour. It is a question of our ability to influence; whether we can influence Indian Legislature better than the British Parliament is a matter of opinion.

Earl of Derby.

B653. I understand your answer is this: You object to the whole proposal, but, at the same time, if there is to be one, you want it to be done by the Indian Legislature so that you feel that on that Legislature you may have more influence to change the provisions in the way you desire?—That is my point.

Sir John Wardlaw-Milne.

B654. My question arising on that is why should it be easier to influence a very large number than it would be to influence a small number? A small number would be a Board, however established. The Board would be a small number compared to the total Legislature?—You mean why should we object to a Board?

Sir John Wardlaw-Milne.] That is what I want to get at. It seems to be all in favour of Labour.

Sir Manubhai N. Mihta.

B655. "It is not right that the Federal Legislature's control over the policy and administration of Railways should in any way be weakened by the creation of a Statutory Railway Board." Why should it be weakened?—That depends on the constitution of the Railway Board. If we expect a Board where Labour will be sufficiently represented we may not take that view.

Sir John Wardlaw-Milne.

B656. You do not object to the Board, but you are interested in what the composition of the Board will be?—Yes, that is our view.

Lord Rankeillour.

B657. I am not quite clear what is the relation between the two bodies who are represented here?—(Mr. Shiva Rao.) The Unions which are affiliated to the Bengal Trades Union Federation—seven of them are affiliated also to the National Trades Union Federation, but the Bengal Trades Union Federation as such has no connection whatsoever with the National Trades Union Federation.

B658. There is no joint body or Congress which comprises both?—(Mr. Aftab Ali.) The Bengal Federation is particularly an organisation of the affiliated organisations of the Central Organisation (that is to say, the National Trades Union Federation) for Provincial purposes.

B659. There is no Trades Union Congress which comprises both the National Trades Union Federation and the Bengal Trades Union Federation?—In a way both are one. (Mr. Joshi.) The Bengal Trades Union Federation is not really a separate body. It consists of the same Unions which are affiliated to the larger body.

B660. But not all. There are some others besides, I understand?—I do not know of any.

B661. He said seven?—(Mr. Aftab Ali.) We have nine Unions in the Bengal Trades Union Federation, and of these nine Unions seven are here affiliated in our Federation, but two are taken into the Federation subject to their affiliation with the National Federation.

B662. There is overlapping, as it were?—Yes.

B663. Of the National Trades Union Federation what is the total membership of the Unions affiliated to them?—(Mr. Shiva Rao.) We have 78,000—that is the strength of the Unions affiliated to the Indian Trades Union Federation which is now merged in the National Trades

ROY CHOWDHURY and Mr. N. M. JOSHI.

Union Federation. In addition, the Railwaymen's Federation contains 129,000, and several of the Railway Unions are now coming into the National Trades Union Federation, so at the present moment, our strength would be, say, about 120,000 or 130,000. It is an approximate number.

B664. The National Trades Union Federation represent some 125,000?—Yes, approximately, because new Unions are now coming into this Central organisation.

B665. Can you tell me what is the total number of registered Trade Unionists in India?—I could give you that number, but just at the moment I cannot.

Sir John Wardlaw-Milne.] It is only a small addition to that total, because most of them are in the Federation.

Lord Rankeillour.

B666. I understand you want for your representation the representation confined to registered Trades Unions?—Yes.

Mr. Isaac Foot.

B667. Mr. Joshi, or Mr. Shiva Rao, you have gathered up your general objections to the White Paper, and then you particularise your objections at the end of your Memorandum. You speak about the White Paper proposals being reactionary. May I put this general question: Would you rather have conditions as they are, or the White Paper, if that could be achieved?—(Mr. Joshi.) I am not prepared to give a categorical reply, because it is difficult to-day to give that reply.

B668. It is only upon your own wording. You speak here in the middle of the last paragraph (that is where you gather everything up) of: "The inauguration of a Constitution on the lines of the White Paper will bring no relief to the Indian workers, and they are one with other sections of public opinion in India in condemning the proposals as reactionary." You have got that in your last paragraph. You see there "The inauguration of a Constitution." Will you read those three lines to yourself. The question is simply this, Mr. Joshi: You have been in touch, and no one is better qualified to speak than yourself. You condemn the White Paper proposals. Would you rather not have the White Paper proposals and leave things as they are, if that were the only choice?—As regards this sentence itself—

B669. I quite understand that you are opposed to the White Paper, that you want very substantial amendments of it? Supposing nothing more than the White Paper could be achieved, would you say you would rather have things as they are?—I will not give a definite reply to that to-day.

B670. I will not press you for a reply if you do not desire to give one. Mr. Joshi, you have been, of course, a colleague of ours in the adjoining room, and you have heard the contention made by Sir Charles Innes and others, that one advantage of a measure of reform would be the releasing of forces now devoted to barren political purposes to economic reform and social uplift. Is that the general contention of your Union? Would you believe that such forces could be released for that purpose by a large measure of self-government?—Yes, if the Legislatures are really representative of various interests, especially of the poorer classes, and, if they feel that the Legislatures will do them some good, I think that will be the result of the new Constitution.

Sir John Wardlaw-Milne.

B671. May I ask this one general question: If your anticipations regarding these alterations in the White Paper are not realised, do you think that there will be co-operation among the labouring classes in India for reforms on the basis of the White Paper, or will there be active opposition?—I prefer not to give a reply to that, because, although we are here to represent our organisation we do not know what view the organisation will take when that situation arises.

B672. You gave a figure of 120,000 to 130,000 as the number probably enrolled in the Trades Unions. I will assume that it may be that, or more?—(Mr. Shiva Rao.) To correct that particular point, I should say: enrolled in Unions affiliated to the National Trades Union Federation.

B673. There are just a few outside—small numbers?—Yes.

Sir John Wardlaw-Milne.] Let us assume 120,000, or 130,000, or 150,000, or 200,000. Can you give us any idea at all how many people are engaged in industry in India? I only want the roughest answer.

19^o July, 1933.] Mr. B. SHIVA RAO, Mr. AFTAB ALI, Mr. K. C. [Continued.
ROY CHOWDHURY and Mr. N. M. JOSHI.

Earl of Derby.

B674. It is given here?—(Mr. Joshi.) That depends on what we call "industry." If it is organised industry—

Sir John Wardlaw-Milne.

B675. I meant organised industry such as your Trades Unions deal with?—(Mr. Shiva Rao.) 4,000,000 to 5,000,000. (Mr. Joshi.) We have given the figures.

B676. 4,000,000 to 5,000,000?—Yes.

B677. Of which your Trades Unions at present represent, whatever it may be, 150,000 to 200,000?—Yes.

B678. It is therefore the case that, speaking for the Trades Unions at the moment, you cannot be said to be speaking at the moment for those engaged in industry in India?—It is really a representation through those who are organised, but we consider that is the fairest representation, because there are no other people who will be able to represent them.

B679. I quite agree that there is nobody else to put their case?—Exactly.

B680. But you still agree with my point?—Yes.

B681. That it is only a very small number who are actually represented?—Yes.

B682. You said in the early part of your evidence that one of the fundamental rights that you wanted was a right to Old Age Pensions, and that kind of thing?—Yes.

B683. Do you know anywhere in the world where there is a fundamental right to an Old Age Pension? Is not that a matter purely of Government action in one country or another, according to the financial conditions of the country?—There are some Constitutions in which the social legislation is put down as a fundamental right—some European Constitutions.

B684. There may be some. I do not know of them. I will be glad if you will tell us?—There are some.

B685. You have suggested that your Trades Unions representatives should be elected by some form of electoral College in the same way as the Chambers of Commerce?—Yes, that is for the Central Legislature.

B686. You realise that in the case of the Chambers of Commerce of India the electorate is a very small one?—Yes, their electorate is a small one.

B687. Generally speaking, it would be true to say that it is an educated electorate?—Yes.

B688. By that I mean that the members then asked to vote would have a knowledge of the people they are asked to vote for, and their qualifications, and so on?—Yes.

B689. It is surely not the case that you can compare such an electorate with the electorate you could get through a Trades Union as at present constituted?—I think our members will know our representatives. If it is a question of mere knowing, they will know who can speak for them, and who will defend their interests.

B690. You think they can act in the same way?—I think in this matter they can.

B691. You think they could be trusted to represent the 4,000,000 who are not in the Trades Unions?—I think they could be trusted and should be trusted. (Mr. Shiva Rao.) If the suggestion be that the members of the Executives of Trade Unions, because some of them are illiterate, therefore they are incapable of taking wise decisions, may I say, with all respect, it is a very mistaken point of view.

B692. Let me make it quite clear. I have never made any such suggestion. I have merely asked whether they would represent them. I have not made any such suggestion. You are asking for Trade Union Constituencies?—Yes.

B693. That is constituencies which will elect representatives who are Trade Unionists?—Registered Trade Unionists.

B694. Do you know any country in the world where Trade Unionists have a right to be elected because they are Trade Unionists?—I do not know that Chambers of Commerce have. We are dealing with very special conditions in India and we are asking for the same right that has been given to commercial and landlords' organisations.

B695. You know of no other case; but in India the circumstances are exceptional?—Yes. (Mr. Joshi.) And the Royal Commission and the Indian Labour Committee have recommended it.

B696. You refer to the disadvantageous effects of tariff measures in India. Is it not the case that one of the greatest causes of the poverty, or so-called poverty, of India is due to the fact that the agriculturist, owing to the subdivision of land and increase of population, has only work for about 150 days in the year? You know that?—(Mr. Chowdhury.) Yes.

ROY CHOWDHURY and Mr. N. M. JOSHI.

B697. Therefore, is it not desirable to some extent, and if tariffs result in an increase in the industrial life of India, is it not a good thing, if that results, that it should provide employment for the people?—If it is not a discriminatory tariff it benefits one class as against another.

B698. It is not tariffs you object to: It is the kind of tariffs?—Yes.

Earl of Derby] Mr. Chowdhury, we can now release you.

(Mr. Chowdhury is directed to withdraw.)

Witness (Mr. Joshi.) May I make a short statement?

Earl of Derby.

B699. I was about to ask you if you wished to do so?—As regards the two representations, I would like the Sub-Committee to note, in the first place, this fact, that seven out of the nine Unions which the Bengal Federation has got are affiliated to the Central body. That is one fact. The second fact I would like the Committee to note is this, that I myself was present when the meeting was held to discuss this question at Calcutta. In the meeting at Calcutta the majority of the members present were from Bengal and belonged to the Bengal Trades Union Federation. If they had to say anything different from us the whole document which is before us, namely, Memorandum 54, would have been according to their view, but this document—the resolutions—was approved by the whole body that was present, without any objection by anybody. We therefore hold that even the Bengal Trades Union Federation approves of the document which we have presented and for which we stand. As regards the particular point raised by Mr. Chowdhury, namely, the special powers given to the Governor to protect Labour interests, I have made it quite clear that we do not agree with that view because we feel that the special power of the Governor is more likely to be used against us than in our favour. Secondly, I think there is some reference in his Memorandum to Special Labour Constituencies. We have also explained that as regards that, our view is that, so far as possible, we would prefer a representation of Labour through Trade Unions rather than through Special Constituencies. We consider there is a disadvantage to labour through Special Constituencies because our candidates will not have sufficient money to fight elections in large constituencies. That will be our real disadvantage. Therefore, we would prefer, so far as possible, all the representation to be given to Labour to be given through Trade Unions. That is all that I have to say.

B700. Would you like to add anything, Mr. Shiva Rao?—(Mr. Shiva Rao.) I would like to make one point only in addition to what Mr. Joshi has said. From the questions asked it seems that some Members of the Committee have the impression (and I think that is supported to a certain extent by the Memorandum Mr. Chowdhury put forward) that in recent years in India strikes have been engineered for political purposes and that Unions are under the control of politicians. I would like to say this, that, while it is undoubtedly true that when Mr. Gandhi started the first Non-Co-operation Movement in 1920 or 1921, a few strikes of that character did take place. It is equally true that during the last three years, when the Civil Disobedience Movement has been very strong, the Congressmen have kept absolutely aloof from Trade Unions.

Mr. A. H. Ghuznavi.

B701. Not in Bengal?—It may not be so in Bengal, but I am talking of some big strikes which have taken place in India during the last three years while the Civil Disobedience Movement has been going on: a railway strike, the strikes in South India in the textile mills: every one of those strikes has taken place absolutely on economic grounds.

B702. What about Bombay?—There it was wage cuts and retrenchment in the railways. Congressmen have said to me in private, "We keep aloof from the Unions because we do not want your Unions to come under the Ordinances." I would make this point quite clear, because there may be an impression in the minds of some people that the Unions are likely to be captured by politicians. We Unions are strong, we are able to hold our own even against Congressmen. In a Municipal Election in Madras Congress decided to put up a candidate against ours, and we won the election by 320 to 200 votes. It was a municipal election. (Mr. Aftab Ali.) I wish to say that the Memorandum submitted by Mr. Chowdhury has been printed in London. If the Bengal Trades Union Federation officially prepared a Memorandum I think it would have been better advised to have printed it in Calcutta, and they could have sent it here.

19^o Julii, 1933.] Mr. B. SHIVA RAO, Mr. AFTAB ALI and Mr. N. M. JOSHI.

Earl of Derby.

B703. I think you have made your point quite clear?—(Mr. Shiva Rao.) We sent copies of this Memorandum to all our affiliated Unions in India just before I left. (Mr. Aftab Ali.) My next point is this: I do not say that we did not appoint Mr. Chowdhury as our representative, but, at the same time, when we left, there was no certainty whether he would be called as a witness or not, and our Memorandum was prepared by the Federation and this other Memorandum of his I want the Committee to treat as a personal one and not as the Memorandum of the Bengal Trades Union Federation. The next thing is the special powers for the Governor for which he has asked in the name of the Federation. This I consider will be a very great danger because, whatever powers the Governor has now, at least so far as I am concerned, always go against the workers. There has been talk of disorder, of strikes and all these things. So far as I know, especially in Bengal, whenever we have had a strike it has always been the Police who created the disorder, not the people who took part in the strike. Mr. Chowdhury feared that the Trades Unions would be captured by the politicians. If the Trades Unions could be captured, I, a seaman signing for 18 rupees a month in 1922, would not be going to Geneva as a delegate and also coming before this Committee to-day.

Earl of Derby.] We are very much obliged to you gentlemen?

(The Witnesses are directed to withdraw.)

SUB-COMMITTEE C.

DIE MERCURII, 26^o JULII, 1933

Present :

Marquess of Lothian.
Mr. Butler.
Major The Hon. E. Cadogan.
Mr. Cocks.

Mr. Davidson.
Mr. Foot.
Sir Samuel Hoare.
Miss Pickford.

DELEGATES :

Dr. Ambedkar.
Begum Shah Nawaz.

Sir Hari Singh Gour.

The MARQUESS of LOTHIAN in the Chair.

Lady LAYTON, Mrs. O. STRACHEY and Sir PHILIP HARTOG, are called in and examined as follows :

Marquess of Lothian.

Q1. Lady Layton, are you acting as spokesman of the Delegation?—(Lady Layton) Yes.

Q2. You represent the list of Associations and Societies mentioned in the Memorandum?—Yes.

Q3. And certain other individuals?—Yes. The Memorandum is as follows :

MEMORANDUM 50. EVIDENCE ON BEHALF OF THE BRITISH COMMITTEE FOR INDIAN WOMEN'S FRANCHISE.

COMPOSITION OF COMMITTEE.

1. The British Committee for Indian Women's Franchise represents over two million women voters of this country, belonging to associations with widely differing aims, and including members of all political parties. Besides associations a number of Members of Parliament, both men and women, and others specially interested in the subject have joined the Committee.

We are united in our desire to register in the strongest terms our protest against the inadequacy of the proposals of the White Paper in regard to women's franchise, and to urge the Joint Select Committee to make recommendations which will secure a ratio of women to men voters, both for the Federal and Provincial Legislatures, at least equal to the ratio of one woman to four and a-half men proposed by the Indian Franchise Committee.

REASONS FOR THE BRITISH COMMITTEE'S SUPPORT OF THE CLAIMS OF INDIAN WOMEN TO AN ADEQUATE FRANCHISE.

2. The reasons why our Committee feel impelled to take action in this matter can be very briefly stated.

(a) The problem of making a new Constitution for India is one which affects Britain as well as India. The provisions of that new Constitution will have to be approved by Parliament, and the responsibility for those provisions must rest ultimately on the electors, both men and women.

(b) Our Committee feel a deep concern and responsibility in regard to the provisions specifically affecting women. This is the only occasion on which organised British women as fully enfranchised citizens have had the opportunity of effectively influencing the destinies of the women of India.

(c) The Women's Movement has always been international in its outlook, bringing together women of all countries working with similar aims and ideals, and thus fostering a feeling of solidarity among women. But between the women of Britain and the women of India the bond is particularly close. It is a bond, not only of association under a common flag for 150 years, but a bond strengthened by the ties of love and friendship in common social and educational work. British women have watched with sympathy and admiration the rapid progress of the Women's Movement in India, and are anxious to place at the service of the women of India all the help that they can give from their own wider political experience.

(d) The disabilities, legal and social, from which the women of India still suffer, their lack of educational opportunities, and the fact that for 150 years the government of India has been almost entirely in men's hands, make it imperative that women should be given adequate opportunity and power to express their views in the new Constitution.

(e) It is the declared policy of Government to see that the interests of all sections of India's population are fairly represented, and our Committee wish to emphasise the fact that for no section of the community is this more necessary than for the women of India.

British Women and the Franchise.

3. Not many years have passed since the women of Great Britain achieved full rights of citizenship. Every step thus won—opportunities of education, the entry into learned professions, rights affecting the status of wives and mothers, political rights—was won after a long and arduous struggle, to which the entire working lives of innumerable women were devoted and on which vast sums of money were expended. Especially during the closing years of the struggle, much bitterness was engendered and many unhappy incidents took place. It would be a grave misfortune if in India, where the work of women in many fields of social and educational effort is so sorely needed, a similar struggle became necessary.

4. Members of our Committee realise how much the vote has meant to the women of this country. It has served both as a means of self-protection and as an opportunity for bringing their influence to bear for the benefit of the whole community, especially in the realm of social welfare. With regard to their own protection, for instance, it is noteworthy, that during the first eighteen years of this century, only four Acts were passed relating specially to the position of women, whereas, during the nine years after their partial enfranchisement, some 20 Acts were passed dealing with questions such as the removal of sex disabilities, the admission of women to Parliament, to the Bench and to the legal profession, etc., to the rights of guardianship over children, to the position of unmarried mothers, to widows' and orphans' pensions, and so on. On questions affecting the whole community, the influence of women voters has been most noticeable in the increasing support given to causes such as disarmament, housing and education.

Indian Women and the Franchise.

5. It may be argued that advances for British women were spread over a long period and that the small measure of franchise proposed by the White Paper is a fair instalment considering the present status of women in India. It has always been brought up as an argument against the extension of the franchise to any new category of voters in this country, and no doubt in others, that they are not sufficiently educated, politically or otherwise. This argument does not take into account the great strides which the women's movement in India has made during the last few years, stimulated very largely by the political desire for national self-government. A generous measure of enfranchisement is the surest way of directing these energies along constitutional lines. Experience has shown that the most thorough and effective method of providing political education is to give the actual responsibility of the vote. Further, those members of our Committee who have worked in India wish to endorse the statement of the Education Committee of the Statutory Commission, that "The innate intelligence of the Indian woman, her feeling of domestic responsibility, her experience of household management, make her shrewd, penetrating, wise within her own sphere. In all matters of educational and social reform, the counsel and the active work of women are essential both in administration and public affairs."

6. The grave legal and social disabilities which Indian women have for years been attempting to remove affect the efficiency of the whole nation. Girls' education still lags far behind the boys', the evil of child marriage is still rampant, maternal mortality is terribly high, the provision of medical aid for women totally inadequate, the laws of inheritance inequitable. At present the sum spent on girls' education in British India is about one-seventh of that spent on the education of boys. Although there are some 250,000 women factory workers, there is still only one woman Factory Inspector. As testified by the unanimous opinion of medical women in India, very little progress can be made in providing adequate medical aid for women unless and until women administrative medical officers are appointed in each province.

On such grounds it is essential that women should be placed in a position to secure attention to their needs from the very foundation of the new Constitution and during its most important formative years. The framing of a new Constitution presents a unique opportunity which will have passed, once the constitutional structure has taken definite shape and hardened along definite lines. Fresh vested interests will grow up, and it may be increasingly difficult for women to obtain a fair share of educational funds and a portion of administrative posts if these are not obtained at the outset.

CRITICISM OF THE FRANCHISE PROPOSALS OF THE WHITE PAPER. ALTERNATIVE SUGGESTIONS.

7. The proposals of the White Paper actually reduce the voting strength for women suggested by the Indian Franchise Committee to a nominal ratio of one woman to seven men for the Provincial, and one woman to 20 men for the Federal Legislatures. Can it possibly be claimed that such a franchise will give women an effective 'voice'?

The Literacy Qualification.

8. The reduction in numbers of the women's vote in the White Paper proposals as compared with those of the Indian Franchise Committee is due to the dropping of the proposed test of simple literacy as a qualification for women voters. This test would have, for women, the very great advantages that it would increase their voting strength as time goes on without further legislation, that it would apply alike to the unmarried, the married and the widowed, to those who have received their education at home as well as those who have been to school, and that it would serve as a stimulus to education, both that of girls and that of adult women. It has the unanimous support of women, both in England and in India. According to the proposals of the White Paper, only in the province of Madras is it retained. In four provinces the educational standard now demanded is no less than matriculation or school-leaving certificate, a standard which very many educated women have had no chance of attaining, for lack of suitable schools or because they were in purdah. We members of the British Committee for Indian Women's Franchise, desire to protest most strongly against this modification of the Franchise Committee's proposal, and urge the Joint Select Committee to accept simple literacy as a qualification for the franchise for women in all provinces. If the obstacles alleged against it are administrative, and these can be overcome in Madras, it is difficult to believe that they are insuperable in other provinces. Evidently they were not, so considered at the time when the Franchise Committee undertook its detailed investigations in India only a year ago and made its recommendations.

Application for the Vote.

9. A second, hardly less important, whittling down of the Franchise Committee's proposals in the White Paper is the provision that a woman qualified to vote in respect of her husband's property must apply to be put on the register, though her husband is not required to do so.

This proviso seems to the Committee not only an unfair discrimination between men and women, but one calculated to reduce the estimated voting ratio of one woman to seven men to something very far below that estimate. Even in this country it would be found very irksome, but for Indian women there is in most places so much less freedom of movement than for Englishwomen that such a provision, in the opinion of many well qualified to judge, could not fail to result in a very substantial reduction of the potential voters.

We note with satisfaction that the White Paper itself states in this connection—“His Majesty's Government are very anxious that the proportion of women electors should be adequate, and further consideration of the above arrangements may be necessary.” Our Committee, therefore, urge most strongly, that this new discrimination between men and women should not be imposed.

If, however, the Joint Select Committee should unfortunately come to the conclusion that the condition of application is unavoidable, then it will be most necessary that the numbers thus lost should be made up by one of the alternative qualifications suggested in the Memorandum submitted by Miss Rathbone (para. 16), or in some other way.

Franchise for the Federal Legislature.

10. For the Federal Legislature, in order to secure an adequate proportion of women electors, the Indian Franchise Committee made two proposals, viz.: (1) that for the first election the names of all women entered on the provincial rolls under the literacy qualification should be included as voters and subsequently retained on the roll and (2) that the educational qualification for women after the first election should be by the Upper Primary Standard.

26° Julii, 1933.]

Both these proposals are dropped in the White Paper, which lays down no special qualifications for women.

Yet it was expressly stated by the Prime Minister in his letter of instructions to the Indian Franchise Committee that:

"His Majesty's Government attach special importance to the question of securing a more adequate enfranchisement of women than the existing system, which applies to women the same qualifications as to men, and has produced a women's electorate numbering less than one-twentieth of the total male electorate."

And the White Paper itself again states that:

"His Majesty's Government fully appreciate the importance of a large women's electorate for the Federal Assembly."

In spite of these pronouncements, the ratio of women to men is left at its present low and totally inadequate figure. The reasons given in the White Paper are administrative difficulties and objections to a differential franchise based on education. Our Committee cannot feel that these difficulties are insurmountable (cf. Memorandum by Miss Rathbone, para. 7).

If, as we hope, the qualification of simply literacy is accepted for the Provinces, then the roll so prepared should be used also for the first election for the Federal Legislature, as recommended by the Franchise Committee.

Alternatively, our Committee supports the suggestions made in several Memoranda,* that an addition to the women's electorate may conveniently be made by adding the wives of the men property voters for the Centre, whose names will be readily available from the rolls of the voters for the provincial councils.

Franchise on Husband's Property Qualification.

11. Lastly, the British Committee for Indian Women's Franchise are aware that there is a strong feeling among many, though not all, of the organised women in India against the proposed enfranchisement of women on the property qualification of their husbands. We should like to point out that these Indian women's associations took their stand from the beginning on adult suffrage, because they believed it to be the only means of giving representation to all interests, including equal voting strength to men and women. We understand that they have now put forward as an alternative adult suffrage in urban areas only.

Our Committee fully realise the importance of meeting the desires of Indian women, but in case the Joint Select Committee should consider it impossible to grant their demand in this respect, we wish to register our carefully considered view that the granting of special qualifications to women, such as the Married Women's qualification, would represent a far nearer approach to real equality than the granting of a paper equality which would in fact enfranchise only a minute proportion of women.

Members of our Committee desire to record their own experience of the vote given on the husband's property qualification. This was in use in this country from 1918 to 1928 to supplement the independent property qualification. Although there was at first some hesitation in accepting this qualification, it worked quite satisfactorily and caused no resentment in practice in spite of the large number of professional and industrial unmarried women in England who were excluded at the time from exercising the vote. It raised the status of all women by giving them an effective voice in the government of the country, and that of married women in particular by showing that the State valued their experience as mothers and home-makers. It was also found that men who had had misgivings as to the wisdom of granting the suffrage to women were reassured by a conviction that the mothers of families were likely to prove a stabilising element in the community and to exercise their vote with a due sense of responsibility.

Apart from adult suffrage, the wife's vote is the only qualification suggested in the White Paper, which enfranchises immediately any large number of women. Should it be dropped and no other qualification substituted in its place, the women's vote would fall to about 2 millions for the whole of British India, making it entirely negligible in any single constituency and for any single candidate.

OTHER PROPOSALS SUPPORTED BY THE BRITISH COMMITTEE.

Upper Chamber.

12. No mention is made in the White Paper of any provision as regards women in the Upper Chamber of the Federal Legislature. Our Committee urge that provision should be made to secure the inclusion of a certain number of women in that Chamber and that the qualifications required of members should be adjusted so as to facilitate this.

Fundamental Rights.

13. We note from the White Paper (page 37) that His Majesty's Government proposes to provide for what are commonly called "fundamental rights" in two ways, namely, by including certain provisions in the Constitution Act and by recommending others not suitable for statutory enactment for inclusion in a pronouncement by the Sovereign. Our Committee urge that in both classes of provision, the case of women be taken specifically into account. In matters especially of "personal liberty and eligibility for public office," it is desirable to guard against discrimination on the ground of sex no less than of caste or religion. The Report of the Minorities Sub-Committee of the Round Table Conference, 12th November, 1930, to 19th January, 1931, states that:

"One of the chief proposals brought before the Sub-Committee, was the inclusion in the Constitution of a declaration of fundamental rights safeguarding the cultural and religious life of the various communities and securing to every individual, without discrimination as to race, caste, creed or sex, the free exercise of economic, social and civil rights." (Page 46.) In Great Britain, the Sex Disqualification (Removal) Act (1919) provides a precedent for dealing with a number of disabilities based on sex in a single comprehensive Act. The experience of that Act also, however, warns our Committee of the necessity for very careful drafting, if comprehensive declarations of this kind are to be really effective in achieving their purpose.

SUMMARY AND CONCLUSION.

14. The British Committee for Indian Women's Franchise urge the Joint Select Committee:

(1) To accept simple literacy as a qualification for the franchise for women in all Provinces:

(2) Not to impose the condition of application for women voters qualified in respect of their husband's property qualification:

(3) In the event of the condition of application being considered unavoidable, to replace the number of voters thus lost by some alternative qualification:

(4) To increase the ratio of women voters for the Federal Legislature by reverting to the proposals of the Indian Franchise Committee or by adding the wife voters from the Provincial rolls.

(5) To make provisions for the inclusion of women in the Upper Chamber of the Federal Legislature:

(6) To include women in any declaration of "fundamental rights."

In conclusion, the members of this Committee desire once more to urge that, on whatever qualifications the franchise is finally based, the women's voting strength should be made up at the very least to the ratio of one woman to 4½ men, both for the Federal and Provincial Legislatures.

The Simon Commission, the Round Table Conference, the Indian Franchise Committee, and His Majesty's Government itself have repeatedly acknowledged the importance of securing an adequate voting ratio for women. If the Joint Select Committee sincerely desire to satisfy the legitimate expectations aroused among the women of India and of Great Britain by these repeated declarations, we feel confident that means of surmounting the administrative difficulties can and will be found.

Franchise for Indian women? It has no other purpose?—That is quite correct.

C5. And you claim to represent some 2,000,000 voters, which, I suppose, means the Members of these other Associations?—That is so.

C6. Should I be correct in interpreting your Memorandum to mean that the primary consideration you have in mind is that the ratio of women to men voters should be at least equal to one woman to 4½ men, rather than any specific detail?—Yes, that is so.

C7. I do not know whether you have had an opportunity of reading the evidence which has been published in the last few days in regard to the Women's question?—Yes, I have followed it very closely.

C8. Do you want to add anything to your Memorandum in the light of that evidence?—I should like to be able to do so.

C9. Will you make a statement now, then?—I should like to recall, first of all, that the Organisations I represent do really cover practically all the organised women in this country of all Parties, and doing every kind of work, and that we have set out in our Memorandum submitted to the Committee what they consider to be the minimum conditions that will ensure a reasonable enfranchisement of women under the new Indian Constitution. These proposals are far more modest than the claims of some of the Indian Women's Organisations; but though we are fully at one with the Indian Women as to the immense importance, from a social, economic and political point of view, of giving as great a measure of political power as possible to Indian women, we recognise the practical difficulties expounded in the Lothian Report, and we realise that the full enfranchisement of women means a revolution in India, and that it can only be accomplished by stages. The Women's Organisations have, however, been profoundly disappointed to see that the White Paper has still further whittled down the Lothian Report, and in particular we regret that the Secretary of State in his evidence has defended the proposition that wives of present property voters to the Provincial Councils should only be enfranchised on application instead of being put on automatically. This will so reduce the number of women on the electorate as to make it utterly inadequate. If I have followed the Secretary of State's evidence

C4. Would I be correct in saying that this is a Committee specially constituted for dealing with the problem of the

correctly, the main reasons for this are administrative difficulties; first, the administrative difficulty of enrolling wives; and, secondly, the administrative difficulty of providing polling accommodation for so large a number of women at the first elections. As regards this first administrative difficulty, we suggest this could be overcome by enrolling the wife merely as the wife of "Mr So-and-So," and making the husband responsible for her identification in the polling booth at the first election, instead of attempting to get the actual names of the wives from each individual voter. I understand that a canvass of these voters is, anyhow, made at regular intervals for Revenue registers. It would surely not add very considerably to the administrative burdens if, at the same time, a note was taken as to which property voters had a wife or wives living. As regards the second point, the White Paper suggests that its proposals will enfranchise for the Provincial Councils one woman for every seven men as compared with one woman for five men in the Franchise Committee's proposals, but the Secretary of State admitted, if I interpreted his evidence correctly, that if three million out of the 4,000,000 wives do apply, which is what is assumed in making up this proportion of one in seven, the administrative advantages in this respect would not be worth the differential treatment of the women, but, obviously, expected that the application would be some figure far less than this, which would mean that we should in the end get a proportion of women to men enfranchised of something like one in 16, or even something as low as one in 20. It would only be in this way that you would get this second relief, a relief which I venture to say cannot be obtained if the White Paper's original proportion of one in seven actually takes place. This only corroborates what we have said in our Memorandum, that application by the wives and dropping the literacy qualification will really enfranchise only about one woman to about 16 or 20 men—not one woman to every seven men. In this country when the registers were left to the Party machines to bring up-to-date, we all know how very few individual men and women took the initiative, in advance of the excitement of an election, to get themselves enrolled. How much more must this be so for both men and women in India? Yet we ask the women, thousands of whom are in purdah, and miles from any polling station, with few postal or transport facilities, many of them unable to read, to take this very difficult step. Is it not a wholly unreasonable demand? In any case, the number who will vote at the first election will be much smaller than at subsequent elections for all these and other reasons. When it is more fully realised that issues of burning interest to the women are under discussion, and they realise the power of the vote, this will change. We should like further to suggest that, as with us, the women who apply will do so mostly at the instigation of the most strongly organised political party; in India this undoubtedly is the Congress party. Would it not be wiser to encourage the political consciousness of the more moderate elements in the community, by not increasing the difficulties under which they must in any case labour? We would like to remind the Secretary of State and the Committee of the increasing part that the women have taken in the recent political movements, and the importance of winning their support in the building up of the new Constitution. We are quite certain that if the proposals in the White Paper are not improved in this respect, there will be such strong feeling among all the organised Indian women in India that they will undoubtedly stir up difficulties which will create quite as great administrative difficulties as the proposals attempt to meet. We feel it would be so much wiser to enlist their support by treating them fairly and justly at the outset than to create unrest among all the Indian women who have so strongly supported in the past all attempts to improve the health and social welfare of the people. It would be so much better to enlist their support at the outset than to drive them to desperate action because they have been unfairly treated. Furthermore, I want to make it quite clear that the organised women of this country, of all political parties and employed in every walk of life, are not prepared to accept the administrative difficulties laid before us by the Secretary of State as a sufficient reason to hand over to the male voters of India the problems of Child Marriages, Child Welfare, Guardianship of Infants, the relations of husband and wife, the laws relating to property, the whole gamut of problems whose solution or neglect will do more than anything else to decide if India is to be a peaceful, happy, healthy and economically sound nation. A Federal Assembly in which women's voting strength is one in 20, so low as to be of no practical value, and in the Provincial Assembly one in 16, is totally inadequate. We urge you to accept, remembering that the Simon Commission after full investigation proposed a proportion of one to two, while the last Round Table Conference took the proportion of one in five as an unalterable basis on which to build—

Mr. Isaac Foot.

C10. A minimum basis?—Yes. I am obliged for the correction. —and throw upon the Provincial Governments during the next three months the responsibility of finding the most administratively possible way of bringing this about. In reply to the defence of the Government against granting a specially reduced literacy qualification to women, we suggest that the very inferior educational opportunities given to women entirely justify the difference. Sir Philip Hartog will give evidence on this point. As to the administrative difficulties, I should just like to make one point. We note that in the White Paper the differential qualifications to be prescribed for the scheduled classes are still under consideration. If the literacy qualification suggested for this purpose by the Franchise Committee is likely to be applied there, could not similar methods for its application be equally well arranged for the women? This has been the only method proposed so far for increasing at the first election the proportion of women voting for the Federal Assembly. We notice also that you consider it necessary to insert in the Constitution a definite period during which no change can take place in the Franchise at all, and later say that the Federal Legislature will, presumably, settle further advances for the Federation, and the Provincial Legislatures for the Provinces. This means that this is the last chance for the British Parliament and public to influence the matter at all, and give the women of India, who are anyhow in a minority in the community, the power to get rid of the grave injustices under which they suffer, to-day, to an extent probably greater than in any other country in the world. We will not dwell on these in detail; Miss Rathbone has done that adequately in her memorandum, which we strongly endorse, but in a country which has more than 5,000,000 wives under the age of 15 and more than 100,000 child-widows under the age of 10, and a maternal mortality estimated in some districts to be 40 per 1,000, and even in the most healthy districts 20 to 30 per 1,000, this, surely, should give us pause before we hand over the power over these women without adequate representation for them to stand up for their own rights and improve their conditions. For the last 150 years individual English women have done heroic service for women in India, but until the last decade it could be truly said that the men of this country had the determining voice in regard to the status of women in India, so far as it could be affected by the Governing administration. Also, since the Montagu Reforms, women, though enfranchised on technically equal terms, have only had a voting strength of 1 in 20, and the tendency of the new Indian administration, so far as Indians have had control in the Provinces, has been still further to increase the discrepancy between girls' and boys' education and to do very little to improve the medical treatment of the women in the villages. Since the enfranchisement of women in this country, we feel that we share the responsibility, and that we should be betraying the interests of Indian women if we acquiesced in Parliament setting up a Constitution under which their representation is extremely small, and the prospects of its extension extremely remote. For that reason, we take a very strong stand that we shall not be prepared to accept anything which gives a proportion of women to men in the new Constitution of less than 1 in 5. I should like to make one or two remarks which we have not made in our Memorandum with regard to the Federal Assembly and the Council of State, if that is in order now. We deprecate very strongly the election of women to the Federal Assembly only by the transferable vote of the Provincial Councils. We feel that it is most important that the nine women in the Federal Assembly should really be free to speak on behalf of the women of the whole country, and that if they are elected by the transferable vote of the Provincial Councils, by the communal conditions of those Councils they will inevitably be communal women, instead of being free and specially chosen because of their capacity to understand and speak for the needs of the women throughout the country. Alternative methods of election have been put forward in Miss Rathbone's Memorandum. We only want to emphasise here our reasons for this objection. The organised women in India and the women who have taken an active part in bringing about the Sarda Act and in pressing for improvement in the condition of education and health, are most anxious to be sure that they will be actually in the Federal Assembly, and we very much fear that the methods proposed may not have that result, but that you will have women who will vote as they are told rather than women who will be independent spokesmen. With regard to the Council of State, we should very much like to know and we wish to urge that women should be eligible; we are not clear whether they are so at present, and we wish to secure that the conditions of election should be such as to make the eligibility of a considerable number of women possible; and, thirdly, we make the suggestion that, if Indian Christians, Anglo-Indians and Europeans can have 10 seats reserved for them to be chosen by electoral colleges among all the representatives of those communities in the different Councils, it might be practicable for the women members of the Provincial Councils also to form an electoral college and elect one or two members. I have no other particular remarks to make supplementing the evidence. Sir Philip Hartog wishes to speak on the literacy qualification, and the practicability of that, and Mrs. Strachey will speak on the reasons why the English Women's Organisations are so determined, through the practical experience of what we have achieved through our enfranchisement, to see that the Indian women have the same opportunity that we have. (Sir Philip Hartog.) May I explain, first of all, why I appear in this position. I have never been a politician; but I have been driven into fervent advocacy of Women's Franchise in India, because of my investigations as Chairman of the Education Committee of the Simon Commission. I discovered at the very outset that the most important, and the most neglected factor in Indian education was the education of the girls. You will understand in a moment why I say that. In India as a whole, according to the latest census figures, 18½ per cent. of the men of 20 years of age and over are literate, 2.9 or 3 per cent. of the women. In the schools you find about one-eighth of the total amount spent on education spent on the girls who form half the population. You find a tragic wastage in the schools. I suppose about 60 per cent. of the money spent on primary education of all the children, and about 90 per cent. of the money spent on the primary education of the girls, is wasted because it needs four years under present conditions in India, with the large mass of illiterate mothers, to produce literacy, and only a fraction of the children stay for more than one year in the schools. I would like to correct my figure later if necessary. I think it is only about one-tenth of the girls who reach Standard IV. I put down that tragic neglect of girls' education and the education of the mothers to the Indian public, to the Indian politicians, and to the administrators of India, Indian and European alike. The policy that I found almost everywhere (I do not say there were no exceptions) was a policy of spending all that you reasonably can on the boys, and, if there is something over, spend it on the girls. The years 1917 to 1927 include the period of the introduction of the reforms. The increase in the direct expenditure on boys' education was, roughly speaking, six and a-half times that on the girls', 832 lakhs for the boys and 127 lakhs for the girls, so that instead of trying to diminish the difference between boys' and girls' education the difference has been increased, and the latest census figures show naturally that the difference in literacy has been increased. It is quite obvious that a fundamental change is essential. I do not think you will get that change until the women play a greater part in Indian politics than they have played up to the present. That is the expressed view of the Simon Commission, and it is the view of the Lothian Committee; it is the expressed view of His Majesty's Government, though I see nothing in the White Paper to translate that view into facts. At the bottom of these objections to using literacy as a qualification, what have we? We have the phrase "Administrative difficulties; administrative impossibilities." To anyone who has worked in India that phrase is only too familiar. I suppose that I was met by such phrases every week, certainly every month, during the five years during

26^o Julii, 1933.]Lady LAYTON, Mrs. O. STRACHEY and
Sir PHILIP HARTOG.

which I was Vice-Chancellor of the University of Dacca, and it was part of my work to show that what I was told was administratively impossible was, in fact, possible, and of course it is not only in India that one has that kind of experience. Looking round this table I suppose there is hardly one of you ladies and gentlemen who has not done things which you were told were administratively impossible. So I am not at all alarmed by that phrase. I am only alarmed by the state of mind which it indicates. It corresponds exactly to the state of mind of the Governments who reported on the Simon Report, and I would urge this Committee very strongly to ask for those Provincial Reports in which it is stated that the application of the literacy test, which is recognised as possible in Madras, is impossible elsewhere.

Major Cadogan.

C11. Would you repeat that?—I should like to ask that the Committee should ask for the Provincial Reports which attempt to show that what is possible in Madras in respect of literacy is impossible in Bengal. Have they been circulated?

Mr. Isaac Foot.

C12. The Reports which Sir Philip refers to are the reports which are already available—the comments of the Governments?—They have not been published.

Mr. Butler.] Command Paper 3700.Marquess of Lothian.

C13. What report are you referring to? Are you referring to documents to the Simon Commission or to the Franchise Committee?—No, the provincial report to which the Secretary of State referred in his evidence. Are those available?

Mr. Butler.

C14. Those were not the reports to the Simon Commission?—No the reports on which the White Paper was based.

Mr. Isaac Foot.] Does Sir Philip refer to the Secretary of State's statement as to the administrative difficulties in making inquiries about wives of electors.

Mr. Butler.] The despatches to which I think Sir Philip refers are the confidential comments to the Government on the Lothian scheme which were sent by the Provincial Governments.

Begum Shah Nawaz.

C15. As well as the Government of India?—That is to say, they have been treated as confidential.

Mr. Butler.

C16. They are in the normal course of administrative procedure regarded like so many other documents as confidential?—I suggest that they should not be regarded as confidential to the Select Committee however* they are regarded as in respect of the general public, because you will not get to the bottom of this until you see what the actual objections are. I do not mean to say that there is not such a thing as an administrative impossibility, but it is a phrase used sometimes, as we all know in India, to dress up a bogey.

Mr. Butler.] These questions were fully gone into in the evidence which the Secretary of State and his advisers, including Sir Malcolm Hailey, gave before the Joint Select Committee, and these administrative points were put to his advisers, including Sir Malcolm Hailey and Sir John Kerr, and answered in some detail, particularly in Questions 7416 and 7417 of No. 21 on the 21st July, 1933.

Begum Shah Nawaz.

C17. Are they the only points that the Local Government as well as the Government of India have referred to, or are there any more points with regard to those administrative difficulties of which they make so much?—Might I be referred to the actual question?

Mr. Butler.

C18. Question 7416 was asked by Sir Hari Singh Gour and answered by Sir Malcolm Hailey. Sir Malcolm referred to "a test electoral roll on the new franchise in certain selected areas. They were so selected as to be more or less illustrative of what we might expect to find when we came to prepare the full electoral roll afterwards." In that question, and in his answer to the next question Sir Malcolm details some of the difficulties which a typical local government has experienced in making an electoral roll?—Yes, I read those, but, if I may say so, there is not a word about literacy in these two answers.

Marquess of Lothian.

C19. I understand your main point is your argument that literacy is a practicable qualification?—It has been recognised I think in the White Paper itself that it is practicable because it has been put forward as one of the means of increasing the proportion of the voters of the scheduled castes up to 10 per cent. in two Provinces, and I cannot imagine what the special difficulty can be in other Provinces. The test is perfectly easy. I don't rely only upon my own opinion, but I have questioned on this point some of the most experienced district officers of the past who are now in England. It is perfectly easy for a village officer, controlled by a tahsildar as suggested, to dictate a passage to a would-be elector and to listen to that elector read it. The whole thing can be perfectly public. It is a perfectly easy test. I cannot help thinking that the difficulties have been very much exaggerated, but as I say it is quite impossible for me to come to grips with them until I see on paper what they are supposed to be, and none of the public has yet seen what they are supposed to be.

Sir PHILIP HARTOG.

C20. Does that conclude your evidence? Yes, Sir. (Mrs. Strachey.) I have only three points to put forward. I cannot claim to speak of the Indian conditions, because it is 20 years since I was there, but what I can claim to speak of is the way the Suffrage Movement catches hold of women, and that is certainly true of women of all races and all nationalities. I was in the British Suffrage Movement from the time I grew up to the time we got the full enfranchisement. I was its Parliamentary Secretary during the critical years, and I really know what effect the Suffrage Movement has on the females of the population. The more active politically-minded of them go perfectly berserk about it, they can do nothing else, and they can think of nothing else; they go perfectly mad for their own rights and throw everything to the winds. That is what you are laying up for the women of India if you do not put them into this new constitution when it starts. You are preparing, not only a suffrage agitation, but a militant agitation which will prevent all the more active minded women in India from helping on the new constitution. You are dragging them out of that and driving them into a new agitation, to trouble and impede the progress of the Government in India.

Sir Hari Singh Gour.

C21. You say it will emphasise the sex disqualification which the women of India would resent?—Yes, of course they would. They would start in an inferior position of a serious kind—a numerically inferior position—and it is inevitable that within a few years this same Suffrage Movement which hit us so hard would be troubling the Government of India. I think, unless a reasonably large number of women get enfranchised now, before the thing starts, you are laying up serious trouble for the future Constitution of India; not only that, but you are throwing away the help of Indian women which could be so considerable in making smooth the progress of the new Constitution. I speak very passionately on that subject because I was right in it here in England. I saw women of ability and real possibilities of public service forced to waste their time on this barren, stupid, silly agitation for rights, when they might have been helping on the things they really cared about: welfare of children, welfare of social conditions, the various interests of their country that were real to all of them; but they could not get at them because of this barrier of disfranchisement that stood in the way.

Begum Shah Nawaz.

C22. May I know what was the proportion of women to men that you got when you first were given the vote?—Yes. Under the first enfranchisement of women in this country, which was partial, with an age limit of 30, not adult suffrage and not on the same terms as men, in England and Wales there were 6,941,929 women voters and 10,281,054 men voters; that is nearly seven to 10. In the United Kingdom as a whole there were 8,479,156 women to 12,913,166 men which was 17 to 24. The proportion was about one to 1½ in each case. That was followed, after 10 years, by complete equal franchise, which at this moment gives a very slightly higher number of women voters than men in the country. My second point deals with the results of enfranchisement, again arguing by analogy from what has happened here. In the 12 years which preceded the getting of the vote in this country there were four Acts passed directly relating to the special interests of women as apart from the interests of men. They were an Act dealing with midwives, an Act dealing with married women's power to hold property (that was a very small Act only relating to Trust Estates), an Act dealing with women's qualifications to sit on County Councils, and one Act dealing with Affiliation Orders for separated wives. Those were the only four Acts relating to women passed between 1902 and 1914. Taking out the War years, when everything was abnormal, we then come to the Suffrage Bill which was passed in 1918, and in the eight years which followed that there were 18 Acts directly affecting the interests of women. I put aside things like housing and other things, which relate obviously to both men and women; but these are directly on women's own position and special interests: eligibility for Parliament, affiliation orders, midwives, sex disqualification removal, intestacy (affecting the right of women to hold property), nurses' registration, maintenance orders, infanticide, married women's maintenance, Criminal Law amendment (relating to the age of consent), law of property (intestacy again), matrimonial causes, sale of drink to children, guardianship of infants, summary jurisdiction (dealing again with separation orders), widows' pensions, adoption of children, and the registration of midwives, and maternity homes.

Mr. Isaac Foot.

C23. What period was that?—Between 1918 and 1926—eight years. It ran along at the rate of nearly three a year, whereas before it was merely one every three years.

C24. Have you a list now showing what has been the spate of legislation affecting women since you have become a majority in the country?—No, I have not. I think that has made no appreciable difference. With the partial franchise there was not any appreciable difference in results as distinguished from the complete franchise.

Begum Shah Nawaz.

C25. How many Acts do you say were passed during the earlier years of the present century?—From 1902 to 1914 there were four, and from 1918 to 1926 there were 18. I have not taken it beyond 1926 because, as the position of women becomes more and more equal in this country, it becomes more and more difficult to differentiate between what are really women's Bills and what are not. It is not only legislation that has altered in this country. You find an enormous increase in the number of women taking part in local government since the Parliamentary franchise was granted. Women have had the vote for local government for a considerably longer time, and they have been eligible for local councils since 1907, but they were taking a small part in that work until the Parliamentary franchise was given, which aroused their interest in public questions and drove them, so to speak, back to the detailed administration of those questions and to an interest in local government, and every year since 1918 more women have come forward and have been elected on to borough councils, county councils, rural district councils, urban district councils, and all the local government bodies.

Major Cadogan.

C26. I hope the witness does not think I am unsympathetic—this has nothing to do with my feelings about the question—but are you establishing an analogy between English women and Indian women? You are giving information about English women?—Yes, certainly I am trying to establish an analogy.

C27. Do you maintain that the education and position of English women are the same as those of Indian women?—No, clearly not. We needed the vote in spite of being well educated and well able to look after ourselves. The Indian women need it even more because of the difficulties arising from the fact that education has not reached them yet. Much as we needed it, they need it more, and if it did all this for us, what will it do for them? That is my argument. I was saying it was not only Acts of Parliament which have resulted here; it does afford an increase in the interest and contribution which women have been able to make to local government. It is also the entry of women into administration, which is an exceedingly important thing, and, particularly, obviously important in a country where a large proportion of the women population are in purdah. If you do not have women officials, how can you hope to reach the women in purdah with the health regulations or any of the other domestic legislation of your Government? It seems to me that the question of using the women in the administration of India is obvious, moreover, with the experience we have got in this country, following the Parliamentary franchise, that you do get, in fact, an increase of women in administrative positions, it becomes an additional argument for extending the franchise to women in

26th July, 1933.]Lady LAYTON, Mrs. O. STRACHEY and
Sir PHILIP HARTOG.

India, in the hope also that that may lead to an increased use of women in the administration, major and minor positions both, of the Government of India. That is my second point. The third point I can put very shortly. It is, that the British women in this country who are enfranchised citizens do feel very strongly that they have a responsibility to the only nominally enfranchised women in India and they are really concerned about it. They are passionately anxious to help, and I am bound to say, though, perhaps, it is not orthodox to say so, that unless women in India under this Constitution do get a fair enough proportion to be able to have some political weight in the first few years of the new Constitution, we British suffragists are going to help the women of India to try to get that altered in India.

Begum Shah Nawaz.

C28. In every possible manner?—In every possible manner.

Marquess of Lothian.

C29. Does that complete your evidence, Mrs. Strachey?—Yes.

C30. Now, Lady Layton, I think your Deputation has set out very fully the main thesis for the suffrage. What I would like to do is to get a little more clearly what suggestions you have to make for dealing with the administrative difficulties which were put forward by the Secretary of State and others in public evidence. I think I am right in saying there is no lack of sympathy. The problem is largely a practical problem. Now so far as the Provincial proposals are concerned, I understand your first proposal is that, instead of having the name of the individual wife, if there are difficulties in obtaining that, the roll should simply register "wife of X Y Z," namely, the man voter. That is your first proposal?—(Lady Layton.) That is so.

C31. Your second proposal is that the literacy qualification should be restored on the ground that it cannot be administratively impracticable if it is used in Madras and is used as one of the qualifications for the Depressed Classes? Is that correct?—That is correct.

C32. Now turning to the Central Legislature, what is your proposal there (I am not certain that I got it very clear) for dealing with a situation which admittedly will only produce one woman in 20?—We have no further proposals with regard to that, except to restore the literacy qualification. My other proposal with regard to the Federal Assembly was with regard to the election for the reserved seats.

C33. Have you considered at all the possibility of enfranchising the wives of the existing Assembly voters?—We should welcome that, and be quite prepared to accept any qualification of that kind, if it was found administratively more possible. Might I at this point just add one word with regard to the literacy qualification, which Sir Philip Hartog did not touch upon? We are very anxious to see the literacy qualification restored, because there are so many Indian women who are well educated, who have been educated in their homes, and are now taking a very active part in the political movements of their country and in other ways, and who would be enfranchised by that method and by that method alone. They are not on school registers, because they have not had the opportunity, either through purdah or because there were not the schools for them, to take any particular kind of examination, and it would clearly not be possible to increase the number of women who can pass any kind of educational test for many years to come, on account of the difficulties of having sufficient teachers and getting the schools going, and so on. So we do lay particular stress on the restoration of the literacy qualification for the first two elections.

C34. Then, turning to the special representation of women in the Assembly, you object to the system by which the nine women members are elected by the Provincial Councils, on the ground that it will not produce the type of woman member that the women will want?—Yes; and further on the ground that they are the only members who will be indirectly elected. All the other members of the Assembly will be directly elected.

C35. Is your alternative that, as has been suggested for the Provincial elections, special constituencies should be created in each Province in which men and women should vote, which should return that one woman as representing the Provincial women to the Assembly?—That is one proposal. We have made several proposals. Another proposal is that in the capital cities of the Provinces there should be a special constituency. We do not lay any particular stress upon what kind of constituency is made; we do only lay stress upon the importance of

26° Juln, 1933.]Lady LAYTON, Mrs. O. STRACHEY and
Sir PHILIP HARTOG.

those women being elected in a constituency of some kind so that people will get used to electing women to the Federal Assembly, and the women in the Federal Assembly will be conscious of their responsibility to actual men and women for the work that they are doing.

C36. In that constituency, there should be both men and women voters—not women voters only?—We should prefer that.

C37. Then the other practical point was the representation in the Council of State. Your suggestion there is that although the leaving of eligibility qualifications vague, makes it difficult; it does not make it impossible, for women to be returned; at the same time, it would be preferable that women should be treated like the Indian Christians, Anglo-Indians and Europeans and the women members of the Provincial Councils should be made members of an electoral college for returning one or two women. Am I correct in saying that these are the practical proposals that you want considered for dealing with the administrative difficulties?—That is so.

Sir Hari Singh Gour

C38. I understood Lady Layton and Sir Philip Hartog to question the statement that has been made by the Secretary of State, or rather by Sir Malcolm Hailey, with regard to the administrative difficulties anticipated, on the ground that the administration at the present moment is all man-made and man-run, and you suggest that if this inquiry were made through the medium of women and there were some women honorary workers and stipendiary workers appointed for the purpose of preparing an electoral roll for the women of India, that administrative difficulty would disappear?—I feel convinced that that is so.

C39. But when you have the difficulty at the present moment, for example, of the purdah system, that is to say the seclusion of women system, when the low paid village accountant getting a salary of about £1 a month, £12 a year, goes to a circle of villages, the women naturally do not want to come before him, but if you have a school mistress, for instance, in that locality to go round and put down the names of all women, there would not be the same difficulty?—That is so.

C40. At the present moment, the administrative difficulty that is pointed out by the Government really exists because of machinery of men being universally employed for the purpose of getting at women voters. Is that not so?—That is quite so.

C41. Consequently, what you demand is that women also should be employed for the purpose of securing the electoral roll of women voters and then the question of purdah and seclusion would not appear at all?—We have not made any specific proposal of that character. I am not quite clear from Sir Hari Singh Gour's question whether he is speaking of the application of the wives or of the literacy qualification.

C42. I am really speaking of the administrative difficulty which the Secretary of State stated to the Joint Select Committee of getting all women on the register, and, therefore, making the rule more rigid in the case of women that only the wives who put in an application should go on the register?—I think our answer to that would be, first of all, that undoubtedly both women's organisations, teachers and women inspectors, could be utilised in places where there was likely to be any difficulty in getting the names of the women; but it would be still easier, it seems to me, to revert to our actual proposal, that at the first roll, when it might be difficult to enlist all these outside people, it should be sufficient to find from the male voter whether he had a wife, or not, and to put it down merely as the wife of "Mr. So-and-So." When the voter goes to the poll, the husband would be responsible for her identification and the name could be taken; and on a second poll, you would have the individual names; but for the first poll, which is, I imagine, the primary difficulty administratively, that seems to be the simpler solution. If that is not sufficient, undoubtedly the suggestion that is put forward by Sir Hari Singh Gour would meet with our entire approval, and I can say that the organised women of India have immediately replied, on hearing that this objection had been made, that they were quite certain that they could assist any investigation of that kind that was made and see that it was successfully carried through.

C43. Now the next point I wish to draw your attention to is that even after all is said and done and the women get what they want, their number of votes in the Local and Central Legislatures

26th July, 1933.]Lady LAYTON, Mrs. O. STRACHEY and
Sir PHILIP HARTOG.

would be very small compared with the number of men who would be returned, and that for the last 150 years, under the reform enfranchising women, removing their age-long disabilities for the acquisition and inheritance of property and improving their social status, social reformers in India, both in the Legislature and outside, have been confronted with these difficulties—though the difficulties would still remain, and women will have to fight their own battle for a long time to come, but now that Parliament is establishing responsible Government in India, do you not think that it is up to Parliament to appoint a Committee to inquire into the present status and disability of the women of India, and to take a bold step, at any rate, to place them on a reasonable footing of equality, and then let them work out their own salvation in the future Legislatures?—I am not quite clear as to what Sir Hari Singh Gour means by his question.

Sir Hari Singh Gour.] We have been pressing upon the Government that Parliament professed to be the trustees of the people of India, and we have been pressing upon the Indian Government, and through the Indian Government, the British Cabinet—Chairman.] Sir Hari, is this a proposal which relates to the Constitution?

Sir Hari Singh Gour.] Yes. This is a proposal which deals with the fact that Parliament is now going to transfer its powers, and, in transferring the powers, what we suggest is that these radical disabilities, from which the women of India have been suffering for a long time past, should be removed by Parliament by appointing a Committee and giving them such reasonable facilities at the present moment before announcing its decision in this matter.

Marquess of Lothian.] Do you mean that the Parliamentary Committee should alter all the Legislation of India affecting women? I think the idea is rather that this is a matter for India. That you are creating Legislatures which will be empowered to deal with these things, and the question is whether the women of India are going to have an adequate voice in those Legislatures to see that matters affecting them will be properly dealt with.

Mr. Davidson.] Does Sir Hari really mean this, that the future of the women of India should be a matter for the Legislature of India?

Sir Hari Singh Gour.] No. My point of view is this, that the disabilities from which the women of India suffer, and have suffered, for a long time past, might be at least partially removed at the time that the new Constitution is promulgated by a Committee being appointed. During the Simon Commission there was the Hartog Committee on Education, a Committee on Franchise, and Committees on various other subjects dealing with the Constitution. It is suggested that there should be a Committee appointed for the purpose of eradicating some of these outstanding evils from which the women of India suffer and then for the rest leave them to help themselves.

Mr. Isaac Foot.] I suggest, with all respect to Sir Hari Singh Gour, that that is a matter which would be for the discussion of the Committee and not for questions to these ladies.

Marquess of Lothian.] I think so, yes.

Begum Shah Nawaz.] May I add one thing? Most of the disabilities from which the women of India suffer are social disabilities, and no Parliamentary Committee can possibly remove them.

Sir Hari Singh Gour.] The next point I wish to ask is this. Sir Philip Hartog has very rightly pointed out that there is a tremendous amount of wastage of girls who are brought into the school for primary education, and the Hartog Committee emphasised that fact in their valuable Report submitted to the Simon Commission. Has Sir Philip any suggestion to make as to how this wastage might be reduced, if it cannot be eliminated?

Marquess of Lothian.

C44. Sir Hari, may I ask what has that got to do with the Constitution? As I understood, Sir Philip's argument was an argument for seeing that women should have adequate representation in the Legislature which will have to deal with these questions. Is that not correct?—(Sir Philip Hartog.) Yes.

Marquess of Lothian.] I think we have got to keep these questions to the points which have a bearing upon the Franchise and the new Constitution?

Sir Hari Singh Gour.] Very well; then I have finished.

Begum Shah Nawaz.

C45. I want to know something from Sir Philip Hartog about literacy. Is it

26^o Julii, 1933.] Lady LAYTON, Mrs. O. STRACHEY and
Sir PHILIP HARTOG.

not a fact, Sir Philip Hartog, after all the experience you have had in connection with the Education Committee, that in most of the homes in the villages the girls study at home. Most of the literate women that you will find in the villages have read, more or less, in their own homes?—I am afraid, Begum, that I cannot say that as a matter of personal knowledge. I have heard that said, and what is, I think, certain is that if you take the wealthier classes in the villages, you will find the older girls do not go to the schools, but if they are educated, they are educated at home, they must be; there are no secondary schools in the villages.

C46. If the educational qualification is to give the vote only to women who are holding some certificate or another, either of primary standard or matriculation, would it not mean that most of the prominent women workers belonging to my generation as well as one or two generations back, would not get a vote under the educational qualification? I do not get one, because I do not possess any certificate of primary standard or matriculation?—I can say quite certainly that a considerable number of the most distinguished women in India would not get a vote, if there were no literacy qualification and if they had had to depend upon passing matriculation, or on some school register.

C47. Would not it mean that by not accepting literacy you are keeping out a most useful, intelligent electorate that you ought to have for the new Constitution?—I should say that you would exclude a number of very able women unless they came in under some other qualification, such as the husband's property qualification, or their own property qualification.

C48. You said something about indirect election to the Legislative Assembly. Supposing that the proposal embodied in the White Paper of the indirect election to the Federal Assembly were to stand as it is, would not it mean that in most of the Provinces where the extremist party would be in power, because they would be the majority in the Provincial Legislatures, women belonging to that party alone will be elected as members of the Federal Assembly and vice versa? In the case where some of the orthodox parties will be in power, in many cases women belonging to the moderate section will not have representation on the Federal Assembly?—(Lady Layton.) I think that is so, and it is because of that that we feel that if you have an election in any constituency women will have a chance of standing really as representative women and will be elected as against any woman who stood as a communal woman, if you have a general constituency; we are so anxious that that should happen for the reason that it is the only way of educating the people what the women's question means and how Parliament can touch it, and it is the only way of educating women for the time which is bound to come after the first two elections, when they will have to be elected on their own merits and their own strength and capacity to pull a constituency. We feel that, if they are elected indirectly to the Federal Assembly, when the first elections pass, and the period when they have reserved seats passes, they will not have had the opportunity of electoral experience which is necessary and of putting themselves before a general constituency, which is the only way in which they would have a chance of being elected later on.

C49. You would agree with me, would you not, that if there are to be reserved seats for women, such seats should be provided for them in all the Provincial Legislatures, in the Upper Chambers in any Province where they are constituted and in both the Central Legislatures?—I would certainly agree, particularly in the case of Provinces which have not now got reserved seats. We understand that they have not been reserved because they are backward Provinces, and that seems to us the very reason why it is most necessary that you should have women on the councils. In those councils, the condition of the women and the power to make themselves felt on the councils, to improve those conditions, would be far greater than in the more advanced Provincial Councils such as Madras, where the women are sufficiently organised and strong enough to bring pressure to bear, even if they have not got actual representation.

C50. Under the White Paper proposals there is to be a high property qualification for membership of the Upper Chamber. I think you are aware that the women of India are asking that this high property qualification should be supplemented by an educational qualification in order to make more women eligible for membership of that House. Would not you be prepared to support that claim of the Indian women?—May I ask if the Begum Shah Nawaz is referring to the Council of State?

Sir PHILIP HARTOG.

C51. Yes?—If that is the only method by which eligibility of any women to the Council of State could be effected, we should be willing to propose that, but the other method that we put forward, of the electoral roll, might be more on the same footing as the present elections for that Council.

C52. In paragraph 13 of your Memorandum you lay stress on the fundamental rights clause for women. You feel strongly, as the women of India do, do not you, that equality between the two sexes with regard to their fundamental rights should be made clear, either in the Constitution itself, or it should find some place somewhere in His Majesty's Proclamation, or in the Instrument of Instructions to the Governors?—Indeed, we do, and we realise fully the difficulties we have had in this country in combating the fact that these fundamental rights have not been adequately recognised until such a very recent date. At the same time, we are conscious of the danger of any statement about fundamental rights which might in any way be a limiting factor, because we realise that that may be more dangerous than to have no statement at all.

C53. Supposing, Lady Layton, that the Joint Parliamentary Committee or the Local Governments and the Government of India think that, instead of the wives' vote, they can propose some other qualification which would make the numbers almost the same as those recommended by the Indian Franchise Committee, you would have no objection to its being accepted, would you?—We should have no objection to its being accepted, provided that it gives the women a sufficient power in all constituencies, rather than in particular constituencies. To increase the number of women voting in certain constituencies—in urban areas, for instance, and not in the rural areas—though better than leaving the women in the condition envisaged in the White Paper (because it is essential that the women should have power somewhere) would not be so good, in our view, as that the women, under some method of franchise, should have a sufficient voting strength in every constituency, because, when it comes to the discussion of Bills and the possibility of carrying out legislation on the women's behalf in the Provincial Councils and in the Federal Assembly, the thing that matters is that you can bring influence to bear on all your Members of Parliament. The fact that you can influence 13 per cent. of them is not much use, even though that influence can be a very weighty one. It is quite true, as the Indian women themselves state, that they are perhaps more organised in the towns, and you may have a more educated expression of the women's view in the towns and it might be very valuable, as soon as practicably possible, to have an increased franchise in the towns before it is possible to extend it throughout the country. But we do stand by our first proposals, that we cannot accept a position which leaves the women less represented than one woman to five men voters, not in one or two constituencies but throughout the country.

C54. One of the reasons given against women becoming voters in such large numbers as recommended by the Indian Franchise Committee has been this, that some of the local governments and the Government of India think that it would mean too much pressure on administrative machinery, and the numbers might be so large that there is a fear of the administrative machinery breaking down. You would agree with me, would you not, that if that happens to be the case, it is high time that the British Government realised their duty towards half the population of the country and that, instead of making the numbers of enfranchised women less, they should reduce the numbers of enfranchised men?—I entirely agree with you.

C55. Lady Layton, you said this morning that we were suffering from many social disabilities. You would agree with me, would you not, that if the British Parliament cannot directly help us in the matter, the best method that they can adopt of indirectly helping the women of India would be to give them a good proportion of the voting strength of the country?—I not only agree with you, but I would go much farther. The only excuse that the British Government has got for not having improved the conditions of women in India has always been, as we have maintained, that they were so bound up with the social conditions of India that only the Indians themselves could alter those conditions. We are now handing over to the Indians

Sir PHILIP HARTOG.

themselves this responsibility. We are all the time laying great emphasis on the necessity, while handing those over, of safeguarding the rights and improving the disabilities of those classes of the Indian population who are in a minority, or who are suffering under any unfair treatment. We are taking special care of the labour population. We are taking special care of the scheduled castes. It is incomprehensible to us that, that being so, we should be content to leave the women in such a position of weakness that they admittedly cannot bring a sufficient influence to bear on Parliament to conquer their disability and to do the things which I am sure in this country the British Government would wish to see done in India, but which we have always held we were unable to do because we could not interfere with the social customs.

Mr. Davidson.

C56. Can you point to any provision in the White Paper which prevents a woman standing on an equality with men (and equality has been the basis of your plea) in any general constituency apart from the special reserved women's seats which appear in the Constitution?—It is quite true that the women are treated on a technical position of equality; we do not gainsay that, but in the present position of Indian women that technical equality leaves them without any real equality. Take the last Montagu proposals. The women have an equal voting strength with the men on a technical equality. They vote on the same property basis, and it is true that in the White Paper they are given a technical equality on the educational qualification, but they have not got equal opportunities with the men, because no Hindu woman is allowed to hold any property, on the one hand, and, on the other hand, as Sir Philip Hartog has pointed out, the possibilities of education for the girls have been so infinitesimal compared to that of the boys that it has been impossible for them to take advantage of them and to be educated. It is for those reasons that we are claiming a differential qualification for the women (we admit it) because the women of India are not as we were in this country on a sufficiently equal basis to start with to be able to get representation equally.

C57. I would specially like to ask Mrs. Strachey, with whom I have had conversations in the past, whether, having once granted rights, you can take them away, and do you propose permanently to place women in a superior position (whatever the developments in India may be) over men by making a provision in a permanent Constitution?—(Mrs. Strachey.) It is not a permanent Constitution. My answer is that you are not making permanent provision. After a period of years the electoral arrangements will be re-considered. You say you cannot take away again the extra rights.

C58. Is it easy to?—It is entirely speculative. How can anyone answer that, but it seems to me certain if the women are taking advantage of getting the social equality, which we hope they will get under this, they themselves will be demanding equality of rights with men backwards as well as forwards just as we are inclined to do in this country. (Sir Philip Hartog.) May I say a word on that point? The Secretary of State in Answer 7316 dealt with this question of a differential educational qualification. He said: "First of all, we have found the gravest possible objections urged, I think, in almost every Province in India, against a differential education qualification for women." But he gave no details whatever. If I might just answer Mr. Davidson's question as to the possibility of taking away rights which have been once conferred, I think it would be practically impossible to remove a woman from the register at a later stage who had been admitted under a differential qualification, but it would be quite possible not to add any more when the opportunities for boys and girls were equal.

Mr. Davidson.] I was thinking not so much of the actual franchise as representation.

Major Cadogan

C59. Is not the answer that obviously the whole thing will have to come up for review? For instance, the whole question of reservation of seats, communal representation, and so on?—(Lady Layton.) Yes.

Major Cadogan.] It is not like our English constitution where we have not had these artificial things, and, obviously, it is implicit in this Constitution which it has been proposed to give to India, that they must come up for revision. Is not that right?

Mr. Davidson.

C60. The only point was that I was rather puzzled, because the whole of the

26^o July, 1933.]Lady LAYTON, Mrs. O. STRACHEY and
Sir PHILIP HARTOG.

plea (I recognise it very well) has been equality as between men and women, but, at the same time, there is a plea that there should be not equality but preference and differentiation both in representation and in qualification?—May I answer that?

Marquess of Lothian.] Is not the point this, that, while there is legal equality, the effect of the White Paper proposals is that only one woman may get the vote as against 15 men in the Provinces, and one woman as against 20 men at the Centre.

Mr. Butler.

C61. That is an interpretation which we cannot necessarily shoulder. Might I give a further reference to Sir Philip Hartog? Questions 7433 onwards also refer to the difficulties?—(Sir Philip Hartog.) * I was going to refer to them.

Begum Shah Nawaz.

C62. Is it not the fact that almost all the women's organisations are not asking for any reserved seats. All they ask is that you should give them their full voting strength, 50-50?—(Lady Layton.) That is what I would have liked to say to Mr. Davidson. The Indian women themselves would like adult franchise with absolute equality, but, as that is not a practicable possibility, we are asking for the nearest equivalent to it in voting strength. We do not think one in five is sufficient. Without having adult franchise we think there ought to have been a much closer proportion than that, but we are prepared to support that as a minimum proposal, but the Indian women themselves do want in the long run, and in everything they have said they have stood for, equality, and, as you get closer to adult franchise in India they will be the first to ask that any special reservations and special conditions shall be removed. With regard to the communal questions which Major Cadogan spoke of, I understand that this Committee is not dealing with that, and that the reservation of seats is all part of that decision, and that therefore we are really not at liberty to give any answers on that point.

C63. Is it not a fact that some of the women belonging to the moderate section are prepared to accept these reserved seats just because they feel it will not be possible for them for a long time to come to get their full voting strength, that is one woman to one man?—That is so.

C64. In almost every country women are supposed to be a conservative element. You would agree with me, would you not, that if the women of India, by getting this voting strength, have some of their social disabilities removed, there would be a tremendous stabilising force under the new Constitution?—I agree with you, although my experience of India is a very brief one, but I saw sufficient of India to realise what a very big influence the woman does play, whether in purdah or out, and in the home life, and I think there is no doubt in our own minds and from what we have heard from others, that it will be a tremendous stabilising influence in India once the women have had the political influence which we all need before we can bring our weight to bear; and once they have had the education and the opportunity of administrative work it will make a tremendous and profound difference in the whole development of India.

C65. Would I be wrong in saying that if the united demands of almost all the women's organised Indian bodies that are at present working for educational progress and social uplift are not given full consideration by the British Parliament at this stage, it will only mean that they will be turning their activities to slogans such as "No Taxation without full voting strength"?—That is what I think is likely to happen, both from one's experience of the activities which are now taking place in India and of what happened in this country. (Sir Philip Hartog.) Might I just supplement what Lady Layton has said and the Begum has said about the conservative influence of women?

Marquess of Lothian.

C66. Just give us the reference; I think we all know the Simon Commission Report by heart?—Yes. It is my own Committee's Report, page 151, Section 13.

Dr. B. R. Ambedkar.

C67. I would like to ask one question. I do not know whether you agree with me, but I suppose when you press for votes for women, I think you also desire that the franchise should be so devised that the women who will be brought upon the register will be drawn from all strata of Indian society, and not necessarily drawn, either from the upper strata or

26th July, 1933.]Lady LAYTON, Mrs. O. STRACHEY and
Sir PHILIP HARTOG.

the middle strata or the lower strata exclusively; that there ought to be some proportion of the women on the electoral roll to the communities from which they are drawn?—(Lady Layton.) As far as is practically possible, certainly.

C68. I mean, it is not your case that you want this mathematical ratio of 1 to 4 or 1 to 5, but apart from that ratio, you would also desire that all women from all sections should be on the register?—Certainly, as far as possible, we do want to feel that the urban and rural voters and the different sections will be adequately represented.

C69. You will also agree, I suppose, that if the education qualification or the property qualification were fixed higher, the result of that would be that you would be getting on to the electoral roll women drawn from one section of Indian society alone?—That is so. I would supplement that by saying that if it were administratively possible, we should welcome, and we have pressed in our Memorandum, that the wives of the lower property qualification should be enfranchised, and not only the wives of the Higher Property qualification.

C70. What I am anxious to get at is this—whether you attach importance to the point which I am putting to you, namely; a well proportioned distribution of the women's voting strength throughout the population, or whether you merely attach importance to the proportion of the man voter as against the woman voter?—We attach importance to both those factors, but we think that the women's interests for the moment are sufficiently safeguarded on this particular question. If you have a sufficient number of women enfranchised in all the districts for them to represent the other women, the women who are not enfranchised, we would like to see it as low as possible, and if it is put at a certain place now we would like it to be moved as soon as practically possible. We ourselves would certainly wish to see it as low as possible. We would be prepared to ask for adult franchise, if it were practically possible, but we realise it is not administratively possible.

C71. Might I put the same point in a somewhat different manner? Of course, all women are interested in matters of social welfare; that is quite true. The woman's point of view may be quite common, but you will also realise that schemes of social welfare are going to cost money, if they are to be put through and that would require taxation?—Yes, I quite appreciate it would.

C72. And all women may not take the same point of view with regard to that; they are likely to divide on the basis of the class to which they belong?—Yes. I can give you two answers to that. First of all, take the education point of view. If you have a certain amount of money to divide on education, women of every class would agree that it should be spent equally on men and women, whereas, if you have not got women with sufficient pressure to bear, you will still go on spending a great deal more on the boys than on the girls. In the first place, that is one of the things that has to be seen to. Also, I would say this: The women of all classes who are taking any active interest in welfare are pressing that there should be a larger proportion of finances spent on education. I think you could safely trust to the women of most classes to take that line at the present moment, but I should be very glad to see the franchise taken as near as possible, and that is why I do lay particular importance upon the literacy qualification. Any woman who is intelligent enough to be of any value to bring any pressure to bear at all, can make herself literate within a reasonable period, and if you have the literacy qualification, and any section of women feel strongly that the section of women which has the vote, is not taking the vote, they have the weapon in their hands, and it is for that reason that I have always been so strongly in favour of literacy, and it is for that reason that all the organised women of India are also in favour of literacy.

C73. I am satisfied, as long as you see my point of view. Sir Philip Hartog, I just want to ask you a question about literacy. We have really no information as to what the administrative difficulties are, as they are alleged to be, against adopting literacy as a test for the franchise in the case of women, but what I understand the difficulties to be are these: First of all, it is suggested that there are no certificates available which would enable a registration officer, off-hand, to satisfy himself that a woman falls within the category required under literacy, and, therefore, would in the position to be put on the roll off-hand. That being the case, we shall have to adopt the procedure suggested in the proposals, that a village officer should

Sir PHILIP HARTOG.

examine and his certificate should be countersigned by a tahsildar. I think the administrative difficulty that is suggested is this: How is a village officer to approach a woman in the village to find out whether she is literate or not? Would you make it depend upon the woman who wants to get her vote having to approach and make an application?—(Sir Philip Hartog.) I think that is the only possible way. She would have to have sufficient interest to say, either herself or through her husband. "I wish to be placed on the roll; I am literate and am willing to be tested."

Mr. Butler.

C74. How does that differ from application?—(Lady Layton.) I do not think we have objected to application on the part of literacy in our Memorandum. We do not object. We think that the people who are already recognised as literate in any educational qualification that is admitted should be put automatically on the roll. Beyond that, it must be a matter of application.

Dr. B. R. Ambedkar.

C75. So really this objection raised on the basis of inquiries made in households, which might be objectionable, would not arise?—Never. (Sir Philip Hartog.) May I just say, it seems to me to be an appropriate place to make reference to two answers of the Secretary of State bearing directly upon the point which has been raised by Dr. Ambedkar. In answer to Question 7437 the Secretary of State said: "In future, for future generations of girls or women, it will be a comparatively simple matter to adapt your educational registers and returns for electoral purposes, but in Provinces where that has not been done hitherto, there will be very considerable difficulty in doing it for the first election." Now, I think this must be read with another answer of the Secretary of State; he says at page 817, Question 7214: In answer to the Marquess of Salisbury, that in the Act of Parliament he would say for X number of years there can be no alteration of the franchise. Consequently, it would be of little use to have improved educational returns for the second, third or fourth elections, if those second, third or fourth elections came within the period of X years. Let me take the question of numbers. The total number of literate women was estimated in the Lothian Report before the last census to be a million and a quarter. It is on page 86 of that Report. Of those, 345,000 are in Madras, with regard to whom there is no difficulty. That leaves over for the rest of India the relatively small number of 875,000. Now, if it was possible to put 345,000 Madras women on the rolls for one election, and that must have been done at some time or another, why is it impossible to put 875,000 women on the rolls for the whole of the rest of India?

Mr. Butler.

C76. I think that question was answered somewhere in the course of the Secretary of State's evidence. First of all, the conditions are, I think, quite different, and, secondly, Madras has a register based on local Government returns, which makes it easier to adopt the qualification there. That is found in the answer of the Secretary of State?—I am aware of Question 7435; I have got marked on my copy those answers to which Mr. Butler refers. I know that in answer 7435 Sir John Kerr said he thought it would put an unbearable strain upon the administrative machinery, but unless one sees what the detailed objections are, one cannot answer detailed questions of that kind. From my experience in India, I am familiar with general statements of that kind, and am quite familiar with the way they break down under cross-examination, and still more in actual practice.

Mr. Cocks.

C77. Lady Layton, I understand, taking the Provincial franchise first, that under the proposals of the Franchise Committee, the Lothian Committee, they recommended a proportion of 1 to 5, or the result of their recommendation would be 1 to 5?—(Lady Layton.) Yes.

C78. Under the White Paper, I understand it is estimated that the proportion will be about 1 to 7. Do you think it will be as much as that?—I feel quite convinced still more by the Secretary of States evidence out of his own mouth that it certainly will not be 1 in 7, but more like 1 in 16 or 1 in 20. It was for that reason I made that statement at the outset of my speech to-day, because it was quite clear from the Secretary of State's evidence that there were two administrative difficulties in mind when the application was put in; one was the administrative difficulty of finding out

Sir PHILIP HARTOG.

the names of the wives; and the second was the administrative difficulty of having to poll so many women at the first election. Now, you cannot have it both ways. You cannot say you are going to have 1 in 7 and at the same time say: "This is splendid; we shall be able to run this thing because we are really only going to have about 1 in 4 applying." It is for this reason that we think it is rather disingenuous to pretend the total proportion of women to men enrolled will be 1 in 7 in one breath, and, with the next, to give as your reason for insisting on application, that it will greatly reduce the numbers of women on the first electoral rolls because few will apply at first. We are quite convinced the second argument is right. If you take this country, we are quite sure if you left it to the women at the first election to apply for their vote, you would have nothing like the proportion of 3 in 4 applying. In this country, without the difficulties of purdah or getting to the polling booth, or going out and appearing before the public and taking part in public life, I am quite sure in India it is a conservative estimate to think that you are going to have 1 in 4. I, myself, would not be at all surprised if it was much less than 1 in 4. I think that after the first election, when things have warmed up, or when the organisations have got going, and the women have begun to realise that certain things were going to be discussed in the House which they were concerned with, the political parties will be able to bring that up, but at the first election I am sure that will not happen. The only party that would be able to get people to apply would be the Congress Party, because that is the most adequately organised political party, and they would actively work to persuade women to go and apply, but I do not think you will get the majority of women at this moment doing it, and that is why I think it is such an unfair thing to have done, in regard to women who, in any case, will find it difficult to go to the poll, with all the transport difficulties, distance and purdah, and so on—to add to their problems by giving less than this differential qualification of application. We do feel that most strongly.

C79. You want to abolish the condition of application?—We want to abolish the condition of application as regards the wives' vote, but are quite prepared to accept it for literacy, it would be natural for both men and women if you had a literacy qualification. It is only a suggestion that the literary qualification should be for one or two elections, and until the period when it was possible to get more women to pass the ordinary educational standards and get in on the same footing as men. It is purely a temporary measure, the literacy qualification.

Miss Pickford.

C80. With regard to that, Lady Layton, when you say it is purely a temporary measure, are you referring to the qualification for the Federal Assembly only?—Yes.

Mr. Cocks.

C81. On the question of literacy, you think the qualification of matriculation, or something approaching that, is far too high, I imagine?—It would amount to something like 12,000 women voting, at the most.

C82. What do you think would be the effect upon the electorate of this country if matriculation were made a test? Do you think it would disfranchise a million electors?—Do you mean by itself?

C83. Yes, if that was the test?—It would disfranchise a tremendous number of people, but it would enfranchise a much larger proportion than in India, because the majority of children who do go through the secondary schools do go in for the matriculation standard.

C84. Even though England is a country which spends much more on education than India does, you would find it would disfranchise more than half the electorate?—It would disfranchise much more than that, because even in the schools where they get the very best material that is going up for scholarships, you have a very large proportion of girls and boys who are not generally taking the matriculation standard, and never get past the School Certificate.

C85. It might disqualify many Members of Parliament, I imagine?—It is quite possible.

C86. And Members of the House of Lords as well?—I have no doubt about the House of Lords.

C87. You think the test is simply the ability to read or write a letter, say?—I think that that should be the qualifi-

26^o Julii, 1933.]Lady LAYTON, Mrs. O. STRACHEY and
Sir PHILIP HARTOG.

cation during the next two elections during which period you are going to give the women the opportunity of pressing for educational opportunities and make it possible for them to reach, at any rate, a primary standard and to get some kind of actual qualification. At present it is quite impossible for women to get the other qualification because in enormous numbers of villages and even in some towns there are not the schools to do it. However much the woman may wish to do so it is quite impossible for her to pass certain tests, even the lower standard not quite as high as the matriculation. Literacy is the only test that can draw in many of the intelligent women in India, and I think you will be surprised to find the number of Indian women who are taking a leading part in this country and India to-day who would be disqualified if the matriculation standard were adopted.

C88. You think it would be sufficient if a woman could read or write a letter?—That seems to me a fairly simple thing to judge—whether a person can read and write a certain letter.

C89. As far as franchise is concerned, you would really accept the proposals of the Lothian Committee?—Yes.

C90. As far as the Assembly is concerned, what do you suggest the proportion under the White Paper proposal would be of women to men?—The proportion at present would leave the women one to 20, practically the same as they are to-day, because the men's franchise is increased and the women's is increased—the actual numbers are increased—but the proportions are left the same, in spite of the fact that every committee and conference that has met has strongly emphasized the necessity of increasing the women's proportion in the Federal Assembly for the reason that in the long run it is the Federal Assembly that is going to legislate on these questions that concern women. On these big questions of child marriage and of increasing the general medical service for India, the administration of that kind of thing must inevitably be an all-India one, in the long run, be finally decided in the Federal Assembly, together with questions of divorce and women's property. It is not very likely that Provincial Assemblies will take very definite decisions on questions of intestacy and so on. It is much more likely that they would be settled in the Federal Assembly, and that is why we think it is absolutely essential that women should have a real voting strength there. Whatever may be said for the possibility that women in their own Provinces may be able to exert influence without having the vote, I am perfectly certain that will not be so with a thing so remote as the Federal Assembly, unless they have the vote.

C91. I notice you give two alternatives for increasing the vote in that way. One is to add all voters on the Provincial Roll who pass a test of literacy. Another is to add the wife voters. Which of those two alternatives do you prefer?—Personally I prefer the literacy because I think it does give an opportunity to those women who are really keen and who are really interested and who really want to take an active interest in getting themselves enfranchised; and also one is quite certain it will enfranchise the women who now are in that position; but I think that the first important thing is that you should have a sufficient number to be able to influence what is going on.

C92. That answer depends on the literacy test being adopted for the Provincial franchise?—Yes. If you have one it is obviously so easy to use it for the other.

C93. If it were administratively practicable for the Province it would be the same for the Federal Assembly?—You have the same roll clearly. I would like to stress what Sir Philip Hartog was saying, that, in spite of what Mr. Butler was saying, that it is much easier in Madras than in other Provinces (which, of course, I am quite willing to admit), if you think seriously you are only expecting to have 875,000 women over the whole of India spread over all the rest of the Provinces, the actual numbers which that means in any particular district, in any particular Province, cannot make it so administratively difficult. (Sir Philip Hartog.) It would delay your elections for three or four months; that is all. It is worth it. (Lady Layton.) The advantages so outweigh the difficulties (which we are willing to admit there may be) that they are worth the extra cost and labour involved at the outset, and once you have got it, the thing is done. What has distressed us most and what we feel most strongly about is that too much weight and importance seem to have been attached to these difficulties and not nearly enough attached to

26° Julii, 1933.]

Lady LAYTON, MRS. O. STRACHEY and
Sir PHILIP HARTOG.

the fundamental importance of women being adequately represented. It is not as though you are just balancing two things which are of equal importance. One is vitally important to the whole future of the women of India.

Marquess of Lothian.] I think you have made the point very well. We must not get into a series of speeches.

Mr. Cocks.

C94. Can you give the estimated number of women who would be enfranchised under the White Paper and the estimated number who would be enfranchised under your proposals?—For the Provinces under the Franchise Committee's proposals there are 6,620,000 odd estimated. Under the White Paper you have that very difficult problem as to how many women you think are going to apply; whether out of the four million who could be enfranchised, three million will apply, or two million or one million, and that is entirely a question of judgment; but I have deduced from the Secretary of State's evidence that he only really expects something like one in four to apply rather than three in four, in which case you would reduce your four million to about one million wives. Add to that two million, roughly, property women voters, and that leaves you with three million as against six million.

C95. For the Assembly?—For the Assembly the important point is the proportions.

C96. I wanted to know the numbers?—The numbers of women under the Franchise Committee are 1½ million—1,578,151. Under the White Paper they are 300,000.

C97. Only 300,000. That is for the Government of all India?—Yes.

Begum Shah Nawaz.

C98. Out of 165 million women?—That is out of about 63,000,000 adult women.

Mr. Cocks.

C99. For the Council of State you are asking for certain special seats. How many would you suggest?—We suggest one or two as a possible minimum, but we have not really made any definite proposals as to numbers.

C100. That is what you have in mind?—We have that in mind; but the main thing also is that they should be eligible in some way. We are not clear whether they are eligible. I was not clear from the Chairman's remarks as to whether they are actually eligible under the present regulations.

Marques of Lothian.] They are not eligible for the Council of State to-day, but they would be, I understand, under the White Paper for the Upper House.

Miss Pickford.] The Secretary of State's evidence gave that.

Begum Shah Nawaz.

C101. When both the Houses are to have almost equal powers do you think the one or two that you are suggesting is a sufficient number?—I think that they should be in a position to be able to increase that number by their eligibility. I was only speaking really of the actual reserved places if it is decided that it should be done in that way.

Mr. Cocks.

C102. You know that the Governor-General has power to nominate ten members to the Council. Would it satisfy you if it were said that one of those must be a woman?—That would be better than nothing, but I am sure all Indian women themselves would far prefer to have some kind of electoral roll, as I have proposed, of the women in the different Provincial Councils, electing one or two or three members, than to have it done by nomination, because I think they would again feel that a woman who was elected would be more likely to be a freer woman and a spokeswoman of the right type than one who was nominated.

C103. In the last ten or fifteen years tremendous changes have been taking place in India. Do you not think one of the most remarkable of those changes has been the political awakening of Indian women?—I think it is quite one of the most remarkable. It has gone forward at a pace which nobody could have thought possible, and which I should think has no parallel anywhere in the world. It is quite extraordinary, and I think what we ought to remember is that the stimulus to-day has been the national feeling of taking part in a new self-governing community. That has been the main stimulus in the last few years. That is why I think it would be so very unfortunate if that is not recognised in the proposals of the Government.

C104. You know the Franchise Subcommittee of the Round Table Conference

26th July, 1933.]Lady LAYTON, Mrs. O. STRACHEY and
Sir PHILIP HARTOG.

said that no system of Franchise can be considered satisfactory where such a great disparity exists between the two sexes, and the Prime Minister's letter said that a proportion of one-twentieth was not satisfactory or adequate. Bearing those two things in mind, do you think the present proposals of the White Paper are clearly throwing over both the Prime Minister's and the Round Table Conference's views?—We think they are entirely throwing them over, and we think the Secretary of State's evidence has shown that even more clearly than the White Paper itself.

Mr. Butler.

C105. Have you, in your consideration of literacy, considered the question of the overlap which is bound to take place between those who would be qualified for literacy and those who would be qualified for property, or a wife's qualification?—Yes, we have taken that into account, and I understand in all the figures that have been brought forward, the final figures as to total numbers, the Franchise Committee recognised and allowed for it, so that in the figures I have given, which I was asked for just now, that has been taken into consideration.

C106. Do not you think the overlap is likely to be very considerable and very hard to judge?—It may be, but that will settle itself quite simply when it happens. It will not give anybody a second vote. It will merely mean that nobody who has been enrolled as a wife would apply to be enrolled as a literate, or vice versa. When once you were enrolled you would be enrolled.

C107. When you take it that there are 875,000 women literates in India, excluding those who would be qualified in Madras, and when you consider the question of overlap, I think you will agree that the actual numbers would be very small?—Yes, at the present moment I think that is probably true, but I do think my answer to Dr. Ambedkar is very important in this respect. (Sir Philip Hartog.) This point is referred to on page 87 of the Lothian Report.

C108. I was referring to the numbers we were quoting this morning?—They come from the preceding page.

Mr. Butler.] Thank you very much. Do you realise that the actual gross figure of the women's voting figures as included in the White Paper is 4.8 in their ratio to men, and do you realise that in putting in a ratio of one to seven we have made elaborate allowance for overlapping, and so forth, and that really the gross figure is of a very satisfactory nature and comes within the 5 per cent. which you yourself advocate?

Begum Shah Nawaz

C109. And also application for registration?—(Lady Layton.) I realise you have made allowance for the overlapping, but I also realise you have not made allowance for the number of people who will not be likely to apply under the wife's vote when they have to apply, because you specifically state the number of people you assume will apply, which is three-fourths, and it is after that that you make your allowance.

Major Cadogan.

C110. There is no means of estimating that at all, is there?—There is no means of estimating it, but the Secretary of State himself made it quite clear that the Councils were counting on the fact that there would be only a much smaller proportion than that applying, otherwise there would be no reason to put in the requirement about application, because the administrative advantages from the point of view of reducing the numbers of women would be gone. You cannot have it both ways. If you are not going to reduce the number of women why irritate them by making them apply? If you are going to reduce the number of women you cannot pretend that you are enfranchising them in the proportions of one to seven, because they will not be there. You cannot have it both ways.

Mr. Butler.

C111. If Lady Layton will refer to the Secretary of State's answers she will appreciate some of the difficulties which have confronted us?—I can see a division of opinion in the Secretary of State's mind. I am sure he would be quite willing to enfranchise more women if he were not confronted with the difficulties which the Provincial Governments are putting to him, but I want to strengthen his hand by assuring him that he has to assure the Provincial Governments that the women of this country and the women of India are not going to put up with it, and he must realise that they are so strong that the Provincial Councils must get over their administrative difficulties.

C112. Is it not important that the ratio of men voters should be taken rather than the ratio of men electors when you are actually taking the proportion of women who are likely to apply as against the proportion of men voters who actually go to the poll?—No, surely not. It is because the figures are not put clearly in the report. I am comparing the number of women that it is estimated are likely to apply (that is those that will be on the roll) to the number of men who who are also on the roll. I am comparing the two sets of people on the roll.

26^o Julii, 1933.]Lady LAYTON, MRS. O. STRACHEY and
Sir PHILIP HARTOG.

Major Cadogan.

C113. Those who apply, and those who intend to vote?—It is quite true if you apply you probably mean to vote, but if you think of the conditions of Indian women to-day, or of any woman for that matter, it does not necessarily mean when the particular date comes for the election she will be able to vote. There are many things that prevent women voting. There are the practical difficulties of getting to the poll which must be much more great in India.

Mr. Butler.

C114. May I put it to you, when you are working out those rather large percentages which you have given us, which the Government cannot accept as being likely to be true, you should work out the proportion of actual men who go to the poll as against the actual proportion of the women who apply, and I hope your fears will not be justified by the actual ratio?—I do not think that would be a fair comparison, because, if so, you have also got to reduce the proportion of your women, who vote on the property qualification; that is your 2,000,000 has to be reduced by about 60 per cent. if you take the last elections, and your figures are completely different. I do not really think it is practicable to attempt to compare the proportion of men who did vote at the last election with the proportion that are likely to vote at an election in which India is, for the first time, responsible.

C115. I was not asking you to take the last. I was asking you to forecast the future, and to take the same standards for both men and women, that is all?—If you will make the men apply for their vote as property voters, I am quite prepared to do that—not otherwise.

C116. May I ask you one general question? Do you not accept that the White Paper proposals in respect of the number of women voters and the number of seats reserved for women are a very great advance on anything hitherto?—In India?

C117. Yes?—Yes, certainly, they are an advance on anything hitherto.

Mr. Davidson.

C118. I have only got one or two questions to ask. I hope that my intervention earlier in the proceedings was not taken to mean that I am not in favour of every possible advance in the condition of women in the world at large, and especially in India; I think my political record would justify that. I should like to ask this question. Do you agree that in the production of proposals for franchise, they must, in a Constitution Act, apply equally to the whole of the country? I mean by that the question of literacy. It is perfectly easy to argue, is it not, that in the south of India, where political advance and the absence of purdah and the use that the women have made of local elections, and so forth, if that were set as the standard for All-India, it might not work out practically?—Yes.

C119. In other words, one has to try and strike a mean which will enable the franchise proposals to work as a practical proposition?—Yes.

C120. Secondly, do you agree that some weight must be given to the evidence of those who have had the practical working of elections in India, and that their evidence must be of some value?—I agree that some consideration must be given to it. There is never any likelihood that consideration will not be given to it, because, clearly, they must play a very important part in any decision; but there is always a danger of the man who is running a thing close to it losing sight of the wood for the trees, and that is the danger which I see has arisen with regard to this problem.

C121. Would you agree also with the proposition that it is impossible to obtain absolute perfection at the first election under any Constitution?—I agree, yes.

C122. We ought to aim at getting as near as we can to it?—Yes.

C123. You will also agree that political organisation in India is in its infancy?—Yes, but not such an infant as it was.

C124. And that a great many of the difficulties with regard to the possibility of the women exercising the votes that are given to them may be remedied by the more intensive political organisation of the women in the future, even as regards its effect on the application of women for the vote?—I agree, but I should like to qualify that with this remark. If the women are put in such a very inferior position, they may not bother to put any pressure behind the application, but they may be, as Mrs. Strachey suggested, so bitter about it that they may do what appears to be unreasonable, and instead of educating their sisters to apply and to become literate, and to do all the things which we should like them to do, they may merely make themselves as unpleasant as they can and try and work up among the illiterate population, a population which is very easily swayed, a movement which may cause a great deal of trouble, and may prevent the administration from carrying out other things in a reasonable manner.

Sir PHILIP HARTOG.

C125. But does Lady Layton think that where provision has been made for the enfranchisement of a large body, but not a large enough body, naturally, for those who wish a larger body—but assuming that provision is made for the enfranchisement of a large body of women and the reservation in the local Councils of actual seats for women, that the women's movement is likely to die in India?—(Mrs. Strachey.) May I answer that? This Committee must know very well that the Indian women do not like these reservations at all. What they want is adult franchise on an equal basis and no reservations. The only reason why they could be got to work happily with this proposal is if it gave them substantial numbers. If it does not give them substantial numbers, all their theoretical and genuine objections to special treatment and reservation will be revived, and I am perfectly convinced that you will find them in hot opposition to the whole thing unless this proposal is so adjusted as to give them substantial numbers and enable them to go into real political questions other than this tiresome question of their own rights.

C126. Then your fear is that they will be driven to agitate outside the Constitution and not to work for the Constitution?—Certainly. (Lady Layton.) I entirely agree.

Miss Pickford.

C127. I do not think there is very much left for me to ask, but there are just one or two points I would like to bring out. Am I right in understanding that the main line of argument in your introductory statement was that unless women in India, or in other countries, have a substantial proportion of the votes in the country, it is not worth while for candidates and members to pay particular attention to what may be called women's questions, and that the history of this country may be said to prove that?—Yes, that is quite so.

C128. And, not only do you anticipate that it will be the same in India, but that the history under the last 12 years of the Reforms goes to prove that?—Yes, that is so.

C129. That when the proportion of of women voters to men voters in India has been as 1 to 20, in such subjects as education, which Sir Philip Hartog has drawn attention to, women, or rather girls, then have a very small proportion of the funds available?—Yes, that is so; not only a very small proportion of the funds available, but a smaller proportion than they had before.

C130. And that would be true with regard to other social activities, such as, for instance, maternity and child welfare and general health services?—Yes; and might I say, we all know we are going through a difficult time economically, and India is not free from this difficulty.

C131. That is the point I wanted to come on to next, that it would be recognised that India, like other countries in the world, will not have so much money to spend on social and other services as she might wish to have, and that, therefore, the distribution of the funds available will be a matter of the first importance?—Yes.

C132. Do I take it then that your main line of argument is that it is of the first importance that women shall have a voting strength sufficient to make, not only candidates but also Legislatures, pay attention to their desires?—Yes, that is entirely my view; it is exactly what I have been trying to put forward.

C133. And that you lay more importance upon the volume of voting than upon the actual methods by which women shall be brought upon the electoral roll?—Yes, that is so.

C134. Do you also lay very great importance on the distribution of those votes fairly throughout the constituencies?—Yes, for the same reasons.

C135. Therefore, without wishing to support any particular method of bring-

26^o July, 1933.]Lady LAYTON, Mrs. O. STRACHEY and
Sir PHILIP HARTOG.

ing women upon the roll, does it appear to you that what has been called the qualification of the wives of the property holders does, not only, bring on the largest number of women, but also in the fairest distribution?—In the present state of India, and having regard to the administrative difficulties, I think that is so.

C136. And, therefore, for that reason, you feel that the wives' qualification will bring pressure to bear on all constituencies, better than such a qualification as adult franchise for urban areas?—Yes, for the reason that only about 27 per cent. of the constituencies are urban and the rest are all rural districts, and, therefore, you will only have the representatives of that 27 per cent. feeling the pressure of the women's vote, whereas in all the rest of the constituencies, being rural districts, the members will be quite indifferent to what the women think.

C137. With regard to the question of bringing on the wives of some of the property owners, has the attention of your Committee been drawn to another proposal, that of enfranchising the widows of soldiers who served and fell in the War, the pensioned widows, and also the wives of men who, under the White Paper proposals, and the existing Constitution are enfranchised as ex-soldiers and officers?—Our attention has been drawn to that, and we shall be quite willing to support that.

C138. With regard to the literacy qualification to which you attach so great importance, you do realise that even if every literate woman applied, it would only bring on to the roll, not, I think, even allowing for overlapping, 1,250,000 women?—We do fully appreciate that, and for that reason, we have supported the wives' vote in addition, and we are most anxious to keep that. We should like the wives' vote to have been for the lower property qualification; we should have liked it for many reasons. One of the reasons Dr. Ambedkar put, namely, it does bring it to women of a different class; we should have liked to have had it happen, but, at the same time, though it is a small number, as I stressed before, we do feel it is very important that some qualification should be given which the Indian women themselves like. We think that is very important, and they do want the literacy qualification, and, I think that is a very important factor. (Sir Philip Hartog.) And it will increase.

C139. I was going to say that it has the further merit that it is an automatically increasing qualification without requiring any change in the franchise qualification?—Yes, administratively so, and it is one of the things which the Government of India would like for that reason.

C140. Is it a fact that under Provincial Autonomy the majority of the questions which affect women socially, what may be called, popularly, the nation-building services, will be matters for the Provincial Councils?—It is a fact that they will be matters for the Provincial Councils, but, as I said before, they are also matters for the Federal Assembly, and a great many of them, undoubtedly, will be finally settled by the Federal Assembly.

C141. But such questions as education, public health, and so on, are all Provincial matters?—Yes.

C142. And, therefore, it is, may I say, of the first importance to have a substantial women electorate for the Provincial Councils?—Yes, that is so.

C143. I think from what you have said that you recognise that under existing conditions in India, where special representation is a feature of the Constitution, it is important that special representation should also be given to women?—Yes. We have accepted that for the very reason that the situation is unique in India.

C144. It is not confined to special representation to women, but is an essential feature of the Constitution?—It is an essential feature of all the other parts of special representation which will be necessary. I should like to qualify that by saying that we fully sympathise with the Indian women's great dismay and dislike of the necessity of being, themselves, brought into the communal problem, because it has been a very particular feature, and we have great respect and admiration for the Indian women's organisations who have kept free from it, and that is why we do want, as far as possible, to meet their views, which are based on a good ground, that wherever possible they should have these general constituency electorates, so that they can, as soon as possible, break down this communal feeling; and I feel that the women will have a greater chance of doing that if there are a sufficient number of them and sufficiently strongly backed behind, both in the Provincial Assembly and the Federal Assembly, because they have had in their minds all the time that these are all wide India problems; they are not communal problems.

Sir PHILIP HARTOG.

C145. But on the general question, your Committee recognises that under a limited franchise, inevitably limited owing to the present state of development in India, it is necessary to consider together the question of franchise and representation. They cannot be considered in watertight compartments?—No, I entirely agree.

C146. Now just a final question on the special representation for the Federal Assembly. You have taken objection to the White Paper proposals for the special representation in the Lower House of the Federal Assembly. Have you taken into consideration this point, that women elected by the whole Provincial Council are indirectly representative of the Province, as a whole?—We have taken that into account, and I would say myself that when I first saw the proposal, I was quite prepared to accept it; only, on thinking it over and meeting the criticisms that the Indian women themselves put forward, did I realise that they were really just criticisms. I quite saw the advantage of a woman feeling that she was representing the whole Province; I think that is an advantage. On the other hand, there is this other point, that this is a temporary thing. We know it is a temporary thing. It is specifically stated that these reserved seats are only for two elections, and that you are not going to give the women the opportunity of representing and meeting a general constituency, if you elect them in that indirect method, and they will be in a different position in the Federal Assembly from all the other members, because all the other members are going to be directly elected to the Federal Assembly.

C147. But you realise the very formidable arguments that can be drawn against your proposals, that a woman who is elected either by a special constituency or by the capital city of the Province, is a representative in the Federal Assembly, not of her Province, but of one constituency alone?—I do realise that, but I think that does not outweigh the other. After all, all the representatives who are there from the Province, will be representing the whole Province; you will have quite enough representatives of the Province as such in the Federal Assembly. It is not as if the women who were there would have to bear the burden of all the questions that cover the whole of the Federal Assembly, and, moreover, it is always possible for a woman to be elected as one of the other Members, there is nothing to prevent her being elected in the other capacity but it seemed to me that the reserved seats for the women at the moment in the Federal Assembly is for a particular purpose, in order that they may voice the women's questions and women's problems. It is a temporary position, and as such they are in a much stronger position than if they had been elected directly.

C148. I think your suggestion for a special seat, if any, in the Council of State, the Upper House, was that the woman or women who should go there would be elected by all the women representatives in the Provincial Councils?—Yes.

C149. Do you realise that very strong objections have been made in India to a special women's electorate, and that the electorate for those special women's seats is composed of both men and women?—Yes, I do realise that, and if any other alternative method of finding a means of electing one or more women for the Council of State could be found, we would be quite willing to accept it. I do not lay any particular stress upon that particular method. The Organisations have said that we want representation on the Council of State, and we are trying to think out how best that could be done. I realise that these other bodies have been elected in that way, the Anglo-Indians, Europeans, and so on, and it did seem a method by which women who had been already elected might be elected.

Begum Shah Nawaz.

C150. May I put a supplementary question: Would you have any objection to one seat for women being reserved out of the quota of seats given to the major Provinces, four or five for the women for the Council of State, and these seats to be filled in by indirect method as it is going to be the case for the men?—No; I should have no objection to that.

Mr. Isaac Foot.

C151. We have on the Memorandum this very important list of societies. May we take it that the Memorandum is the considered representation of those several societies?—You may take it that

26^o July, 1933.]Lady LAYTON, Mrs. O. STRACHEY and
Sir PHILIP HARTOG.

this Memorandum has been circulated to all the societies, and has been considered by all the societies.

C152. Every one of them has had the opportunity of considering it?—Every one of them, and they are all represented on the Committee which decided the lines on which it was to be drawn up, and which saw it before it was circulated to the Committee.

C153. Broadly, the position is that you think theoretically the women of India should be upon the same basis as the men, but that every exception should be proved by the necessity of the country's conditions, and should be as far as possible temporary. Is that broadly your view?—Yes.

RAJKUMARI AMRIT KAUR and Mrs. HAMID ALI are called in, and examined as follows:—

Chairman.

C154. Rajkumari Amrit Kaur, and Mrs. Hamid Ali, you are here on behalf of the All-India Women's Conference, the Women's Indian Association and the National Council of Women in India?—
(Rajkumari Amrit Kaur.) Yes.

C155. You have been good enough to provide us with Memoranda marked 49 and 56, which you now hand in?—Yes, they are as follows:—

MEMORANDUM 49 ON THE STATUS OF INDIAN WOMEN IN THE PROPOSED NEW CONSTITUTION OF INDIA BY THE ALL-INDIA WOMEN'S CONFERENCE AND THE WOMEN'S INDIAN ASSOCIATION.

After a careful consideration of the proposals embodied in the White Paper with regard to the status and enfranchisement of women in the proposed new Constitution of India, we representatives of the All-India Women's Conference and the Women's Indian Association find that they fall far short of the demands made in our memorandum of August, 1931, presented to the second Round Table Conference.

We are still of opinion that only the proposals made in our first memorandum will confer upon women equal political status, but as they have not been accepted on the ground of their supposed impracticability, at the present moment, we feel obliged to make the following new proposals:—

FUNDAMENTAL RIGHTS.

1. We urge that the recognition of the principles of equality between the sexes should find a definite place in the declaration of the Fundamental Rights of citizenship in the Constitution Act.

29^o Julii, 1933.]

2. We desire to point out that the word "Sex" has been omitted from page 29, para. 75, of the introduction to the proposals for Indian Constitutional Reform, as embodied in the White Paper, and it should be inserted.

FRANCHISE AND REPRESENTATION.

1. Though we feel strongly that Adult Franchise is the best method of enfranchising men and women on a basis of equality, we would accept as a temporary measure—until such time as universal Adult Suffrage can be introduced, and we earnestly hope it will not be long before it is introduced—the following system:—

(a) We recommend that for both men and women literacy (ability to read and write in any language) should be substituted for the higher educational qualifications proposed in the White Paper for voters in the elections for the Provincial Legislatures and for voters in the election for the Federal Legislatures.

(b) We accept the property qualifications as recommended in the White Paper for eligibility to vote in elections to the Provincial Councils and we strongly recommend that the property qualification for the provincial franchise be adopted for the Federal franchise, also.

(c) We strongly disapprove of the proposed special condition under which women may be enfranchised, namely, being the wife or widow of a person possessing the property qualifications at present entitling him to a vote for the Provincial Legislature, and we are of opinion that our rights as citizens should not depend on any extraneous factor like marriage. We would therefore recommend that in addition to (a) and (b), men and women of 21 years of age and over be enfranchised in all urban areas. The number thus enfranchised would be approximately fourteen millions odd, including those already enfranchised under (a) and (b) in the urban areas. These should vote both for the Provincial and the Federal Legislatures. The registration of voters should, we recommend, depend on the personal application of the claimant.

2. We strongly object to the election of women to the Federal Assembly from the Provincial Legislatures by the Indirect system as proposed in the White Paper (para. 4, Page 75, Appendix II).

3.—(a) We earnestly recommend that men and women should be equally eligible for membership of the Upper House. This should be clearly mentioned as the existing practice does not allow women to stand for the Upper Chamber of the Council of State.

(b) We recommend that property qualifications should be supplemented by educational qualifications for the membership of the Upper House.

4. In the matter of reservation of seats for women both in the Provincial and Federal Legislatures we adhere to our original demands and are strongly opposed to any such reservation.

ELECTORATES.

We are of opinion that a system of Franchise and Representation based upon Communal electorates and interests, as proposed in the White Paper, will be highly detrimental to the progress of the Indian people as a whole and to that of women in particular. We stand united in our demand for a system of joint electorates and in our protest against the communal award as it will introduce the poison of communalism into the now united ranks of the women of India.

MEMORANDUM 56.

MEMORANDUM 56. SUPPLEMENTARY STATEMENT ON THE STATUS OF INDIAN WOMEN IN THE PROPOSED NEW CONSTITUTION OF INDIA SUBMITTED BY THE THREE ELECTED REPRESENTATIVES OF THE ALL INDIA WOMEN'S CONFERENCE, THE WOMEN'S INDIAN ASSOCIATION AND THE NATIONAL COUNCIL OF WOMEN IN INDIA.

The All India Women's Conference.

Founded in 1925. This Organisation has Constituencies in every Province in India as well as in 12 Indian States. The total number of Constituencies with their sub-constituencies is at present 118.

The Women's Indian Association.

Founded in 1917. This Association has its headquarters in Madras with 24 centres and 72 branches distributed throughout India.

The National Council of Women in India.

Founded in 1925. This Organisation has six main centres in different Provinces, including Burma with six branches and 77 affiliated societies.

The ever-expanding membership, running into millions, of these three organisations is drawn from women of all races, communities, castes and creeds by reason of which their inner strength and all-India character enables them to voice truly the public opinion of the womanhood of India on matters of vital concern to women's interests in a manner that can in no sense be expressed by individual local women's societies or organisations.

We should like to point out, at the outset, that it is through the efforts of these All-India Women's Organisations that Indian women have been enfranchised.

"The Franchise Committee which visited India in 1919 expressed the view . . . that the social conditions of India made it premature to extend the franchise to Indian women at that juncture when so large a proportion of male electors required education in the responsible use of votes. If this advice had been followed, a beginning could not have been made until now, and the request that Indian women should have some direct opportunity of influencing the course of politics in the land to which they belong would still have remained wholly unsatisfied. But the claim was pressed by the Women's Indian Association and its allies, and the Electoral Rules made under the Act were so drawn as to secure that if any provincial council passed a resolution in favour of removing the sex disqualification this should become an operative decision; and a corresponding facility was conferred upon both Houses of the Indian Legislature."

(Report of the Simon Commission.)

Remedial legislation is increasingly finding a place in the Statute Book of India in response to our insistent demands. We lay full claim to the passing of the Child Marriage Restraint Act as the direct result of our labours, and The Lady Irwin College in Delhi is a standing monument to our united efforts in the field of educational reform. In short, it is due very largely to our work and propaganda on behalf of the women of India that there exists in our country to-day in the minds of both men and women a real interest in and desire to give to woman her rightful place in the New Constitution.

In spite, however, of the acknowledged recognition of the just claims of India's women to full citizenship and equal opportunities for service by His Majesty's Government, the Prime Minister and the various Committees and Commissions that have of recent years visited India and in spite of our own united demands for the fulfilment of that recognition, we must confess to a sense of profound disappointment and dissatisfaction at the wholly inadequate proposals contained in the White Paper with regard to women's franchise and our status in the New Constitution.

We now wish to refer in more detail to our Memorandum II. on the Status of Indian women in the New Constitution of India.

FUNDAMENTAL RIGHTS.

We strongly urge the necessity of the specific recognition of woman's inherent right to full citizenship and equal opportunities with men for public service to the country. Therefore, in the Declaration of Fundamental Rights, we wish it to be clearly stated that "sex" shall be no bar to any public employment, office, power or honour and in the exercise of any trade or calling.

29° July, 1933.]

FRANCHISE AND REPRESENTATION.

Although Adult Franchise has been publicly declared and accepted by British and Indian authorities as the desired goal we deplore the fact that the White Paper proposals for franchise have failed utterly to inspire us with the hope that we shall reach this goal within a reasonable period of time.

While we fully agree with the Indian Central Committee that Adult Franchise would be the best means of emancipating women—and it would seem impossible to do full justice to the claims of women and the poor millions of the country without universal suffrage—we emphasise once again that the alternative proposals embodied in our Memorandum II. are put forward by us only as a temporary measure until such time as our goal is attained.

Chiefly concerned and anxious as we women are to possess the means of furthering the cause of economic, educational, social and medical reform, we consider it essential that as large a number of women as possible should be brought immediately on to the electoral roll so that our voice may be a determining factor in influencing and shaping the policy of the Provincial and Central Governments in matters of such vital importance to the nation.

(a) We, therefore, strongly recommend the "literacy" qualification for the following reasons:—

(i) a much larger number of women will be enfranchised under this than under the higher educational qualification proposed in the White Paper. "Literacy" would give us 1,255,000 voters, whereas the Upper Primary Standard would only enfranchise 500,000.

(ii) a qualification of this nature will be an incentive to education amongst the illiterate classes.

(iii) it will bring in a larger percentage of voters for the Federal Legislatures which is essential in the interests of social progress and will, incidentally, minimise such administrative difficulties as must arise if the electoral roll for both Provincial and Federal Legislatures is not the same. The proposed increase in numbers for the electoral roll for the Federal Assembly is, in our opinion, fully justified if this body is to be a really representative one and, in this matter, we are in entire agreement with the minority opinion of the members of the Lothian Committee.

"The chief factor is the area of constituencies and not the number of electors, and owing to the proposed increase of the size of the Assembly the area of every constituency will be much smaller than at present. Therefore, even if the numbers are increased as we propose, the task of candidates will be easier than it is at present. The argument of administrative convenience is more in favour of our proposal than that of the majority."

(Minute of Dissent. Report of the Indian Franchise Committee.)

Moreover, the problem of numbers has got to be faced sooner or later, and we are firmly convinced that a definite beginning on the right basis can be made at once. We are emphatic that the true spirit of reform, without which no national progress is possible, must in no wise be sacrificed at the altar of administrative inconveniences.

While on the subject of "literacy" as a qualification for the franchise, we confess to our utter inability to understand the logic underlying the recommendation in the White Paper for "literacy" in Madras only—educationally the most advanced Province in India—and higher educational qualifications for the other less advanced Provinces. Such a recommendation will eliminate from the electoral roll large numbers of women who are educated but will not be able to produce the required examination certificates. Indeed, a vast number of women, who are to-day taking a prominent part in our social and educational activities, will be debarred from taking their rightful place in the public life of the country.

(b) We recommend the same property qualifications for eligibility to vote in elections to both Provincial and Federal Legislatures inasmuch as these will give us 1,929,000 women on the rolls and for the same reason as given above in support of the "literacy" qualification.

(c) We disapprove strongly of the proposed enfranchisement of the wives and widows of persons possessing the property qualifications for the following reasons:—

(i) Such a proposal is a direct negation of the recognition of the woman's inherent right to citizenship. There is no reason whatsoever, in our opinion, why the women of India should not be enfranchised independently of any extraneous factor, and we would like to emphasise that on this point there exists a very strong feeling amongst the members of our Organisations who perceive that they, as women, are in themselves a vitally integral part of the body politic. The importance and value of the effect of this psychological factor on the minds of both men and women must, on no account, be ignored. We would here like to point out that our traditions and social conditions being wholly different from those of the women of the West the argument that in England, for example, the wife's vote proved useful is not necessarily applicable to us, having regard to the fact that we do not to-day possess those facilities for freedom and education which they possessed at the time of their enfranchisement on this basis.

29^o July, 1933.]

(ii) We know full well that this proposal will only serve to double the vote of the landlords and capitalists—a section of the most conservative and orthodox members of society—who are, generally speaking, invariably opposed to all progressive reforms. The recent opposition from this section, who will constitute the majority of voters to the Councils and Federal Legislatures, to the Child Marriage Restraint Act, The Hindu Widows' Inheritance Rights Bill, The Raising of the Age of Consent Bill, The Removal of Untouchability Bill, is an unequivocal proof—if proof were needed—of the cogency of our argument against further strengthening the hands of a community which has always been unintelligibly conservative and reactionary in its outlook.

(iii) In so far as the 4,236,000 women sought to be enfranchised under this proposal will be scattered over the length and breadth of India—less than half a million in each of the 11 Provinces—it will be a matter of supreme difficulty for the educated womanhood of India to co-ordinate the woman's vote on right lines, and the numerical strength of this vote will, therefore, be a negligible quantity so far as the furtherance of the very causes for which we are working is concerned. We attach equal importance to the quality as well as to the quantity of the woman's vote.

Hence it is that we urge with all the insistence at our command the adoption of our alternative proposal, viz.: adult franchise in urban areas* because:—

(i) We shall be placing forthwith on the electoral roll approximately between five and six million women—a number which, together with the women enfranchised under the literacy and property qualifications above mentioned, is the very minimum that will satisfy our present demands and needs.

(ii) Such a franchise will, we feel, ensure for us a more intelligent and, at the same time, a more independent and well organised vote—factors of the most vital moment to us at this juncture.

(iii) Difficulties in the matter of co-ordinating the woman's vote on a sound and workable basis will, without doubt, be minimised for the main women's organisations throughout the country.

(iv) The rural vote in India being so very much greater in numerical strength than the urban vote, adult suffrage in urban areas will not, in our opinion, disturb the ratio to any perceptible extent.

(v) The interests of Indian women in urban and rural areas being identical, it will be an incalculable asset to our Organisations and the cause of reform advocated by them to feel that the true welfare of dwellers in both areas is in the safer keeping to-day of a more enlightened and intelligent electorate.

(vi) Our proposal will certainly entail less difficulties as far as the Administration is concerned and, at the same time, relieve the latter in considerable measure of the expenditure involved in the recommendations proffered by the White Paper.

(vii) The increased vote in the urban areas will also help to return to the Councils and Federal Legislatures a larger number of women candidates, while men candidates returned on the strength of the

* Vide Report of The Indian Franchise Committee, p. 43, para. 95, for definition of urban areas.

woman's vote will, of necessity, interest themselves in matters concerning the welfare of women. It must be borne in mind that the majority of social reformers are residents of urban areas.

(viii) There will, if our proposal is accepted, be an increased enfranchisement on right lines of the humble masses who stand in urgent need of ameliorative reform and constitute the majority of India's population.

Our recommendation (3 (a) and (b), page 4 of our Memorandum) for a clear statement that women shall be equally eligible with men for the Upper House needs no amplification. We strongly urge that property qualifications for this Chamber should be supplemented by educational ones as, under the former, the number of eligible women will obviously be negligible.

ELECTORATES.

We have repeatedly urged that we do not desire the communal virus to enter into our united ranks. We, therefore, disapprove entirely and shall continue to resist to the uttermost the White Paper proposal (para. 4, page 75, Appendix II.) by which women will be elected to the Federal Assembly by an indirect system. We totally refuse to be made party pawns for the purposes of weightage for the convenience of any community—a state of affairs which will surely follow if this proposal is accepted. On the contrary, we desire direct election on an entirely non-communal basis. By merit and merit alone do we wish to find—and we are confident we shall find—our rightful place in the Councils and Federal Legislatures of our country.

It naturally follows that we are opposed to reservation of seats for ourselves and are whole-heartedly in favour of joint electorates—by which means alone, we are convinced, can India rise to her full stature.

Cl56. Do you desire at this stage to make a statement or to say anything in amplification of those Memoranda?—Yes. May I crave the indulgence of the Committee for a few remarks only, not to make a statement, but just to elucidate a few more points in connection with what we have said. If we consider it necessary to make a further statement, we should like to do so before the full Joint Select Committee, if we may. First of all, I think, owing to some misunderstanding on the part of the National Council of Women in India, their second Memorandum, which has now been numbered 56A, has not been sent to the Committee. Am I right? Memorandum No. 56A which goes under the signature of the Women's Indian Association and the All-India Women's Conference, does not include the National Council of Women in India. May I hand that in?

Cl57. Thank you?—It is as follows:—

MEMORANDUM 56A. ON THE STATUS OF INDIAN WOMEN IN THE PROPOSED NEW CONSTITUTION OF INDIA.

After a careful consideration of the proposals embodied in the White Paper with regard to the Status and enfranchisement of Women in the proposed new Constitution of India we, the representatives of the National Council of Women in India, find that they fall short of the demands made in our Original Memorandum of August 1931, which was presented to the 2nd Round Table Conference.

1. We still adhere to the demands made therein but as they have been turned down on the ground of their supposed impracticability at the present time, we feel obliged to make the following new proposals.

FUNDAMENTAL RIGHTS.

2. We urge that the recognition of the principle of equality between the sexes should find a definite place in the declaration of the "Fundamental Rights" of Citizenship in the Constitution Act.

3. We desire to point out that the word sex has been omitted from page 29, para. 75 of the Introduction to the proposals for Indian Constitutional Reform, as embodied in the White Paper.

4. We earnestly recommend that both men and women should be equally eligible for membership of the Upper House. This should be clearly mentioned as the practice as it exists to-day does not allow women to stand for the Upper Chamber.

5. We recommend that property qualifications should be supplemented by educational qualifications for membership of the Upper House.

6. In the matter of Reservation of seats for women both in the Provincial and Federal Legislatures we adhere to our original demand and are strongly opposed to any such reservation.

29^o July, 1933.]

7. We strongly object to the election of women to the Federal Assembly from the Provincial Legislatures, by the indirect system as proposed in the White Paper (Page 75, Appendix II, para. 4.).

FRANCHISE.

8. Though we feel strongly that Adult Franchise is the best method of enfranchising men and women on a basis of equality, we would accept as a temporary measure—and we earnestly hope it will not be long before it is introduced—the following system.

9. (a) We recommend that for both men and women literacy (ability to read and write in any language) should be substituted for the higher educational qualifications proposed in the White Paper for voters in the elections for the Provincial Legislatures, and the upper primary standard for voters in the election for the Federal Legislatures.

(b) We accept the property qualifications as recommended in the White Paper for eligibility, to vote in elections to the Provincial and Federal Legislatures.

10. We strongly disapprove of the proposed special condition under which women may be enfranchised namely, being the wife or widow of a person possessing the property qualifications at present entitling to a vote for the Provincial Legislature as derogatory to our sense of equality, and we consider that our rights as citizens should not depend on marriage. We would therefore recommend that in addition to (a) and (b) men and women of 21 years of age and over, be enfranchised in all urban areas. The number thus enfranchised would be approximately fourteen millions including many of those already enfranchised under (a) and (b). We recommend that the registration of voters should depend on the personal application of the claimant.

ELECTORATES.

11. Being of opinion that a system of Franchise and representation, based upon Communal electorates and interests, as proposed in the White Paper, will be highly detrimental to the progress of the people of India as a whole, and to that of her women in particular, we stand united in our demand for a system of joint electorates and our protest against the communal award as it will introduce the poison of communalism into the now united ranks of the women of India.

I may say that that Memorandum differs not at all from the others, except in one or two details, but as they chose me as their representative, and their memorandum was printed before ours, I take full responsibility that they would subscribe to the views in our Memoranda.

Cl58. I quite understand?—I would also like to explain why it is called the second Memorandum. Our original Memorandum, the first one, was submitted at the Second Round Table Conference, that is why this Memorandum is called the second one, it is not that we have submitted two Memoranda to the Joint Select Committee. May I presume that our supplementary statement bearing upon this Memorandum which has been circulated, has had the careful consideration of the Members of the Joint Select Committee?

Cl59. You may?—Because, of course, we want to tender our evidence on the Memoranda proffered by us, as well as on the unfeasibility and undesirability of the proposals contained in the White Paper concerning the womanhood of India. I would just like to say one or two things in order to elucidate further this point, because we are very grieved, indeed, that no effort has been made by those responsible for the White Paper to abolish the sex disqualification. If, as we have so often been told, the Government is really anxious that women should play their rightful part in the public life of India in the future Constitution, we are convinced that we do want a declaration, whether it be in a declaration of fundamental rights, if there is going to be one, or in the Instrument of Instruction, or in whatever manner that is selected finally, but we want that there should be a declaration to this effect, as appeared in our first Memorandum: Equal rights and obligations of all citizens without any bar on account of sex; no disability to attach to any citizen by reason of his or her religion, caste, or creed or sex in regard to "public employment, office, power or honour and in the exercise of any trade or calling". We think that this is very essential, from the point of view of the women. I should like to explain the position of the three organisations which we have the honour to represent. We have throughout stood for adult franchise or any system based thereon, and we gave evidence to this effect before the Indian Franchise Committee. We suggested the grouping system, and we say that we still adhere to our opinion that because adult franchise is the goal which has been universally recognised as the ultimate desideratum, we are not convinced that it is possible to bring women in on any basis of equality with men without adult franchise or any system based thereon; and we are not convinced after all the objections that have been raised that it is either administratively impracticable or financially impossible; but because it has been turned down, I suppose we dare not ask for a re-consideration of these views; therefore, we have put forward alternative proposals in our Memorandum which is now under consideration. We have paid attention to, I might say, five points in framing our proposals. First of all, in the very limited franchise that India is to have under the new Constitution, we want to bring as many women as possible on the electoral rolls, but though we concentrate and though we do lay an enormous importance on the numbers enfranchised, we also lay equal importance on the quality of the vote, because we want the Women's Vote to be one that is going to carry real weight, and we want the Committee, please, to have an impartial mind when they are considering our objections to the enfranchisement of women on the wives and widows qualification, and our strong advocacy of adult franchise in urban areas. The third point that we have kept in mind is that we have tried to make as few differential qualifications between men and women in our proposals, as possible. Fourthly, administrative difficulties which, alas, have always put forward where any progressive legislation, as far as women are concerned, have also been kept in view by us, and I think that our proposals do simplify administrative difficulties, and also will relieve the financial burden, if they are accepted. Then, last but not least, the Committee must be fully aware of the united stand that the women of India have taken against communal and separate electorates, and also against the reservation of seats which must, in the very nature of the proposals embodied in the White Paper be on a communal bases. The Secretary of State in reply to a question by Miss Pickford on the 21st July, I think I am right in saying, definitely said, regarding reserved seats for women: "The communal question, of course, as she knows, does enter into the question of these women's seats very definitely." We wonder whether the full implication of this answer has been realised by the Members of the Committee as it is realised by us. May I give just one example? In practice, it will mean that every woman will have to enter the Councils or the Assembly on a communal ticket. It follows that she will have necessarily to be loyal to that community, and in the event of any controversy arising as regards any remedial legislation proposed for any particular community, the women of the other communities in the Councils or in the Legislatures, as the case may be, will be morally debarred from giving their full support, or otherwise, in matters that are going to concern, and are of vital importance to, the entire womanhood of India. I think that this is an extremely important point for the Committee to consider. Of course, I need hardly add that we shall not on this basis have the opportunity of returning the women of our choice to either the Councils or the Assembly. We women are, therefore, determined not to let this spirit of separation which is so highly detrimental to our national interests and to our personal interests, to enter into our ranks. When the Secretary of State implies—I am afraid I have not got the exact words—but certainly the implication was that the communal award was forced upon His Majesty's Government by all the communities in India, we would have him remember and the Committee remember that 47 per cent. of the population of India were never a party to it, and will never accept it. We feel extremely strongly on this point. Surely, it is not fair, and it is against all canons of justice—(I am sorry the Lord Chancellor is not here)—to push us into a Room against our will, and tell us that the door is locked; we shall not take it as being locked. Now, as far as the proposals contained in the White Paper are concerned, I would just briefly say that they meet, in the main, with our unqualified disapproval. There is no uniformity in these proposals; they vary from Province to Province, as, for example, in the case of the reservation of seats, certain Provinces have been omitted altogether, though we are against the reservation, as I have said; as also in the differential educational qualifications, they also vary from Province to Province. The wives and widows of those holding the educational qualification might also raise and, I think, very legitimately, a hue and cry as to why they have been ignored and preference given to the wives and widows of those who hold the property qualification. The Upper House holds no opening—at least it is not definitely stated whether it holds any opening—for women at all, to say nothing of the monstrous suggestion that there should be indirect election for us to the main House of the Federal Assembly, where educational and economic reforms are going to come in, and that is where we women do want to have strength. As far as numbers are concerned, you cannot blame us for being exceedingly depressed when you realise that various Committees and Conferences which have dealt with India, instead of increasing the number of women that should be enfranchised, have decreased the number. We seem to be going backwards. The Simon Commission actually recommended the ratio of men voters to women, in the proportion of 1 to 2. The Indian Franchise Committee brought it down to 1 to 4½, and the White Paper has further decreased it now to 1 in 7, and I would please have you to remember that this 1 in 7 is on paper only, and with all the difficulties placed in the way of that vote, which we object to, wives and widows, is going to work out in practice at 1 in 15, and probably in Provincial Councils at 1 in 20 or even less for the Federal Council. It seems almost as if they are ostensibly given with one hand and taken away with the other.

Mrs. Hamid Ali.

C160. May I say a few words? I fully endorse what the Rajkumari has said in all particulars. I should like to tell you something about the Women's Associations which we women have the honour to represent. I wonder if it is realised by Members of the Committee that it is for the very first time in the history of India that women elected accredited representatives of the women, representing the women of India, have ever come before a Committee of the British Parliament. We understand and realise fully the responsibility that has been laid on our shoulders, and we hope that by the unity that we are going to prove to you, and by our breadth of vision and the potency of our arguments, we shall conquer those of you who do not believe in the arguments that we are putting forward and vanquish our opponents. Now may I tell you what is the nature of the Associations which we have the honour to represent. There are three Associations who have joined together. We are elected by a Joint Committee of these three Associations, first of all, the All-India Women's Conference, founded in 1925. The organisation has constituencies in every Province in India, as well as in 12 Indian States. The total number of constituencies with their sub-constituencies is at present 118. The Women's Indian Association was founded in 1917. This Association has its Headquarters in Madras, with 24 Centres and 72 branches distributed throughout India. The National Council of Women in India was founded in 1925. This Organisation has 6 main Centres in different Provinces including Burma, and 6 branches and 77 affiliated Societies. If you want me to read out the names of all the constituencies, I shall do so.

C161. I hardly think it necessary?—Then I shall read out the names of the few constituencies which have a bearing on the subject on which I am going to speak. We, the representatives of the Indian Associations have brought this Memorandum and we hear that there are other Memoranda sent from India which do not entirely agree with our views, but we still are of opinion that the Memorandum which has been sent to the Committee through us really represents the opinion of the Women all over India in spite of a few other sections of women who have brought in other Memoranda. We hear that a Memorandum has been sent from Madras and, perhaps, Bihar and Bengal. I would draw your attention to this fact, that in Madras there are 52 constituencies of the Women's Indian Association alone which have entirely accepted this Memorandum. In Bengal there are 6 branches of the All-India Women's Conference alone, apart from the affiliated Associations of the National Council of Women in India, and they have all agreed to our Memorandum, so that we still continue to think, and I hope that I have proved to you that our Memorandum is really accepted by the women in the length and breadth of India, because our Associations and our constituencies are spread over the whole face of India.

Begum Shah Nawaz.

C162. May I ask a question? This Memorandum represents the opinion of your Organisations, as such, and that the dissent by any member to any clause therein has not been attached to the Memorandum, but is recorded?—Certainly. I would like to point out that when this Memorandum was drafted by our Committee, the Committee which represented the three Associations, it was sent round for affirmation to all our sub-constituencies. Of course, there are a few dissentients, individual dissentients, even on the Committee, but on minor matters, and that has been recorded on the Minute but we could not naturally record the dissentients in the Memorandum. Now, about adult Urban Suffrage: We would like to have this adult urban suffrage and we would entirely do away with the wives' and widows' votes which has been suggested in the White Paper. We know that the great argument against adult urban suffrage is: Why do you women want to get more votes for urban women than for rural women? And they say that it would be very unfair to the rural women if the adult urban suffrage was granted according to our wishes. Adult Urban Suffrage means suffrage in urban areas. May I read out to you what that urban area really means; then I think it will be quite clear that it is in the hands of the Committee to delimit an urban area in such a manner that they can either give the majority of votes to rural areas or to urban areas which comprise that unit which is known as the Municipal Unit or a notified area unit, or a cantonment area unit. I speak from experience because most of my life I have lived in these so-called urban areas which are governed by either municipalities or notified areas, and I know (I am speaking of the Bombay Presidency in particular) that excepting for perhaps a few large towns like Bombay, Ahmedabad, Sholapur, and so on, which have very large populations, all other urban areas do comprise villages which have been taken into the urban area, simply to bring the population basis up to 5,000 or more. Only on that condition can they get a municipality. I will not ask you to accept my definition of the urban area, but the definition of the Indian Franchise Committee. "For the purpose of these comparisons, we have taken as the urban population the areas classed as urban during the census; that is, all municipalities, cantonments, and other towns with over 5,000 inhabitants which, though they have not attained self-government, still possess urban characteristics differentiating them from the larger class of purely agricultural villages. The actual influence which the urban vote may have on rural areas depends largely on the extent to which urban areas are included in rural constituencies, and it is not possible to indicate at this stage what the proportion of the purely urban vote in mixed constituencies will be." Then there is something which I will leave out. "The question of the relative representation of town and country in the Legislatures will depend upon the manner in which constituencies are delimited and at the delimitation stage one of the most important matters to be taken into consideration will be the desirability of making the representation of town and country in the legislatures proportionate to the population in each. The matter will also come up for consideration in mixed constituencies consisting partly of urban and partly of rural areas. In Bombay, for example, it would be advisable, other things being equal, to arrange constituencies so that urban areas will not have a preponderating influence in mixed constituencies; while in Madras on the other hand, where the rural voting strength is the greater, it may be found desirable to give some weightage to urban areas in the distribution of seats."

Miss Pickford.

C163. That is paragraph 95, page 45 of the Indian Franchise Committee's Report, is it not?—(Rajkumari Amrit Kaur.) Yes. (Mrs. Hamid Ali.) From this you will see that it is entirely in the hands of either the Provincial Government or for anyone who makes the units, or who defines the units, to give the rural women as many votes as they would want to because in some of the Provinces you will notice that the urban ratio is larger than, or almost equal to, the rural ratio, and in some much smaller. It can be adjusted according to the needs of the moment. We are not at all in favour of giving the urban women a larger vote than necessary, but we do think that at the present time, especially for the first two or three elections, the urban woman is the woman who is more educated than the rural woman, and the urban woman will be able to educate the rural woman far better, and lead her to vote in the right way, as we think, for our social legislation than if you give the rural woman a vote only, and no urban women get it. For instance, if you give the vote to the wives and widows, then practically all the voting will be distributed in the rural area, and it will be so distributed (50,000 I think in each province) that it will be very difficult for any organisation to reach those votes individually. We are also afraid that those votes will not be a help to us, but they will strengthen the hands of those members of the Assembly and Councils who have already shown their Conservatism by not wanting to have the Sharda Act and other similar legislation. So we do not want that the literate woman and the more educated woman should be able to influence and to get at the rural women's votes. If you accept our proposition I think it will act in fairness to everyone all round. It will also be a step towards Adult Franchise which is our ultimate goal. We really cannot understand why the wives and widows' votes have been suggested in the White Paper, and the widows and wives of propertied men only. As the Rajkumari said why not of educated men? I say why did not you suggest it of, say, the Civil Service, then you could have put another steel band round your steel frame; or why not the wives of the policemen; then we could have had the policemen's wives being put into the Reserved Department as well. There are so many other things that one could have done, but this opportunity has been neglected, and only the wives of propertied men have got this distinction of getting a vote which they do not get as human beings, but because they are the property of some man. We are entirely against it. We feel it very bitterly, and we feel that it is against the dignity of womanhood and humanity to suggest a vote like that. It begins from the very first on a wrong basis, and if we once accept it we shall find it very difficult to come back to our principles again, so we do hope that our suggestions will be considered and adult suffrage will be agreed to. May I also just point out to you that there are only 30 large cities all over India (according to the Minute of Dissent by the three gentlemen, S. B. Tambe, C. Y. Chintamani, and R. R. Bakhale) which could be considered as purely urban areas if the Franchise was only granted to them; then that would be purely urban vote; but if the Lothian Committee definition of the urban area is accepted and acted upon, then the vote for the rural women will be equal—(or you can give more, if you will) to the urban women. Now we come to the question of the Communal Award. This is another matter on which the Women's Associations feel very deeply. We are feeling aggrieved and hurt that no account is taken of half the population of India when such a far-reaching award is made. If we accept this award what will be the result? Rajkumari will go into the Council through the Indian Christian door, Begum Shah Nawaz and I shall go into the Legislative Assemblies through the Muslim door. The Muslims' and the Hindus' and the Christians' parties will not allow each other to vote or to interfere in any legislation which bears either on the Sherriat or Shastras, or, if it is a Christian religious question, of, course, the Bible. Supposing we want to do away with polygamy in India, we three women would not be able to join together, or supposing the matter of divorce comes up, or of inheritance, then we know very well the practice of the Assembly. They make a pact between each other and say, This question is entirely for Muslims or Hindus, hands off, so they must refrain from voting. They work it so that it will be desirable that the Government members will refrain from voting because this is either a Muslim, or Hindu, or Christian, or some other question. We do not want it to work in that way. We think it is a loathsome way to work in small compartments and to cut our country into bits. It will not lead to nationhood, nor do we think it conforms to our idea of patriotism to go into small compartments like this, so we must make it clear to you that whatever happens even if this Award is continued, women like me—and I speak for a very large number of women who are working in our associations—will entirely keep out of all political matters, and we shall see to it that we try to get this Communal Award changed as quickly as possible.

29th July, 1933.] RAJKUMARI AMRIT KAWR and Mrs. HAMID ALI.

Chairman.] There are just one or two questions I should like to ask you,

29^o July, 1933.] RAJKUMARI AMRIT KAUR and Mrs. HAMID ALI.

Rajkumari Amrit Kaur. I should like you to tell us a little about the political organizations which you represent. Which of these two organizations do you regard as the more democratic?—(Rajkumari Amrit Kaur.) The All-India Women's Conference.

C164. That is the more democratic organization?—I think so, and perhaps I may be allowed to give you, as briefly as possible, an explanation of the Constitution.

C165. Might I put my questions to you and then you will see whether we are both moving in the same direction?—Yes.

C166. I should like to know a little about the organization. Let us take that one?—May I take the organization of the All-India Women's Conference?

C167. May I put it in the form of a series of questions to you because I know precisely that which I desire to discover, if I can?—Yes.

C168. Can you give us any indication now as to whether those organizations embrace all classes of the population? Naturally, in these matters interest tends to show itself first in the better educated and more well-to-do, but I am anxious to discover how the development of these organizations is proceeding?—Very definitely, yes. It embraces every woman in India, from whatever class or whatever creed, or whatever position in life she comes from. May I briefly tell you the Constitution of the All-India Women's Conference?

C169. I am not really so much concerned with the constitution; I am prepared to take from you at once that that is democratic?—Yes.

C170. What I am very anxious to discover, if I can, is as to how far the actual membership is democratic?—We have not got an actual membership in the nature of members paying fees for the very reason that we wanted to embrace all—even the very, very poor—and you know that for them it is almost impossible to pay fees, however small an amount we fix those fees at; but, for instance, when it comes to the election of our Delegates to the Annual Session those Delegates from every constituency are elected. We hold large annual meetings in our constituencies and sub-constituencies. They are open to women from every part of that particular constituency and when the election of Delegates takes place every woman present at that meeting has a vote. When it comes to framing any resolutions (and for the last three years we might say that the question of franchise has been very much to the forefront amongst our constituencies) every woman present at those meetings has a vote, and I may say that those meetings are attended by hundreds of women, illiterate as well as literate, and they all vote, either in favour of or against and they are at full liberty to speak.

C171. Would you tell us whether the organization is doing any direct political education in the way of house-to-house visiting and attempting to interest women not yet interested in politics in such matters? Is any work of that kind being done?—Our Conference is pledged not to take part in Party politics, but we certainly do go round to women and as far as possible our Standing Committee members go into the villages and also get into touch with the villagers to put such matters as we think matter very definitely to the women in the new Constitution for India before them, and I may say we have an extremely lively interest taken in all matters pertaining to women.

Begum Shah Nawaz.

C172. May I put one supplementary question? Could you tell us something about the representative character of the meeting that was held in Bombay at the end of March which framed this Memorandum?—Yes. At the end of March, when we were definitely told that adult franchise or any system based thereon was impossible, these three organizations elected ten women from amongst themselves—ten each—to meet in Bombay, and these organizations gave these ten delegates full powers to frame a Memorandum and alternative proposals, and if we had wanted—if these ten delegates from each of these Conferences had wanted—to publish a Memorandum ourselves, we should have had the entire support of our Associations; but feeling as we do that we wanted not only to frame it ourselves (even although we had plenary powers) but that we should circulate it, we circulated it amongst all our constituencies and we have got the unqualified approval of all the branches from all over the country of all these three organizations, so that the Memorandum does really speak not only for those who actually were responsible for the framing of it, but for the constituencies as a whole.

C173. Is any work being done in the villages remote from urban centres, by way of attempting to interest women in political matters and political development?—(Mrs Hamid Ali.) May I answer this question?

C174. If you please?—There are three Associations, you will remember. The All-India Women's Conference is pledged not to take up political work; but the object of the Women's Indian Association is "to secure the abolition of child marriage and other social evils; to secure for women the vote for municipal and legislative councils on the same terms as it is or may be granted to men; to secure adequate representation of women on municipalities, Taluk and local boards, legislative councils and assemblies; to secure for women the right to vote and to be elected for the Council of State; to establish equality of rights and opportunities between men and women, to help women to realize that the future of India lies largely in their hands, for as wives and mothers they have the task of training, guiding and forming the character of the future rulers of India; to band women into groups for the purpose of self-development in education and for the definite service of others." Except one or two items in those which are purely political, the All-India Women's Conference sub-constituencies and the affiliated constituencies of the Indian Women's Association do definite work in villages. We go about from village to village holding meetings in large villages and collect women from several neighbouring villages. We do medical work as well as school work, we start classes, and we have men or women coming down to speak on various question of legislation such as doing away with the disabilities of inheritance laws, or widows, or divorce laws or the rights of widows and so on. Mr. Jayaker will know that he himself has been asked to address several meetings of this kind so that we do educative work as well as propaganda work in the villages.

Chairman.

C175. Now, Rajkumari, do you meet, as representing Women's Organisations, with much opposition in India from Indians?—We do from the orthodox section of India undoubtedly, or from what I might call the unintelligibly conservative section of India.

Begum Shah Nawaz.

C176. Have not you had many of these ladies presiding at some of your provincial conferences belonging to the orthodox section?—May I say that we have no opposition from our women—no.

Sir Hari Singh Gour.

C177. Orthodox men do not oppose?—So far as the women's work is concerned, we have no opposition from the women, but we do have opposition in India from our men.

Chairman.

C178. Does that opposition take a very active form? Can you tell us anything about it?—Yes, undoubtedly. For instance, to take the Child Marriage Restraint Act; we would not have been able to pass it without the help of the Government.

C179. That is opposition policy which you favour. Can you say that there is any opposition to your organisation or to you in your endeavour to interest women in the franchise? Is there any counter-propaganda, let me put it that way?—No.

C180. I am only seeking information—I do not know?—I cannot say that there has been any counter-propaganda.

Mr. J. C. C. Davidson.

C181. There is nothing equivalent to what we had in this country—the anti-suffrage organisation?—No; certainly not. We have had no difficulty from our men as far as obtaining the vote is concerned. The opposition we meet with is when it comes to a question of remedial legislation; we get opposition from the orthodox and conservative section of the men in India.

Mr. M. R. Jayaker.

C182. In the legislatures?—Yes.

Chairman.] I shall reserve any further questions until I hear what my colleagues may wish to ask you.

Miss Mary Pickford.

C183. Rajkumari, you said there was no definite membership for the All-India Women's Conference?—Yes.

C184. There is no what one might call subscribing membership?—That is so.

C185. So that it is not possible to estimate the numbers behind that movement?—The numbers are so large that it really is impossible to estimate them.

C186. Does the same apply to the two other allied associations, or is there a definite membership there?—I think the National Council of Women in India has a membership; I am not certain about the Women's Indian Association. Mrs. Hamid Ali can qualify that. (Mrs. Hamid Ali.) We co-operate with the other

29^o July, 1933.] RAJKUMARI AMRIT KAUR and Mrs. HAMID ALI.

Societies. There is no fee. (Rajkumari Amrit Kaur.) I think there is a fee for actual members in the large towns, but there is no bar to women attending those meetings.

C187. You cannot tell me the membership of the National Council of Women—the numbers?—I am afraid I have not got that.

C188. Perhaps you could look that up and put it on the Note afterwards?—(Mrs. Hamid Ali.) The National Council of Women in India have not a very large individual membership because they usually work in large towns. I have a paper here:—There is the Bengal Presidency Council of Women, which has 32 affiliated societies and one branch at Dacca and 250 individual members. The Bihar and Orissa Council of women has 3 branches, 5 affiliated societies and 330 individual members. The Bombay Presidency Women's Council has 2 branches, 27 affiliated societies and 500 individual members. The Women's Indian Association, which has a central organization in Madras, was started on May 8, 1917, and has grown and increased steadily ever since. It now has 72 Branches, 23 Centres and over 4,000 members and several affiliated foreign bodies. The Political policy of the Association is to work for Reforms through the Legislative Councils. The aims, ideals and work of the Association are on a religious but non-sectarian basis. The Association has connections with some of the important and influential foreign Women's Organizations whose aims and objects are for the material, moral, social and political advancement of women. Hence the Association is in touch with the organisation, work and progress of the Women's Movements all the world over. The Association has an influential and most active Committee at London carrying on propaganda work for the benefit of Indian Womanhood. May I point out that all the women's societies and associations working in a large town, say, for instance, in Calcutta or Bombay, have one woman member to represent them, so that these affiliated societies as a whole come on their association. It is impossible really to calculate how many members each Council has, because they have affiliated all the clubs, and working societies, and women's associations, to work, in that special unit. Say, for instance, in Bombay, they might have 50 affiliated societies and all the members of those 50 affiliated societies are the members of the National Council of Women.

C189. The main object of the three associations was, first of all, educational work, and to that was added general social work affecting principally women and children and young persons?—(Rajkumari Amrit Kaur.) That is so.

C190. And two out of these three organisations in their foundation are precluded from taking part in political work?—Not political. We are pledged not to take part in party politics, but where it comes to political questions that affect the welfare of women and children, we are at full liberty to take part.

Begum Shah Nawaz.

C191. Like the franchise?—For instance like the franchise; that is termed political. Anything may be termed political; even remedial legislation may be termed political, but we are not barred from taking part in that. It is only party politics because we embrace women, to whatever party they may belong politically.

Miss Mary Pickford.

C192. Is it not the case that that definition of political work has been differently interpreted in different branches, and that some of the branches felt that the question of franchise was bound to come up against party political questions?—I think I must make that position quite clear. It was not any constituency or sub-constituency; what I mean is it was no body of any standing within the conference that did object to this. One or two isolated members did put forward the plea that perhaps we should not take up the question of franchise because it was a political thing. Last year at our annual session, this question was definitely thrashed out in open conference, and it was the opinion of everybody present that franchise came well within the realm of the work of the All-India Women's Conference. So far as the Women's Indian Association is concerned, they have, from the very beginning, taken up franchise. There is no bar to their taking it up, and I do not think the National Council of Women in India either have had any question as to whether they had a right to take it up or not.

C193. With regard to the question of franchise, I see you say in your supplementary statement that if women "are to possess the means of furthering the cause of economic, educational, social and medical reform" all of which are questions with which the Association are most intimately concerned?—Quite.

29° Julii, 1933.] RAJKUMARI AMRIT KAUR and Mrs. HAMID ALI.

C194. "We consider it essential that as large a number of women as possible should be brought immediately on to the electoral roll so that our voice may be a determining factor." Therefore you stress the very great importance of having a franchise sufficiently large to bring pressure to bear not only upon the candidates who are standing for election, but also on the provincial councils of the legislative assembly?—Certainly.

C195. You favour, I think, the qualification which was recommended by the Indian Franchise Committee for Women, that is, the literacy qualification interpreted as meaning the ability to read and write?—Yes.

C196. Even though that was suggested as a differential qualification, you would support that?—We have in our memorandum, of course, recommended literacy for men and women, because we have not wanted to differentiate between men and women as far as possible. But if the administrative difficulty of numbers is going to be in the way of this qualification, we would be willing to accept the literacy qualification for women only, and have it as a differential qualification. We are very sorry about it, but there seems to be no way out of having differential qualification once we go away from what I shall call the basic principle of adult suffrage.

C197. Would it be fair to say that in essence there is not really so great a difference because it is easier for boys to attend a public school and get the necessary educational qualifications, whereas many girls and women, equally well-educated, have not got these certificates because they have been educated privately?—Without doubt it would be impossible for us women to produce examination certificates.

C198. And, therefore, it is more differential in outward appearance than in essence?—Yes. We must admit that because we are willing to accept it.

C199. With regard to the other suggestion of the Indian Franchise Committee, and also of the Simon Commission, of enfranchising wives, and widows, who as wives have been qualified, of men who hold a certain property qualification, I understand that your Association takes somewhat strong objection to that suggestion?—That is so.

C200. I notice in your memorandum you say "the women of India should not be enfranchised independently of any extraneous factor"—that is a double negative, as a matter of fact—"the women of India should be enfranchised independently of any extraneous factor"?—Yes; it is a misprint. Our meaning is clear.

C201. Yes; it is only because I have not read the whole paragraph. Do you think that marriage would generally be considered in India as an extraneous factor?—I can only put it to you this way. India is, of course, a land of universal marriage, but whenever we have held meetings, and these meetings have been very largely attended, and we have put to the women "Do you want the vote in your own right as women or would you be willing to accept it simply because you are married to a man who had the vote," the answer invariably has been "Why, because we are married, should not we have it in our own right; it is our birthright."

C202. Would it be fair to say, that the property, though held in the name of the man benefits the family as a whole, and that that is a strong argument for that property enfranchising both husband and wife?—In a country like India where women suffer under tremendous disabilities, where ownership of any property is concerned, I should certainly say that would not apply to the women of India. We are struggling to get our recognition of owning property in our own right.

C203. Another objection you take to this is that it would "double the vote of the landlords and capitalists—a section of the most conservative and orthodox members of society—who are, generally speaking, invariably opposed to all progressive reforms". You know, of course, that the suggestion is to enfranchise the wives and widows of those who are qualified to vote for the provincial council. Do you think the experience of the last 10 years would show that all those voters have been opposed to progressive reforms?—Of course, I can only speak generally, that it is, as a rule, the opposition from these property holders that we have to come against where any reforms are concerned.

C204. Are you distinguishing between property holders and others? I am speaking of those, all of whom are qualified to-day to speak for provincial councils?—Do you mean the ones who have the lower property qualifications? Do you include the lower property qualifications also—all property qualifications?

29th July, 1933.] RAJKUMARI AMRIT KAUR and Mrs. HAMID ALI.

C205. I am including those who to-day are qualified to vote for provincial councils under the existing Constitution?—No; I cannot say that all have been opposed to reforms as far as we are concerned. I cannot say that.

C206. I think you said in answer to a previous question that even in the most orthodox, and, shall we say, ultra conservative section, although you had opposition to reforms in which you are interested from the men, you had never had any opposition from the women and, in fact, many of the women of this section of society are members of your organisations?—Yes. But I should like to qualify the position there. There is no doubt about it that if the women of those property holders who are conservative and are opposed to reforms are given the vote simply because they are married to these people, or are the widows of these people, there will be pressure brought to bear on them—there is no doubt about it—and though they are members of our organisations, and though they inwardly sympathise with us, it will be very difficult, or I may say impossible, for them to go against their husbands where the vote is concerned.

C207. That argument would apply whatever the franchise qualification might be?—No! because we have to take the psychological factor into consideration, and when a woman gets a vote in her own right, it is much easier for her to exercise it without any pressure from outside being brought to bear upon her.

Chairman.

C208. Is the suggestion that the secrecy of the Ballot would be of no avail in this regard?—I do not think so, because apart from anything else, if a husband were to say to his wife "I do not want you to vote", she does not go at all. It is impossible to get away from that.

Marquess of Lothian.

C209. How is that affected by the process by which she gets on the roll? She is on the roll and has a vote in her own right. How is that affected?—Supposing she is not allowed to go to the polling-booth.

C210. That applies equally whether she has a vote in her own right or by virtue of marriage?—No; because, as I say, you must take into account the psychological factor there. That does make a difference. It may affect—I dare say it will—I am not going to say it will not absolutely affect the vote where women are concerned, but it will make a difference to the strength of that vote.

Miss Mary Pickford.

C211. Is your suggestion that supposing the Franchise Committee's recommendations were adopted and a woman was qualified by literacy and she was also qualified as the wife of her husband, she would vote differently in one capacity from what she would in the other?—No; certainly not. I do not suggest that for a moment, but we accept the literacy qualification because, as I say, it does not make any conditions where the vote is concerned for that woman, but the other qualification distinctly denies to women their rightful position in the Constitution. That is my point. After all, we have to take risks where women are concerned, and a great many of them will be influenced, as I dare say a great many in England are to-day influenced, by their husbands. I am not going to say that that will not obtain, but we want to eliminate all pressure that may be brought to bear on them as far as we possibly can.

C212. Your alternative suggestion is that of having adult franchise in urban areas. Of course, if you are going to avoid a differential qualification, that would necessitate enfranchising both men and women in urban areas?—Yes.

C213. You do realise, of course, that that question was very carefully considered by the Franchise Committee and was rejected on a variety of grounds?—But may I suggest here that with the lower property qualification that is now going to be applied to men and the suggestion that labour ought to have adult suffrage in urban areas, men will practically have adult suffrage in urban areas and the numbers are not going to be increased to an enormous extent, whereas, as far as we women are concerned, it is going to make a very great difference.

C214. Then it comes to the point how you are going to define the urban area. I understood from Mrs. Hamid Ali that you wished to define the urban area so as to bring in a large amount of country districts?—(Mrs. Hamid Ali.) May I say that it was not my definition. It was the definition of the Indian Franchise Association.

Sir Hari Singh Gour.

C215. It was a question of defining areas such as Local Councils, District Councils, and so on?—I said that I have lived in these areas. I am speaking from personal knowledge. For instance, when 29th July, 1933.] RAJKUMARI AMRIT KAUR and MRS. HAMID ALI.

I lived in Alibagh, which is known as an urban area, it had about 6,000 inhabitants, and 3,000 or 4,000 of those inhabitants came from the villages surrounding that urban district. It was only put together as a unit because they wanted to have a municipality there.

Miss Pickford.

C216. The point I want to put to you is this. It is recognised that only a certain number of votes can be polled satisfactorily for administrative reasons. If you get beyond that machinery you break down. May I put it that was one of the arguments for not extending the vote, for not having adult franchise. It was suggested by the Minority Report of the Indian Franchise Committee that adult franchise should be introduced only in large cities where in a sense it was administratively possible. If you enfranchise all the adults in large cities, then your urban areas are, very strictly, large towns and the large towns only, but if you extend your definition of urban areas to take in country districts then it is impossible to tell at present what additional numbers will be placed on the roll by that suggestion?—(Rajkumari Amrit Kaur.) We have reckoned a population of 14 millions in urban areas. I think that figure is from the Indian Franchise Committee's Report. The adult population in the urban areas is 14 millions, and we imagine that the adult women would be a population of between 5 and 6 millions. If the wives' and widows' vote is not ruled out, and this substituted for it, the question of numbers causing the administrative machinery to break down would not arise, because it is practically only a little more than what is suggested was a fair qualification.

C217. It is fair to say these figures are purely hypothetical seeing that the constituencies have not entered into the question?—The question of numbers has to be fixed sooner or later in a country like India where, alas, the population is increasing by leaps and bounds. In ten years we have increased by another 25 millions, and we shall have a more difficult problem to solve, and we must make a beginning somewhere. I do not think that these administrative difficulties are going to be so great—"where there is a will there is a way." In the urban areas in particular, where we want adult suffrage for women, the women's organisations will be at the entire disposal of the Government, and we shall help in every way we can. I do not see that there will be that difficulty that is imagined. There will be far more difficulty from the administrative point of view in placing on the rolls the wives and widows. We shall have the most amazing difficulties placed before us as far as the wives and widows are concerned. In fact, pari passu, with the White Paper suggestion that these wives and widows should be enfranchised, statements have been made that, owing to the difficulties which are being put in their way, very many less will come on to the rolls.

C218. Would not you agree that the essence of representative government is that it should represent all sections of society?—Certainly it should, and that is why we still adhere to the adult franchise and say that any system based thereon should be the best system. But when that has been ruled out and we are forced to go back, and when you are going to give the women a limited franchise, we insist that it should be given to us where it is going to carry weight. So far as our women's questions are concerned, I may tell you that any remedial legislation, any social legislation, any educational legislation, any economic legislation, that we women may fight for, is going to affect women in the rural areas far more than it is going to affect the women in the urban areas. So that, as long as we get that vote, it does not matter the way we get it, but let us get it where it will carry weight. With wives' and widows' votes it is going to be spread over the length and breadth of India. In the eleven Provinces there will probably be less than half a million. Of those half million presumably nothing like those numbers will come on to the rolls. So that the women's vote is going to convey nothing. Absolutely it is going to be negligible so far as we are concerned. Therefore, we demand that it be given to us, so long as it is going to be on the basis of a restricted franchise, in the area where it is going to count. All our social reformers are in urban areas. All our women organisations and women workers are there, and we are going to get a more intelligent vote, a more independent vote, a better organised vote, and surely that means a very great deal to our organisations and to us women at this time.

C219. Is not it a logical corollary of your statement that you get as large a representation as you can in the areas which support your views but you exclude those areas which you fear may be hostile

29^o Julii, 1933.] RAJKUMARI AMRIT KAUR and Mrs. HAMID ALI.

to your views—is that quite representative?—It is going to be as representative as possible in the circumstances, because I hold that the women in the urban areas who are going to vote are voicing the sentiments not only of women. We do not divide ourselves, wherever we go, into urban and rural, but we voice the sentiments of women as a whole. I would impress on you that, wherever the vote comes from, it is not going to be a rural vote or an urban vote. It is going to be a vote for the women of India and for all that the women of India are working to-day to get.

Sir Hari Singh Gour.

C220. Would not the women in the rural areas oppose your suggestion?—I do not think they will. That is why we have suggested the literacy qualification also, because we feel that will embrace a fair number—we cannot say the mass unfortunately, because the figures of illiteracy in education are so deplorable in India—but it will increase the number and give us a certain number of women in rural areas. As Mrs. Hamid Ali has pointed out, even in the urban constituencies we shall get a certain number of rural women on the roll. Our women who live in the urban areas have relations in the neighbouring villages, and they will have the vote. We are not going to have a great opposition from the women in the rural areas.

Miss Pickford.

C221. Is not it true to say that there are fewer schools in the rural areas and less opportunities for other services such as maternity, child welfare and so forth? Would it not, therefore, be of very great importance that the women's vote should be brought to bear on candidates standing for rural areas?—(Mrs. Hamid Ali.) But the constituencies can be formed in such a way that a large number of rural areas can be taken into that constituency.

C222. Those would be only such parts as adjoin a town or an urban district, but in the remoter country districts the need is surely much greater?—May I point out to you that all the work that has been done so far for education and for medical relief amongst the rural women has been done by the urban women's Associations—either individually or through the Associations as a whole. That is just why we want our vote to be effective, because really if we go round India and see the state in which the rural women live to-day, without any medical aid, especially in matters of maternity or maternity homes or medical aid of any kind, then you would feel as intensely as we feel that something must be done to remedy this evil. The only way we can get money from the Provincial Government or influence the Provincial Government is to make our votes count. That is just the thing we are fighting for.

C223. Therefore, you want to bring pressure on the candidates and members of all the districts?—Of all the districts, and all the rural votes we want to capture.

C224. Yet you are opposed to a special reservation of seats for women?—(Rajkumari Amrit Kaur): Yes; if they are to be reserved, as we are told they are to be, on the communal basis, we are definitely opposed to that.

C225. On those grounds?—Yes, that is our objection throughout, because we realise they could not be reserved to us on any other basis, and, therefore, we object very strongly.

C226. You object to the suggestion of the election of the women members of the Federal Assembly by indirect election?—Yes, very strongly indeed. I do not understand why this differential qualification has been made between men and women. We are told in one breath that we do not want to make a differential qualification between men and women, and yet in this very important Assembly, where we want a strong vote and a strong representation of women, we are given an indirect vote without any chance of getting the right type of women and men; there is the communal difficulty.

C227. You realise that women will be elected by the whole Province?—When these Provinces are going to be hot-beds of communalism, I cannot see that the women who would be elected by these Provincial Councils will be representative.

C228. Have you any alternative suggestion?—Certainly. Why not direct election through joint electorates?

229. Direct election from what?—As far as the reservation of seats is concerned, we are opposed to the reservation of seats, so naturally we have not got any proposals for election to reserved seats, unless, I say, those reserved seats were definitely on a non-communal basis. We might then ask our organisations to consider the reservation of seats, but, as long as they are on a communal basis, we will not have anything to do with them.

29° July, 1933.] RAJKUMARI AMRIT KAUR and Mrs HAMID ALI.

C230. I do not understand your suggestion about direct election?—Well, there could be special constituencies, could not there, or one multiple constituency for the election of women through joint electorates to those reserved seats, if they are to be reserved?

C231. Direct election from special constituencies?—Yes.

C232. But the women would be representative of that constituency and not of the Province?—Well, it is a choice of evils. It depends on how many seats you have. We do not think we should have enough representation, but still we would have to compromise on that and take it from one of the capital cities of the Province, or in any way that the Committee thought the most representative women could go, but certainly it should be on a system of joint electorates.

Mr. Davidson.

C233. In your memorandum under the heading of "Franchise and Representation," you say: "We are emphatic that the true spirit of reform, without which no national progress is possible, must in no wise be sacrificed at the altar of administrative inconveniences." You will admit, I suppose, that a breakdown in the initial election after the constitution was in operation would have a very serious effect upon the future constitutional progress of India—I mean if the machinery broke down at the first election?—My answer to that is that every precaution must be taken, and even more money spent, at the beginning, because, after all, the difficulties are going to be for the first electoral roll. Every precaution should be taken that the administrative machinery does not break down. What we feel, and have always felt, is that the administrative inconveniences have been magnified to a very great extent, and that they will not really loom so large as they are supposed to loom.

Mr. Butler.

C234. There are one of two points that you have raised that I should like to refer to. You first refer to the actual paper figure in the White Paper of the relation between men and women voters?—Yes.

C235. Are you aware that the actual gross figure is 1 to 4.8?—I saw that yesterday in the evidence that was given by the British Women's Organisations.

C236. And that in the case of the figure of 1 in 7 we are allowing for a considerable overlap?—I know, but from the White Paper proposals, I would also say that the education test you are putting for the women, and for the women only, is going to eliminate very many more women than you have really reckoned for. The figures will be very much nearer 1 in 25 or 1 in 20, as we have said. I do not think it is fair to count them as 1 in 7. I do not think you have allowed enough for the overlap, as you call it.

Mr. Butler.

C237. 1 to 4.8 is the gross figure on paper and 1 in 7 is the net figure on paper. That is just allowing for the overlap of different qualifications without taking education into consideration.

Marquess of Lothian.

C238. May I ask Mr. Butler what he means exactly by overlap in the matter of qualification?—(Mr. Butler.) There are certain qualifications, property, wifehood and education. It is very likely that somebody who is qualified educationally will already be qualified with other qualifications.

Marquess of Lothian.

C239. You are not thinking of the people who might be put on and those who might not be put on?—(Mr. Butler.) No, I am thinking of the overlap of qualifications.

Marquess of Lothian.

C240. Then it would be 1 in 7—it is not possible to have 1 to 4.8?—(Mr. Butler.) No, it is almost impossible to calculate, but we were to count the overlap in the gross figure of 1 to 4.8.

Mr. Butler.

C241. May I say, under the educational calculations recommended by the White Paper, you are not going to get as large a number of women as I think you thought, because we are not able to produce those educational qualifications? That is going to be a very serious drawback. As I say, the majority of our women would be eliminated from voting, so I do not agree to that 1 in 7.

C242. Have you considered some of the administrative difficulties which Sir Malcolm Hailey described in his evidence in taking the electoral Roll?—Yes, I have.

C243. Would you think it would be worth taking the risk of prejudicing the women's cause by coming up against such difficulties as he described?—Might I suggest that these difficulties could be overcome. Speaking for my own Province, if the women who are in the 29^o Julii, 1933.] RAJKUMARI AMRIT KAUR and MRS. HAMID ALI.

Educational Department, for instance, who are District Inspectoresses of Schools, if the women who are running the women's side of the Co-operative Societies, if the women who are working in the districts as lady health visitors, in addition to the women workers of our own organisations in the urban areas, were asked to help, I do not think these difficulties which Sir Malcolm Hailey has put forward would arise. The Government could always appoint special women also to help them. I do not think that the women will have any difficulty whatever in going to the villages and eliciting the names for preparing the register and electoral rolls.

C244. Have you any statistics of the number of women available, in your suggestion, to cover the whole of the villages?—I could not give you an actual number. I know that in my Province, my own district of Tallumdar, it comes in to the neighbouring district, and this lady, who is running the Co-operative side of the Women's Societies, would be able to do that part of the work for you in those areas.

C245. You are aware that we have had to prescribe a certain qualification for the men who were to do this work. Do you think that there will be sufficient women possessing such qualifications to do it?—I see no difficulty; I think there will be. I think that if an appeal is made to our Organisation and to the young girls of to-day who have just finished their university education or their school education, and who, perhaps, are looking out for jobs, they will be forthcoming. It is only, as I say, for the first electoral roll that it matters very much.

C246. That would actually be a lesser qualification than we are demanding for the men to do this work?—I do not think that would matter where women are concerned. We are told that the husbands will be willing to throw brickbats about the place—that danger, at any rate, will be eliminated.

C247. Mrs. Ali said that the men in some of the urban areas were to get practically adult suffrage. Could you substantiate that?—(Mrs. Hamid Ali.) Yes. They would get adult suffrage, but they would overlap, as you call it, because in municipal areas there is already adult franchise for men. They come under the property votes, and taxation and Income Tax, and in various other ways—graduates. I do not remember all the details, but I know that it is so.

that practically there is adult suffrage in urban areas for the men.

C248. Arising out of that, are you aware that on page 45 of the Franchise Committee Report, the highest percentage of the urban population is 22 per cent. and that in Madras 9 per cent. of the urban population was to be enfranchised?—But if you give the labour classes adult franchise, then it will practically be adult franchise.

C249. If you turn to page 102 of the Franchise Committee Report, paragraph 250, where it refers to the establishment of special labour constituencies, in making your calculation, would you not agree that these constituencies have not yet been delimited, and further that this Report refers to the fact that some of the major provinces are all prepared to agree to the establishment of one or more constituencies of this nature. I think you will agree that that cannot be said to be the equivalent of adult franchise or anything near it?—What does it matter if a few more men are enfranchised, because you have already acknowledged that the Government is prepared with this administrative machinery to increase the number of men from 9,000,000 to 36,000,000. Is it not so?

C250. I was only concerned to correct what I thought was a misapprehension about adult suffrage for men, because I think it is a slight exaggeration?—(Rajkumari Amrit Kaur.) Adult franchise in urban areas would not mean the same increase in the men's vote as it does in the women's vote. There will not really be a very substantial increase in the men's vote, whereas, it does make an enormous difference to the women's vote.

C251. I think that modification of the original is true?—Yes.

C252. There is only one other point. On page 4 of your first Memorandum, you refer to the Upper House, and you earnestly recommend that men and women should be equally eligible for membership of the Upper House. Is there anything in the White Paper which prevents men and women being equally eligible?—There is no mention of women at all. We should like it clearly defined. If we are wrong in assuming that women are equally eligible, of course, we withdraw that, but there is nothing in the White Paper to indicate that women are eligible. We would like a definite declaration upon that point.

C253. There is no positive assurance, but the fact is that there is nothing to stop them being eligible, nor is it intended in the White Paper?—I think we should like it made clear. (Mrs. Hamid Ali.) We know how it works in India when a thing is not definitely put down.

Mr. Cocks.

C254. Rajkumari Amrit Kaur, in the first instance, you want the recognition of sex equality and fundamental rights?—(Rajkumari Amrit Kaur.) Yes.

C255. The White Paper on that point says that His Majesty's Government is satisfied that "certain provisions of this kind, such, for instance, as the respect due to personal liberty and rights of property and the eligibility of all for public office, regardless of differences of caste, religion, etc., can appropriately, and should, find a place in the Constitution Act". I suppose you say that the question of sex is far too great a question to be covered by a little word like "etcetera"?—We would not object, if it were put in there, but we object that it has been deliberately left out, in spite of our repeated demands on this point. We would not object, if it had been put in there. As it had been omitted, we offered our own wording of the clause. As long as it is definitely understood that sex shall be no bar we are content. As we said: "sex shall be no bar in regard to any public employment, office, power or honour". As long as it is definitely understood we do not mind where it comes in, but we do object very very strongly to its omission.

C256. Do you suggest that it has been deliberately left out?—We have pressed this point for the last three years, and when the White Paper is framed, and it is left out, I do not know whether we are meant to understand it under the word "etcetera", but, if so, we would like it put in. I can come to no other conclusion except that it has been deliberately left out.

C257. Regarding the franchise, the test for literacy, you suggest is simple literacy?—Yes, ability to read and write.

C258. If the matriculation test were adopted, or anything like it, will that only enfranchise about 12,000 women in India, as was stated the other day?—I have not really got the figures before me, but I should be very much surprised if it enfranchise even 12,000 women.

Begum Shah Nawaz.

C259. May we have a reply to that question also from Mrs. Ali?—(Mrs. Hamid Ali.) The fact is that most of the women in our organisations would have no vote at all. The Begum Shah Nawaz would be unenfranchised; so would I. I do not think the Rajkumari Amrit Kaur has any primary certificate. (Rajkumari Amrit Kaur.) I have not. (Mrs. Hamid Ali.) So that you need not trouble yourselves at all about the question of women's franchise in this Committee.

Mr. Cocks.

C260. Such a test would amount to a farce?—(Rajkumari Amrit Kaur.) Certainly, an unadulterated farce.

C261. I see that you accept the property qualification?—Yes, we have accepted it. It enfranchises, I think I am right in saying, about 2,000,000 women. We have accepted it on the same basis as it has been suggested for the men.

C262. But that would not enfranchise a very large number of women?—No, only about 2,000,000 altogether, I think.

C263. You object to the wife of a property holder having the vote?—Yes.

C264. Would you object to that, even if it meant that a good many women would be enfranchised, as a result of it?—We have put forward our other suggestion, in order to make up the disparity of numbers, the enfranchisement of women in urban areas, adult suffrage in urban areas. That makes up for the wives' and widows' vote, of numbers that it is sought to give us ostensibly on that qualification.

C265. You are assuming in your Memorandum that the adult suffrage is not at the moment practicable?—We have not assumed that it is not practicable.

C266. You are assuming that the majority of the Committee will possibly come to that conclusion?—I hope not. I hope we have been able to convince them that it is practicable and that it would be a very excellent method of enfranchising the women and giving us the requisite numbers.

C267. But assuming that adult suffrage is not accepted, would you still agree to disqualify the women on the grounds of marriage?—Our Organisations are not prepared to accept the wives' and widows' qualification.

C268. And you stand by that, even if it means disqualifying many women?—Yes, we have that mandate from our Organisations. We shall oppose it very strongly.

29th July, 1933.] RAJKUMARI AMRIT KAUR and Mrs. HAMID ALI.

C269. Have you the Table that has been given in the Franchise Committee Report, on page 88, paragraph 217? There is a Table showing women with independent property qualifications, and women with husbands' property qualifications?—I should, of course, like to say that it would be a very sad thing if our proposal for adult suffrage is turned down, and we object to the wives' and widows' vote, that same other means cannot be found by the Committee in consonance with our principles and what we have throughout stood for, if some other means cannot be found in bringing that requisite number of women on to the electoral roll.

Begum Shah Nawaz.

C270. You will have no objection to any other feasible qualification which would give the women the vote, being found by the Committee?—Certainly not. When they say: "We will not have this", it is not fair to say to us: "If you do not want this, you will have nothing." It is scarcely fair, as I say, to offer us half a loaf, and tell us at the same time that it is stale.

Mr. Cocks.

C271. Even a stale loaf is better than none at all?—I disagree.

C272. Referring to that paragraph, you will see the numbers stated there. Take the question of Madras. You see that although 700,000, roughly, would be given the vote of independent property qualification about 700,000, holding it as the result of the husbands' property qualification, would be disqualified, if that qualification were removed?—Yes, I see that, but I have said before that in order to make up the numbers, we have definitely made what we consider is a very practical suggestion.

C273. Do you think it is really humiliating to have a vote because you are married?—Well, that is the feeling of the women of India; I do speak for the women. We have put that to them very very often, and very very strongly. I, myself, speaking for my own constituency actually asked them to accept it, and they said, no, literate and illiterate. As I say, we cannot altogether disregard the psychological factor when we women are struggling under very many disabilities and we are anxious to get rid of those disabilities and, therefore, we have got to change the mentality not only of our men, but also of our women, as well as of the Government. Therefore, we want this recognition of our entity in the political body of India as women.

C274. But are you not getting that, if you get the vote through a literacy test on the same terms as men?—You are getting it on the same terms as men, but we are not getting it, because we are married to the men.

C275. The literacy test alone gives you that right by itself, does it not, those who have got the vote merely because they are literate?—You mean, that we ought not to object. We are not getting it everywhere simply because we happen to be married, or widows of men who hold the vote?

C276. My point is this. The idea, in my view, anyhow, of giving a vote to a woman because she is the wife of an elector who is qualified as the result of holding property, was merely to increase the women's franchise?—But please remember that in the case of a large majority of women sought to be enfranchised is going to be the man enfranchisement qualification for women, is it not, apart from our objection to it, the psychological objection, as we put it, we also say that it is going to double the vote of the landlords and the capitalists, in a large measure. Even if it does not, as Miss Pickford pointed out, in the case of all those who hold the property qualification, it is certainly going to double the vote in considerable measure for those who are going to be very much opposed to our reforms or the reforms we stand for. The third objection that we have (it is not only one objection) is that because it is going to be spread over the length and breadth of India, it is going to be very difficult for us to organise this vote, and we do want, in the first one or two elections, to be able to have an organised women's vote that is really going to count for us, and carry real weight, so there is more than one objection. We attach equal importance, as I have said to the quality as well as to the quantity of the women's vote.

C277. Why should it double the vote of the property holder, if, as you say, the probable result will be that the husband would say: "I do not want you to vote"?—He may force her to vote for what he stands for. The other position is equally possible. He either will say to her, "I would rather you did not vote," and, therefore, you do not have the vote at all, or else he might make her vote exactly as he wishes her to vote. It all depends.

29^o July, 1933.] RAJKUMARI AMRIT KAUR and Mrs. HAMID ALI.

C278. With reference to that second point, as the Lord Chairman put to you, there is the question of the secrecy of the ballot to be considered there. The husband does not know how his wife will vote?—I can only say that it will be very difficult.

C279. Mrs. Ali said on the same point that women objected to being considered a sort of property of some man. You disagree in that matter from the Report of the Lothian Committee when they said they considered that by marriage a woman enters into a partnership with her husband, which may well confer civic rights, as well as domestic duties?—(Mrs. Hamid Ali.) We have got domestic duties all right, but we have not yet got the civic rights. When we get them, I shall be able to answer that question.

Begum Shah Nawaz.

C280. May I put a supplementary question on this point? Was it not a fact that until very recently women in India have never been known by the names of their husbands or their fathers; that this is a vested custom which has only been very recently introduced in Eastern countries? They were always known by what you would call your Christian names, in India?—(Rajkumari Amrit Kaur.) Certainly, that is so, we never have had surnames in India.

Mr. Cocks.

C281. With regard to the indirect votes in the Assembly, you object to that. What it amounts to is that the women elected to the Assembly are elected by the Provincial Legislatures?—Yes, and, therefore, will not be representative of the Province.

C282. And that is the only reserved seat which is elected in that way?—The only one, yes. All are elected by direct election, but we are definitely given indirect election.

C283. As a matter of practice, therefore, does this not mean that the women who are elected to the Federal Assembly will be elected really by a large majority of men?—Yes, it does.

C284. The membership of the Provinces will be mainly men?—Yes, of course.

C285. And they will probably be elected on communal grounds?—Of course.

C286. Not on feminine grounds at all?—No, never on feminine grounds.

C287. Therefore, you think this matter is obviously unjust?—Of course, naturally.

C288. As to the Upper Chamber, how would you suggest that women should be elected there?—I think we originally asked that it should be the single transferable vote, when we gave evidence before the Franchise Committee. I imagine that that is the proposal now in the White Paper, as far as seats in the Upper House are concerned. Am I right in concluding that?—(Sir Hari Singh Gour.) Yes.

Mr. Cocks.

C289. How many seats would you suggest?—Are we given any seats at all?

C290. No, not at present?—(Mrs. Hamid Ali.) Fifty-fifty.

C291. You have not any proposals to make about the number of seats which should be reserved for women?—(Rajkumari Amrit Kaur.) We should like as large a number as possible provided that they were for women as women, and on no other basis whatever.

Marquess of Lothian.

C292. Women elected by men and women, and not by women only?—Yes.

Mr. Cocks.

C293. The representative of the Indian Women's Committee for Franchise who gave evidence before this Committee suggested one or two for the Upper House?—We should be very dissatisfied with only one or two. We should want more.

Begum Shah Nawaz.

C294. Would you be satisfied if, out of the quota given to the Major Provinces (that is about five Provinces, I think, altogether), one seat is reserved?—How many seats would that mean altogether?

C295. That would be about five altogether?—Yes; that would be the minimum.

Mr. Cocks.

C296. Are you of opinion that the development of political consciousness in Indian women is one of the factors which is most likely to break down in the future the communal and caste distinctions?—Without doubt. We women are very conscious nationally, and we have never had the communal question in our ranks, and we are going to fight and see that we shall convert our men in the end to our way of thinking.

C297. This method is a developing method, is it?—Very rapidly indeed.

C298. Are you of the opinion that, generally speaking, the authors of the White Paper and the Members of the Round Table Conference, and so on, are attaching rather too much importance to the views of the Orthodox Indian Community?—Yes, I think they are; as far as we women are concerned certainly.

29^o July, 1933.] RAJKUMARI AMRIT KAUR and Mrs. HAMID ALI.

C299. You think if they had the women on their side they could, I do not say defy the Orthodox people, but feel that they need not attach such an extreme importance to their views?—Of course not.

C300. You believe, therefore, that the development of the women's movement will make for the unity and strength of India in the future?—I have no doubt whatsoever on that point.

C301. Therefore those who wish to bring about the unity of India in the future should support the extension of the Women's Franchise?—Yes, and should support the representation of women on a non-communal basis, if it is really sought to help us.

C302. It has been sometimes said that women are the people who (I do not refer to India only) chiefly support the rule of the Orthodox religions. Is that so in India?—Undoubtedly they are religious, and the older generation of women are Orthodox, I cannot deny it; but I think you will find that there is a rapid advance in the outlook of women, and the younger generation can in no way be said to be Orthodox or Conservative, and, not only that, as I say, the women go even farther than the men do to-day.

Begum Shah Nawaz.

C303. What did you mean by the "younger generation", Rajkumari?—When I say the younger generation I suppose I ought to say between the ages of 20 and 30, but I would go further and say up to the ages of between 40 and 50 even, and only eliminate those who are between 60 and 70—I mean the really old people.

Mr. Cocks.

C304. You think it would be wise to look forward to the future of India rather than to the movements of the past?—That has been our standpoint to-day. We want a Constitution that is going to be for the good of the future generations, because we are responsible. It really does not matter at all for us personally to-day who are helping to frame the Constitution as to whether we are in Legislatures or in Councils or not. We have to build a Constitution that is going to carry through all right and do the best by the future generations.

Sir Hari Singh Gour.

C305. When you want the addition of the word "sex" to the fundamental rights on page 37 of the White Paper, I presume that the reason you want the word "sex" to be added is that you have got already the recognition of two facts, namely, disabilities incidental to caste and religion?—Quite so.

C306. But the disabilities due to sex are even greater than the disabilities due to caste and to religion?—Certainly.

C307. And when you categorise caste and religion as objects of non-discrimination, you want that sex, which has been the greater subject of discrimination in the past, and is the subject of discrimination at present, should be equally emphasised?—Certainly. As I say we want it to be definitely recognised that there shall be no bar on account of sex to women having their full and free rights of citizenship and opportunities of public service in India.

C308. Because you feel that on account of your sex you suffer from as much disability as, if not greater than, other people do on account of caste and religion?—Certainly.

C309. And when you wish to enumerate the disabling clauses in respect of which the fundamental rights are to operate, you want also that the women should be mentioned there?—It follows.

C310. You say that you are not in favour of the inclusion of a wife or a widow, qua wife or widow, under the Register. You want a woman to go on the register as woman qua woman in her own right?—That is so.

C311. It has been put to you what practical difference it will make if she goes on the Register either as a wife or widow, or in her own right as woman; but would not it in the latter case add to her moral strength when she feels that she is on the Register in her own right, and not as an appanage of her husband?—That is our point.

C312. It is for that reason that you want women's rights to be recognised because they are women?—Yes, that is one of the reasons.

C313. And not because they are appurtenant to some man?—Certainly.

C313A. The question that has been put to you is a question about administrative difficulties?—Yes.

C314. The Under-Secretary of State for India drew your attention to a trial electoral roll prepared by Sir Malcolm

29° July, 1933.] RAJKUMARI AMRIT KAUR and Mrs. HAMID ALI.

Hailey in the United Provinces. That trial electoral roll was prepared through the existing agency of men in which the services of women were not utilised. Supposing you suggested that between now and the promulgation of the new Constitution in India similar electoral rolls might be prepared not only in the United Provinces but in the other Provinces in test areas with the co-operation of women, would not that be a fairer test to judge of the administrative difficulties, if any, which are likely to be encountered in the matter of bringing women on to the electoral register?—Not only would it be a fairer test, but it would eliminate those very administrative difficulties of which we have been talking.

C315. That is to say, you would then be able to say whether the administrative difficulties are really real, or whether they are not due to the fact that the test was made in circumstances which did not bring into play the full work that the women were capable of doing for their own sex?—Quite.

C316. And some forecast might be made as to the financial difficulties and as to whether they do or do not encounter any financial difficulties. It was suggested by Mr. Butler that the standard of the agency that was employed, if women were to be enlisted in preparing the electoral roll, would have to be lower. Is not the present standard the standard of Patwaris, or the village accountant in the village who gets on an average a salary of £1 a month. The Patwari is the man who prepares the register. Is not that the standard? How can it be lowered if women are employed for the purpose of helping in preparing the Register?—I understand they were contemplating having men of higher educational standards than the women that might be available, but if you are to compare the women to be employed for the help of registering the votes, naturally if they are to be compared with Patwaris their educational qualifications would be much higher than those of a Patwari.

C317. Yes?—I understood you to say you contemplated having men of perhaps even higher qualifications. I did not understand it was Patwaris.

Mr. Butler.] I think I can help by drawing attention to paragraph 24 of the Report. The differentiation is between the use of officials and non-officials, and the Franchise Committee at any rate came down against the use of non-officials for the reasons which they set out in that paragraph. I think it might be difficult to find women officials of approximately the same status as the men who would be doing it.

Miss Pickford.

C318. Is not there a confusion of ideas here?—An effort might be made to find women who are non-officials and I believe that the official women also would be very, very willing to help.

Begum Shah Nawaz.

C319. What about the teachers, would they be called officials?

Miss Pickford.

C320. My Lord Chairman, I think there is a confusion of ideas here, because I understood that the Rajkumari's point was that women of education could be used in the preparation of the roll, and I think Mr. Butler is referring to polling arrangements.

Mr. Butler.

C321. Yes, that is quite correct?—You were referring to polling arrangements and not to the preparation of the rolls.

Miss Pickford.] Mr. Butler was referring to polling arrangements.

Mr. R. A. Butler.

C322. I thought you were referring to polling arrangements?—Sir Hari Singh Gour is not.

Sir Hari Singh Gour.

C323. No, and I do not think you were referring to polling arrangements?—No; I was really referring to the preparation of the electoral rolls because administrative difficulties have been put forward as far as the number of women to be enfranchised is concerned.

Mr. R. A. Butler.] The same considerations apply to both.

Sir Hari Singh Gour.] As a question about polling arrangements has been raised let us deal with the polling arrangements. As regards the polling arrangements, an objection has been taken; how are we going to make arrangements for the purdah women and, secondly, that there would be the difficulty of identifying them? Thirdly, if the women were to go on the electoral register without application by them, husbands will object that their wives have been put on this register. Those are the three main objections that have been raised?—Yes.

29^o July, 1933.] RAJKUMARI AMRIT KAUR and Mrs. HAMID ALI.

C324. Will you kindly deal with those three objections?—(Mrs. Hamid Ali.) May I answer the question? I suggest the English custom should be followed. They have a registration officer here and a revising barrister. Why could not the Government of India appoint special registration women officers? In almost all our presidency towns we now have women barristers, so for the first election at least these women can be pressed into service, either honorary service or paid service, as the case may be. (Rajkumari Amrit Kaur.) May I say something more? You said something about purdah being a bar to women coming to the polls. I should like to say that as far as the rural areas are concerned, purdah is practically non-existent, so the question does not arise as far as a large number of women voters are concerned; and in urban areas it only applies to a certain number, and purdah is rapidly breaking down in India also, and all that you want for the purdah women is a woman at the polling booths. That is all that is required; and possibly a separate entrance for the women.

Begum Shah Nawaz.

C325. Could you say something about polygamy also; what is your view? That is supposed to be also one of the objections to women becoming voters in large numbers—the difficulty arising from the fact of men having more than one wife.

Sir Hari Singh Gour.

C326. I will put that question. The question to which the Begum Sahiba adverted was an objection which is more theoretical now than practical because polygamy in the country is disappearing both amongst the Hindus and among the Muslims?—Yes.

C327. It is a discredited institution, but to such an extent as it does exist (there is some polygamy) the objection that has been raised is this: A man may have a plurality of wives, two or three wives, but how are you going to give the vote? Are you going to give the vote to all three, and how are you going to describe them? One answer is that one wife may be described as the wife of A, or that it should be given to one wife of A. That is one of the explanations given. Have you any observations to make on that subject? I think your answer is a very simple one; your answer is to eliminate—

Dr. B. R. Ambedkar.

C328. Let her answer. We want the witness's answer?—Will you reply, Mrs. Ali? (Mrs. Hamid Ali.) We would say, do not only give any such wife the right of voting, but take away the right of that man to vote if he has two or three wives.

Sir Hari Singh Gour.

C329. Apart from that heroic measure there is a simpler solution for the time being, having due regard to human infirmity, namely: you want it that the women should vote as women, not as wives?—(Rajkumari Amrit Kaur.) Yes.

C330. That does away with the objection about polygamy?—Yes, certainly.

Sir Hari Singh Gour.

C331. The next objection is really an objection that is also troubling me. That objection is this: There are certain Provinces and localities where men do not take the names of their wives and do not mention them in public. That feeling of delicacy does exist. It is disappearing, but it does exist. If the electioneering officers were to bring all women on the register without consulting the susceptibility of the husband, there might be objection on the part of the husband and there might be (it was said by one of the Honourable Members) an open revolt as in the North West Frontier Province. What is your experience and what is your comment?

Chairman.

C332. Before the witness answers, will you explain to me against whom the revolt would be led?

Sir Hari Singh Gour.] Against the man who goes to prepare the register. A man goes to prepare the register and says, "Give me the name of your wife; I want to bring her on the electoral roll." He will be subjected to shoe-beating. That is the suggestion.

Chairman.

C333. I understand the question now. May we have the answer?—As far as Muslim women are concerned, I do not think the difficulty arises at all. It may arise in the case of certain Hindu households, and there again, as I have said, if we had women rather than men to go round there would be really no difficulty in getting the names of these ladies.

29^o Julii, 1933.] RAJKUMARI AMRIT KAUR and Mrs. HAMID ALI.

Dr. B. R. Ambedkar.

C334. Did you say there would be no difficulty about the Muhammadan households?—(Mrs. Hamid Ali.) The Mussulman never has an objection to taking his wife's names. As Sir Hari puts it, there is a certain feeling of delicacy, but I have never known any feeling of difficulty among Muslims to take their wives' names. It is true the women do not take their husband's name frequently, but they do it occasionally. (Rajkumari Amrit Kaur.) It is in Hindu households, where the husband may object to taking the wife's name.

Mr. M. R. Jayaker.

C335. Is it not a question of ceremonial etiquette?—Yes. There is not going to be any real difficulty.

C336. There are occasions when the husband takes the wife's name, and vice versa?—Yes, certainly there are. As I say, the difficulty would arise in a very small number of cases, and we must rid ourselves of this psychology of fear which hinders progress.

Marquess of Lothian.

C337. This is the most formidable objection which was raised, the illustration given by Sir Malcolm Hailey, and this does not apply only to wives. If it is a valid objection it will prevent almost any woman from getting on to the roll anywhere?—Exactly. We say that it is not a valid objection and that if the appointment of women is going effectually to solve that problem for us, if it did arise in a few cases, we must, as I say, banish all psychology of fear and go ahead if we want to make any progress at all.

Mr. M. R. Jayaker.

C338. Does not it happen now that when in the Courts of Law a woman is examined as a witness she mentions "So-and-So, the wife of So-and-So"?—Certainly she does. She names everybody. May I also say in the case when the census is taken what exactly happens? As far as I am concerned I know I write down my name, and I presume all the women in the villages have their names written down.

C339. Does it not come to this, after all, that in the orthodox Hindu house a woman in the presence of her elders will not mention the name of her husband?—Quite.

C340. It does not go beyond that?—It does not go beyond that.

Begum Shah Nawaz.

C341. Is it not a fact, Rajkumari, that Muslim wives, mothers and daughters, are inheriting property belonging to their fathers and husbands in all the Provinces, except in the Punjab, and also in the North West Frontier Province, and, therefore, their names are already on the register?—It is perfectly true.

Dr. B. R. Ambedkar.

C342. I thought the point of the question raised by Sir Hari Singh Gour was not whether there was some mental objection on the part of the Hindu husband or the Mahommedan husband to give utterance to the name of his wife. I thought the point of the question was Which one of the two, or any one, would object to the sort of enquiry that a registration officer will have to make?—I do not understand what sort of enquiry the registration officer will have to make.

Dr. B. R. Ambedkar.] It will be, "Have you a wife; if you have a wife, what is her name?"

Sir Hari Singh Gour.] And "How many wives have you got?"

Dr. B. R. Ambedkar.] Who would object to the sort of enquiry that will have to be made by the registration officer is the point of the question.

Marquess of Lothian.] "Is she over 21?"

Dr. B. R. Ambedkar.] That is the sort of question.

Chairman.

C343. The witness might care to interpose an answer now. Will you answer Dr. Ambedkar's suggestion, if you have any views?—Yes; I can only say that I do not think anybody will have any objection to a question like that. I cannot understand the mentality that even proffers a question of this nature. It seems to me wholly incomprehensible.

C344. Do you agree with that answer, Mrs. Hamid Ali? Do you agree that there will be no difficulty?—(Mrs. Hamid Ali.) I think it will depend on the way and the tone, in which a question like this is put. Ordinarily a question like that asked in good faith and with no evil intention would not be taken amiss by anybody at all.

Mr. M. R. Jayaker.

C345. Supposing the question was put by the enquiring officer in these terms, "The Government have decided to give a vote to wives. Your wife will have a vote. I have come to obtain the information. Are you married? What is the name of your wife? I am asking this because the Government have decided that a wife should have a vote." Supposing the enquiry was prefaced by such remarks, do you think there would be any resentment among Hindus and Mahomedans?—(Rajkumari Amrit Kaur.) Not at all. (Mrs. Hamid Ali.) I think if men went about making those enquiries there is a likelihood of people resenting it, but certainly not if a woman goes and asks these questions.

29^o Julii, 1933.] RAJKUMARI AMRIT KAUR and Mrs. HAMID ALI.

Dr. B. R. Ambedkar.

C346. I want to ask (Mrs. Hamid Ali) one more question. You come from Bombay. You know that there are certain distinct wards which are exclusively Musselman quarters. From your experience do you really think it is possible for an election officer to enter these wards and make these enquiries?—As far as Bombay is concerned, yes. I do not think anybody would take objection in Bombay, because in Bombay we have municipal elections so often and people are trained to this kind of thing.

C347. I have an opinion on the matter. I should think myself that it would be far easier to make an enquiry of this sort in a rural area than in urban areas? That is my opinion, for what it is worth?—(Rajkumari Amrit Kaur.) I do not hold that opinion.

Sir Hari Singh Gour.

C348. Is it not a fact that the real objection that is voiced by Dr. Ambedkar, and men of that kind, is to an idle enquiry; but if it is made known to the husband that the enquiry is directed in order to confer upon his wife a privilege, a civic right, and a valuable civic right, then there would be no objection?—None whatever.

C349. It depends for what purpose the enquiry is made?—Quite.

Mr. M. R. Jayaker.

C350. If it were an idle enquiry, it would be resented even in England?—Yes; everywhere.

Sir Hari Singh Gour.

C351. That enquiry may not be made by a man. It may be made through the instrumentality of a woman?—Yes; we have already suggested that women should be asked to help as far as possible and naturally we assume that any enquiry made by any man officer of the Government would be made tactfully so that the question of resentment cannot arise.

Dr. B. R. Ambedkar.

C352. I have not exactly followed what is stated in this supplementary statement No. 56 in regard to the representation of women in the Federal Assembly. It is said "We have repeatedly urged that we do not desire the communal virus to enter into our united ranks." You see that the proposal of the White Paper so far as the representation of women in the Lower House is concerned is not by communal electorates, but is by a general electorate by a single transferable vote?—Yes.

C353. From that point of view I should have thought it could not be objected to on the ground of its being a communal electorate?—In the first place the seats in the Lower House of the Federal Assembly for Women are definitely to be on a communal basis. We have the Secretary of State's clear dictum on that point, in his evidence the day before yesterday or three days ago. In the Lower House of the Federal Assembly the reserved seats to which this indirect system of election refers are definitely to be on a communal basis.

Mr. M. R. Jayaker.

C354. Your objection is to the reservation of seats on the communal basis?—Yes; and further the indirect system of election to those seats by legislatures which must, in the very nature of the Constitution as proposed to-day, be on communal lines.

Miss Mary Pickford.] May I just interpose here? In the Secretary of State's reply when he said that the communal question was involved he was then referring to the women's seats on the Provincial Council of Bengal. It was not in reference to the seats in the legislative assembly.

Dr. B. R. Ambedkar.

C355. That is what I thought. If I may draw the attention of the witness to page 89 of the White Paper, Appendix II, I should have thought that that matter had been settled once and for all. You also refer to it. "Election to the women's seat in each of the provinces to which one is allocated will be by the Members of the Provincial Legislature voting by means of the single transferable vote"?—Yes; but my point is this. May I, then, know 29th July, 1933.] RAJKUMARI AMRIT KAUR and Mrs. HAMID ALI.

if the Secretary of State in answer to Miss Pickford's question was referring to reserved seats on a communal basis for the Provincial Council of Bengal. May I understand whether the communal question does not enter into the reserved seats for women in the Lower House? Are they to be reserved on a non-communal basis? I should like to be clear on this point. I want to know on what basis these seats are to be reserved.

Mr. R. A. Butler

C356. I think it is perfectly clear that the Councils as they are constituted would elect women representatives by the single transferable vote?—Yes; but Dr. Ambedkar raised the question as to why we think it should be on a communal basis, and we understood from the Secretary of State that, so far as reserved seats are concerned, the communal question does enter very definitely into it. Now Miss Pickford has said that the Secretary of State, when he made this remark, was referring only to seats reserved in the Bengal Council. I want to know: Are the seats that are definitely reserved for women in the Lower House of the Federal Assembly reserved on a non-communal basis, or reserved on a communal basis?

Marquess of Lothian.

C357. I think the answer is inherent in the two tables on pages 90 and 93 of the White Paper. They are non-communal for this reason that in the first place in certain provinces there is only one woman; in the second place if you compare the table marked "Muslim" or "Mahommedan" as the case may be, on page 90 and page 93, you will find in the case of Provincial Assemblies a certain number of seats are allotted to women on a communal basis. These things do not appear in Appendix II?—So that in the Federal Assembly, the reservation of seats is non-communal; that is to say, it will not matter, for instance, if there were nine seats there whether all the nine were filled by Mahommedans or Hindus. Am I to understand that?

Mr. R. A. Butler.

C358. That is why they are elected by provinces. There is no mention of the communal question in this Table?—But as far as the weightage in the Lower House is concerned, will those women's seats go in 51 per cent. in proportion to the communities?

C359. They will go according to the result of the single transferable vote, but not by any prejudged communal decision?—Anyhow, our point is that the Provincial legislatures will elect them; they, at any rate, will be communal.

Mr. M. R. Jayaker.

C360. If the election of the women members of the Federal Assembly is going to be by the provincial legislative council members on the principle of single transferable vote, do not you apprehend that the voting will go on communal lines?—That is exactly my point, that the indirect election is going to be by provinces.

C361. It will work on the same principle?—It will work on the same principle, apart from the fact that we object to indirect election.

C362. It will be on the same principle, if I may take it further, as the representation to the Upper Chamber of the Federal Legislative House, which you will remember, would be by the members of the Provincial Legislative Council, by a single transferable vote. The Government expect by that method a sufficient number of Musselmen will come into the Upper Legislative Chamber?—Certainly, and we object to this.

Dr. B. R. Ambedkar.

C363. Let me follow this further, because, to my mind, there is a certain amount of confusion, and I should like to get it cleared up. First of all, do you object to indirect election as such?—Yes.

C364. You do?—Yes.

C365. That is one objection?—Yes.

C366. You do not want the women representatives who are to represent women in the Federal Lower House to be elected by indirect election from the Provincial Legislative Council?—Most definitely not.

C367. You want some sort of a direct constituency provided?—As we are against reserved seats, if they are reserved for us on a communal basis, of course, really this question as far as we are concerned does not arise, but we would, of course, want women to enter—

C368. Let me put a question first to clear the ground. Do you want any seats to be reserved for women at all in the Lower House?—I have said that we would recommend for the time being until such time as adult suffrage is obtained through our organisations, the acceptance of reservation, provided it were definitely laid down that the women's seats would be on a non-communal basis, and through the means of joint electorates. That is the only condition on which we would accept it.

29^o July, 1933.] RAJKUMARI AMRIT KAUR and Mrs. HAMID ALI.

C369 I quite follow two things. You want for the time being a certain number of seats reserved for women?—We have always been opposed to reservation.

C370 The second thing I have understood from you—correct me if I am wrong—is that you do not want that provision for the representation of women in the Federal Lower House by any system of indirect election. That is the second point you have made?—Yes C371. What I want to ask you is that . . . ?—You say we want reservation, I have told you we have always been opposed to reservation.

C372. You do not want any reservation at all?—We have always said that we do not want reservation, but, as I say, if reservations are to be forced down on us as so many things have been forced down on us against our wishes, then the only conditions on which we would recommend the acceptance of reservation to our organisations would be definitely that they would be through a system of joint electorates and direct election, and if the seats were on a purely non-communal basis, that is to say, that we have the right to put on women of our choice.

C373. If the matter were left to your choice, you would not want any earmarking of seats for women as such in the Federal Lower House?—Certainly not.

C374. If it is to be, then you would want it on a system of joint electorate and direct election?—Yes; direct election and a non-communal basis.

C375. Let me take the non-communal basis. Do you want this constituency for direction election to consist only of women in that particular constituency?—No; we want men and women.

Dr. B. R. Ambedkar.

C376. You want this constituency to be a sort of composite constituency, in which the voters will be both men and women?—Yes.

C377. With this restriction that the candidate to be ultimately elected from that constituency would be a woman?—Yes; that is to say, if a woman was to be elected to a reserved seat, it would naturally follow that it must be a woman.

C378. How would you provide these direct constituencies for the Legislative Assembly?—As I say we have not got any constructive proposals on this because we have throughout been opposed to reservation. We would leave that to the discretion of the Committee, but if reservation were given to us, on the terms and the only terms on which we would accept it, we would leave it to the discretion of the Committee to form such constituencies as would be the most representative.

C379. I thought you said in answer to a question that you objected to this indirect system of election provided in the White Paper for the representation of women in the Lower House of the Federal Legislature, because, in a certain sense, it would be, what shall I say, communally-minded?—Yes.

C380. That the representatives in the various provincial councils would act in a communal manner in the exercise of their votes, and that is the ground of your objection?—I have already answered this question, have I not?

C381. Yes. I want to put one more question. Further, I see, and I want to get this matter clear, that you object to the indirect election that is proposed in the White Paper because you think that the representatives of the different communities in the provincial legislature will be communally-minded, and, therefore, communal considerations will be imported in that election?—May I give you the answer again. We object to indirect election, first of all, because naturally we want direct election.

C382. Yes. I follow that?—That is the first objection. The second objection is that when this indirect election for us is proposed through the Provincial Councils, those Provincial Councils which are going to be on communal lines will naturally bring that communal question again to the women that they elect.

Dr. B. R. Ambedkar.] That is true, but I want to put a further question. I quite understand your objection that to have different representatives of the different communities in the Provincial Legislative Council would import a material consideration in the election of women.

Mr. M. R. Jayaker.

C383. That is only one of your objections to the indirect election, but I understand there is another objection also on the ground that the election is indirect?—I have said so more than once.

Dr. B. R. Ambedkar.

C384. The question is this. Take, for instance, your direct constituency, any constituency that you may like to take,

29^o July, 1933.] RAJKUMARI AMRIT KAUR and Mrs. HAMID ALI.

for instance the City of Bombay. You will have in that constituency, which you would desire to be specially designed for the election of a woman representative in the Lower House, electorates of both men and women drawn from different communities?—Yes.

C385. Do you mean to suggest that those voters who would take part in the election of a woman representative would be less communally minded than the representatives of those larger communities in the Provincial Legislative Council who would be participating in the election of a woman candidate on the indirect basis?—Without doubt, because the communal question exists far more among the type which goes into the Legislature than it does among the masses of the people.

C386. But I want to draw your attention to this fact, that these very electorates will be electing the men who will be the voters for the indirect election?—It may be so, but when it is a question of joint electorates and we are going to get the votes of joint electorates, the communal question will not exist there—it cannot exist—to the same extent that it does in a Provincial Council which has been elected by separate electorates and where the communal question is alive and must be very much alive.

C387. Do you think that in the general electorate the men and women in India do not act in a communal manner?—Certainly not in the general mass.

C388. Have you ever seen a poll going on?—Yes. We have had a very recent example in the case of one of the women members of our organisation who topped the poll in Bombay with the joint electorates, and practically no women at all but all men: the Depressed Classes and everyone voting and she topped the poll. That is in a municipal election. Then there was not only her but another lady, and we have had examples in elections in Universities in Putna where women have been elected by men, and no difficulty on the communal question has arisen.

C389. When the point is whether a woman will be elected, no doubt the communal feeling will be less in a direct election than it will be in an indirect election?—Certainly. Whenever the indirect election is going to be by means of the Council, it is going to be permeated by communalism.

Mr. M. R. Jayaker.

C390. Am I right in saying that there has been a great awakening among Indian women in the last quarter of a century?—There can be no two questions about that.

C391. This awakening is not confined to urban areas nor even to Reform circles, but it is increasing generally?—Throughout the length and breadth of India. I may say, speaking from my own humble experience, that I find the village women almost more keen to come and listen to me than the urban women in my own constituency.

C392. I take it that you agree with my view that it has been recently felt that the whole department of a woman's life, including their marital state, the law of inheritance, conjugal rights and so on, require modification in the light of modern conditions?—Without doubt.

C393. You and the leaders of this movement feel that this reform is not likely to come unless women have a vote?—Without doubt.

C394. You also feel, I take it, that the reform will be in the Legislatures by legislative enactments?—Again without doubt.

C395. Have you considered the question, if the men members were not compelled to seek the women's votes, whether purely out of altruistic motives or generous impulses, women can expect any large measure of reform in the Legislatures?—I think undoubtedly the women's vote where men are concerned would have a great bearing on Reform. We would get very much more help from those men that we have returned and who feel that they have been returned by women's votes—it is going to make a great difference.

C396. You think it is going to make a great difference if the candidate has to go and beg women for their votes?—Yes.

C397. What ratio would you like to work up to—what is your ultimate ideal of ratio with men's votes?—I do not follow you there.

C398. What proportion would you like to work up to—how many men, to how many women?—According to our own proposals we have said one to four—that is the minimum, one to four or one to five.

C399. That is your present demand?—That is the minimum, but, ultimately, certainly half and half.

C400. Would you mention any minimum period in which you would like to work up to that ratio?—Certainly I would like to envisage adult franchise in India after a period of two elections.

C401. In 10 years?—Ten or 15 years at the most.

29^o July, 1933.] RAJKUMARI AMRIT KAUR and Mrs. HAMID ALI.

C402. You would like to work up to that ratio?—Yes, if we are really meaning to progress.

C403. Would you tell us the present condition of the women's vote? Are they voters in all the Provinces?—No, they are not.

C404. How many Provincial Councils are there in which women sit as members elected?—I do not think there are any, so far as I know. I do not think a woman can sit as an elected member on any Council.

Miss Pickford.

C405. I did not quite hear whether you said they do or that they can but have not done so?—They can.

Begum Shah Nawaz.] In all the Provinces they can.

Dr. B. R. Ambedkar.

C406. In those Councils where they have actually been members I understand it has been by nomination?—Yes, there is no such thing as election.

Sir Harī Singh Gour.

C407. To the Legislative Assembly they have never been nominated so far?—Never.

Dr. B. R. Ambedkar.

C408. Is there a disqualification?—I think not. (Mrs. Hamed Ali.) May I point out in connection with this that it is very lately that the Provinces have done away with the disqualification—it has been done very, very recently; in some Provinces so recently that they have scarcely had time for another election since the disqualification was done away with.

Mr. M. R. Jayaker.

C409. I will ask a few questions on the communal matter. On that I suppose the views you express are shared by Mrs. Hamid Ali?—(Rajkumari Amrit Kaur.) Yes.

C410. May I take it that the members of your women's Associations are drawn from women generally?—Yes.

C411. Membership is not in terms of Hindu or Mahomedan?—No; we do not think in terms of Hindu.

C412. Do any of the women's representative organisations ask for reservation on the communal basis for the Provincial Legislatures?—Not one.

C413. When it was announced did they protest against it?—Yes, most strongly did they protest.

C414. Did any women's organisation support that reservation, so far as you are aware?—Not one that I know of.

C415. I suppose you regarded it as a retrograde move?—Of course.

C416. Why did you regard it as a retrograde move?—Because there is no hope for our country as long as the spirit of communalism is allowed to remain and is encouraged.

C417. You think that the communal virus would be introduced into regions where it does not exist at the present moment?—Yes, without doubt.

C418. Have you considered the question whether any question is likely to come up in the Central or Provincial Legislatures on which the voting would be Muslim women against Hindu women?—I cannot envisage it now, but what I mean is this. If women go in there, as I said in my preliminary remarks, what ever the religion or caste that they belong to, they would work for women as a whole; that is to say, when any remedial legislation for women comes before the Legislature the Hindu women support it to the nth and vice versa, but if we are sent into the Legislatures on the communal basis a position may arise when the Mahomedan woman or the Hindu woman out of loyalty to her community may be asked to refrain from voting on a question which she considers vital to the interests of the womanhood of India because she may be going against her particular community. Do you understand me? It is going to cramp us enormously in our work in these very Legislatures.

C419. May I take it you apprehend that, if this system were ultimately adopted, a woman's loyalty is likely to be divided between the claims of her sex and the claims of her community?—(Mrs. Hamid Ali.) May I answer this question? In the present circumstances, if we are given this communal electorate, this separate electorate, and not a joint electorate, the woman who would be natural-minded would refrain from going into the Councils or the Assemblies and the only women who would go would be women of the communal type who would be the tame women, and the men would be able to do anything they like with them, and they will vote on the communal basis.

C420. Supposing you had two Mahomedan women, one communal and another one a little more national and temperate-minded: which, if this process were to be ultimately adopted, do you think is likely to be elected?—(Rajkumari Amrit Kaur.) Naturally, the communally-minded woman, but she will not be elected on the women's vote, please remember.

29^o July, 1933] RAJKUMARI AMRIT KAUR and Mrs. HAMID ALI.

C421. May I ask you another question? I want to ask you about the proposal that women who come in through the door of their husband's property should apply. Supposing that was insisted on, what do you think would be the result on the strength of the women's vote?—It would diminish their voting strength enormously.

C422. May I ask your attention to the White Paper, Appendices IV and V, the introductory note under the heading of "Franchise"? I do not know whether you have the same copy?—We have the Indian edition—I have what you are referring to now.

C423 I am asking your attention to the close of paragraph 3 in those Appendices which deals with the women's vote: "The proportion of women to men in the electorate will depend upon the number of women who are actually registered under the qualifications in question. There are practical difficulties in placing on returning officers the whole responsibility for registration of those qualifications. But his Majesty's Government are very anxious to secure that the proportion of women electors should be adequate and further consideration of the above arrangements may be necessary." You would very strongly desire the reconsideration of this question in the light of the comments which you have made?—Of course.

C424. Do you agree with the view expressed in the memorandum submitted to the Joint Select Committee by the British Committee for Indian Women's Franchise, from which I will just read one sentence to you: "If the Joint Select Committee sincerely desire to satisfy the legitimate expectations raised among the women of India and of Great Britain by its repeated declarations," which are mentioned in this document—"we feel that means of surmounting the administrative difficulties can and will be found." Do you share those sentiments?—Absolutely.

C425. You are speaking as a representative of all your Associations when you make that remark?—Certainly.

C426. Do you agree with that?—(Mrs. Hamid Ali.) Certainly I do.

C427. Then a word about the wife and widow. I know that you are opposed to this method of securing the franchise, but have you been able to find out what is the opinion of women on this point who can come in only as wives and widows and not through the door of an educational or property qualification?—(Rajkumari Amrit Kaur.) When we have had meetings and have had this question put to women—they are illiterate women, very poor women, whose husbands probably would have no property for qualification—they have all said: "We want it. Please get it for us in our own right." That is a very definite feeling amongst them. As I say, they all press for adult suffrage, and adult suffrage, in my opinion, is preferable.

C428. Do I understand you to say—correct me if I am wrong—that those women whose sole chance of coming in as voters is as wife or widow would agree to forfeit this right?—I think, if I might say so, if it was put to them, they would say "Yes."

C429. Is it not the case that the women who are against this vote are voters on some other principle like educational qualifications?—No, because, as you will see from the proposals to enfranchise women, the large majority of the women proposed to be brought on the electoral roll will be from the wives and widows—is not that so?

C430. The last question I wish to ask you is this. You would have no objection to reserved seats, I imagine, if the communal basis were removed from it?—Well, as I say, our organisations have throughout been against reservation, but if the communal taint were removed, I think that we would certainly tolerate it.

Sir Hari Singh Gour.

C431. You would tolerate it?—I am speaking now personally. We, as elected representatives of this organisation, would have to put this question to them. I recommend reservation for the time being, provided that it was through joint electorates and on a non-communal basis. I think we would certainly recommend the acceptance of that with, like all our alternative proposals, a limitation for a definite period of years.

Mr. M. R. Jayaker.

C432. You are making two conditions: first there should be an automatic time limit beyond which it shall not endure?—Yes.

C433. And, secondly, that it shall be on a joint electorate basis?—Yes, and non-communal.

29^o Julii, 1933.] RAJKUMARI AMRIT KAUR and Mrs. HAMID ALI.

C434. On a joint electorate basis?—Yes, a joint electorate and reserved without any proportion in the Councils on the communal ratio.

C435. So far as your voting is concerned in your organisations—and several instances must have come up as a matter of voting—do you recall any instance where the voting has gone on the lines of Hindu women against Mohammedan women?—Never, never.

Begum Shah Nawaz.

C436 My Lord Chairman, I do not think I have many questions to put to the witnesses after all the replies that they have given to the many questions that have been put to them this morning, but I would like just to ask them two or three questions. Rajkumari Amrit Kaur, would I be right in concluding from your evidence that whatever are the qualifications which ultimately the Joint Select Committee will accept for women voters, if those qualifications give you the vote in your individual right, the Women's Associations will be prepared to accept them?—Certainly, because we want the full quota; but as I say, we do lay great stress on the numbers as well as on the quality of the vote, and the fact that it should be given to us in our inherent right.

C437. Do I understand aright that the minimum number of women voters acceptable to you, both for the Provincial as well as for the Central Assemblies, is that recommended by the Lothian Committee?—The very minimum.

C438. Adult suffrage not having been accepted, and if the women are to have the votes under different qualifications, do you not think that your Women's Organisations would be well advised to think twice before they refused reserved seats?—I told you that we would be willing to accept reserved seats on the conditions that I have already laid down.

C439. Realising that when the fight between the different communities in certain provinces was over one or two seats here and there, and that reservation of seats might mean their division being on communal lines, most of the Women's Organisations did not ask for reservation of seats; is that not so?—Of course.

C440. In the absence of a settlement between the two major communities, would it be right for you to say that almost all the Muslim women within these organisations would ask for these seats to be on non-communal lines?—

Certainly; the Muslim women, in the Punjab, for instance. I can say I have never had any Muslim women in the Punjab asking for reserved seats on communal lines. (Mrs. Hamid Ali.) I have not yet come across any Association which has sent any Resolution asking for any reserved seats on the communal basis.

C441. Is it not a fact that they have not asked for any reserved seats?—Yes.

C442. But if there are to be reservations, do you think that all the Muslim women in all these Provinces would agree to their having them on a non-communal basis in the absence of a settlement between the two communities?—The great majority of them. (Rajkumari Amrit Kaur.) Speaking for our Organisations, where we have a system of election, the question of Hindu and Muslim has never cropped up, and we invariably do have numbers of Muslim women working for us and elected by us. I do not think that our Muslim women Members of our Organisation will have no objection.

C443. My point is this, Rajkumari, that the women of India, as united Indians, demand the number of seats being reserved for them, but when it comes to the question of these reserved seats being accepted by His Majesty's Government and when there has been no settlement between the two major communities, do you think that all the Muslim women in your Organisation will agree to having them divided on a non-communal basis?—They will not agree to having them on a communal basis. They would certainly agree to what our Organisations have invariably stood for.

C444. Have not some of your constituencies differed on that point?—No; no constituencies have differed.

C445. What about the Karachi constituency?—Only three members of that constituency.

C446. And some of the Members of your Standing Committee as well, I understand?—On our Standing Committee, apart from yourself, was there any other Member who differed?—I do not think so; I have not had any information on that point.

C447. Supposing you were to ask some of these Muslim women, especially in some of the Provinces where Muslims are in the majority, like the Punjab and Sind, for instance, to decide the question on its merits, that in the absence of a settlement between two communities, if there are to be reserved seats, would they 29° July, 1933.] RAJKUMARI AMRIT KAUR and Mrs. HAMID ALI.

accept them on the basis of joint electorates, do you think the majority of them would agree with you?—I still think they would agree with us. May I give you a small instance of my own constituency which is 90 per cent Muhammadan? A question of membership, of having two women members on the local municipality came up, and, as you know, women members of a municipality can only be nominated and the Commissioner has the right to nominate them. I put it to a very large meeting at which there were, I think, about 1,500 women present also from the villages and the surrounding suburbs, and the town of Jullundur, practically all Muslims—I said to them that the Commissioner has the power, if there were two women willing to stand for the municipality, one Hindu and one Muhammadan, would they be good enough to elect those two from amongst themselves, so that I might submit the names to him. The answer that came without one moment's thought was: "Why should the Commissioner nominate them? Why should we not nominate them?" The second is: "We do not want to send one Hindu and one Muhammadan. Why should we eliminate you because you are not a Muhammadan or a Hindu." This is from a very important constituency in the Punjab, and this is the spirit that does animate the women of India to-day.

C448. Is it not a fact that both the Muslim women of your Standing Committee from the Punjab dissented from it?—Miss Feroze Uddin's opinion is not on record. As far as I know, yours is.

C449. Of course, I do not wish to press the point any further. All I wanted to say was that my experience has been something quite different, because most of these Muslim women have said to me that their husbands would never let them go to the men members of the opposite community for votes, when they themselves were not prepared to go in the absence of a settlement?—(Mrs. Hamid Ali.) But that proves the point that the men are communal-minded.

C450. Yes, I agree?—(Rajkumari Amrit Kaur.) Therefore, why make the women communal-minded?—(Mrs. Hamid Ali.) The same thing happened to me in another district where we were asked to send in the names of two women for municipal and school Committee work, and our Hindu women there suggested the names of non-Hindu women, because they thought they were the fittest to go in.

C451. I quite agree that one happy feature of the women's movement has been this, that there has been no communal feeling, as far as the women of India are concerned, but do you not think that when His Majesty's Government has been forced to give an award, those who wished to work for any change in the system of electorates would be well advised to do it in India, rather than over here?—(Rajkumari Amrit Kaur.) Certainly we should work in India, but, at the very beginning of a Constitution, we object to being forced into a room into which we have never wished to enter. You say the decision has been forced upon His Majesty's Government. By whom? By the men—only the men who were here at the Round Table Conference—not by a large section of the men in India, apart from those who came to the Joint Select Committee or the Round Table Conference, and certainly never by the women of India.

Mr. M. R. Jayaker.

C452. Do I understand you to say that you apprehend that the happy relations now existing between Hindu and Muslim women would be destroyed gradually if this virus were introduced?—Certainly, gradually. We still feel that our Muhammadan and Hindu sisters will rise above it. But you must admit there must be a danger. It will make concerted action on our part more difficult in the future, and we do want concerted action. That is why we have had such inordinate success in the women's movement in India. If you are going to destroy that for us now, I might say all the nationally-minded women of India—and there are a great number of Muslim women who are nationally-minded—will be discontented. From the conservative Muhammadan centre of Lucknow the last wire I had from one of our members was: "Do not co-operate with the Committee that is forcing us into communalism."

Begum Shah Nawaz.

C453. My point is this; is not the field open to us in India itself to bring about a settlement between the different communities?—My answer to you is that the field is invariably open, but our task is going to be made much more difficult, if here and now, by the White Paper, we are forced into accepting conditions which run contrary to those very measures which you wish to work for just as much as I do, I hope.

C454. You would agree with me, would you not, that if there are to be reserved seats, we should have them in all the Provincial Legislatures as well as in the two Central Assemblies?—Yes. As I have said before, I have not been able to understand the logic of the White Paper proposals, because of the extraordinary way in which they vary from Province to Province. I do not understand it at all.

C455. Would you tell the Committee something about your constituency in Peshawar and the North-West Frontier?—Yes. We have only recently had formed a constituency of the All-India Women's Conference in Peshawar, and we are shortly to have one in Abbotabad as well; that is in the Frontier Province. The last thing these women said to me at Lucknow last winter was: "If you are to go to give evidence before the Joint Select Committee, never give up adult franchise or any system based thereon, because if we find in the Frontier we do not get adult suffrage, we are not going to come into the picture at all, and we are very anxious to have our full strength in the future Constitution."

Marquess of Lothian.

C456. Rajkumari, a very few questions. I am afraid we have already tested you to the maximum, but I know your capacity, from my own experience in Lahore. First of all, on the point of the application, the estimate of the Franchise Committee was that the number of wives who would be qualified on the property qualification was just over 4,000,000?—Yes.

C457. I do not know whether you read Sir Tej Saprú's analysis of the reasons why women would be reluctant to apply to be put on the electoral roll?—I am afraid I have not been able to read them in detail; I have just glanced over them.

C458. Supposing the application condition is maintained, what sort of proportion of those 4,000,000 women would, in practice, be likely actually to apply to be put on the roll—that is, probably a year before the election takes place?—I should be very much surprised if, out of those 4,000,000, even 1,000,000 applied—very surprised, indeed. I should be tempted to put it at even a lower figure than that.

C459. Then would you turn to your supplementary statement, section (B). Am I right in thinking that your suggestion for putting women on the roll for the Assembly is that you should take the women qualified in their own property right for the Provincial Assembly and make them the voters for the Assembly.

Is that what it means?—Yes. We have said this in the case of the women qualified under the literacy as well as under the property qualification, because we felt it would be administratively so much easier to have just the one roll; and, in the second place, it would give us a stronger women's vote for the Federal Assembly, which is going to be the main House for all that we want done in India.

C460. That is the Assembly in which, under the Government proposals, women will have only one vote in 20?—Yes.

C461. Would you just tell us why you think the Assembly is the main Assembly, from the point of view of the women's case?—I think it is going to be in this Assembly that all Bills for educational reform, for social reform, for the removal of our legal disabilities, which will be All-India questions, are going to come forward.

C462. Surely, education and the greater part of ordinary social reform will be a Provincial matter, will it not?—No; I think when it comes to the removal of disabilities under which women suffer, legal or otherwise, it must come before the All-India Legislature.

C463. At any rate, the opinion of your Associations is that women's questions will figure very prominently?—Yes, very prominently; that is what we feel, and we do want a stronger women's vote for the Members returned to that House, men or women.

C464. Just one question on the so-called wives' qualification. You have no objection in itself to property being a qualification for a woman being put on the roll?—Property in her own right, no.

C465. Supposing the qualification for what is called the wives' vote was modified, so that the property itself qualified either a man or a woman, or, in the event of her being married, both—in other words, that the woman was qualified in her own right by reason of the fact of the property qualification, would you feel that there would be the same psychological objection?—No, not quite the same. (Mrs. Hamid Ali.) May I ask, would a man be qualified on his wife's property to vote also?

C466. I was going on to ask you that, whether if you added that, such husbands as were not qualified by their own property, but whose wives were qualified, and were on the roll, would not that remove a good deal of your objection?—Only one part of our objection, not a great deal. (Rajkumari Amrit Kaur.) We have other objections as well.

29^o July, 1933.] RAJESUMARI AMRIT KAUR and Mrs. HAMID ALI.

C467. On that particular point, would that not moderate your feelings, a bit?—No, because, after all, the husbands who would be enfranchised on the wives' qualification would be so few in number.

Sir Harri Singh Gour.

C467A You would regard it as a sop?—Yes; we should really regard it as a sop.

Marquess of Lothian.

C468. My last question is this. You have stressed the importance that you attach to having adult franchise in the towns, because a certain number of persons would be returned to the Legislature by men and women voting in, more or less, equal numbers?—Yes.

C468A. I think you have estimated that that would cover about 14 per cent. of the seats? Is that correct?—We said that the adult population in towns was 14,000,000.

C469. It does not matter for the purpose of my argument. I think most people who have contested elections would say, that if you wanted to get women's questions considered by a Legislature, you would have very much more effect if all the Members of the Legislature, when fighting their elections, had to take into account a considerable number of women voters. With the suffrages, both sides would be anxious to get in in order to win, and, therefore, would have to consider the matter as of interest to those women voters, and you would bring women's questions far more formidably before the Legislature where every candidate had to pay a consideration to the women's vote than if only a small proportion had to pay rather more attention, because there were more women voters in their constituency. Have you any answer to that?—Yes, because, as I say—I think we have put it in our supplementary statement—that these four and a quarter millions who are to be enfranchised under the proposals of the wives' and widows' vote will be scattered over the length and breadth of India, and in the eleven Provinces there will probably be less than half a million in each, and a certain number of those will also be in the urban areas, so that this vote is not going to be strong enough to count and to carry any real weight. Therefore, we have suggested, only as long as we do not get this adult franchise, that we should be given the vote in an area, even though it covers a small area, and even though it will affect a smaller number of men and women who are returned to the Legislatures; at any rate, let us have them in large numbers and, through them, influence the other members. That is our answer to it.

C470. You prefer a small number of members who are intensely responsive to the women's vote than to have a large number of voters who are less responsive?—Yes, but my point is, that if we could make our voice really heard amongst the larger number, we will accept it. Therefore, I say, if in addition to constituencies in urban areas, you are willing to give us some franchise in the rural areas, we will accept at once, but give us the quality of the vote, as well as the quantity.

Chairman.

C471. Subject to your approval, Rajesumari, I propose to make arrangements for you to make a statement before the main Committee. May I assume that that course is agreeable to you?—Yes; but does that mean that the statement will be all that we do before the Main Committee? Will there be no opportunity for those Members who have not been able to hear us to-day, to cross-examine us?

Chairman.] The Committee, when the statement is made, must decide that for itself. Under the House of Lords procedure, it rests with the Committee itself, and I am not entitled to give you any view at all.

(After a short adjournment.)

Mrs. P. K. SEN and Mrs. L. MUKERJI are called in and examined.

Chairman.

C472. Mrs. P. K. Sen and Mrs. L. Mukerji, you are here on behalf of the Mahila Samiti Ladies' Association?—(Mrs. Sen.) Yes, that is so.

C473. And you have provided the Committee with Memoranda numbered 41, 42 and 43?—Yes, that is so.

The Memoranda are as follows:—

MEMORANDUM 41 BY MRS. P. K. SEN ON THE FRANCHISE OF WOMEN.

The women of Bengal strongly protest against the reduction of the voting strength of women in the new constitution proposed by the White Paper as compared to the voting strength suggested by the Indian Franchise Committee.

The following memorandum stresses the minimum voting strength which will satisfy the women of Bengal and which they regard as a preliminary stage towards eventual adult suffrage.

THE PROVINCIAL LEGISLATURES.

1. In the memorandum submitted by the women of Bengal to the members of the Indian Franchise Committee the proposal of the Statutory Commission to enfranchise the wives and widows of men entitled to vote under a property qualification was approved, and it was also proposed that an indirect group system of voting, for the rest of the adult women population, should be adopted. If both the proposals had been accepted, about 30 per cent. of adult women would have been enfranchised.

2. The Indian Franchise Committee's proposals, if adopted, would have enfranchised only 10 per cent. of adult women but 43 per cent. of adult men, giving a voting ratio of one woman to roughly $4\frac{1}{2}$ men.

3. The proposals of the White Paper now cut down that ratio to one woman to seven men, and in practice the ratio will be still less, since it is proposed to make women apply to be put on the electoral roll.

4. The women of Bengal advocated simple literacy as a qualification for the franchise of women over 21 years of age. This qualification was accepted by the Indian Franchise Committee and forms part of their proposals.

5. We are therefore dismayed to find in the White Paper that the educational qualification recommended for Bengal is the matriculation or school-leaving certificate (Appendix V, p. 106). So high a qualification would enfranchise a fair number of men but an insignificant number of women.

6. We desire to urge most strongly that simple literacy as a qualification for women should be restored, since it would enable women who have been educated at home to become voters. Further, it would serve as a stimulus to adult education, and would automatically increase women's voting strength as time goes on, without new legislation.

7. The provision that women should be required to make application to be entered on the electoral roll would inevitably reduce very considerably the potential number of women voters. It is therefore essential that this provision should be deleted. We do not see the difficulty in placing the wife's name on the Register at the same time as that of the husband. It would be far easier to get the particulars required from the homes than for women to make special application to the Returning Officer.

8. In the event, however, of its being found unavoidably necessary to retain this provision, it is submitted that the number of women voters thus lost must be made good by some other means, e.g. by extending the husband's property qualification to wives of all propertied voters, and not merely to the wives of men possessing the higher property qualifications at present prescribed for the Provincial Councils. If this is not done women will fail to secure any appreciable representation.

9. We approve the wife's vote on the husband's qualification both because of its convenience and because it enfranchises women in rural as well as in urban areas. If for any reason it should be considered impossible, it would be necessary to substitute some other qualifications which would bring up the voting strength to the requisite number. For this purpose we should be prepared to accept an alternative qualification, if it could be shown that the total number of women enfranchised would be not less than that proposed by the Indian Franchise Committee.

THE FEDERAL LEGISLATURE.

10. The proposals of the White Paper admittedly leave the ratio of women to men electors the same as at present for the Legislative Assembly, on the ground of administrative difficulties and of objections to a differential franchise based on education (p. 12, par. 21). The ratio is about one woman to 20 men. Yet it is expressly stated that "His Majesty's Government are very anxious to secure that the proportion of women electors should be adequate." (p. 94.)

11. In view of the very small proportion of women enfranchised under the

29° July, 1933.]

White Paper proposals, and the importance to women of subjects like marriage and inheritance dealt with by the Federal Legislature, we would urge that, in spite of administrative difficulties, some arrangement to increase the number of women is necessary. If it is found to be impossible to carry out the recommendations of the Franchise Committee, we suggest that the roll of women voters for the Provincial Councils, on the husband's property qualification, might also be used for the Federal Legislature.

THE UPPER CHAMBER.

12. For the Upper Chamber, qualifications should be such as to secure the eligibility of a considerable number of women.

FUNDAMENTAL RIGHTS.

13. The political status of the women of India should be dealt with in the Bill for the new Constitution and should not be decided subsequently by the Provincial Governments or Legislatures.

14. On the principle that men and women should have fundamentally the same rights and duties as citizens there should be a clause in the new Constitution clearly providing that the rights of women as citizens shall not be denied or abridged in any manner whatsoever on account of sex.

ELECTORATES.

15. It is a matter of deep regret to the women of India, who have always been free from communal differences, that they should be compelled to record their votes in separate electorates. Our women should be able to seek election, for the seats reserved for them, without consideration of the creed or community to which they belong.

CONCLUSION.

In conclusion we would emphatically urge that it is absolutely necessary that women should be given an effective voice in questions of government which vitally affect their welfare, and that they cannot accept any smaller proportion of voters than the 6,600,000 which the Lothian Committee has recommended.

MEMORANDUM 42. ON THE STATUS OF WOMEN UNDER THE NEW INDIAN CONSTITUTION, HANDED IN BY MRS. P. K. SEN.

We desire to present this memorandum to you and to request you to give special consideration to the points raised in it as the matter concerns the welfare of nearly half the population of India.

Civil rights and duties of women.

2. In the first place, we wish to urge that a clause should be inserted in the new constitution safeguarding women from disabilities imposed on them as women in the exercise of civic rights. Sex should be no disqualification for serving India and men and women should have fundamentally the same rights and duties as citizens.

Franchise.

3. We are also keenly interested in the franchise qualifications for women and we earnestly hope that this matter will receive very careful consideration by the Committee, and that such qualifications may be prescribed for women as will give them their due share in electing representatives to the legislatures. We desire to place a few important points on this subject before you.

Present position of women with regard to franchise.

4. The present franchise given on equal terms to men and women, and based mainly on property, produces in actual practice, a very great discrepancy between them in voting power, as the number of women voters is at present wholly inadequate when compared to the total population of women. Statistics show that while the proportion of men voters is 10 per cent. of the total adult male population the proportion of women voters is only .6 per cent. of the total adult female population. We would emphasise the fact that adult franchise would provide a solution of this disparity between men and women voters, but if there is no hope of immediate adult franchise in any form, we wish to point out, that as a temporary measure and until adult franchise is obtained, special qualifications for women will be required to increase their voting strength and make it a real factor in elections.

Methods for giving women an adequate voting strength.

5. Certain proposals have been put forward for these special qualifications for women:

(1) The Indian Statutory Commission recommended:—

(a) being the wife, over 25 years of age, of a man who has the property qualification to vote.

(b) being a widow, over 25 years of age, whose husband at the time of his death was so qualified.

(2) The women delegates at the Round Table Conference in 1930 supported this proposal with the modification that the age should be the same as that for men, i.e., 21 and not 25 years.

(3) The Franchise Sub-Committee of that Conference (1930) agreed that special qualifications should be prescribed for women and recommended that the expert Franchise Committee should devote particular attention to this question in the light of the evidence available and of the proposal made by the women delegates.

(4) The Indian Franchise Committee in 1932 recommended for the Provincial Legislatures that, for both men and women, the property qualification should be substantially lowered, and that there should also be an education qualification. Recognising however that, in the case of women, "theoretic equality under a restricted franchise means in practice extreme inequality," they proposed that, in the case of men, the educational qualification should be the passing of the Upper Primary Standard, or an equivalent test; in the case of women, simple literacy. They also proposed another special qualification for women, viz., being the wife of a man possessing a specified voting qualification or the widow qualified under this provision during her husband's lifetime.

Under these proposals the Committee estimated the number of women who would be qualified to vote under each heading as:

| | | | |
|--------------------------------------|-----|-----|-----------|
| (a) Own property qualification | ... | ... | 1,929,000 |
| (b) Literacy | ... | .. | 1,265,000 |
| (c) Husband's property qualification | ... | ... | 4,306,000 |

But as there would be some overlapping between these voters, the total estimate as likely to be enfranchised was approximately 6,620,000.

Views of the Thrd Round Table Conference on Provincial Franchise.

6. We are glad to note from the Report of the third Round Table Conference of 1932 that "the general feeling" of the Conference was in favour of the proposed literacy standard for women, though some members would have preferred the same standard for both men and women. The Report further records that there was a very general difference of opinion concerning the proposal to enfranchise the wives of men qualified by property to vote for the present Provincial Councils.

We would in reply point out that this proposal of the Franchise Committee is in fact a very cautious one, and it would enfranchise considerably fewer women than the corresponding proposal by the Indian Statutory Commission. If even this moderate proposal of the Franchise Committee is dropped, the effect will be to reduce the number of women voters by more than half. Again, if the Upper Primary Standard be substituted for literacy, the effect will be to increase the disparity between men and women voters as statistics prove that even now more boys than girls attend schools and pass tests or examinations, and there was a still greater difference in their numbers when the adults of to-day were boys and girls.

The White Paper Proposals—Provincial Franchise.

7. Under the White Paper proposals the franchise in general for provincial legislatures will be essentially based on property supplemented by an educational qualification, common to men and women alike, and by a qualification for women in respect of property held by the husband. These educational qualifications as defined in Appendix V of the White Paper would vary considerably in the different Provinces, e.g., in Madras the educational qualification for both men and women would be literacy (ability to read or write in any language), in Bombay, Bengal, Bihar and Orissa, and Central Provinces, the passing of the Matriculation or School Leaving Certificate or its equivalent, in the United Provinces, Punjab and Assam "the completion of the educational course immediately below the Upper Primary Stage or its equivalent" and in the North-West Frontier Province, "in urban areas, the passing of the Middle School Examination; in rural areas, of the Upper Primary Standard; or of an examination accepted by the Local Government as the equivalent of either."

29^o July, 1933.]

Under a qualification based on a public examination very few women will come on the register, particularly in Provinces, where education among women is still very backward, and where the majority of even the few educated women have, because of social custom, never been to schools, or passed examinations. It is extremely unlikely that any adult women if literate, would be allowed by social custom to sit for a public educational examination, of however low a standard, so that women already educated at home will not be qualified to vote, because they have not passed a public examination. We have no doubt therefore that if the Government proposals are adopted the proportion of women to men voters will be far lower even than the Government estimate of 17 and the women's vote will continue to be a negligible factor in elections in those Provinces where an educational qualification higher than bare literacy, is prescribed for women.

*Franchise for the Federal Assembly.
Proposals of the Indian Franchise Committee.*

8. With regard to the franchise for the Assembly, the Indian Franchise Committee recommended that it should be the same for both men and women as that now in force for the Provincial Councils, supplemented by an educational qualification for both men and women. They suggested that in the case of men the educational qualification should be the possession of the Matriculation or School Leaving Certificate or its equivalent. In the case of women they stated that as education has made much less progress among them, the names of all women entered on the new Provincial Council rolls under the literacy qualification should be added to the Assembly roll. They added, however, that this proviso should apply only to the first roll of election to the Assembly, and that thereafter while the names of all these women would be retained, the qualification for the additional new women electors should be the Upper Primary Standard. They expected that under these proposals, the number of women on the electoral roll for the first Assembly would be about 1,500,000 in a total electorate of about 8,500,000.

In our opinion the Committee's proposals for women's franchise are quite inadequate and we would urge that the franchise for the future Provincial Assemblies and for the Federal Assembly should be the same.

Views of the Third Round Table Conference on Franchise for the Federal Assembly.

9. In its chapter on the Federal Legislature, the Report of the Third Round Table Conference states that "the conference accepted generally the proposal that the franchise for the British Indian section of the future Assembly shall be the existing franchise for the Provincial Legislative Councils"—"the conference was unable to agree as regards the adoption of an educational qualification for women voters for the Federal Assembly, the same arguments as were advanced for and against the proposal in the case of the Provincial legislatures holding good in their view here also". We, too, would repeat our replies to those arguments given in para. 6 above when urging that the same special qualification of literacy should be prescribed for women for the Federal Assembly franchise also.

Franchise for the Federal Assembly recommended by the White Paper.

10. The franchise for the House of Assembly under the British Government's proposals will be for practical purposes the existing franchise for the present Provincial Legislatures supplemented by an educational qualification common to both men and women. The White Paper further states in para. 21 that "the ratio of women to men electors for the Federal Assembly will for practical purposes remain unchanged under the present proposals, although the number of women electors will be substantially increased", but it gives no figures to explain how the Government arrived at this conclusion. Under the new property qualification for the Assembly proposed by the White Paper, which is the same as that now in force for the Provincial Legislatures, the proportion of women to men voters will certainly not be higher than under the existing Assembly qualification, as both are based on property held in the voter's own right. To this property qualification for the Assembly franchise, the White Paper proposes to add an educational qualification of the Matriculation or School Final Certificate common to men and women. For reasons which we have already explained, it is obvious that far more men than women will be qualified for the franchise under this high educational qualification. The franchise (1932) Committee's Report (para. 409) points out that even if the Upper Primary qualification were adopted, the "number of women on the electoral roll for the Federal Assembly will be very small." The proposal of the White Paper to prescribe an educational qualification of such a high standard as the Matriculation or S. S. L. C. examination, for both men and women, will of course reduce the number of women voters for the Assembly far below the number who would be qualified were the Upper Primary qualification prescribed, and we would point out that the number of women electors who would be qualified under even this Upper Primary qualification was considered inadequate by the Franchise Committee unless this qualification was modified by the special temporary literacy qualification for women proposed by them. The educational qualification proposed by the White Paper will therefore surely lower the ratio of women to men electors below even its present inadequate figure.

29° July, 1933.]

Effect of the New Regulation on Women's Vote.

11. The White Paper further modifies the proposals of the Franchise Committee by adding a proviso that for both the Assembly and the Provincial Council electoral rolls the claimants in respect of an educational qualification or of property held by a husband will be required to make an application to be entered on the electoral roll to the Returning Officer. The Franchise Committee suggested this condition only in the case of women who were not recorded as literate in the educational records, and not of all women who would be qualified under these two special qualifications. There is no doubt that the only possible effect of this proviso must be a lowering of the number of women voters, for certain social disabilities such as purdah, seclusion, etc., under which many Indian women still labour, makes this condition much more difficult for them to fulfil than for men. We would urge therefore that this condition should not be prescribed for women and that the recommendation of the Franchise Committee on this point should be adopted as being fair and reasonable. If, however, this rule is insisted upon, we would urge that to compensate for the probability of a smaller number of women coming on the roll, the husband's property qualifications should be extended to the wives of all men qualified under the property qualification, instead of merely to the wives of men possessing the property qualifications prescribed at present for the Provincial Councils.

Importance of adequate Women's Vote for the Federal Assembly.

12. There is one other point which we should like to emphasise. As the Federal Assembly will deal with many questions which are of particular concern to Indian women and on which the views of men and women may differ, it is essential that the members of the House of Assembly should be responsive to a large women's vote if the views of women are to have a fair chance of influencing legislation on these subjects. In view therefore of the legislative importance of the Federal Assembly to women we would repeat that women voters for that Assembly should have the same qualifications of literacy and of the husband's property qualification as recommended for them by the Indian Franchise Committee for the Provincial Assemblies.

The British Government anxious that the proportion of Women Electors should be adequate.

13. We are glad that the British Government have stated that they fully appreciate the importance of a large women's electorate and are very anxious to secure that the proportion of women electors should be adequate, and admit that further consideration of the subject may be necessary. We do most earnestly hope that the Joint Select Committee will bear this in mind, and will carefully consider the arguments we have urged for the necessity of enlarging the women's electorate both in the Provincial and in the Central Legislatures. We hope that on consideration of those arguments they will modify the Government's proposals so as to enable women to have a share in the electorate more in proportion to their number and their importance to the country.

Opinion of Women in India.

14. We are aware that certain women's organisations in India have in the past put forward objections to special voting qualifications for women; but these objections have invariably been coupled with a demand for a full and real equality of citizenship rights with men, through some form of adult franchise, directly or through groups. It would be most unfair to interpret these objections as implying that organised women in India are indifferent to their voting strength, or would be satisfied with a mere paper equality, resulting under a restricted franchise in an almost negligible proportion of votes. The Report of the Indian Franchise Committee shows that many of the women witnesses who gave evidence before the Committee, some of them speaking on behalf of other important organisations, anticipated that immediate adult franchise might not prove practicable, and definitely supported the qualification of literacy and of the husband's ownership of property which were subsequently recommended.

29° July, 1933.]

We are also aware that it has been suggested by some women that the women's electorate can be enlarged by enfranchising all women of 21 years and over, living in urban areas. We wish to state that we have no objection to the adoption of this scheme as a means of further increasing the number of women voters recommended by the Indian Franchise Committee, but we are opposed to substituting this proposal for the proposal of the Indian Franchise Committee to enfranchise the wife of a man possessing a specified property qualification, as we are sure that such a substitution will result in an unequal and unfair distribution of voting power between women in urban and in rural areas. Under the literacy qualification, far more women will come on the roll in urban than in rural areas, as education is undoubtedly more advanced in towns than in villages, and this new proposal to have adult franchise for women in urban areas, will further increase the disparity in numbers between the women voters in urban and rural areas. The women in villages are in many respects less advanced than the women in urban areas, and they specially need the stimulating effect of the franchise to awaken in them a full sense of civic responsibility. The vote therefore is of far greater importance and value to them, in educating them and in raising their status generally, than it is to the women in the urban areas. We have therefore no doubt that the substitution of this proposal for the special qualification proposed by the Indian Franchise Committee will cause grave injustice to many millions of women and retard the progress of women's advancement in our villages. Many of us, signatories of this memorandum, have lived in rural areas and are well acquainted with the conditions prevailing there and we feel it would be grossly unfair to deprive the women in rural areas of their rightful share in the franchise and its educational and other advantages. For those reasons we strongly urge that the proposal of the Indian Franchise Committee to prescribe a special qualification for married women on husband's property qualification should not be abandoned.

The Federal Upper Chamber.

15. With regard to the Upper Chamber of the Federal Legislature no proposals have been made for ensuring that women will be eligible for election to this chamber. The White Paper states that "since the British Indian seats in the Upper Chamber of the Federal legislatures will be filled by indirect election by the Provincial legislatures, no question of franchise qualifications arises, though certain specific property or other qualifications will be required in members of the Upper House". (para. 20, page 6.) Under the present qualifications for election to the Council of State the number of women who would be qualified to stand is infinitesimal, and we would urge that if these qualifications are to be continued for the new Federal Upper Chamber, some modification in them should be made for women candidates.

In this connection it is illuminating to note that in spite of a strong demand from women, the Council of State has not yet extended the right to vote or stand for election, even to those few women who possess these high qualifications. As practical experience on legislative measures affecting women has also shown that this body is reactionary in its attitude to women, we are naturally anxious that the qualifications to serve on this body should be modified as to make it possible for an adequate number of women to be eligible for election.

Summary of our Recommendations.

16. We would summarise our demands by urging with all the force at our command, that if the Joint Select Committee finds itself unable to recommend any form of adult suffrage, it may at least not ask the women of India to be satisfied with anything less than the measure of franchise rights for the Provincial Assemblies recommended for them in the Report of the Indian Franchise Committee of 1932; and because of the special legislative importance of the Federal Assembly to women we would urge that the women's electorate for that body should not be less than a third of the total electorate. We are convinced that nothing less than this measure of franchise will be fair or just to the women in India, considering their numbers and importance in the country.

29^o Julii, 1933.]

Conclusion.

17. In conclusion we would respectfully urge that the consideration of the question of women's franchise be not postponed or left to be dealt with by the Central and Provincial Governments or legislatures at some future and uncertain date. We request that the claims of women be examined at the same time as those of the rest of India and before the Bill for the new Indian Constitution be finally drafted and presented to Parliament.

MEMORANDUM 43. ON CERTAIN QUESTIONS AFFECTING THE STATUS AND WELFARE OF INDIAN WOMEN IN THE FUTURE CONSTITUTION OF INDIA, HANDED IN BY MRS. P. K. SEN.

Introduction.

1. We, the undersigned, women members of local bodies, such as Municipalities, District Boards and Taluk Boards, desire to present this Memorandum to you, and request you to give it special consideration as coming from women who have all had experience of standing for election and of serving on public administrative bodies. We have had personal practical experience of the difficulties which confront women standing for election under a franchise principally based on property qualifications, and in which, though franchise qualifications are the same for men and women voters, the proportion of men to women voters is about 6:1 in Municipalities and 8:1 in District Boards.

Experience of Election to existing Local Bodies.

2. We would point out that our experience in elections is of special interest as we have all stood for election under the Local Bodies Act of 1930, by which any taxpayer of however small an amount is qualified to vote. (Sec. 45, Madras District Municipalities Act and Schedule III to the Madras Local Boards Act, 1930.) We have therefore had practical experience in advance of how franchise based on a low property qualification and given on equal terms to men and women would affect women candidates if unmodified by any additional special qualifications for women voters. Before 1932 the only women on local bodies were women members nominated by Government, and we would point out that their work was so much appreciated, that when nominated seats on local bodies were abolished by the New Acts which came into force in 1932, these bodies recommended that under the provisions of these Acts, seats should be reserved for women. There are now over 200 women on local bodies in the Madras Presidency, sitting on Municipalities, District Boards and Taluk Boards, but almost all of them have been returned for seats reserved for women. From figures that are available now we learn that out of these 200 women on local bodies only one woman has been returned for a general and unreserved constituency in a Municipality, and one woman for a District Board general and unreserved constituency. These figures speak for themselves with regard to the chances women would have, of being elected for general unreserved constituencies on a franchise nominally equal for both men and women voters, and comment is almost superfluous.

3. We would, however, point out that the presence of these women on local bodies shows the keen interest women are taking in local affairs and that this interest has even spread to the villages, which are usually regarded as the stronghold of conservatism with regard to women. We have now elected women members on several Taluk Boards, these women members being usually women residing in Taluk areas and not outsiders. The existence of women members on Taluk Boards, is especially interesting, as prior to 1932 there were no nominated women members on Taluk Boards as there were on Municipal Councils and on District Boards. It shows that the work of the nominated women members on the old Municipalities and District Boards has encouraged women in the villages to stand for election to Taluk Boards under the provision of the new Act. (Sec. 9 (2), Madras Local Boards Act of 1930.)

Opposition to postponement of consideration of qualifications for women's franchise.

4. Before we go on to deal with the special franchise qualifications for women which we support, we should like to deal with the general argument that this question of women's franchise be postponed and left to the Central and Provincial Legislatures to deal with at some future and uncertain date. We are emphatically opposed to this suggestion as we consider that the claims of India's women to political status and rights should be dealt with at the same time as those of the rest of India, and before the Bill for the New Indian Constitution is finally drafted and presented to Parliament. The new Central and Provincial legislatures will have many pressing questions to deal with, and the questions affecting women and their status will be crowded out, unless candidates for election are responsible to a women's vote too considerable for them to dare to ignore it, but the women's vote under the present nominally equal franchise is 1·10 in our province of Madras, and is very much lower in other provinces, e.g., in Assam it is 1·114 (para. 204, Chap. VIII, Report of Indian Franchise Committee).

29^o Juln, 1933]

Special franchise qualifications for women supported in this Memorandum.

5. These general considerations therefore make us support the special franchise qualifications for women proposed by the Indian Franchise (Lothian) Committee for the Provincial Councils.

(a) an educational qualification of bare literacy for women.

(b) being the wife of a man who possesses the property qualification prescribed for the existing councils.

The Committee estimated that under these proposals the number of women enfranchised would be approximately:—

| | | |
|--------------------------------------|--------|-----------|
| (a) Own property qualification | | 1,929,000 |
| (b) Literacy qualification | ... | 1,235,000 |
| (c) Husband's property qualification | | 4,306,000 |

As there would be some overlapping between the voters qualified under these different heads, they estimated the total number of women voters as approximately 6,620,000. These proposals would nowhere result in a higher proportion of women to men voters than as 1:4 and in some provinces such as Bihar and Orissa the proportion would be only as 1:9 and we cannot think this anything but a modest proportion considering that the total adult populations of men and women are about equal. If these special qualifications of literacy and of the husband's vote are not adopted the proportion of women to men voters would be only as 1:11 in this province and considerably smaller in other provinces. We wish, therefore, to emphasise the very great importance to women of those special franchise qualifications as proposed by the Indian Franchise Committee, and to state that we will be content with no proposals which enfranchise a smaller proportion of women.

Suggested enfranchisement of all women over 21 in urban areas.

6. We are aware of the suggestion made by some women's organisations to increase the women's vote, by enfranchising all women of twenty-one and over living in urban areas. We would have no objection to this scheme were it in addition to the special qualification for women of the husband's property qualification recommended by the Indian Franchise Committee and the White Paper; but we understand that this enfranchisement of urban women voters has been suggested as a substitute for the husband's property qualification, and to such a substitution we are totally opposed, as it must result in an unequal and unfair distribution of voting strength between women in urban and in rural areas. As education is more advanced in urban than in rural areas, more women will come on the electoral rolls under the literacy qualification in urban than in rural areas. To this literacy qualification which itself favours women in urban areas, it is proposed to add a special qualification giving adult franchise to women in towns, a qualification which will only benefit women in urban areas, while at the same time abandoning the husband's property qualification which would have enfranchised women in rural as well as in urban areas. All students of Indian Economics and Politics have emphasised that India is predominantly an agricultural country and that nearly 90 per cent. of her people live in villages, and therefore to give adult suffrage to the 10 per cent. of women who live in towns, while giving only a property qualification in her own regard and a literacy qualification to the 90 per cent. of women who live in villages, would be manifestly unfair and injurious to the interests of Indian women as a whole. As the women in villages are educationally and socially more backward than the women in urban areas, the vote is of greater educative importance to them than to women in urban areas, and they need the stimulus of the franchise to awaken them from their present state of civic inertia and to raise their general status. It is, moreover, especially in rural areas, that the pressure of an adequate women's vote is needed to increase the provision of facilities for education and medical help and generally to improve the social conditions of life for women in villages. We have no doubt, therefore, that the substitution of this proposal of adult suffrage for women in urban areas in place of the husband's property qualification would cause grave injustice to many millions of Indian women, and retard the progress of women's advancement in the villages. We, the signatories of this Memorandum, have many of us lived in rural areas, and are well acquainted with the conditions prevailing there, and we feel strongly that it would be most unfair to deprive the women in villages of their share in the voting strength of the country, by substituting for the special qualification of husband's property qualification, a special qualification enfranchising women only in towns, because of the personal and theoretic objections, however genuinely held, of a few women to the married women's qualification. We feel that their objections take no account of the actual practical conditions prevailing in Indian villages. We state with full confidence and a real knowledge of rural conditions that women in rural areas have no such objections to a vote on the husband's qualification, and consider that at the present time and under the present circumstances in Indian villages it would be regarded as quite fair and in no way derogatory to women. For these reasons we most strongly urge that the proposal of the Indian Franchise Committee of the special qualification for women on husband's property qualification should not be abandoned.

White Paper Proposals for Women's Franchise for the Provincial Councils.

7. Under the proposals of the British Government in the White Paper of March, 1933, the franchise in general for Provincial legislatures will be "essentially based on property supplemented by an educational qualification common to men and women alike and by a qualification for women in respect of property held by the husband." The Government estimate that under these qualifications the ratio of women to men voters will be approximately 1:7 but they do not give any figures or state reasons for arriving at this ratio. Their proposals for women's franchise differ from those of the Indian Franchise Committee with regard to the educational qualification. The White Paper recommends the same educational qualification for men and women, and that qualification is a very high one in some provinces, e.g., in Bombay, Bengal, Bihar and Orissa and Central Provinces where the passing of the Matriculation or School Leaving Certificate or its equivalent is the qualification prescribed. Therefore the women who in these provinces will come on the electoral roll under the educational qualification will be very few, far less in number than the men. We would point out that even now many more boys than girls go to school and pass examinations, and this was still more the case when the adults of to-day were boys and girls. We have, therefore, no doubt that if the proposals of the White Paper are adopted the proportion of women to men voters for Provincial Assemblies will be far lower than the Government estimate of 1:7 a ratio which is not fair or just to the women, considering their numbers and importance in the country.

White Paper Proposals for Women's Franchise for the Assembly.

8. The franchise for the House of Assembly of the Federal Legislature under the White Paper proposals will be for practical purposes the existing franchise for the present Provincial legislatures, a franchise essentially based on property. The Government propose that this qualification should be supplemented by an educational qualification common to men and women. They state that under these qualifications "the ratio of women to men electors for the Federal Assembly will for practical purposes remain unchanged although the number of women electors will be substantially increased." Here again no figures are given to explain how this ratio was arrived at. The property qualification proposed by the White Paper for the Federal Assembly is the same as that proposed by the Indian Franchise Committee, but while the Committee recommended literacy as the educational qualification for women the White Paper recommends the possession of the Matriculation Certificate or its equivalent examination as the educational qualification for both men and women alike. Statistics show that there will be only about 315,651 women voters and 6,792,821 men voters under the proposed property qualification for the Federal Assembly (Table in Chapter VII, Report of Indian Franchise Committee). The Indian Franchise Committee rejected the idea of the immediate introduction of even the Upper Primary Standard as the educational qualification for women as the number of women who would come on the electoral roll would be very small, and advocated bare literacy as the educational qualification for them for the first election to the Federal Assembly. (Chapter XX, para. 409.) The number of women voters will surely be smaller still when the educational qualification is as high as the Matriculation Standard. We would refer to the remarks of the Education Committee of the Indian Statutory Commission (Chap. VII, para. 7 of their Report) that the disparity and the growing disparity between the figures for boys and girls increases as we go up the educational ladder and that the number of boys in the high school stage (preparing for matriculation) is 34 times as great as the number of girls. This high educational qualification will, therefore, surely lower the ratio of women to men electors below even its present inadequate figure.

29^o July, 1933]

White Paper Proposal for Application to the Returning Officer.

9. The White Paper further modifies the proposals of the Indian Franchise Committee by adding a proviso that the claimants in respect of an educational qualification, or of property held by a husband, will be required to make application to be entered on the electoral roll to the Returning Officer. The Indian Franchise Committee suggested this condition only in the case of women who were not recorded as literate in the educational records, and not of all women who would be qualified under these special qualifications. The exact effect of this proposal of the White Paper cannot be measured now, but we fear that numerically it will be very serious indeed. One of the main reasons for this fear is that under existing social conditions in India this proviso will press more severely on women than it would on men voters for social disabilities such as purdah may make it difficult for qualified women voters to fulfil this condition. Also women qualified to vote may not realise until too late that under this new regulation they are obliged to make an application to the Returning Officer before their names are entered on the register. The only effect of this proviso must be to decrease the women's vote and lower its proportion compared to that of men and thus to diminish the effect of the special qualifications for women devised in order to mitigate the present disparity in numbers between men and women voters. We would urge, therefore, that this condition should not be prescribed for women, and that the recommendation of the Indian Franchise Committee on this point should be adopted as being fair and reasonable. If, however, this proviso is insisted upon, we would urge that to compensate for the probability of a smaller number of women coming on the roll, the husband's property qualification should be extended to the wives of all men qualified under the future property qualification, instead of merely to the wives of men possessing the property qualifications prescribed at present for the provincial councils.

Special Importance of Assembly Franchise to Women.

10. We would like to emphasise that though the White Paper contains provision for reservation of seats for women for the Assembly, this reservation of seats should not be considered as in any way a substitute for a women's vote large enough to demand consideration from candidates for the Assembly. Questions such as marriage and divorce, adoption, custody and guardianship of minors, wills and succession, will under the proposals of the White Paper be concurrent subjects for Provincial and Central legislation. As these are questions on which the views of men and women may differ, it is essential that the members of the House of Assembly, should be responsive to a large women's vote, if the views of women are to have a fair chance of influencing legislation on these subjects—subjects which all will agree are of the most vital and particular concern to Indian women. The attention that these questions are likely to receive unless there is an adequate women's vote was demonstrated when a motion for the reference to a Select Committee of a bill to secure a share for Hindu widows in their husband's family property was negatived by the legislative Assembly on 4th February, 1932. Other similar instances can be given, and had the members of the Assembly been answerable to a large women's vote such neglect of questions of peculiar importance to women would not have occurred. In view therefore of the special importance of the women's vote for the Federal Assembly, we would urge that women should have for that Assembly the same qualifications of literacy and of the husband's property qualification as recommended by the Indian Franchise Committee for the Provincial franchise.

29° July, 1933.]

Hope that Joint Select Committee may modify White Paper Proposals for Women's Franchise.

11. We are glad that the British Government have clearly stated that they "fully appreciate the importance of a large women's electorate and are very anxious to secure that the proportion of women electors should be adequate" and admit that further consideration of the subject may be necessary. We do most earnestly hope that the Joint Select Committee will bear this in mind and that on careful consideration of the arguments we have urged for the necessity of enlarging the women's electorate, they will revise the Government's proposals so as to enable women to have a share in both the Federal and Provincial electorates more in proportion to their number and their importance to the country.

12. We are aware that under adult suffrage the proportion of men and women voters would be fair and just but we do not consider it probable that adult franchise will be introduced at once owing to administrative difficulties. We, therefore, urge most strongly that if the Joint Select Committee are unable to recommend any form of adult suffrage, they will not ask the women of India to be satisfied with any smaller measure of franchise than that recommended for them by the Indian Franchise Committee for the Provincial legislatures; while in view of the special importance of the women's vote for the Federal Assembly we would respectfully and with all the vehemence at our command, urge that nothing less than one-third of the total voting strength for that Assembly will be fair or just to women. We have made a careful study of the subject and feel convinced that anything less than the franchise we have demanded will fail to make the women's vote an effective factor in elections.

Eligibility of Women Candidates for Election to the Upper Chamber of Federal Legislature.

13. With regard to the Upper Chamber of the Federal Legislature no definite proposals have yet been made for ensuring that women will be eligible for election to this body. The White Paper states "since the British Indian seats in the Upper Chamber of the Federal Legislatures will be filled by indirect election by the Provincial legislatures, no question of franchise qualifications arises though certain specific property or other qualifications will be required in members". Under the present qualification for election to the Council of State the number of women who would be qualified to stand is infinitesimal, and we would urge that if these qualifications are to be continued for the new Federal Upper Chamber, some modification in them should be made for women candidates. If new qualifications are to be prescribed we would urge that these new qualifications should be such as to secure the eligibility of a considerable number of women as candidates.

In this connection we would draw attention to the significant fact that in spite of a strong demand from women, the Council of State has not yet extended the right to vote or stand for election even to those few women who possess the existing high qualifications. As practical experience on legislative measures affecting women has shown that this body is extremely reactionary in its attitude to women we are naturally anxious that the qualifications to serve on this body should be such as to make it possible for educated women to stand for election.

Statutory Declaration of Women's Equality in Civic Rights.

14. This disability brings home to us the importance of a Statutory declaration safeguarding women from disabilities imposed on them as women in the exercise of civic rights, and we would urge that a clause stating that men and women have fundamentally the same rights and duties as citizens, should be embodied in our new constitution.

Summary.

15. We would summarise the proposals we urge as follows:—

(1) That the consideration of the question of the political status of women under the new Indian Constitution should not be postponed or left to be dealt with by the future legislatures or Government; and that the claims of women should be examined at the same time as those of the rest of India and before the Bill for the new Indian Constitution is finally drafted and presented to Parliament (Para. 4 of this memo.).

(2) That a clause should be inserted in the new Constitution safeguarding women from disabilities imposed on them as women in the exercise of civic rights (Para. 11 of this memo.).

29^o July, 1933.]

(3) With regard to women's franchise we would urge:—

(a) For the Provincial Assemblies.

(1) Property and educational qualifications the same as men.

(2) Special literacy qualification of bare literacy.

(3) Special qualification of being the wife of a man having a specific property qualification. A woman once placed on the roll in respect of this qualification to continue to be on the roll during widowhood.

Note.—In these we support the recommendations of the Indian Franchise Committee and declare that we will be content with no smaller proportion of women voters than they have recommended.

(Paras. 5, 6 and 7 of this memo.)

(b) For the Federal Assembly:

(1) The same property and educational qualification as for men.

(2) and (3) The same special qualifications for women as those proposed for the Provincial Assemblies and stated above.

Note.—For reasons already explained and in view of the special importance of an effective women's vote for this Assembly, our proposals differ from the more restricted franchise recommended for women by the Franchise Committee (Paras. 8 and 10 of this memo.).

Note on (a) and (b): With regard to the special qualifications for (a) and (b) we would draw your attention to Para. 9 of this memorandum.

(c) For the Upper Chamber:

The qualifications should be such as to secure the eligibility of considerable number of educated women (Para. 13 of this memo.).

16. In conclusion we wish to state respectfully that our experience as members of Local Bodies and our experience of elections, has impressed on us the necessity of an adequate women's vote, if questions affecting women are to have given to them the attention their importance to the country demands. We have, therefore, felt impelled to present this Memorandum embodying our views on women's franchise, and we are confident that you will attach the greater weight to our views because we have had practical experience of administrative work on Local Bodies.

C474. Do you desire now to make a statement or to add anything to those Memoranda?—I understand I will have to appear before the full Committee on Tuesday. I think I would rather make my statement then.

C475. You appreciate that our hope is that your detailed examination may be taken this afternoon?—Yes

C476. And if you think that there is sufficient in the Memoranda to enable the sub-committee to carry out that detailed examination, then I agree that you should make your statement only before the main Committee?—If you would permit me to say a few words about the Mahila Samiti I would like to do so.

C477. Please?—The Mahila Samiti is a successor to the Women's organisations which were started and carried on in Bengal since the early eighties of the last century, through the effort of pioneer workers. It was founded in 1905 with the late H.H. The Maharanee Sumiti Deuco of Cooch Behar as the President and Mrs. P. K. Ray as the Secretary, and has gradually extended its activities. Although its work is mainly intended for Bengal it has brought Bengal into contact with various other parts of India. In 1908 this Samiti organised a Conference which was presided over by Her Highness the Maharanee of Baroda. This Conference was attended by representative women numbering over 500 from Bombay, Madras, Punjab, the Central Provinces, and other parts of India. About 1914 it further extended its activities by raising funds and sending young women students to England for further studies and training. For this purpose a Branch Association was formed in London called the Indian Women's Educational Association which exists here to the present day, and is doing useful work. During the Great War the Samiti stirred the whole of Bengal by organising active work in different centres for the purpose of supplying comforts to the Indian sepoys in the front and to the newly enlisted recruits known as the Bengalee Double Co. In 1917 there was another big Conference of women from different parts of India, held at Calcutta under the auspices of the Mahila Samiti and the Samiti came into contact with various women workers from different parts of India.

In 1918 the Samiti framed a definite scheme for starting a Home School and College for Indian girls which has since materialised into a very useful institution, and we have girls from various parts of India.

Thus for nearly 30 years the Samiti has done silent and steady work for social and educational advancement. It took the lead on the question of women's Suffrage in Bengal at the time when the Indian Franchise Committee visited India and worked in that behalf in conjunction with several women's organisations in Bengal. It can therefore well claim to be heard on the enfranchisement of the Indian women. This is one point, and, my Lord, with your permission, I might emphasise the point which was brought forward by Miss Pickford the other day about Reserved seats in the Provincial Councils and Assemblies.

Chairman. On what occasion?

Miss Pickford.

C478. I think probably Mrs. P. K. Sen is referring to my questions to the Secretary of State about the representation of Bengal on the Provincial Councils, and also in the Federal Assembly. Is that so?—That is so.

C479. The number of the question is 7454?—It said that in Bengal with a population of 50,000,000 in the Provincial Councils there were five women, and in the Federal Assembly one woman, in Bombay with a population of 18,000,000 (without Sind) six women in the Provincial Council and two women in the Federal Assembly. Madras has eight women in the Provincial Council and two in the Federal Assembly. This point I wanted to bring out before your Lordship.

Chairman.

C480. Would you tell me about your organisation. Have you a definite membership?—Yes, we have.

Begum Shah Nawaz.

C481. Confined to Bengal only?—Yes, the Mahila Samiti is confined to Bengal only.

Chairman.

C482. I do not think you give us your total membership in your Memoranda, do you? Could you give me that?—We have not got it in that sort of organised way, because we have small Mahila Samitis in almost all the districts, and each Association is doing work for the local area. We could estimate it at more than 1,000 at least, and there are other branches which have sprung up from the Mahila Samiti, but which are not exactly in the name of the Mahila Samiti, such as the Saroj Nalini Association which has 222 branches all over Bengal, and, especially in the rural districts. It is really a part of the Mahila Samiti. There are other Associations which have also sprung up from this Mahila Samiti. This is a sort of parent body—the mother I might call it. May Mrs. Mukerji add something?

C483. I might ask you a question on that last observation of yours. Are you meeting with much opposition from Indians in India?—No, I do not think so.

C484. Is there any organised opposition to your propaganda?—I cannot quite say that. I do not think there is.

C485. You are not conscious of any strong organised opposition?—Against our views there might be opposition.

C486. Let me ask you in connection with that whether you have been carrying on any active propaganda in Bengal or elsewhere in favour of your suggestions with reference to the White Paper scheme?—There has been no sort of propaganda. We have held meetings in Calcutta, and also in the districts, but I cannot say that it was propaganda on a large scale against the White Paper.

C487. Has there been evident any opposition to, or resistance against your proposals for amending the Government's scheme?—Regarding some of our methods, of course, there is difference of opinion with the other organisations, but I think their object is all the same, because we all want adequate representation, I think.

Miss Pickford.

C487A. With regard to the last question that the Chairman has put to you, would it be fair to say that your organisation and the All-India Women's Conference are entirely agreed as to the necessity of an adequate number of women being on the electoral roll in order to make their needs and opinions felt?—Yes, that is quite so.

C488. But there is some difference between you as to the best way of bringing the women upon the electoral roll?—Yes, that is so.

C489. That it is a difference of detail, but an agreement in principle?—Yes, that is so.

C490. Am I right in thinking that there is a branch of the All-India Women's Conference in Bengal?—Yes, there is; recently formed.

C491. You are or were a member of that organisation at one time?—At one time I was, yes.

C492. And the Mahila Samiti, and the All-India Women's Conference are really pursuing the same objects, namely, improvement in the education and social conditions of women and girls?—Yes.

29° Juii, 1933.]

Mrs. P. K. SEN and Mrs. L. MUKERJI.

Chairman.

C493. Mrs. Mukerji, I rather think you wish to say a word or two before the general examination begins?—(Mrs. Mukerji.) Yes, I wish to say that under the auspices of the Mahila Samiti many Women's Committees have sprung up in Bengal dealing with all the different vital matters that deal with the improvement of women, such as the Women's Union which has tried to bring forward in the Council the Immoral Traffic Bill. We want to have it passed all over India. It has done great work in that way. We have got over 2,000 signatures including those of men, and, although the Mahila Samiti has now rather gone into the background, to give more energy to these new Associations that have sprung up under its auspices, where the younger generation seem to be taking a lead—

C494. Could you give us an indication of the scope of the welfare work in which those organisations were interested?—Yes. One is this immoral traffic, and the other is that homes have sprung up for the children of these women who are, I should say, fallen women.

Sir Hari Singh Gour.

C495. Foundling Homes?—Foundling Homes, and there have been several Vigilance Societies to watch over and to take care of girls who are led astray.

Chairman.

C496. Have those activities been mainly urban or have they penetrated into the rural areas?—They have penetrated into the rural areas. Their centres have been urban, but they have tried to extend their activities to rural areas.

C497. Are you yourself conscious of the organisations at work in Bengal known as the Co-operative Welfare Societies?—Yes, I am conscious of it. I am not a member; I have heard of these societies. I am not actually a member of the Co-operative Society.

C498. Are your members, or supporters, to your knowledge, taking any active part in that work?—I cannot say about the Co-operative Societies. Lady Bose has an organisation which actually works in the rural areas, but it is not known as a Co-operative Society. You might put it under that head, but the work is in the villages to get the widows and women—

C499. I am thinking of the anti-malarial societies. Malaria after all, though it bears hardly on the men bears even more hardly on the women?—That is more in the hands of the medical associations. But maternity work we have distinctly taken a great lead in. We have baby clinics all over Bengal, even in some of the village places, and especially in Calcutta, and there once or twice a week the Society maidens take it upon themselves to go there and dole out milk and give food to children and to see to their medical requirements if they are ill or sick in any way. They give them medicine and see to their medical requirements. We have established centres for the last 10 years or more, and even some of the Girl Guides take part in that.

C500. With regard to your maternity welfare work, have you any centres for training midwives?—We have centres for training midwives in some places. We have some under the auspices of the Government; we have health visitors and also midwives who go round, and they are paid a nominal sum, for this nominal sum they go and do accouchement for the poor women who cannot go to hospitals, due to purdah and other reasons.

C501. As an organisation you associate work of that kind with the general progress of women, material and political?—Yes; I do. In Chittagong I was directly concerned with this. We had a Maternity Committee and I was for some time President of this, and we actually gave out clothing and we sent out these midwives to these poor people who actually could not go to hospitals, and I and other ladies in turn visited the homes of these women who were in a state of accouchement.

C502. You regard the matter of the franchise as it affects women as very directly associated with the advancement of work of that kind?—Yes, because I think, when the laws are passed, they might touch on the improvements for this sort of thing. It is all a question of finance, and it is finance that is needed always. We had to raise money for public charity as it were, to help these women. If we have a sufficient representation in the Councils we might get the money directly from the funds put aside for medical or educational needs.

C503. Would you expect the general quickening of interests in affairs which is likely to follow the grant of the vote, in its turn to make a contribution towards the interest which women would take in that type of work?—I think decidedly so.

29^o Julii, 1933.]

Mrs. P. K. SEN and Mrs. L. MUKERJI.

C504. Have you any further statements which you desire to make?—It was only regarding these organisations, and I think your Lordship has heard enough of that.

Miss Mary Pickford.

C505 I understand that you have been asked to represent also the ladies who have sent in memoranda Nos. 42 and 43 from Madras?—Yes.

C506. You are in substantial agreement with the proposals that are put forward in those two memoranda?—Yes, we are.

C507. I think, Mrs. Sen, you are also in fairly close touch with the women in Bihar?—(Mrs. P. K. Sen.) Yes. I was in Bihar for almost 15 years. That is why in fact I asked Mrs. Mukerji to come with me to say something about Bengal, as I was not very closely in touch with the work in Bengal.

Miss Mary Pickford.] The differences in points of detail between these memoranda and those that have been put in on behalf of the All-India Women's Conference may be said to be that you are in favour of the proposal put forward by the Indian Franchise Committee of enfranchising the wives and widows of men with a certain property qualification, and they do not like that particular qualification.

Chairman.] I just want to say one word, you Mrs. Sen, or Mrs. Mukerji, will either of you answer these questions as you please?

Miss Mary Pickford.

C508. Is it your view that some such qualification as that will give a fairer distribution of voting strength than the proposal put forward by the All-India Women's Conference for enfranchising urban areas alone?—Yes; we feel very strongly that the rural areas want help and we cannot leave out the rural areas. There should be no discrimination between town and country. I have put that clearly in my memorandum. Both the Madras memoranda have stressed this point very clearly. I do not know whether I am in a position to say that they would accept anything else. I have said in my memorandum that I would be prepared to accept any other alternative. The Madras memoranda I presume all the Members of the Committee have read. They seem to be very strong on the fact that the vote in the rural areas is of far greater importance and value to them in educating them and raising their status generally than it is to the women in the urban areas. In the urban areas they have already got a special qualification namely literacy. In the villages there are not so many literate women. They have already that advantage in the urban districts, and if another special qualification of adult women suffrage were given in the urban areas, the rural areas would really be thrown into the background and we are afraid that there would really be no improvement which we all want very strongly. 90 per cent. of the population as you all know are in agricultural districts and it is for their improvement that we want wife's votes. That would result in a fair and even distribution at least, if we have to accept any special qualifications at all.

C509. From your experience would you agree with a statement in memorandum 43 which is sent in by ladies who have experience on local boards in Madras?—Yes.

C510. It is a very short paragraph, so perhaps it would be simpler if I read it: "We state with full confidence and a real knowledge of rural conditions that women in rural areas have no objection to a vote on the husband's qualifications and consider that at the present time and under the present circumstances in Indian villages it would be regarded as quite fair and in no way derogatory to women"?—Yes.

C511. Would you agree with that?—Yes; we would agree with that. In India the wife and husband really regard themselves as equal partners. The husband has his duties outside the home but the wife has the dominating influence inside the home. Both of them go to make up the fortunes of the home. I do not see how it can be regarded as derogatory to accept the husband's property qualifications. I think it is only recognising the status of the Indian women that they are equal partners to their husbands if they were given the vote on their husband's property qualifications. The Hindu law is much against the women of India and it is very difficult to change that all of a sudden. In the Madras memoranda they say quite distinctly that they are sure that the wives' vote will be acceptable. For Bengal and Bihar I can speak quite confidently and also for the United Provinces. I have also had experience of talking to the women of Assam and they all supported the wives' vote and do not think it is derogatory in any sense

29^o July, 1933.]

C512. I suppose it would be taken for granted in India as well as in England that a husband may influence his wife's vote and a wife influence her husband's because they would influence each other's ideas?—Yes; certainly.

C513. But would you say that a vote given on the husband's property qualifications would be a less independent vote than that given on some other qualification?—The same argument was used even in this country, when women first got their votes on the husband's property qualifications, but since the vote was given I have heard from ladies who worked during those times. They say that it made no difference to them. I think it would be the same in India, and even if it had some influence I do not see what harm it could do. (Mrs. Mukerji.) May I put forward a point? I do not see how the qualifications would influence the idea of the vote. If the wife got the vote on her own merits, she might be just as much under the influence of her husband.

C514. You recognise that it may exist, but it may not have anything to do with the electoral qualifications?—I do not see how it would.

Mr. M. R. Jayaker.

C515. That is an argument against giving votes to wives at all?—No; I do not see that.

C516. I say the argument would be against giving the wife a vote if she is going to be influenced?—I am saying it is not against it, and it does not affect the vote.

Dr. B. R. Ambedkar.

C517. Quite so?—We are trying to get a strength of vote of the women. We see, by the statistics, that the number of women with independent property qualifications is much lower than that of husbands because in our country, according to the Hindu law of inheritance, the women do not inherit equally with the men. Therefore, naturally, the independent property qualification is much lower with women. Therefore, we want to get a strength of vote in order to progress all the women's causes in India, because, then, we can be in touch with the actual laws passed. If we do not take advantage of this how shall we get the strength of the vote, because the figures show that under the husband's property qualification the figures are adopted to a great extent in Madras. I need not put the figures before you because you have them already. That is the chief point.

Miss Mary Pickford.

C518. I want to ask you a question about the reservation of seats. Even with a fairly large women's franchise do you think that without reservation it will be likely under present circumstances that many women would be elected to general constituencies in competition with men?—(Mrs. P. K. Sen.) No. In the Madras memoranda the ladies say they have had experience of standing for election and that it would be impossible for women to get on to the seats unless they were reserved seats in the beginning.

C519. They give some figures to prove that which we need not quote because they are in the memoranda?—Yes. (Mrs. Mukerji.) It is quite impossible for them to get into the ropes of these elections which are very knotty and tricky in the very beginning. You must give them a few years.

C520. As it has been difficult for them to get on local boards where the franchise is very extended and women have a large number of votes, it would be more difficult to get on to the local Councils and on to the Federal Assembly?—Yes.

C521. Therefore, you do attach importance to having seats reserved for women so that women may be able to express their points of view?—(Mrs. P. K. Sen.) Yes, under the circumstances. (Mrs. Mukerji.) May I add a point that only for one election and subject to change at the next election.

C522. Only one election?—Because one election carries you 5 years. Supposing in those 5 years, we are able to stand on our own merits, we ought to be given a chance of doing so and if we find we are not able to stand on our merits we can abide by that for another election, but 5 years is a long time. It should be only time for us to get into the ropes and the working of it.

C523. It would be one election only, would it not—5 years?—It would be a good thing to give us the option of the one election.

Chairman.

C524. That is the maximum statutory period; it might conceivably be shorter, —“accidents happen in the best of regulated families”?—It would not be shorter than 4 years, would it?

29^o July, 1933.]

Mrs. P. K. SEN and Mrs. L. MUKERJI.

[Continued.]

Mr. M. R. Jayaker.

C525. The first election would come at the beginning of this 5 years' period and not at the end?—Yes.

Miss Mary Pickford.

C526. I think you are strongly in favour of the literacy qualification for women?—(Mrs. P. K. Sen.) Yes; certainly. We should have the literacy qualification restored as was proposed by the Indian Franchise Committee.

C527. You have seen no doubt the proposals in the White Paper that the women who might be voters under their husband's property qualification should have to apply. Do you think that would largely reduce the number of people who would actually be placed upon the roll.—Yes, certainly, much more than has been estimated by the White Paper—very much more. I do not think you would get one woman out of 10 applying for the vote if they have to apply.

C528. The arguments have been put forward that there would certainly in some parts of India be objections to the officer responsible for the drawing up of the roll making a kind of rather detailed enquiry which would be necessary in order to place the name upon the roll. Have you any criticism to offer from your own experience in the Provinces that you know?—I have not actual experience, but I could say that the difficulty could easily be overcome by saying "The wife of so-and-so". There would be absolutely no difficulty that way. I think it has been over-estimated—the difficulty about the officers going and making enquiries like they do. Is that what you refer to?

C529. Yes?—I think the difficulties have really been over-estimated and it can easily be done because the husband's name will be put on the roll; at the same time the wife's name also could be put on the roll. I do not see the difficulty there.

C530. You realise that any person who is placed on the electoral roll has to be absolutely identified. Do you think it would be sufficient to say "The wife of so-and-so", without giving the name?—Yes; I think that would be because the husband would be there. He would be able to identify the wife.

Mr. R. A. Butler.

C531. Mrs. Sen, may I ask you a question about paragraph 5 of your first memorandum 41? Do you know if there are any records in Bengal which would make it possible easily to establish a lower educational qualification than the one suggested?—No; I have not been able to find that out, I say quite frankly, but there must be some way of having educational qualifications tested. I have not gone into those details further.

C532. The next question was about paragraph 12 of your memorandum. You say that the qualifications for the Upper Chamber should be such as to secure the eligibility of a considerable number of women?—Yes.

C533. Does that refer to proposal No. 27 of the White Paper which gives the qualifications for a member of the Council of State?—Yes.

C534. Would you regard those as shutting out women candidates for the Council of State?—Yes, but we wanted educational qualifications as well.

C535. You say "the qualifications"; I wanted to know whether you meant the qualifications for membership?—Yes.

C536. That is what Proposal 27 refers to?—I have not studied that question.

C537. Would you be able to tell us what further qualifications you would like added for the sake of women?—I think, if you admit the wives of propertied men in the Lower Chamber, you could allow them also in the Upper Chamber.

C538. I think we are at cross purposes, because I take your memorandum to mean the qualifications of candidates for the Council of State as apart from the question of franchise?—Yes.

C539. Is that what your memorandum means?—It says "the qualifications for the Upper Chamber should be such as to secure the eligibility of a considerable number of women." That is what I have said, and that is what has been said in the Madras memoranda also. The White Paper is not quite clear on that point.

C540. I want to get clear whether you are referring to the qualifications of the candidate, that is to say, that he should be over 30 years of age and so forth, or whether you mean the franchise, because it is different surely in your memorandum?—I mean the former.

C541. Which are you referring to there?—The qualifications of the candidate.

C542. You only refer to the qualifications?—Yes. We want representation there too, because it is most important that we should be adequately represented in the Upper Chamber, which is the most conservative Chamber, I should say, as regards women's legislation.

Mrs. P. K. SEN and Mrs. L. MUKERJI.

C543. My question was restricted solely to the qualifications, and I wanted to ask you whether you had any other suggestions to add to Proposal No. 27 of the White Paper?—No; I have not. (Mrs. Mukerji.) May I suggest something, and that is to give educational qualifications, not of a very high standard, but something like upper primary?

C544. I wonder if you would refer to paragraph 7 of Memorandum No. 43 from Madras. This memorandum says that the Government do not give any figures or state reasons for arriving at the ratio of 1 to 7 as a figure?—(Mrs. P. K. Sen.) Yes.

C545. Perhaps it would help you if I told you that the gross figure that we have calculated is a figure of one woman to 4.8 men—that is the actual ratio gross?—That is the actual ratio?

C546. Yes. The gross—before you allow any deductions for overlapping?—There would be a large number of deductions.

C547. That is why I am giving you the explanation which is asked for in this memorandum, and I can give you actually the figures, if you desire, upon which it is based?—(Mrs. P. K. Sen.) It gives 1 in 7 here.

C548. I may explain to you the gross figure is 1 to 4.8, but when you have allowed for the overlap of the different qualifications you arrive at the figure of 1 to 7?—Yes, I think that is what it is.

C549. Do you not regard 1 to 4.8 as a gross figure as being more satisfactory?—Yes, that is, of course, more satisfactory.

Sir Hari Singh Gour.

C550. Can you avoid an overlap?—We cannot avoid overlap because there are some women who would come under the literacy qualification and who would have husbands.

C551. Who would be married?—Yes.

Mr. F. S. Cocks.

C552. May I ask you about the education qualification? Do you hold that the only education qualification should be simply literacy?—Certainly.

C553. Coming to the election to the Assembly, do you know how it is proposed that women should be elected to the Assembly—that is to say, it is proposed they should be elected by the members of the Provincial Legislature?—Yes.

C554. Are you in favour of that?—No, we do not agree with that, because that would be an indirect election. We want some form of direct election. It would really be much better and it would educate the women for what they had to face later on. Some form of direct election is what we would prefer, and I think that proposal that the capital town should be the constituent area and women from all over the Province would be allowed to stand for election is a proposal which appeals to us. Under that it would be taken by rotation. That would be really much more satisfactory than having indirect election.

C555. You think it would be the best method?—I do think so.

C556. You were asked just now by Mr. Butler about the qualifications for the Upper Chamber. The qualification for a member of the Upper Chamber is, first of all, a property qualification?—Yes.

C557. Secondly, he must be a member of another Legislature, a Provincial one or a Federal one?—Yes.

C558. Or must hold any special qualification conferred for distinguished public services?—Yes.

C559. Those are the three qualifications?—Yes.

C560. You think that would rule out a great many women?—Yes. There would be very few, in fact none, there, because many of them have not got the property qualification, and in the case of the other two qualifications they do not apply to Indian women at all.

C561. What I would like you to state, if you could, is what additional qualification you suggest?—Perhaps matriculation qualification for the Upper Chamber.

C562. You consider Matriculation should be a qualification?—Yes. Perhaps for the Upper Chamber you may need a high qualification, but at the same time I feel it would be shutting out women who are doing important work. Many of them have not even the Matriculation qualification. But if you want women in the Legislatures in the beginning of the Constitution you would perhaps have to do with the Matriculation test, but even then there would be very few women's women who would be able to show that.

Sir Hari Singh Gour.

C563. They would have to contribute to the discussion in the Upper Chamber, and they would play a very responsible part in the administration of the country?—Yes.

C564. Therefore, you must have highly qualified women if they are to represent the women of India in the Upper Chamber?—Yes. (Mrs. L. Mukerji.) It is a matter on which a great deal of common sense is also needed. A young woman who has very high qualifications would not be as capable as an older woman who has had experience of social work but has not the advantage of academical qualifications.

29th July, 1933.]

Mrs. P. K. SEN and Mrs. L. MUKERJI.

C565. That commonsense must be brought home to the other members of the Upper Chamber, otherwise that commonsense is no good at all?—(Mrs. Sen.) But our statistics show that many of the chief women workers have no academical qualifications, and therefore you would shut them out if you put on a very high qualification.

Mr. M. R. Jayaker.

C566. Among those who are at present prominent women workers for the women's cause how many have academical qualifications, speaking in the language of percentage?—Very few. I cannot speak in percentages, but certainly the percentage is less than 50 per cent.

C567. You apprehend that by setting up academical qualifications of that kind these women who have been pioneers in the movement would be shut out?—Yes.

C568. Which would be very disastrous?—Yes, I think so. There are very few of us who have academical qualifications.

Mr. F. S. Cocks.

C569. Would you be in favour of the wife of the man who had property qualifications for the State Council being eligible for the State Council?—(Mrs. P. K. Sen) Yes, I think so, because their social status would be the same, and I think that would be quite fair.

C570. Have you any views as to how they should be elected to the Council of State?—Well, there are no reserved seats now, and since in the White Paper you are giving reserved seats in the Federal Legislatures and the Provincial Legislature, they should be reserved seats in the Upper Chamber also, because here it is most important that women should be represented. But it is very difficult to say the numbers—I do not know what the proportion should be—but we want at least some reserved seats there.

C571. The Governor-General has power to nominate 10 members to the Upper Chamber?—Yes.

C572. Would you be satisfied if it was said one or two out of the 10 should be women?—I do not think we should like that at all—without some form of an election—some kind of election would be much better.

C573. Do you mean some form of election by women or by general electorates?

—No, by general electorates. (Mrs. L. Mukerji.) From each Province, I should say—an open election, not chosen from the Provincial seats in the Council.*

Chairman.

C574. Direct?—Yes.*

Mr. F. S. Cocks.

C575. You say in your memorandum that women in India have always been free from communal differences?—Yes.

C576. Could you expand that a little? Do you mean to say that women in India have never been interested very much in the differences between the various religions?—No, I do not think so, really. They have had no communal differences so far. They are united on that one point at least. In any work that we do in any of the Provinces—and I have worked on various bodies—we do not find this communal question coming in at all.

C577. Is it confined to the men?—So far, I think. It might penetrate, I think, to women also, but we do not want it.

Sir Hari Singh Gour.

C578. And it does not penetrate in a good many men either?—(Mrs. L. Mukerji.) In Bengal we had a representation to the Governor from the women there, and there were women of all types—Gujeratis, Muhammadans, Hindus, Marathas, Parsees, and Bengalis. I am a member of at least six or seven associations in Calcutta, and the communal question has never come in.

Mr. F. S. Cocks.

C579. You feel no rivalry or enmity in that respect?—Rivalry in ordinary circumstances in life but not communal.

Chairman.

C580. How do you account for that fact? Can you account at all for the fact that the communal differences are much less to be observed in the case of women than in the case of men?—I think because the communal differences come in the professions. It is in the rivalry in professional qualifications that they come in and the men stick to them; but we have not any professions, and no rivalry so far has been produced—we have not come in contact with the idea at all.

*Note.—Subsequently, in correcting the evidence, the witness wished the following reply to be substituted for the answers to Questions C573 and C574:

"The election to these seats might by the women members of all the Legislatures who might form an electoral college for the purpose."

29^o July, 1933.]

Mrs. P. K. SEN and Mrs. L. MUKERJI.

This communal idea comes in when you come in contact with the rivalry for posts in public positions or in professional occupations. That is usually the point where the communal idea comes in and one considers there are so many Muhammadans and so many Sikhs. But with women not having to go for that, the idea never comes in at all.

C581. In your experience do the communal prejudices arise in the case of boys in the home?—No, I do not find it so at all.

C582. About what age in the case of boys does the communal prejudice begin to show itself? Is it when they leave the home?—I think, decidedly, when they enter into their professions.

C583. That is your strong impression?—That is my strong impression. There is always something common touching the case of women which brings them together, and they never think of communal ideas. I have worked alongside with Muhammadans, Hindus, Gujaratis, and when there is rivalry for some post in the Association, such as office bearers, the communal idea honestly has never come in at all.

Mr. M. R. Jayaker.

C584. Do not they come in when the young child is sent to the communal school or college?—Yes, that is why we are so much against the communal school, but on going to the Hindu school, I do not think the children think really about the communal idea—as mothers, we must say so, I think.

C585. If a child goes to a Hindu college or a Hindu university, or to a Muslim college or a Muslim university, does it not become tainted with communal ideas by reason of its isolation from the general community?—I do not think so. In the case of a child of that age the professors do not touch on these points. It is only instruction that is given. Until they begin to go into the world and think of these social distinctions, which come from going into the world, according to my experience, I have never found a child has touched on communal differences in his speech or in his conversation. (Mrs. P. K. Sen.) May I supplement that? We in fact passed a resolution at the All-India Conference, asking for the doing away of these communal institutions. The women are very much against these communal institutions—we do not want them.

Begum Shah Nawaz.

C586. Is it not the fact that the woman's movement is international in its outlook all over the world?—Yes.

C587. Is it not also a fact that in this matter we have the support of all parties?—That is so.

Dr. B. R. Ambedkar.

588. Is it to be inferred that these communal differences would very likely spread to the women if the women were to enter the professions?—(Mrs. L. Mukerji.) I do not think so. I think that woman by nature is free from such communal feelings on account of her sex.

C589. For instance, to-day the struggle or scramble for jobs and professional appointments is really confined to the men?—Yes.

C590. Largely, because women in India are not earning members of the family?—I quite see your point.

C591. Therefore, to take the case of education, if a large section of women along with men were entering that profession, and other professions as a result of education, on your own analysis, perhaps the thing would develop among women?—It is quite possible. I cannot answer that point until we see the result.

C592. I appreciate that, but I just wanted to put the point to you?—I feel in a future time, when our women will be in a position to go into the professions, that the communal business might die out altogether. I anticipate that.

Dr. B. R. Ambedkar.] I hope so.

Chairman.

C593. You think women have more common sense than men?—Yes, I honestly think so.

Begum Shah Nawaz.

C594. They are supposed to be "the better half"?—One of our poets, writing in the fourteenth and fifteenth century, said: "Women are born diplomats".

Chairman.

C595. Well, I must preserve complete impartiality on that?—Men have admitted that women are more intuitive, and if you are more intuitive, you act on your common sense. Men are more likely to base their arguments on facts, but women will go on their intuition and I think that all goes in with common sense.

Chairman.] The great advantage of acting on intuition is that you cannot be proved to be wrong.

29^o July, 1933.]

Mrs. P. K. SEN and Mrs. L. MUKERJI.

Mr. Cocks.

C596. I will not pursue that point, but does what you say as to the comparative immunity of women from communal differences apply to such questions as Untouchability?—Yes, so far women have accepted Untouchability as it is because you must understand that Untouchability sprang up from hygienic principles. The Untouchables usually led unhygienic lives and, therefore, we had to isolate them. We accepted it as a tradition, and, generally, because of hygienic principles, all these Untouchables were isolated. Their professions were rigid then, but, since they are not so much tied to their professions, the Untouchable idea will also die away, I think

Sir Hari Singh Gour.

C597. Untouchability is a heritage of law?—But there was the hygienic principle, too.

C598. As those laws have been relaxed, Untouchability is going?—Yes, but the chief idea was that, if a man had to deal with unhygienic things, we did not like to bring him into the home and let him touch anything. Often he would be dealing with refuse, and, naturally, even women when they have children and want them to be sanitary and clean did not like them to touch him. But it was on no other ground. It was based on purely hygienic principles. Now that we are having sanitation and all modern methods and ideas of cleanliness, we feel that this idea of Untouchability will die out. It was not due to any prejudice from the women's point of view that there were any restrictions in the matter of Untouchability.

Mr. Cocks.

C599. Would you say with regard to legislation affecting women and children that India is not so advanced as many other countries in the West?—I think so.

C600. Do you think that such legislation will not have much chance of being carried out unless there is a large body of women electors?—Certainly, because the men do not have time to think of these things—they are so full of administrative difficulties that with them come first, but to the women the social welfare of the community would be the first idea. In the case of men, so often the first idea is something quite different.

Sir Hari Singh Gour.

C601. May I explain to you what we have been doing this morning. This morning we have been examining Rajkumari Amrit Kaur and Mrs. Hamid Ali, and they entirely agree with you that communalising is the bane of nationalism and must go. They are not in favour of any communal electorates?—(Mrs. P. K. Sen.) Quite so.

C602. You agree with them so far?—Yes.

C603. I see from your memorandum that you differ from them on this point, namely, that you want the wife to have the husband's qualification and so can go on the roll?—Yes.

C604. They say we do not want the wife to have the qualification of the husband, but she should go on the electorate roll on the strength of her own qualification?—Yes.

C605. That is one point on which you differ?—Yes.

C606. That is the only one on which you have any real difference with them, otherwise you entirely agree with them?—Yes.

C607. That is a point of detail?—Yes.

C608. What you really want is a larger vote for women. It does not matter how it is got—that is the only question between you on that?—Yes.

C609. And they also want a larger vote for women. It does not matter how it comes, though they have a prejudice against the wife getting a vote upon her husband's qualification?—(Mrs. Sen.) That is quite right, but as I have already said, we have also got a disinclination to leaving out the rural areas.

Dr. B. R. Ambedkar.

C610. There is just one question I would like to ask you, Mrs. Sen. You have explained your views with regard to the representation of women in the Federal Lower House, and you have stated your objection to the provision made in the White Paper for indirect election?—Yes.

C611. I do not find anywhere your views as to the provisions made for the representation of women in the Provincial Legislatures, except, of course, that you have expressed generally that you would not like any provision which savours of communalism?—Yes.

C612. Have you anything to suggest on that?—I did not quite follow the question.

C613. In the Provincial Legislatures several seats are provided which are to be filled by women?—Yes.

C614. No detailed provisions are laid down in the White Paper as to how those seats are to be filled. It is Appendix III, of the White Paper, on page 93. Under

29^o July, 1933.]

Mrs. P. K. SEN and Mrs. L. MUKERJI.

"General," Madras, out of 152, 6 women; Muhammadan, 29, including one woman. This is all the provision that exists in the White Paper, so far?—We would like to do away with all these communal reservations. If you would give us six seats in each of the Provinces, that would be much better, and we should be able to fill these seats with the best women available.

C615. Have you any other method by which these six seats could be filled up?—Yes; capital city, for the Federal Assembly. I have already answered that question. It would be the same for the Provincial Assembly also. The capital city and other principalities would be the constituent areas of the Province, it would be a small electorate. It would not mean so much expense, and women from all over the Provinces would be able to stand for the seats.

C616. You would have one capital city to return six women in Madras?—No. They would have their separate constituencies for different principalities of the Province.

C617. The question I wanted to ask was how far you agree? Would you be prepared, as a matter of concession to the communal sentiment of the various communities, that while making arrangements on the basis of a joint electorate for the return of such women in the Legislative Councils, to have a permission reserving a certain number of seats, for instance, for the Muslim women, keeping the total the same?—We are against communal reservation.

C618. I can quite understand your objection to having a separate electorate of Hindu women to return five Hindu women and a separate electorate of Muslim women to return one Muslim woman. What I want to know is this: Whether you have also the same objection to a system in which both the Hindu women and the Muslim women would vote together in a common constituency—a joint constituency, with this reservation, that, at least, one seat would be reserved for a Muslim woman?—They would all vote for the Muhammadan lady.

C619. I know that you would probably be so generous that you may give more. Would you be prepared to approve a reservation being made by law that just one should be reserved for a Muslim woman?—Yes; that is already there, and we have to accept that.

C620. That may be on the basis of separate electorate, it is not stated how it would be. Therefore, I wanted to get your opinion on the matter. The detailed provisions as to how these six seats in Madras are to be filled are not found in the White Paper?—That should be a joint electorate of men and women?

C621. I do not know. At least Mr. Butler might be able to enlighten us as to how these six seats are going to be filled?—(Mrs. Mukerji.) We do not, if it can be avoided, want any communal distinction.

Dr. B. R. Ambedkar.] I quite follow you. I am asking you whether you would be prepared to moderate your objection, to this extent, that you would have a joint electorate with one seat reserved, so as not to disturb the communal balance.

Mr. Butler.] I think that Dr. Ambedkar will find this at page 91, paragraph 8: "The precise electoral machinery to be employed in the constituencies for the special women's seats is still under consideration."

Dr. B. R. Ambedkar.] Therefore, I was asking whether these seats would be filled by separate electorates of women in the general constituency; it is not made clear here. I do not know how it is done, because I find in the Table given on page 93, seats allocated under separate heads. Under "General," six women's seats, under "Muhammadan," one; that rather gives me the impression that you would have a separate electorate of Muslim women only, so that the result would be that 28 would be men, and one a woman. I do not know; I seek for information upon the point.

Chairman.

C622. I think we had better use this afternoon in getting information out of the Witnesses. Will you return to the point?—(Mrs. Sen.) It would not be at least a separate women's electorate.

Dr. B. R. Ambedkar.

C623. If left to you, you might give them all the six, or more than that?—Quite.

C624. I mean, in view of the fear that there may be none?—Yes.

Mr. M. R. Jayaker.

C625. Do I take it, Mrs. Sen, that your objection is to a communal reservation of women's seats on the basis of communalism, as also to a communal electorate? Is that so?—Yes.

C626. And that, even if the election was made by a joint electorate of Hindu

29^o July, 1933.]

Mrs. P. K. SEN and Mrs. L. MUKERJI.

men and women and Muslim men and women, your objection would be the same, if the reservation was in favour of a Muhammadan woman on the basis of her caste?—Yes, we do not want it

C627. Even if the electorate were joint between the two communities?—No, not if it were joint.

C628. If the electorate was joint, would you agree to the reservation of one or more seats for a Muhammadan woman?—Yes, we would agree to that.

C629. I am asking you, because in the morning evidence was given and the Witnesses expressed their view to be very strongly both against communal reservation seats and communal electorates. Therefore, may I take it, that your view on that point is different from their view?—It is not different from their view. We have all along said that we do not want any communalism. Of course, if it is thrust upon us, we shall have to do it.

C630. I am asking your opinion, and I am putting a specific question. Supposing the election was by a joint electorate of men and women, Hindu and Muslim, but there was to be one or more seats reserved for a Muhammadan woman, what would be your view?—I would have no objection then, because we would have no other way, I think.

Sir Hari Singh Gour.

C631. She says she has no objection, in the circumstances; not that she has not an objection in principle?—Of course, everything is under the circumstances.

Mr. M. R. Jayaker.

C632. Then I find that in your Memorandum, paragraph 9, you approve of the wives' vote?—Yes.

C633. May I know if your opinion is shared by a large number of women from the Province which you represent?—Yes, a very large number.

C634. What would be the opinion of those women whose only chance of coming into the electorate would be through the wives' vote? Would it be in favour, or against, this method?—In favour, of course.

C635. Is the charge just and true that those who are at the present moment opposed to this method are mostly women who already will come in by some other door, either the education qualification or the property qualification? Is that charge true?—Yes, quite true; they would all be coming in under the literacy qualification.

C636. Therefore, it is the opinion of women who are already enfranchised?—Yes.

C637. Have we the opinion of women who would not be enfranchised, except through the wives' vote? Has any such opinion been ascertained by some tangible method?—Yes. We have had experience in the rural districts, and they would be quite prepared to accept that.

C638. Then you go on in that paragraph to say that you want some method which would bring up the voting strength to the requisite number. I take it you mean by the requisite number, the number proposed by the Lothian Committee?—Yes; that is quite the minimum.

C639. That is 1 to 4?—That is 1 to 4.

C640. Do you think that is the minimum?—That is the minimum.

C641. Supposing if it was something less than that, 1 to 8, or 1 to 9, do you think there would be considerable uproar and dissatisfaction among the women of India?—I am quite certain of that, and it would be of no use, because women will not go to the poll, if they are very few in number.

C642. Do you think that the dissatisfaction would be so extensive and marked that it might lead to a suffragette movement in India?—Quite possibly, although we are quite moderate in our views, and, as you find, our demands are quite moderate; but if it is less than the Lothian Committee has recommended, I am sure there will be a very great uproar against it.

C643. Do you think that the political sense and the keenness for the vote amongst women is so great at the present moment that it may lead to a movement of that character?—Yes, quite possibly.

C644. Now some difficulty has been put before those who are considering this question in this country, arising out of the Hindu custom that in the presence of elders in a Hindu family the woman does not ever mention the name of her husband or the husband does not mention the name of the wife. You are aware of such a thing in orthodox Hindu families?—Yes. The wife does not mention the husband's name. The husband does.

C645. We will take it that the wife does not mention the husband's name. Am I right in saying that it is purely a question of social etiquette?—Yes; and it is dying out now. At the present time we find our daughters and daughters-in-law mentioning their husbands' names. (Mrs. Mukerji.) But not amongst the masses.

29^o July, 1933.]

Mrs. P. K. SEN and Mrs. L. MUKERJI.

C646. But do you think that that presents any difficulty in the machinery about the wives' vote?—(Mrs Sen) I do not think so.

C647. You think it is over-estimated?—Yes, it is over-estimated; I have found that C648. Then I ask the last question about applications. Supposing the necessity of applications was insisted upon, you said there would be a very large reduction in the number. Can you give us some idea what the reduction would be? Supposing it were 4,000,000 women who were asked to vote and the further necessity was that they should apply a year in advance, how many do you think would drop out?—I do not think that even 1,000,000 would apply.

C649. It would be safe to say that about three-quarters would drop out?—Yes.

Marquess of Lothian.

C650. You said before, 1 in 10?—I did say 1 in 10 before, yes.

Sir Hari Singh Gour.

C651. It is only a guess, but she says it will be a very small number?—Very small; it would be almost infinitesimal. (Mrs. Mukerji.) The difficulty of mentioning the husband's name may be overcome by the woman writing or getting someone else to speak for her, because I think in many cases a woman will not be able to mention her husband's name.

Mr. M. R. Jayaker.

C652. But you are aware that, in the Law Courts, when a wife is a Witness she has to mention her husband's name, and often does it?—Yes.

C653. So I take it that this practice, assuming it was at one time prevalent, has actually disappeared now?—Yes. (Mrs. Mukerji.) That overcomes the difficulty, if you think they will do it, as they do it in the Law Courts. (Mrs. Sen.) It is dying out now; there is no doubt about it.

C654. How many Hindu women, taking your experience in your own Province, will experience that difficulty now, in modern times?—I think two out of ten would not mention the name of the husband.

Sir Hari Singh Gour.

C655. But those will get a neighbour to mention the name?—Yes, they will get somebody else.

Marquess of Lothian

C656. How many husbands will mention the wives' names?—They are all allowed to.

Dr. B. R. Ambedkar.] That is the point, whether the husband will mention the name of the wife I think 10 out of 10 would.

Begum Shah Nawaz.

C657. Mrs. Sen, could you tell me whether the membership of the organisation which you are representing here to-day is confined only to one community, or whether you have members belonging to all the communities in Bengal?—(Mrs. Sen.) To all communities. The original Memorandum was signed by all communities; I do not know whether it is before you, or not?

Chairman.

C658. Has that been handed in?—Yes, I sent it in, the original copy which was submitted to the Indian Franchise Committee, and it has been signed by all communities.

Begum Shah Nawaz.

C659. You are one of the original members of the All-India Women's Conference. Is that not so?—Yes, I am.

C660. You were the Treasurer of the Standing Committee at one time, and you were Chairman of the Standing Committee also?—Yes, I did.

C661. You are still a member of the All-India Women's Conference?—I cannot say that I am a member of the All-India Women's Conference, because I did not attend the last two Conferences, and I was not elected on the Standing Committee for that reason.

C662. Is it true, or is not, that you have not been able to attend any meeting of the All-India Women's Conference for the last two and a half years, whether a half-yearly or the annual Session?—Yes.

C663. Therefore, would it not be true to say that you have not been in touch with the opinion of the majority within that organisation?—I cannot say that, because I was getting the papers all right, up to last December. I was Vice-President up to last December, and I was getting all the information. In fact, I was taking part in all the business.

C664. Would I be wrong in saying that almost all the constituencies of the All-India Women's Conference have decided against the wife's vote?—It might be so on paper, but, of course, the constituency does not mean a very large number of women from each Province.

29° July, 1933.]

Mrs. P. K. SEN and Mrs. L. MUKERJI.

C665. Is it not the fact that there are sub-Committees of the All-India Women's Conference working in almost all the district towns, that delegates are elected who go and take part in these sub-Provincial or Provincial Conferences and then Delegates are elected who go and take part in the annual Session which is held in every year in one Province or another?—Yes, that is so, in theory, but I cannot say that it is done in all the Provinces. With regard to Bengal, it was purely from Calcutta; they got ten members to be Delegates; none from the districts, even from East Bengal, which is a very large constituency. East Bengal has not been represented at all.

C666. But have you only one constituency working in the whole of Bengal of the All-India Women's Conference?—There are supposed to be three existing constituencies, but, in fact, only one is working.

C667. It is not so in my Province, but I shall not press the point any further. I suppose you are aware of the objections which the women in these organisations are putting forward against the wife's vote? One of the objections is this: That it is the quality of the vote that matters to them, far more than anything else?—Yes, we are aware of that.

C668. That they want the vote to be such as would raise their status in life, and getting the vote through their husbands would not help them to raise that status?—Yes. We have balanced both their and our proposals, and we find that it would cause very great injustice to leave out the rural women. That is one reason for supporting the wife's vote—one of the main reasons.

Mr. M. R. Jayaker.

C669. Can I say that you regard this merely as a question of sentiment, that their status when based on their husbands' property would be lowered?—Yes, I think so, to a certain extent.

Begum Shah Nawaz.

C670. There is one other objection, Mrs. Sen, that the majority of these women feel that if the wife was not given the vote just because she happens to be the wife of the voter, then some of the women in some of the other communities where they are inheriting property would come on to the electoral rolls, and, as you and I are both aware, most of these communities are vying with each other in voting strength; this would mean that the women who at present are not enjoying their rights of inheritance in other communities, could get those laws altered if that vote is not given to them just because they happen to be the wife of the voter?—I do not think there is anything in that. I think that if we have adequate representation in the Legislatures the women themselves would be the best persons to alter the laws. Some of the social reformers like Mr. Jayaker and Sir Hari Sing Gour have tried their best to reform the Hindu law, but there are many obstacles in the way. It is not likely that because women will be on the rolls on their husbands' property qualification the reform of the law of inheritance will take long in coming. On the contrary, I think it is more likely that if the women were there these laws would be easily changed.

C671. Would not the orthodox members be compelled to give the women their rights of inheritance if their getting the vote depended on their having a property qualification?—I do not think so.

C672. Supposing that the Joint Parliamentary Committee could find a feasible qualification which would give the woman the vote in her own right, you would have no objection to that qualification being accepted?—No, certainly not, if some other method could be found which is better than the wife's vote we would have no objection.

C673. Am I right in concluding from your evidence that you accept the property and literacy qualifications recommended by the Lothian Committee, and you are also prepared to accept the wife's vote for this transitional period, as one would call it?—Yes, that is so.

C674. And it is your demand that the minimum number of women voters that would be acceptable to almost everyone in the whole of India is that recommended by the Lothian Committee both for the Provincial and Central Legislatures?—Yes, that is so, except that we have proposed a little more in the Federal Legislature than the Lothian Committee has proposed. If it is impossible we should have to fall back on what the Lothian Committee has recommended. Any number which is less than 6,200,000 for the Provincial Legislature would be quite unacceptable.

C675. You are aware, Mrs. Sen, that we have many women's organisations in my country, some of them working in Provinces alone, others are All-India Associations like the All-India Women's Conference?—Yes, I am aware of that.

C676. It is a fact, is it not, that none of these organisations have sent any representative over here to give evidence before the Joint Parliamentary Committee?—Yes.

C677. None of these other organisations, I mean?—No, they have not.

C678. May I know why, when it was decided by the three All-India Women's organisations to send certain elected representatives, your organisation, which happens to be more or less confined to one province only, decided to send a representative to give evidence here?—While I am representing Bengal, I am submitting the other two memoranda which represent the views of a large number of women from Madras; they also agree with us, and then I can speak from personal knowledge of Bihar, because I have worked quite a great deal in Bihar. The women in Bihar would be quite agreeable to accepting the wife's votes.

C679. Is it because you feel that the wife's vote perhaps is the only feasible qualification at present by which you can get a large number of women voters, that you decided to send a representative here?—Yes, that is so.

C680. You would agree with me, would you not, that if there are to be reserved seats for women they should be given to them in all the Provincial Assemblies as well as in the Central Legislatures?—Yes, certainly they should be.

C681. There should also be reserved seats in the Upper Chamber, as you said just now?—Yes, I have said that.

C682. You are against indirect election to the Legislative Assembly, that is to say, the Lower House, are you not?—Yes, I am against that.

C683. One of your objections to that indirect election would be this, would it not, that if it is left in the hands of the members of the Provincial Councils it would mean that women belonging to the majority party only will get elected to the Federal Assembly who, in many cases, cannot be your and my real representatives?—Yes, that is quite so. They would not be the women's women, which is what we want really.

Marquess of Lothian.

C684. I have only two questions, I think. I think, Mrs. Sen, you hold the view, that the administrative difficulty of ascertaining the wife's name is not as great as has been suggested in evidence?—Yes.

C685. And that, by one means or other, the wife's name could be obtained?—Yes.

C686. What amount of difficulty do you think there would be in actually polling women? Will they require women officers in the polling booth and separate entrances, or do you think that will not be the case?—Separate entrances would be necessary, I think, in the beginning, and perhaps one woman to help. That would be quite enough.

C687. You do not think, from your experience, that the actual business of polling women voters who want to come and record their votes will create great difficulty? You do not think the fiscal problem of polling the women voters, if they are not more than, say, one in five, will be a very formidable problem?—I do not think it will be. As matters are progressing at the present moment, I do not think there will be any difficulty in the polling.

C688. Have you had any experience?—I personally have not had, but Mrs. Mukerji attended a polling booth, and perhaps, if you wanted to know, she could add to my answer. (Mrs. Mukerji.) We had a municipal election at Calcutta some years ago, and it was organised by women, and I think it was very successful, and we got more women than we anticipated to come there, and even purdah women. There was a larger number of purdah women than we expected.

C689. Did you make any special arrangements in that respect?—They had purdah arrangements for the purdah women to come.

C690. Were the polling booths manned by women polling officers?—Yes, they were manned mostly by women.

Dr. B. R. Ambedkar.

C691. Was there a woman candidate in the election which you canvassed?—Not at that time, but later on there have been.

Marquess of Lothian.

C692. Only one other question, Mrs. Sen. You said earlier on that under the proposals of the White Paper, if I understood you correctly, a large number of women who had been most actively engaged in social work and political propaganda would be disenfranchised. Did I understand you correctly?—(Mrs. Sen.) How?

C693. I understood you to say under the proposals of the White Paper a large number of women who are to-day in the forefront of the women's movement and social reform would not, in practice, find their way on to the electoral roll?—Yes, if a high educational test was applied.

Marquess of Lothian.] The White Paper proposal.

Sir Hari Singh Gour.

C694. If the educational test for women is the same as for men?—Yes, that is true.

Marquess of Lothian.

C695. You think that the difficulty would be removed by the literacy qualification. That would, in practice, bring all the women who are actively engaged in social and public work on to the roll?—Yes, most of them

Miss Pickford.

C696. A suggestion has been put forward for enfranchising the pensioned widows of soldiers who were killed in the War, and also the wives of men who will be voters under the Military qualifications, that is men who have served in the Forces. Has that suggestion been brought to your notice, and, if so, would you like to make any observation on it?—Yes, it has been brought to my notice, but it would hardly apply to the Indian women at all.

C697. There would be very few in Bengal?—There are very few in Bengal, and also in the other Provinces

C698. Really you have not considered it very much?—No; we have not considered it very much, because we did not think it would serve any useful purpose.

C699. But you do not see any objection to it in principle?—No, not in principle, but if it does not enfranchise quite a number of women we do not see the use of it at all.

Chairman.

C700. Just one question: In the rural areas of Bengal which you know best do the women go to the market town?—(Mrs. Mukerji.) Yes.

C701. Does that constitute an occasion which has been used or might be used in order to prosecute political activity amongst women?—I think that might, yes, on a market day you would get the women. Nearly all the women do attend the markets in the villages, and that would be a good idea.

C702. Has there, in fact, been any political activity amongst women of the rural classes in Bengal in the rural areas?—Yes, there has been some. (Mrs. Sen.) Yes, quite a lot (Mrs. Mukerji.) In the vernacular paper they seem to be in touch with all the political movements, sometimes even more than the town women you find in some places.

Chairman.] Thank you. We are very greatly obliged to you ladies for helping us this afternoon.

SUB-COMMITTEE D.

DIE LUNAE, 16° OCTOBRIS, 1933.

Present:

Lord Hutchison of Montrose.
Major Attlee.
Mr. Butler.

Sir Reginald Craddock.
Mr. Davidson.

The following Indian Delegates were also present:

Dr. B. R. Ambedkar.
Sir Hari Singh Gour.

Dr. Shafa'at Ahmad Khan.

Lord EUSTACE PERCY in the Chair.

Wing-Commander A. W. H. JAMES, M.C., M.P., and Dr J. H. HUTTON, C.I.E., I.C.S., are examined as follows:

Lord Eustace Percy.

D1. Wing-Commander James, you were commanding No. 60 Squadron of the R.A.F. in the North West Frontier Province from 1923 to 1925?—(Wing-Commander James.) That is correct.

D2. You spent three months among the Gonds and Marias in South Chanda and Ahiri Zemindari, and the Sholegas of the Billigirirangans, 1924; two months in the Central Provinces Jungles in 1925; and five months among Bhils of Satpuras, and Sholegas in 1926-27?—Yes.

D3. Dr. Hutton, I have your record of service before me. You served in East Bengal and Assam as Assistant Magistrate and Collector from 1909, Assistant Commissioner from 1912, and Deputy-Commissioner from 1920. Your whole service was in Assam, was it?—(Dr. Hutton.) I have been in the Census Service of the Government of India for four years.

D4. You were Census Commissioner from 1929?—Yes.

(Memoranda Nos. 85 and 86 were handed in and are as follows):

MEMORANDUM 85 BY WING COMMANDER A. W. H. JAMES, M.P., ON THE FUTURE ADMINISTRATION OF THE "RESERVED" AND "EXCLUDED" AREAS.

(General Submission.)

1. That paragraphs 106 to 109 of the White Paper proposals, relating to "Excluded Areas" and to "Partially Excluded Areas," are in need of consideration and definition before the framing of the Constitution Bill.

A study of the M/C Report, the Reports of the Statutory Committee, of the proceedings of the Round Table Conferences, and of the Franchise Committee Report, shows that the problem of the future treatment of the Tracts inhabited by Primitive Tribes has throughout been left vague.* And of necessity so. Only with the assistance of experts in local knowledge—and they could not, in some cases, be readily found—could the demarkation of Tribal areas be settled, let alone their administrative future be considered; dependent as this must be in no small degree upon the extent of this demarkation.

(The Situation to be met.)

2. The Primitive Tribes, numbering in British India between five and six million people,* are scattered throughout India, usually inhabiting forest areas.† They range from tribes numbering hundreds of thousands, like the Gonds, to tribes numbering a few hundreds, or less, like the Sholegas. They are backward, often excitable.‡ They are

*In Part II, paragraph 167 S.R., the estimated population of the Backward Tracts of British India is given as 13 millions. In the proceedings of the 3rd R.T.C., p. 188, an estimate of 12 millions is given.

†In paragraph 56, p. 29, of the White Paper proposals, Revenues from Forests are, without qualification, allotted to Provinces.

‡There are many more instances of Tribal instability than those commonly quoted, e.g., in 1918 there was a rising in Surguga Feudatory State, Bisalpur, owing to "squeeze" by traders, many banias being killed.

16^o October, 1933.]

distinct from the depressed classes,* and outside the Hindu or Mohamedan religions. Many elements from the Primitive Tribes have settled among neighbouring races, and, becoming cultivators or labourers, have tended to become merged into the depressed classes. It is to the majority, who live as more or less homogeneous blocs, and follow tribal customs and religions, that the attention of the Committee is directed. These people have had special protection in the past, and need it still.

Proposals Submitted.

1.—(a) That areas in which a majority of the inhabitants are aboriginals, and which are of sufficient size to form either by themselves, or in conjunction with adjacent areas, convenient administrative units, be wholly excluded from the Constitutional Reforms.

(b) That these areas be designated "Primitive Forest Areas," and be administered through a Chief Commissioner, acting under the Governor-General.†

(c) That for their efficient and economical administration a "Forestal Administrative Service"‡ be established, to be 75 per cent. European, 25 per cent. Indian (when the latter can be found).§ Recruitment to this service

*In appendix VIII, p. 123, the White Paper, no aboriginal tribes are named.

†The combined administrative functions proposed are not without precedents in addition to some mentioned in the S.R., e.g.,

(a) The Dangs. Where for many years the D.F.O. has wholly administered the district, directly under the Collector of Surat.

(b) Burma, where forest officers have magisterial powers in respect of forest offences.

(c) Assam, Mr. Bor, I.F.S., is also political officer, Balipara Frontier Tract.

‡It is submitted that it will be in the interests of the new Provincial Legislatures not to be burdened with such problems, entirely outside the ken of their members, as the tribal areas present. The nominated members, sometimes suggested, to represent the aboriginal interest, will also be avoided.

§In introductory paragraph 70 (iii) of the White Paper proposals, it is laid down that All-India recruitment for the Indian Forest Service should cease. Unless, therefore, some alternative scheme of recruitment is now adopted, the time will come when no European Officers will be available to look after the Primitive Tribes.

to be both direct, and by secondment and/or transfer from the existing Forest Service, Political Service, Army, or other services.*

(1) See S.R. paragraph 128, end (quoted in appendix p. 5).

(2) In view of the fact that the resident administrators proposed would be able, by acting largely through the existing patriarchal Tribal Machinery, to combine a number of executive functions—Forest work, Revenue, Judicial, Police, etc.—in simplified form, it is submitted that this proposal, which at first sight suggests expense, would in practice prove the most economical and suitable administrative machinery that could be devised.

(3) It is asserted by Forest Officers particularly interested in the Tribes that only a few Indians are as yet to be found in the Forest Service with the peculiar interests and qualifications needed for this task. (See S.R. Part II, paragraph 306 end quoted appendix p. 5.)

2. That where there are enclaves of predominantly aboriginal inhabitants, of insufficient size, or too isolated, to form economical administrative units, these be treated as partially excluded areas, to be a Governor's special responsibility, and to be administered by officers of the Forestal Administrative Service, seconded for the purpose in the Provincial Government concerned.

APPENDIX.

EXTRACTS FROM DOCUMENTS.

Simon Report, Vol. I.

Para. 75. Madras Agency Area.— . . . These tribes follow their own animistic and tribal faiths. Their country has hitherto remained entirely undeveloped. While not aggressive, they are excitable and easily stirred to resentment against

* In order to secure the service of officers with a bent for the work; as in the case with the Political Service, N.W.F.P.

*Many of the Tribal areas, notably the Madras Agency Area, are extremely unhealthy, reeking with malaria and blackwater fever. In many the climate is very bad. Unless, therefore, an All-India basis is retained, it is difficult to see how officers could spend a reasonable proportion of their service in healthy localities.

economic oppression or unsuitable administrative measures. The last of the local rebellions in this area occurred as late as 1922 and was only suppressed two years later with the help of a strong detachment of the Assam Rifles.

The Laccadive Islands and Minicoy, which are inhabited by primitive peoples living in a patriarchal stage of civilisation, and also administered by the Governor in Council of Madras as a "backward Tract" in accordance with simple and elastic regulations.

S.R., para. 80. Backward Tracts of Bengal.— . . . Part of the Darjeeling district lies in the plains with a population mainly Bengali; the remainder is in the Himalayas, rising at one corner to 12,000 feet, and contains numerous hill-tribes with religion, customs, and language quite distinct from the rest of Bengal.

The Chittagong Hill Tracts . . . the population is about 170,000, and the people are as primitive as their agricultural methods.

S.R., para. 86. The Punjab, Backward Tracts.— . . . The Himalayan valleys of Lahaul and Spiti. . . . They present no administrative problems and their local affairs are satisfactorily transacted under a patriarchal dispensation. To preserve this simple form of administration these areas have been notified as "backward Tracts" and excluded from the Reforms.

S.R., para. 88. Excluded Areas of Bihar and Orissa.— . . . Owing to their large aboriginal population the five districts of Chota, Nagpur, together with the districts known as the Santal Parganas and Sambalpur, are partially excluded from the Reforms, and the district of Angul is wholly outside them. These backward races are commonly supposed to be remnants of pre-Aryan autochthonous peoples into whose strongholds in the hills and forests the invader found it difficult and unprofitable to penetrate. Some of them live by hunting, and by a type of shifting cultivation which we have described in writing of the backward tract of Chittagong in Bengal. In the valleys, the tribes have with great labour terraced isolated fields, producing abundant crops, but at no time before the establishment of British rule were these plots coveted by the plainsman, for he could not have collected his rents from the occupiers. But the moneylender and the trader took advantage of the new reign of law and order to reduce the aboriginal owners to practical serfdom. We must refer for further details to the Memorandum on backward tracts prepared for us by the Bihar and Orissa Government. The need for special provision and special protection is brought out in the following extract.—

"They cannot compete against the subtler minds of the Aryan races that have in the past two or three centuries slowly penetrated into the country; their improvidence lays them open to the wiles of the moneylender; their lack of education and their distinctive language places them at a great disadvantage in the courts. When roused to action by real or fancied grievances their tribal organisation, where it survives, and elsewhere the solidarity of kinship makes for a rapid spread of disaffection, while their childlike outlook makes the duty of restoring order a peculiarly distasteful one."

The most notable of such outbreaks in this province was the Santal rebellion of 1855. The application of the ordinary laws of Bengal had resulted in the aboriginals losing their lands to their creditors. The Santals organised a large body to march to Calcutta to present their grievances; their advance was marked by looting and violence, and a large punitive force was required to restore order. After the rebellion, the district was excluded from the operation of the general regulations, and received its own agrarian law and a distinct judicial system. These measures have not sufficed entirely to stop the penetration of the intruder, and in that part of the district which adjoins Bengal there is a considerable settlement of Bengalis who press for the removal of the barriers which have been set up to prevent the exploitation of the aboriginals.

The district of Angul, which contains an aboriginal population of 74 per cent., lies in the midst of the Orissa States. The district came later into British hands, and from the first has received a distinctive system of administration.

The problem presented by the aboriginals of the Chota Nagpur plateau, which formed part of the inaccessible forest tract which the Aryan invaders called the "Jarkhand" is essentially similar. These primitive tribes amount to 58 per cent. of the population, and they nurse a resentment against the Hindu immigrants who, as they consider, have robbed them of their ancestral lands. Unrest, usually arising from agrarian causes, but often assuming a religious complexion, is still endemic. It has occasionally led to the employment of regular troops. . . . The present position would seem to be that the protective measures taken, though by no means adequate in the eyes of many of those who know the aboriginal best, have given him a breathing space, and stemmed the tide of exploitation, but the constructive work of so educating him as to enable him to stand on his own feet has scarcely begun. He remains credulous and excitable, and almost as much as ever is need of special protection.

16° October, 1933.]

S.R., para. 91. Excluded Areas of the Central Provinces.—If the feudatory States be omitted, one-fifth of the Central Provinces is Government reserved forest. Leaving out both the feudatory States and Berar, one-quarter of the remaining territory—consisting of those parts which are coloured purple in the map at the end of the volume—is not subject to the reforms. In these “excluded areas” the Schedules Districts Act reserves to the executive the sole power of deciding what Laws shall be applied, but they are not “backward tracts” in the constitutional sense.

S.R., para. 94. Backward Tracts of Assam.—The backward tracts of Assam are of great importance and extent, and nowhere in India is the contrast between the life and outlook of these wild hill-men and the totally distinct civilisation of the plains more manifest. . . . No description can convey to the reader the striking impression provided by these gatherings, or the difficulty of fitting the needs and interests of such people into a constitutional scheme.

. . . the best judges doubt how far the recent quiescence of the hill-tribes—for the last expedition against them was in 1918—is due to contentment. If progress is to benefit, and not to destroy, these people, it must come about gradually, and the adjustment of their needs with the interests of the immigrant will provide a problem of great perplexity and importance for many generations to come.

The great majority of the hill tribes are far from forgetting their warlike past, with its long record of raids upon the plains. Many of them probably regard the Pax Britannica as a passing inconvenience. The confidence of the plainsman widened by the continual immigration and the breaking up of virgin soil is equally a recent feature.

S.R., para. 99. Excluded Areas of Burma.— . . . the backward tracts of Burma are of great extent. . . . The largest and most homogeneous of the administered tracts is that known as the Shan States. Though so described, the Shan “States” are a part of British India, but administered by hereditary chiefs or Sawbwas, to whom in varying degree large criminal, civil, and revenue powers over the population of their areas have been assigned. . . . The need of special qualifications and of long experience in the administration of the backward tracts has been recognised by the recent constitution of a separate Burma Frontier service which now contains some 50 members. The Commission met a number of the principal Sawbwas from the Shan States, and they appeared to be very well contented with their present system of administration. The dictum of the Burma Government on the Chin and Kachin Hill Tracts applies, we consider, to all the administered excluded tracts of Burma:—

“These . . . areas are all unfitted to participate in a constitution on representative lines suitable for Burma proper. Their people are educationally backward, and have evinced no desire to be linked with the Burmans, who in turn betray little interest in the hill tracts.”

So far as our short experience of Burma goes we confidently affirm the truth of these remarks.

Simon Report, Vol. I, Part II.—The Existing Constitutional Structure, Para. 172. Varying Degrees of Modified Exclusion.— . . . All the backward tracts which are not wholly excluded (except Darjeeling and Lahaul) are represented in the legislatures of their provinces, but it is impossible to regard their representation as really effective in most cases. In Bihar and Orissa the aboriginal preponderance in the population of the tracts is reproduced in the electorate in only three constituencies out of nine. In two of these three, members really representative of the aboriginals have been returned at all three general elections. The other seven are represented at present by members of the very classes whom the aboriginals regard as most hostile to them. Two seats are also reserved for the representation of the aboriginals by nomination in the Bihar and Orissa Council. In Madras qualified residents of the Agency Tracts vote in the constituencies formed out of the three districts in which the tracts are included The backward tracts of the Presidency are also represented by a nominated member. The whole of the Assam backward tracts (covering 50,000 square miles and occupied by half a million hill tribesmen) are represented in the Provincial legislature by a single nominated member, who for a considerable period was a Welsh Missionary.

S.R., para. 306. Forest Administration.—Something must be said of the work of the Forest Service. In some provinces, the forests yield an important revenue to Government, in Burma nearly 20 per cent. of the total provincial revenues. But apart from this they constitute a valuable economic asset to the community. It is an asset which could easily be frittered away and the pressure for a shortsighted exploitation of forest resources is strong. If the best use is to be made of them, long views must be taken.

It is not enough that Government should have a right policy in the matter; expert knowledge, professional enthusiasm and firmness in administration are essential in the controlling staff. From the nature of the work, defects in forest administration may not show their full effect for many years. The maintenance of the present standards of administration is, therefore, of great importance. The heads of the Forest Departments in their evidence stressed the need for the maintenance of the European element in the Service and we were the more impressed by their view because the life of a forest officer, which has many attractions for the young Englishman, makes less appeal to the educated Indian than a career in any other service.

Simon Report, Vol. II.—Recommendations. Para. 24.—Federation in British India.— . . . It would be a very superficial view of the Indian constitutional problem to imagine that areas like these ("Backward Tracts") fall readily into place within the prescription of some simple formula of universal application. The political institutions suitable for other parts of British India could not be effectively worked in them; yet they must have their place in the general structure. It is not reasonable or, indeed, possible to apply the same hard and fast constitution to every part of India, and to attempt to do so would necessarily retard political progress.

S.R., para. 128. The Backward Tracts.—The question now arises what arrangements should be made for the backward tracts in connection with the constitutional changes that we are proposing.

. . . But apart from these, or some of these, we have no doubt that these are other tracts which must be excluded from the general constitutional arrangements, and that special provision must be made for their administration. We would suggest, however, that they should in future be known not as "backward tracts" but as "excluded areas." The stage of development reached by the inhabitants of these areas prevents the possibility of applying to them methods of representation adopted elsewhere. They do not ask for self-determination, but for security of land tenure, freedom in the pursuit of their traditional methods of livelihood, and the reasonable exercise of their ancestral customs. Their contentment does not depend so much on rapid political advance as on experienced and sympathetic handling, and on protection from economic subjugation by their neighbours.

Para. 129.—The responsibility of Parliament for the backward Tracts will not be discharged merely by securing to them protection from exploitation and by preventing those outbreaks which have from time to time occurred within their borders. The principal duty of the administration is to educate these people to stand on their own feet, and this is a process which has scarcely begun. It is too large a task to be left to the single-handed efforts of missionary societies or of individual officials. Co-ordination of activity and adequate funds are principally required. The typical backward tract is a deficit area, and no provincial legislature is likely to possess either the will or the means to devote special attention to its particular requirements. Expenditure in the tracts does not benefit the areas from which elected representatives are returned. Moreover, the most extensive tracts (if Burma be left out of account) fall within the poorest provinces.

Only if responsibility for the backward tracts is entrusted to the Centre, does it appear likely that it will be adequately discharged.

Report of the Indian Franchise Committee.

Para. 339. Aboriginal and Hill Tribes.—The aboriginal population of British India is over 5 millions. . . . Our proposals for the extension of the general franchise will bring only a negligible number on the electoral rolls. It is, in our opinion, of the greatest importance that the interests of these people, who live a life entirely apart from the rest of the population of India, should be protected by effective representation in the councils, or, if this is not possible, by some other arrangement in the new constitution.

I.F.C., para. 340.—. . . The Government of the Central Provinces pointed out that the aboriginal tribes in the provinces are an extremely backward community and cannot expect to obtain any representation at all through the general constituencies. . . .

I.F.C., para. 343.—We have been unable in the time at our disposal to make any adequate investigation of this subject, and cannot therefore put forward any definite proposals. The matter should be further examined in detail by the Local Governments concerned and brought up at a later stage when the time comes for the delimitation of constituencies.

Brief note by a majority of the Committee on the minute of dissent submitted by Messrs. S. B. Tambe, C. Y. Chintamani and R. R. Baekhale.

Aboriginal and Hill Tribes.

13. We feel very strongly the necessity of providing adequately for the representation of tribal races and others, who have suffered so severely in the past from the ignorance of Administrators and Legislators as to their special customs and conditions. We have come to no final conclusion as to the method of representation which should be adopted, but must repeat our recommendation, that the matter should be examined in detail at a later stage during the delimitation of constituencies. We are not prepared to leave the aboriginal tribes to take their chance in general constituencies, as our colleagues apparently suggest.

Indian Round Table Conference (Third Session).

Para. 16.—As regards the "special responsibilities" of the Governors these should be identical with those indicated in the case of the Governor-General, save that the first item on the list would necessarily be confined to the scope of the Province, or any part thereof, and not extend, as in the case of the Governor-General, to India as a whole . . . Finally, it may be necessary to impose upon the Governor a "special responsibility" for the administration of certain excluded areas if, as seems possible, the arrangements for the administration of excluded areas involve their classification into two categories, one of which would be placed under the exclusive control of the Governor, and the other made subject to Ministerial control, but with an overriding power by the Governor obtained in the manner explained in earlier paragraphs of this report through his "special responsibility".

MEMORANDUM 86 BY DR J. H. HUTTON, C.I.E., I.C.S.

ARGUMENT.

Although the position as regards the primitive tribes in the totally excluded areas is satisfactory provided exclusion is widely and freely resorted to at the outset, their interests generally are not adequately protected under the proposals made in the White Paper, inasmuch as the provision for the areas to be partially excluded from the operation of the constitution is not satisfactory. Adequate precautions have not been taken to prevent the interference of legislative bodies in these areas, and it is not clear that it is possible to withdraw such areas from the jurisdiction of the High Courts.

The primitive hill and forest tribes in all parts of India differ from their neighbours in the plains in race, in social organisation, in communal and domestic habits, in religion (very largely) and in their general attitude towards, and philosophy of, life. Consequently they cannot be conveniently included in the same system seeing that:

(1) they are much fewer numerically, and representation in an elected body will carry no effective weight,

(2) their interests are commonly alien if not actually antagonistic to the interests of their more civilised neighbours, and will, therefore, always be liable, if not likely, to be sacrificed to those of the majority,

(3) the aboriginals themselves, although unvoiced, are in several cases conscious of the dangers to themselves of inclusion in the autonomous provinces and are definitely wishful for self-determination and for the preservation of their traditional culture and manner of life.

ILLUSTRATION.

These three points may be briefly illustrated by reference to particular cases, and it should be made clear that these cases are such as have arisen under the existing conditions in which the administration of hill and forest tracts is specialised and in which a bureaucratic Government has made definite efforts to suit its administration to the areas dealt with. Mistakes are likely to be far more numerous and far more serious if the areas in question are regularised and incorporated into normal self-governing provinces:—

(1) (a) In the Central Provinces and Berar these primitive tribes form more than one-sixth of the population of the province (including States); even the local franchise committee recommended two seats for their representation. The Prime Minister's award allotted them one seat. It makes little difference, as one or two seats of this kind offer no guarantee of any kind that any attention will be paid to the interests of, e.g., Gonds and Baigas. In withdrawing even partial exclusion for the areas previously excluded and coloured purple on the Statutory Commission's map, the Central Provinces Government has acted against the interests of the aborigines.

(b) The representation of the Madras Agency Tracts is effected by the election of representatives in the plains areas. The aborigines in the hills—Kondhs and Sawaras, take no part in such elections, could carry little weight if they did, and are unlikely to have their interests considered for one moment by their elected representatives if those interests conflicted with the interests of the same representative's plains constituents.

(2) The interest of the aborigine is often alien to or antagonistic to the interests of the plainsman. This is illustrated in several ways—

(a) In the ownership of land.

(i) The system under which property is owned has been repeatedly misunderstood and the real owner expropriated by the application by courts of legal principles which in reality should not be applied at all. Example may be found in Chota Nagpur, where the feu duty paid to the chief by the landholders of a Kuntkatti village has been interpreted as rent and a sign of the chief's position as the proprietor of lands, which he never was. This has led in the past to expropriation of the villagers. Similarly in the Chittagong Hill Tracts a Government Agent for the collection of taxes was erected into an hereditary chief in villages which owed him no sort of feudal or personal allegiance of any kind.

(ii) The system introduced by civil courts, and their interpretation of contracts and debts has led to wide deprivation of land by interlopers. Tribal law generally recognises no form of realisation by distraint except in such property as that included in the original loan, usually made in kind, and repaid perhaps in the next generation after a good harvest. Consequently loans are lightly taken and result in the reduction of the borrower to the position of a landless serf, or, in some cases, of a serf tied to the soil who renders the landlord half the crop in perpetuity. Chota Nagpur is again an instance in point, also the position of Gond villagers in the north of Hyderabad State at whose harvesting the moneylender is present and takes half the crop, the other half being sealed up for the use of the villagers and consumed gradually. When exhausted they must again borrow. In the Madras Agency Tracts the perennial spring-fed lands have mostly passed into Oriya hands as a result of contracts made under the influence of drink, or at any rate of thirst. In the North Cachar Hills in Assam the richer rice-lands by the railway have largely fallen into alien hands as the result of a similar process, in spite of local restrictions on the issue of Government leases to foreigners. The fact is that the Deputy Commissioner has been too busy and too remote to realise what has been going on and the local Revenue Officer, himself an Indian of the plains, has merely recommended leases which recommendations the Deputy Commissioner has accepted without realising that the land was obtained by purchase, probably on mortgage, from an indebted Kachari who must in future work it as a labourer instead of as an owner. Such leases, although illegally issued, have not been cancelled. The local officers have recommended total exclusion from the White Paper constitution precisely on account of the presence of the railway which had caused the conflict of interests between the hillman and the foreigner. Another instance of the harm that can be done by an inexperienced officer and of the care that has to be taken in administering these areas may be taken from Assam, where a range of hills owned by the independent Nagas was regarded as important on account of the presence of supposititious oil or coal. Government bought the land from chiefs whose ownership was really no more than trusteeship, and when a survey party went to survey and demarcate it, it was resisted. This led to a visit by the Deputy Commissioner, Naga Hills, with an escort. He discovered that the northern part of the range was the sole cultivating land of an adjoining village on the next range, and Government when making a Reserved Forest of the area which was valueless for coal or oil, excluded the northern part of the ridge in order that it might be cultivated as before by the real owners. A few years later applications were made for the grant of this land for tea growing these applications were accepted by the local officer who was ignorant of the history of the case, and recommended to, and accepted by, Government, and the land would actually have been granted to tea companies, if it had not happened that an officer who knew both its past history, and the inhabitants, was transferred to the subdivision in question before the leases were signed.

Obviously there is very good reason for the aborigine to fear expropriation from the land when once he ceases to be under special administration. Only quite recently the Legislative Council of Bihar and Orissa passed a resolution in favour of the exclusion of Chota Nagpur from the "Backward Areas Notification" (paragraph 52A of the Government of India Act) though this resolution was hotly opposed by the three representatives of the aborigines of Chota Nagpur in the Council, an indication of just how much consideration these areas are likely to receive when their only protection is one or two elected representatives. Even where there is no danger of expropriation of land, exploitation by traders or moneylenders is feared, and in the Nicobar Islands it was found not long ago that nearly every household was heavily in debt to Indian and Chinese traders. These debts are paid in coconuts, which serve as local currency. These traders were given five years in which to realise what they could, after which any unpaid balance was to be automatically wiped out. The five years has expired, but there is good reason to believe that the Nicobarese, comparatively honest and simple islanders, are still paying coconuts to traders for debts and interest that they can never pay off in full. It is significant that the Nicobarese are so scared of Indian domination that they petitioned the Government of India in 1930 or 1931 to be made a Crown Colony, and said that they would sooner be part of Burma than of India proper.

(b) In the Administration of Forests the conflict of interests between the forest tribes and the community as a whole is shown in two contrasted directions:—

(i) A number of aborigines, such as the Andamanese, the Kadar, and the Sholaga of Madras, and, generally speaking, the Chenchu, the Kudumba, and the Paliyan of the same Province, do not practise cultivation at all, but are still in the hunting stage, digging for roots and hunting wild animals. To obtain an existence in this manner needs a very much larger area of forest land than would be enough if cultivation were practised. Such a mode of life is apt to bring those who follow it into conflict with forest officials and may be opposed to strict afforestation. Generally, however, such tribes will suffer more by de-afforestation. In either case they are unable to cultivate, and to teach them to abandon the hunting life for a cultivating life is a thing that can only be done very gradually indeed, and in some cases, e.g., that of the Andamanese, is probably impossible.

(ii) Even more serious a conflict of interest is likely to arise in the case of the tribes who practise shifting cultivation:—(ghum, bewar, podu, etc.). In many hill areas the slopes cannot be irrigated, and this form of cultivation is the only one possible. The tribes that practise it must live, but it is not only wasteful, but it is apt to lead to denudation of the hills and consequently to inundation of the plains, apart from the waste of timber. In some cases land so cultivated is tribally owned, and rights of private property have hardly as yet arisen; but perhaps more often, as in Chota Nagpur and Assam, the first clearer of the land from heavy forest has established personal ownership and areas of such land have been transferred by sale, marriage settlement, mortgage and inheritance for many generations. Yet the Assam Government, for instance, treats all such land, theoretically at any rate, as unclassified State Forest, and a case recently occurred in which a man was fined for letting on lease a part of such land purchased by his grandfather from the original owner. In another case it was ruled that a man must pay heavy royalties for removing stone for building from land, theoretically unclassified State Forest, which had belonged to him and his family for generations. Some control and modification of the destructive practice of shifting cultivation is admittedly necessary, but prohibition of this form of cultivation has twice brought the Sawara tribe in the Madras Agency Tracts to the verge of open rebellion. As time goes on this problem will become, if anything, more intense. In part of the Naga Hills a judicious combination of persuasion and compulsion, aided by small grants from the Local Government, has enabled one tribe at any rate to substitute irrigation for shifting cultivation to a very useful extent, but there is every fear that under the new constitution it will be increasingly difficult to obtain such grants, if it be necessary to obtain them as the result of a popular vote in an elected body. On the other hand, the hillman has little capital to undertake irrigation himself and, where easily irrigable land is accessible to the plainsman it tends (as in the Madras Agency and the North Cachar Hills) to fall into his hands. Similarly the plainsman is encroaching on the irrigable valleys of the Mikir Hills in Assam, and, as already mentioned, is ousting the Hill Kachari along the hill section of the Assam-Bengal Railway.

16^o Octobris, 1933]

(c) In the exploitation of land for minerals.

Tribes are apt to be affected in two ways (i) by the introduction into their country of an alien mining or oil-drilling population, which is often exceptionally dissolute and lawless, and (ii) by the taking up of village lands for mining, rendering them useless for cultivation and making it difficult or impossible for the village that owned the land to continue to exist. Two cases of this kind have occurred within my own knowledge. In one, the amount of land taken up by a coal mine included large areas of surface land over which, in theory, the village retained the right to cultivate when the land was not actually occupied by buildings or shafts. The cultivating rights were, in effect, valueless, as even temporary occupation by the mining company left it stripped of forest or covered with debris. In consequence, the village affected is no longer able to grow enough rice and has to depend on its ability to purchase in the plains. The indications are that it will lose its ability to grow crops and that its whole economic life will be destroyed. In the other case, the cultivation of the best half of the village land would have been rendered impossible had one been formed, because it entailed burning the felled jungle which would have been a very serious danger to the oil wells. In both cases the compensation paid to the village was in the form of a lump sum, quickly spent, and affording no sort of substitute for the permanent deprivation of cultivating land, though in the latter case the drillings were abandoned and the land is again under cultivation.

It is not suggested that mining is to be prohibited, but it is argued that the control of leases for prospecting and mining, and the operations involved by their issue need a very strong prerogative vested in a local official who is thoroughly conversant with the customs and the needs of the people who are the owners (in their own eyes, if not those of the State) of the land on which the operations are to take place.

(d) In the administration of excise.

(i) The extension of the licensed liquor shop system to the hill areas may do much harm. Thus in the

16^o October, 1933.]

Madras Agency Tracts again the Kondh was accustomed to regard the flowering of the Mahua as a time for drinking and licence, but for the rest of the year he remained sober by force of circumstances, until the establishment of a liquor shop for revenue purposes in the centre of his country enabled him to get distilled liquor at any time, and the result was very quickly seen in the transfer of his spring-fed terraces to Oriya interlopers who took advantage of his taste for liquor to deprive him of his land. On the other hand, the hillman is likely to be equally hit by:—

(1) the extension of prohibition. In most cases he is accustomed to plenty of mildly alcoholic drink which he brews from grain for himself. Having generally no sugar he probably needs alcohol to replace it. In any case a policy of complete prohibition would be very severe indeed on Naga, Nicobarese and a hundred other tribes, to say nothing of the Gond (and possibly the Santal is the same) whose religious duty it is to refresh his household and ancestral deities with drink brewed at home. Strict control of distilled liquor and of distilling may, in many cases, be in the interests of the hillmen, but a policy of total prohibition, which is known to be favoured by both Hindu and Muslim in the plains, would be a tyrannous imposition in the hills. This case is an instance to show the necessity for the powers given under Section 108 of the proposed constitution.

(e) In the provision of education.

The interests of the hillmen have in the past been little considered. There is every fear that they will be less considered in the future. In Bihar and Orissa again the Santal is given primary instruction in an alien language instead of in his own and the same applies to primary education in perhaps all Provinces, except Assam, where in the Lushai, Naga and Khasi Hills, at any rate, it is given as it should be, in the local vernacular.

In higher education the hill pupil is inevitably handicapped by the non-recognition of his own language by universities, so that he has generally to learn an additional language to enable him to matriculate.

It is very doubtful how far local legislative bodies will be willing to vote money for the education of hill and forest tribes. At any rate in Bihar and Orissa attempts made to obtain grants for institutions which would principally benefit the Munda and Oraon have failed. Further the Bihar Government has admitted that the position of the aboriginal in regard to education is worse now compared to the rest of the provinces than it was before the last instalment of the reforms.* It is impossible to avoid the inference that the greater the extension of popular government the less money will there be for the aboriginal whose vote can be disregarded, even if he is capable of exercising it.

(f) In the administration of justice.

The methods of the plains courts and the legal procedure is completely unsuited to the hillman and the errors of High Courts, particularly the Calcutta High Court, have resulted in serious injustice in the past. Where the hillman is in contact with the plainsman and the two frequent the same courts with the same procedure the hillman very soon learns that truth and a straightforward statement of his case does not pay. Consequently, he resorts to a chicanery in which he is no match at all for his more sophisticated neighbour. In non-regulation district, however, the rules of the procedure codes are not strictly adhered to, and the more common method is, as in the Assam Hills, to follow the lines indicated by tribal methods. Distances are great and communications bad, and the first essential of justice in the hills is that it should be speedy. Consequently a form of summary procedure is generally found most suitable for all but really serious cases. Generally, owing to the difficulties raised by languages and customs entirely alien to the plains lawyers are useless. They are only allowed with the permission of the court, which would be given wherever their interference would be of any value, but generally

* The aboriginals "have got a little less than their general share of the big advance made in primary education, and decidedly less of the advance in high and middle education." Government memorandum to the Statutory Commission.

the employment of lawyers merely complicates cases, and if they once took to practising in the Naga Hills, for instance, the administration of justice would probably become impossible. At best it would become a mere gamble instead of as at present, a generally effective dispensation of tribal custom qualified by equity. It should be added that the pressure of legislative bodies is always towards introducing the lawyer. This is shown by experience (e.g. of Bihar and Orissa).

Police in these areas (e.g. the hill districts of Assam or the Domini Koh of the Santal Pargannas) are generally both absent and unnecessary. The clansmen themselves, when not interfered with, are their own courts and their own police. A small civil police force is maintained to deal with the foreign population, using through communications, but is not normally allowed to interfere at all in tribal cases. For sophisticated people probably both police and lawyers are necessary evils, but where neither are found to exist, or to be needed, it seems a mistake to introduce them.

Under the codes in force, punishments may not exceed those provided in the Indian Penal Code, but, in actual fact, a felony is frequently found to be compoundable and is compounded, as it almost invariably would be, by tribal custom. I cannot conceive of anything more likely to result in general injustice in the Courts of a hill district than the introduction of the Code of Criminal Procedure as interpreted by the High Courts. This is also the experience of Rai Bahadur Sarat Chandra Roy, a well-known Indian lawyer in Bihar and Orissa, who has specialised in aboriginal customs and aboriginal clients from Chota Nagpur. He is very severe indeed on the demoralising and disruptive effects of trying to apply British Indian law to aboriginal litigants and cases. Further, wherever aboriginal areas come within the scope of the activities of the High Courts, actions which are perfectly correct according to aboriginal standards are liable to be punished as contrary to law. Thus, quite recently, a Bhil was convicted and sentenced for effecting a marriage by capture, which is a recognised form of Bhil marriage and which would undoubtedly have been acquiesced in by the society in which he lived had there been no possibility of moving courts. This, of course, was within the jurisdiction of a High Court. A case in Assam of a very similar bihu marriage, in which the parents of the girl prosecute the boy for the sake of form, once led to a sentence of imprisonment for life given by a sessions judge unacquainted with local custom; the Chief Commissioner had to interfere. This, of course, occurred in a regulation district; in the hills the matter would have been tried and settled by local custom. It would have been cheap, expeditious and reasonably satisfactory to all parties, instead of involving the injustice of severely punishing for abduction a man whose behaviour was perfectly correct from the point of view of all the parties principally concerned in the case. Similarly the application of laws of inheritance entirely alien to them has, in many cases, been very severe on the aboriginals. In the Central Provinces very few of the forest tribes have been exempted from the operation of the Hindu law of inheritance, though these are commonly at variance with tribal custom. In the official paper of, e.g., the Posts and Telegraph Department a man may not declare his heir according to tribal custom if a relative exists whom the rules of the Department consider ought to be preferred. He can follow Hindu or Muslim law, but not his own tribal law.

Where, in Assam, the hillman comes into contact with the plains courts, he finds justice practically impossible to obtain. It frequently happens that gangs of hillmen go down and work on tea estates, and when they appear for payment they find that the contract was made with an intermediary who has drawn the amount due and absconded in the night. They cannot find him, if they can they are unable to point out attachable property as required by the court and, in any case, they cannot afford to wait foodless and wageless in the plains while the interminable delays of civil courts continue, nor to pay the necessary fees for a lawyer to fight the case hearing by hearing. If they did secure a decree they probably could not obtain realisation. Such cases are common enough in Assam, and there is no remedy for them, but the extension of the system which makes them not only possible, but frequent, to the hill tracts themselves is unthinkable to anyone familiar with circumstances; at the same time the only alternative is exclusion from the scope of the High Courts and of the legislative activities of provincial councils.

CONCLUSIONS.

The illustrations given above are enough to show that the tribal areas have interests which conflict with those of the people inhabiting the normally administered plains areas, and that the introduction of provincial self-government raises the necessity for some form of protection for these areas until they are in a position to stand on their own feet either as an integral part of the province in which they are found, or as independent units of the federated whole.

Failure to give some protection is likely to lead to the very rapid disintegration of tribal life, particularly in view of the very rapid development of communications in tribal areas, and to the economic ruin of the tribes. This has been so far recognised in the White Paper that provision has been made for the total or partial exclusion of such tribal areas from the operation of the reformed constitutions envisaged for the provinces. It is here contended that the provision made is inadequate.

It must be recognised that partial exclusion is an unsatisfactory expedient. It places the Governor of the Province in a difficult position in which his special responsibility for the interests of the aborigines may be found at issue with the views of both his Ministers and his Council; he is only able to prevent questions or resolutions having reference to such areas by interfering to disallow them in the Legislature, and it would be easier if they were ultra vires from the start. Experience has shown that pressure will undoubtedly be brought upon the Government—as it has been already in Bihar and Orissa and in Assam—under existing conditions—to extend the regime of ordinary law to the hill and forest areas where it is a curse and no blessing.

It is hard to believe that most Governors will not have difficulty in withstanding the pressure of their Councils and Ministers, even though the individuals pressing for the regularisation of tribal areas are the merest handful of vociferous immigrants, and it would be far safer for aboriginal areas to be excluded entirely rather than partially, so that all the excluded areas would be, under their own provincial governors, more or less in the position if such Chief Commissioners' Provinces as the Andaman and Nicobar Islands. In some cases they would be safest treated as States for whom, indeed, the provincial Governor might act as A.G.G. but which should not be treated as British India at all under the proposed constitution.

In the case of the Islands not only do the territories occupied form no integral part of the Indian Peninsula, but there is every reason to exclude them from participation in a federation in the policy of which they can never have any audible voice. The Nicobar Islands have already expressed their emphatic desire to be constituted a Crown Colony. The Islands of Little Andaman and Sentinel might conveniently be included with them in this archipelago administered by the Governor-General on behalf of the Colonial Office as in the case of the Aden Protectorate and the Island of Sokotra. Great Andaman falls, no doubt, into a different category, as being a penal settlement and partially colonised by Indians as a result of that, but here special measures are necessary for the protection of the few remaining Andamanese, the very rapidly dwindling survivals of a prehistoric race, while the inhabitants of Indian origin are too remote from the mainland to take any real share in its representative institutions.

This condition applies also to the Amindivi and Laccadive Islands, and the proper treatment for these latter groups of islands is perhaps to constitute them either an administered protectorate or a separate federal unit with such local self-governing institutions as may be found possible and suitable. At present they are "administered" by biennial visits from the Collector of S. Kanara or Malabar districts, and their own local institutions can hardly have failed to survive as they have survived, in great strength, in the Nicobar Islands, where the inhabitants are perfectly able to conduct their own affairs if protection is given from external interference.

Continental areas are not easy to segregate, but the expressed desire of most of the tribal areas is for self-determination, and this could be secured in a number of cases by the creation of petty states on the lines of those in the Khasi Hills or the Karenni States of Burma. The guidance and supervision of political officers would be necessary for some time, but there is no reason why self-governing units should not be fostered, or why the tribal areas should not be allowed freedom to manage their own affairs as petty units of the Federation like the minor states of Western India, unless they preferred, as they might at some subsequent date, to apply for complete incorporation in an adjoining province. Clearly the initial difficulty is one of finance, but the more closely they are administered the greater will be the cost, and the cost of administration on political lines would be no greater than that of incorporation into a self-governing province with all its apparatus of elections and representation. Many of them like the Kolhan in Singhbhum (Bihar and Orissa) retain their original self-governing institutions still intact. It is not suggested that excluded areas should be retained precisely as they are. Something must be done to set them on their own feet, but it is argued that total exclusion as proposed under the Statutory Commission scheme for some of the Assam Frontier should be extended to the North Cachar Hills to the Mikir Hills, the Garo Hills, and to part at any rate of the Jaintia Hills in Assam, to the Chittagong Hill Tracts of Bengal, to at least the Palamau and Ranchi districts, the Domini Koh in the Santal Parganas and the Kolhan in Singhbhum in Bihar, to Lahaul and Spiti in the Punjab and to parts of Orissa, of the Central Provinces, of Bombay, and of the Madras Agencies and islands, to say nothing of parts of Burma.

For other continental areas, most of which are small and largely penetrated by plainsmen, partial exclusion is possibly the only feasible method, but this should be applied to more areas than those envisaged in the Statutory Commission's Report, and in particular to hill areas in Madras south of the Godavari River and probably in northern Bengal, Bihar and Orissa and the Central Provinces where total exclusion is impracticable. Careful examination and demarcation is required. Above all, a strong prerogative is essential to their good administration. It must remain possible for the officer in charge to remove any undesirable person from the areas in question. This power is provided at present in various ways. In Burma and in the Frontier Districts of Assam and in the Madras Agency Tracts powers exist under varying forms which enable the district or political officer to remove from the area to which the Act extends any non-indigenous person whose presence is found to be undesirable. This power could be employed to advantage in the Madras Agencies in deporting Oriyas and others found trafficking in liquor with the tribes. It has been used to extrude both Europeans and Indians from the frontier districts of Assam, where trouble has been stirred up by such intruders. A nominal exclusion which did not give the local administration power of this kind would be useless, but the existence of such a power is perhaps incompatible in a self-governing unit. Another point which should be made clear is that in considering the boundaries of excluded, or partially excluded areas, regard should be paid to tribal, rather than to political, boundaries. A slight alteration, for instance, of the boundary proposed for the new Orissa Province would make that boundary coincide with the boundaries of the lands occupied by the Sawara and Kondh tribes respectively. This was pointed out to the Orissa Boundary Committee, but unfortunately was not apparently regarded as a matter of importance. It is, however, very much easier to deal with consolidated tribal units than with mixed ones, particularly as some policy of political and economic development is essential to their future administration, and in this respect the tribal consciousness of existence as a corporate and integral unit is needed. A further point of some importance is the training and selection of officers for the administration of excluded areas. By no means all officers are suited by temperament or inclination for work in tribal areas and the best are generally those who are caught young. The proper administration of the tribal areas really involves the careful selection of suitable officers who shall be directly subject to the Governor, and if the recruitment of officers by the Secretary of State on behalf of the Provinces is stopped, it might still be necessary to continue to recruit enough to staff the excluded areas.

16^o October, 1933.] Wing-Commander A. W. H. JAMES, M.C.,
M.P., and Dr. J. H. HUTTON, C.I.E., I.C.S.

D5. We have before us the Memoranda which you gentlemen have been kind enough to lay before us. Dr. Hutton, would you wish at this stage to add anything to your memorandum before we begin to ask questions?—I do not think I have anything to add.

D6. Commander James, would you like to add anything?—(Wing-Commander James.) No.

Lord Hutchison of Montrose.

D7. I would like to ask the witnesses one or two questions about the machinery under which those reserved areas or backward areas would be administered. Under the White Paper they are under the control of the Governor, but I understand that the Governor-General has got to agree to the various regulations which are issued by the Governor for the control of those areas. That is so, is it not?—I take it so, but it is not easy to understand what the intention of those paragraphs is.

D8. Under paragraph 108 of the White Paper the Governor-General has to agree to the various regulations. Could you tell me from your experience to what extent have the Foreign and Political Departments under the Governor-General got any control over those areas?—None. (Dr. Hutton.) None whatever at present. The areas are all at present (and as I understand it they will be still, under the White Paper's provisions as they are) administered through the Governors of the Provinces, whereas the Foreign and Political Service is directly under the Government of India and does not overlap in any way.

D9. They do not overlap at all?—No.

D10. Then do I understand that those reserved areas correspond directly with the Governor?—At present, no. Under the existing condition in the non-regulation areas as they are at present, the officer in control of the area is under the Commissioner and works through the Secretariat of the Governor in the ordinary way.

D11. Very well. Then under the White Paper proposals, when you get the Provincial Government form you will then have touch direct with the Governor in dealing with those areas?—In dealing with the totally excluded areas, but not in dealing with the partially excluded areas. The arrangements for the two as proposed by the White Paper are quite distinct.

D12. Have you any knowledge of the backward areas in Madras?—A little.

D13. In dealing with those, who is the Commissioner there responsible in Madras under the White Paper proposals? Will he go straight to the Bureau of the Governor, or will he go through any Government official?—I am not at all sure how that would work. If you do not mind my taking an instance from Assam, which I know better, in the case of a criminal appeal, for instance, in a totally excluded area, the appeal, as far as I can make out in Assam, goes direct to the Governor through the Secretary responsible, whereas in the case of the partially excluded areas it may go to the Minister. That is a point which has not been decided and which is not clear from the White Paper.

D14. In the event of disputes or legal cases coming along, are those cases fit to go before the ordinary Tribunal of the Province?—In most cases I think they are not fit.

D15. In most cases, they are? At present, I think they are not so.

D16. In mountain areas those forest areas—would the same rules apply there as would apply down in the plains? Yes; in most Provinces the High Courts have jurisdiction. In Bihar and Orissa, the High Court has jurisdiction over the hill areas; in Assam the High Court has no jurisdiction in the hill districts.

Sir Hari Singh Gour.

D17. Are not some of these areas covered by the provisions of the Scheduled Districts Act? Yes.

D18. In that case, the acts of the Governor-General of the Province ipso facto would not apply unless they were extended by the provisions of the Scheduled Districts Acts? That is so.

Lord Hutchison of Montrose. Would that apply to the disputes on land tenure?

Sir Hari Singh Gour. Yes.

Sir Reginald Cradock.

D19. You recognise the difficulty, do you not, as between tribes who are scattered over an area in which the reforms will be fully at work and tribes which are territorially complete, so to speak? Certainly; I recognise that difficulty.

D20. And away from them? Yes.

D21. That would apply to Assam and Burma?—It might be that the exclusion or the territorial separation of tribes goes further than that. I think there are tracts in Bihar and Orissa and Madras which are practically tribal.

D22. They would be scheduled, perhaps; but even in the Scheduled Districts, I suppose, you would recognise that the Indian Penal Code and all the ordinary Acts apply, that is to say, the administration of the Criminal and Civil Law and the ordinary Revenue Law in many cases are applicable to people of those castes?—They have been applied to them; I think in many cases wrongly.

Sir Reginald Craddock.] On the other hand, there are people like the Gonds in the Central Province who are scattered over the whole of the Province. There are more in one place. I know you have an Act about Land Alienation.

Sir Hari Singh Gour.] Yes, about the aboriginal tribes.

Sir Reginald Craddock.

D23. That has been specially enacted?—Yes.

D24. But the difficulty about those Acts has been that a great deal of harm has been done probably before the evils which the Acts were meant to deal with had come to light?—Yes; that is true.

D25. On account of the fact that the statistics of criminal and civil courts naturally do not supply any information as to the caste of the parties?—No; I think part of the evil is that the Civil and Criminal Courts recognise Hindu and Muslim law and never recognise tribal law.

D26. That is so, probably. It is partly due to the fact, no doubt, that many of the tribal people cling on to the garments of the Hindus, so to speak, and they have got so accustomed to that sort of thing that they have their joint families, and so forth, so far as the courts know. They do not plead that there is any other law except the Hindu law?—They very often do.

D27. They would in certain tracts, no doubt?—They would if they could, no doubt.

D28. But they have not done so hitherto?—I do not think they can plead any other law except the Hindu or Muslim law. It is not recognised by the courts and it is useless for the tribes to plead it.

Dr. B. R. Ambedkar.

D29. Cannot they plead tribal law as their customary law?—No; it is not recognised by the High Court.

Dr. B. R. Ambedkar.] The High Court would recognise any custom. It is not necessary to establish that it is a Hindu or Muhammadan custom. If there is no law laid down in that sense, the custom would govern. Ordinarily, that would be the thing. I am not speaking with first-hand knowledge.

Sir Hari Singh Gour.

D30. The Civil Courts of most of the Provinces make a provision for the enforcement of any customary law regulating domestic relations and succession?—It is extremely difficult in that case for the tribe to establish its customary law.

D31. That is for a different reason?—I see your point.

Sir Reginald Craddock.

D32. As far as my experience goes, and I expect it is yours, when they are not definitely under separate political control like the wild mountain tribes, and so on, who are not under the ordinary administration at all—is not that the case?—Yes.

Sir Reginald Craddock.] There are places in Burma where you can punish murder with a fine under the special regulations.

Sir Hari Singh Gour.] That you could do in England not far back.

Sir Reginald Craddock.

D33. I am not making any comparisons. I am only suggesting to the witnesses that there is a distinction between people of the various tribes like Chins and Nagas and Kachins and Kukis and people of that description who are on the Burma Frontier, for example. There is a distinction between treating them under a separate officer or officers from treating aboriginals in regularly administered districts who have hitherto been under the ordinary law and under the ordinary district officers commissioners and under the ordinary Courts, and it seems to me, judging from the evidence both of Wing-Commander James and yourself, that you are anxious to get some sort of supervision over these aboriginals, wherever they may be?—Yes.

D34. Some sort of protection for them?—Yes.

D35. For example, would your case be met if there was in the Province an officer designated superintendent of aboriginal tracts or aboriginal tribes?—(Wing-Commander James.) No, emphatically not. I submit that the White Paper proposals

M.P., and Dr. J. H. HUTTON, C.I.E., I.C.S.

go back on the specific recommendations of the Statutory Commission, of the Franchise Commission, and of the Third Round Table Conference. The Franchise Commission, for example, actually whittles down the suggested numbers of Primitives to between four million and five million. It underestimates the numbers in British India by more than half to begin with, and goes on, pro rata. I submit that these people would be in the interests both of the Provinces and of themselves better for the time being or for the moment left entirely out of the proposed constitutional change.

D36. Yes, but I was putting to you that under the Governor, there should be one officer in the Province whose duty it was to look after these people?—But I would submit that if I accepted that, I would be denying the need which I maintain exists for Central Authority, that the Governor should only be the Agent for the Governor-General. I do not think merely a representative of the Governor would suffice.

D37. But do not you think that would be a rather extreme measure of centralisation. The information at the disposal of the Governor-General would be only what he got from the Governor. I am not suggesting that he should be under the ordinary ministers?—I thought you were.

D38. No?—I am sorry.

D39. I mean a separate Governor's duty with an officer for that specific purpose to look after generally the interests of the forest tribes?—(Dr. Hutton.) Provided they were as far as they could be territorially excluded from the constitution.

D40. Yes, so far as they can territorially be excluded?—Yes.

D41. But even if they cannot be, it might be possible?—It is all the more necessary if they cannot be.

D42. Yes—to have some officer who is charged with that duty. The point I want to put to you is that in many cases these aboriginal tribes are living more or less in the heart of the forest. Sometimes the land they cultivate is actually reserved forest?—Yes.

D43. Which is known in India, in a good many parts anyway, as a forest village?—Yes.

D44. That is, under the Forest Officer?—Yes.

D45. But the Forest Officer is generally very fond of the tribes, and looks after them to the best of his ability, and he manages that village. The Revenue Authorities do not have anything to do with those Forest Villages, except criminal law, but then there are villages (I daresay you have had some in some of the areas) where the ordinary deputy Commissioner or Collector, or whoever he is, keeps an eye over the villages as he is supposed to do over the whole of the district. Then for them I am suggesting to you that some kind of superintendent of the interests of tribes should be an officer appointed by the Governor to enable him to carry out his duties, not necessarily to look after the magisterial work, and so forth?—(Wing-Commander James.) May I point out, Sir Reginald, arising from what you have said, it is perfectly true that the life of the bulk of these people is bound up with the forest administration, but under the proposals with regard to the existing system, the forest service is being transferred entirely, and the time will come, for example in Bombay I think in 1947, when there will be no European officers left in the forest service, and the Secretary of State in a reply that he gave last week to question 6427 and the following questions, stated definitely that the forests were subjected to no safeguards, and that no Governor's intervention was possible, and, furthermore, in the White Paper the forest revenues are allotted without qualification to the Provinces. There seems to be a complete contradiction.

D46. But I was suggesting to you some modification which would allow a Governor to carry out his duties in respect of those backward tracts with the aid of a special officer?—Quite, but in that case the Secretary of State's reply which I quoted would require modification.

D47. What I was really trying to get from you was whether you agree that supervision and that kind of thing might be provided for in the Constitution Act?—Certainly, it must be.

D48. And as regards these other tribes, they are already under the Political Department; they are all probably altogether excluded. I am talking of a local political department. For example, in Burma those places would be under people of the Burma Political Service and not under the ordinary District officers—those excluded tribes? (Dr. Hutton.) They would not be under a different Service in Assam or in Madras. (Wing-Commander James.) Or in the Central Provinces.

M.P., and Dr. J. H. HUTTON, C.I.E., I.C.S.

D49. But the ordinary officers would administer them, and their supervision from the Governor's point of view would come through the officer who was superintendent of all these tribal matters and tribal interests?—(Dr. Hutton.) Provided the areas were totally excluded, I am not satisfied that that would be the case if they were only partially excluded.

Sir Reginald Cradlock.] It is very difficult to exclude an area which contains, not merely aboriginal tribes; you come across a Korku or a Gond village, and its neighbours may be ordinary villagers.

Lord Hutchison of Montrose.] I take it that the point that you want to make is that it is not only the excluded areas that you want to allow for, but it is the individuals?

Sir Reginald Cradlock.

D50. Yes; I will make it clear. Hitherto, the reason why these people were not protected in this way much earlier—they should have been protected much earlier—I admit that they should have been—is that the evil that is going on does not get noticed until it has gone a long way?—That is so.

D51. And, therefore, a whole lot of milk has already been spilt?—(Wing-Commander James.) But I think it could be mopped up even now.

D52. That is why I am suggesting to you that one officer in the Governor's staff might deal with this question if it was specially enacted in the Constitution as a means of dealing with tribes. Then, of course, locally in the districts some of them would come under a Forest Officer directly, and I have no doubt that if it were a special duty an Indian member of the Forest Service would be sympathetic to these people?—Undoubtedly, in certain cases.

Major C. R. Attlee.

D53. I want to ask you, first of all, a question about the personnel of the officers who deal with these excluded areas. Dr. Hutton, in Assam, I take it, that an officer has to specialise before he can be very effective in those areas because of the languages and the customs. Is that so?—(Dr. Hutton.) The officer who is really good in the excluded areas is generally one who is caught quite young before he has got accustomed to the ordinary routine of the Service. Unfortunately, there is no guarantee that he will be kept in such areas because he is normally exchanged with the plains.

D54. Quite. Supposing that these areas are excluded and, as far as possible, kept outside the ordinary Provincial structure, do you think it would be possible to have something like an All-India cadre of officers dealing with backward areas?—That would be the only method of having any specialised cadre for such areas, because otherwise it would be so small as to be unworkable. In each Province the excluded areas would be so small that you could not have special cadres for them unless you had an India cadre.

D55. A point arises there also with regard to Commander James's point. You suggest, I think, that the Forest Officers should be particularly charged with these backward areas?—(Wing-Commander James.) For economy and to avoid duplication.

D56. But you are aware that the idea is that the Forest Service will become a Transferred Service and a Provincial Service?—That is what I pointed out just now.

D57. Do you suggest that the Forest Service should not be transferred?—Not at all; because there are many forest areas like South Kanara, which is inhabited by caste Hindus. All I suggest is that where a forest area is solely or mainly inhabited by backward tribes then it should be an excluded area, administered by a special service. The cost of the normal machinery is totally unnecessary to these areas.

D58. I was going to deal with the cost in a moment. Dr. Hutton, do you say that you wish that the hill areas of Assam should be cut away entirely from the plains area, or do you think that they should come under the Governor-General as a separate unit?—(Dr. Hutton.) Personally, my own view is that they would be better cut away entirely, but it would not be a possible procedure under the White Paper as drafted. There is no provision for such total exclusion.

D59. I was asking, rather, what you wished?—My own idea would be to administer them independently directly under the Government of India.

D60. And have them administered from an All-India Service?—I think that would be preferable, yes. You might recruit it from all sorts of other Services. You

16° Octobris, 1933.] Wing-Commander A. W. H. JAMES, M.C.,
M.P., and Dr. J. H. HUTTON, C.I.E., I.C.S.

could borrow from the Army, Forest Department, the Civil Service, and the Police, where you found suitable men.

D61. Would you say that the experience of someone who had specialized in the Assam tribes would be available if he were transferred, let us say, to Chota Nagpur?—His experience would be available. His language would be the difficulty. He would have to learn fresh languages.

D62. Do you think that in such a Service it would not be possible to provide a career, so that you would not have officers who had specialized in these areas having to go back and take up a different sort of work in order to get a higher position in the Service?—I think if you included all the areas it might be possible. It would want careful working out—if you included the islands.

D63. With regard to the finances of the backward areas, do you think that they should come from the Centre or should they come from the Provinces?—I think that is a question I am hardly competent to answer. In some cases, where the tribes inhabit a frontier, I think it would certainly be reasonable that both the Province and the Centre should contribute, it is a matter of frontier insurance.

D64. Let me put it in this way. I take it that the backward areas are, generally, a cost to a Provincial Government?—Yes; they are not remunerative. (Wing-Commander James.) Not all; some are very remunerative. Some of the forest areas are very remunerative.

D65. Yes; but as a general rule I dare say the larger areas of the backward tracts are a deficit?—(Dr. Hutton.) I think they barely pay their way as a whole. The actual areas that are administered as non-regulation districts at present do not pay their way.

D66. Will not there be a tendency if they are cut off from the Provinces, if they have to come on to the common purse, for the Provincial Government to prefer to spend its money on the areas which are directly represented, rather than on these excluded areas?—I am sure they would; that seems to me to be one of the difficulties, but I think the Provincial Governments have been most unwilling to spend money on the excluded areas if they can help it.

Mr. R. A. Butler.

D67. I think it might help the Subcommittee to say that there is an actual loss on the backward areas in Assam. For policing purposes the cost amounts to 21 lakhs?—That includes the Military Police. Although on paper that is a debt to the backward areas, because that is where the police are posted, they are very often used in fully administered areas on the plains; for instance, in the Bihar riots the Assam Military Police were called on to such an extent that we could hardly keep up our own garrisons.

Lord Eustace Percy.

D68. To make it quite clear, is not it a fact that that loss of 21 lakhs only relates to the backward tracts which the Assam Government want the Central Government to take over? It does not cover all the tracts in Assam which you propose, on page 201, to exclude, does it?—No.

Major C. R. Attlee.

D69. It is, is it not, in a number of cases, more or less an accident that certain backward tribes are tied up with certain Provinces? For instance, Chota Nagpur with Bihar?—Yes.

D70. So it is quite natural that they should not be keen to spend money on it. Would you, generally speaking, agree with the recommendation in the Statutory Commission, that the backward areas should be a Central charge administered by the Governor as agent of the Governor-General?—Yes, I think so; I would agree with that. You mean the responsibility being with the Governor-General?

D71. Yes?—Yes.

D72. Taking Assam, you said that it might be possible to separate these hill areas altogether from the plains. Is there, as a matter of fact, any tendency for a borderland to grow up between them in which both sections are interested? Is there any extension, so to speak, of plains civilisation to the hills area?—In most of the hill districts none. The forests which divide the hills, which come down from the hills into the plains, are, in point of fact, geographically part of the hills, and at present they are administered as part of the plains districts, but there is no real overlap in Assam.

D73. I gather it is your view that in the interests of these people you should preserve their present simple form of administration and not try to bring in a more advanced form?—I think some form of development might be very slowly introduced; I think it probable

16^o Octobris, 1933.] Wing-Commander A. W. H. JAMES, M.C.,
M.P., and Dr. J. H. HUTTON, C.I.E., I.C.S.

it ought to be, but it would have to be a very very simple form, and it could not come about for many years. At present the present simple form of administration would have to continue, but I think something might be done in the direction of forming a tribal Durbar or a tribal Council which would ultimately voice the opinions of the tribe

D74. Is your view that the kind of administration wanted is an experienced officer who guides the people in all their affairs rather than a full administration divided up into all kinds of different activities?—Yes, very much so. I think an experienced officer who can guide the civil administration is what is wanted. For instance, in Assam most of the hill districts provide their own police; the outside police are not allowed to go into a hill village without permission, and the people are perfectly capable of providing their own police; they do all that sort of work themselves, and it would be the greatest mistake to introduce the police officers with Thanas and so forth. That is only an instance which applies to all parts.

D75. Adverting to the point put by Sir Reginald Craddock with regard to the Backward Tribes who are scattered amongst the rest of the population, would it be possible in your view for an administrator who was administering a regular excluded area to be the Governor's officer for protecting the scattered ones, if there were such, in a Province?—I think that would be possible, yes.

Mr. R. A. Butler.

D76. I want first of all to ask one or two questions about Wing-Commander James's suggestion for a Forestal Administrative Service. I think, Dr. Hutton, you referred to the difficulty of having a small cadre of officers in any service. In the projected Forestal Administrative Service which is suggested in Wing-Commander James's note, can you tell me what the size of this service would be and what the cadre of such a service would amount to in numbers according to your idea?—I could not possibly do so offhand. (Wing-Commander James.) May I point out that I do not think anybody could answer that because the boundaries have never been delimited at all. The Secretary of State, for example, has pointed out that there will have to be an inquiry. To delimit constituencies I suggest that the same sort of inquiry is essential to delimit the tribal areas.

D77. In making this suggestion it struck me that you might have formed some idea of the size of such a service?—I have asked a number of Forest Officers serving and retired, and they all thought that it was probable that the area would permit of such a service, but I have not yet met anyone who would express an opinion outside his own Province.

D78. May I put it to you that it is likely, considering the present experience—take one Province, Assam, for example, where very few officers are involved in the work in the Backward Areas—that this would be in fact a very small service?—I should think it would be very small.

D79. In that case do you not think that the difficulties which Major Attlee has put forward would arise in the case of language and in transferring these officers from one district to another, very often totally dissimilar in every way?—I did not suggest it as being a perfect scheme. I suggest it merely forte de mieux, because nobody, and I have inquired of many people, has suggested any alternative.

D80. I am only trying to get your ideas, because every suggestion is, naturally, helpful to the Committee. You raised one difficulty in the course of your notes, which is that of health, and you say that this idea must be put forward because it will be impossible to move officers from unhealthy tracts to healthy tracts. Would not that be equally possible if the converse of your scheme were accepted and if Provincial officers were occasionally transferred to the Backward Areas and those who had been working in the Backward Areas were transferred back to ordinary district work?—It would be possible, but the difficulty there arose in my suggestion that in view of the rapid Indianisation of the Forest Service there would very shortly be a scarcity of suitable officers.

D81. Sir Reginald Craddock raised the point about the scattered nature of many of these aboriginal populations, how they intermingle with ordinary districts in many cases in the Central Provinces. Would it not be possible to say that the work for, at any rate the partially excluded areas, would be done in the majority of cases by ordinary district officers and not necessarily by the Forest

M.P., and Dr. J. H. HUTTON, C.I.E., I.C.S.

Service?—That would depend upon the delimitation of boundaries that I suggested was necessary.

D82 But in the event of scattered populations being in the middle of ordinarily administered territories, it would be possible for the ordinary district officer to do the work better than anybody else?—Certainly in that case.

D83. And in that case it would be possible to fulfil the desideratum of a change in climate within one Province by changing the officer's station from one to another?—It might be.

D84. It would also be easier for the officer to assimilate the language of one Province?—Certainly.

D85. It would therefore seem to be better to organise these services more on a Provincial basis than on an All-India basis taking into consideration the question of the small size of the cadre of the service?—It appears to be incapable of answer until the delimitation is done

Lord Eustace Percy.

D86. I wonder if we might ask Dr. Hutton for his opinion on this question of a separate service?—(Dr. Hutton) I was trying to think of the number of districts. My opinion is that a separate service might be of advantage. It might be possible to combine it with the Foreign and Political Service.

Dr. Shafa'at Ahmad Khan.

D87. Not the Forest Service?—Not the Forest Service.

Mr. R. A. Butler.

D88. At present I understand the Home Department would be a more likely Department to be involved—not the Foreign and Political Department?—Yes; I think there would be enough districts to form as many posts as a small Province.

D89. You consider that the difficulty of language and assimilation of new ideas which is so much recognised in the Colonial service would not arise in this case?—The difficulty of language would arise. I am not sure about the difficulty of ideas; no, I think not. No difficulty of language could be greater than we have at present in Assam in my last district. There were 16 different languages as different as the languages of Europe.

D90. It would be your suggestion that this service as suggested would be a small cadre?—Yes, that is my suggestion.

Lord Eustace Percy.

D90A. What would be the top-most plum to which the man in such a service would rise?—That is a point I had not considered. It would depend entirely on the way in which you decided to arrange the service. The highest post would be somebody under the Government of India but connected presumably with the Home Department equivalent to the Head of a Department.

D91. There are two considerations obviously to be borne in mind. One is: What is the number of posts which would be reasonably possible for a married European, because I gather you want a largely European Service?—Yes.

D92. And what would be the proportion of posts to which a man could look forward, at a really fairly high salary, to conclude his service?—The average man at present cannot look forward to much more than being first grade Deputy-Commissioner, and most of the posts involved in a service of this kind would be Deputy-Commissioner posts. You might add a Commissioner or, if you liked to call him so, a Chief Commissioner—an officer to cover the Head of the Department, whoever it is, with the Government of India, and possibly a Secretary of some kind.

D93. What about the conditions of living for a married European?—It is better in most of the backward tracts than in the plains. They are mostly higher in the hills.

Mr. Butler.

D94. Would not there be great overlapping of work in a district which was partially excluded in which, as Sir Reginald has pointed out, the aboriginal population was scattered?—Yes.

D95. Very great difficulty?—There would be great overlapping of work if you had a separate officer for a scattered aboriginal population.

D96. One being a Forestal Service and the other being an All-India Service working in the Province?—Yes.

D97. It would be very difficult to administer?—Yes, but my point was that the districts I mentioned here were areas which could be totally excluded.

Major Attlee.

D98. We know, Dr. Hutton, you have done a very large amount of research work into the condition of tribes, and so forth. Is that kind of work done among

16^o Octobris, 1933.] Wing-Commander A. W. H. JAMES, M.C.,
M.P., and Dr. J. H. HUTTON, C.I.E., I.C.S.

officers who take up work in backward areas?—No; there are a certain number of officers who take it up, but they are a small proportion.

Mr. Butler.

D99. I wanted to raise one or two other points. Would it help you at all in discussing the type of officer which I think Wing-Commander James has certain apprehensions about?—(Wing-Commander James.) So did the Simon Report.

D100. I quite understand, and I fully sympathise, if I may say so. Would it help at all if the type of officer who would be likely to serve in a partially excluded area were submitted to the approval of the Governor? I am only putting out suggestions. Would it help?—It would depend upon the Governor, which is again an unknown factor

D101. But it would be likely to do so?—It would be likely to do so, yes

D102. From the point of view which I have raised earlier, that if a member of the All-India Service working in a Province was administering a district which was partially excluded and, at the same time, doing his district work, it would probably be of the All-India Service which would, at any rate for five years, according to the White Paper proposals, be recruited by the Secretary of State?—Yes.

D103. And the whole matter would be discussed and gone into later as set out in the White Paper?—Yes, but it has been going to be gone into and discussed for so long that I thought the time had now come for it to be discussed and settled.

D104. I was discussing the issue of future recruitment which is another issue?—Yes.

D105. I want to ask you one or two questions about the representation of the backward areas. The matter, I think, has been dealt with in the Franchise Committee Report, and I would like to ask the valuable help of these witnesses as to the best method of representing the aboriginals in the legislatures in the Provinces. Could I ask Dr. Hutton if he has any suggestions to make as to the best methods? You mentioned a tribal durbar. Have you any suggestions as to how a representative of those areas is best elected to a Provincial Legislature?—(Dr. Hutton.) No, because it seems to me that the real representatives of the areas are the older men, who are familiar with custom, and who are recognised by the younger people as representing them, but who are quite incapable of coming forward in anything like a legislative assembly. That is the great difficulty. The man who really represents the feeling of his village is not the educated man who can come forward in an Assembly and play a part, but one of the old men of the village who retains the traditions of his tribe. For that reason, I would urge total exclusion wherever possible.

D106. That does not answer the point as to how, according to the White Paper Scheme of Representation in the Legislatures in the Schedule of Representation you would organise the representative of the aboriginals?—(Wing-Commander James.) I think it would be so valueless that it should not exist at all. (Dr. Hutton.) Nomination, I think, would be best D107. I think earlier on Wing-Commander James pointed out that the representation was not sufficient?—(Wing-Commander James.) And could not be made sufficient. I do not see how it could possibly be made worth their having.

D108. In that case, the argument that there is not enough does not prevail?—No; I use the argument merely to show how they had been ignored. I was not complaining that they had not enough.

D109. Have you any further suggestion as to how representatives of the aboriginals in the Provincial Legislatures could be put forward?—No; I am for the maximum of total exclusion which would remove them from the legislatures altogether.

D110. That does not help in an area which might be a partially excluded area in which there are many individuals among the aborigines who are located there?—I beg your pardon. That is quite true; it does not. I think they would have to take their chance in the general constituencies. I do not see how they could do otherwise. (Dr. Hutton.) I think in that case it would be possible for them to elect through their own tribal organisation where it survives. You might work a franchise on a tribal basis which was not governed by property. A man recorded as a member of a tribe and not as a member of a caste might have a vote as head of his household or tribe. You might work something on that line. I do not say it would be satisfactory. It would be better than no representation of any kind and no exclusion.

M.P., and Dr. J. H. HUTTON, C.I.E., I.C.S.

D111. We were naturally talking of those areas which were partially excluded?—Yes.

D112. You think that is the best method?—Yes. But I do not advocate the partially excluded areas. I do not wish to be understood to be advocating that.

Lord Eustace Percy.

D113. You have proposed on page 20 that a number of areas should be partially excluded?—Yes; where total exclusion is not possible. I would admit that there are areas where that is the only way.

Mr. Butler.

D114. You have admitted that there are some small villages of Gonds or Bhils in the midst of an area where no other course would be possible. Both witnesses have admitted that, and we are trying to meet difficulties which you have yourself raised?—Yes.

Sir Hari Singh Gour.

D115. I want to ask Dr. Hutton whether the conditions he has described in Assam apply all over India and in Burma, the Shan States, and so on?—I am not certain that I have described any conditions in Assam.

D116. The aboriginal tribes in Assam occupy certain localities?—Yes; that is true partially of other parts of India, certainly.

D117. But can you say the same thing occurs in the other Provinces?—I should say it occurred in the Agency tracts in Madras; in certain districts of Chota Nagpur, not all over, but in the Palamau and Ranchi Districts; the Damini Koh, in the Santal Parganas; the Kolhan in Singhbhum; Lahaul and Spiti, undoubtedly in the Punjab; and probably areas in Southern Madras with which I am not acquainted; Nicobar Islands and Laccadive Islands; part of the Central Provinces. I do not know the Central Provinces well enough to give any areas; the Chanda Zemindari.

D118. You said that the Hindu and Muhammadan law governs the aboriginal tribes?—I did not say that quite.

D119. What did you really say?—I said the Courts administered Hindu and Muhammadan law.

D120. Do you think that that is wrong?—Yes.

D121. You remember the declaration made by Warren Hastings in 1775 which became the Regulating Act a year later?—No.

D122. In which it was laid down by Parliament that the Hindu law shall apply to Hindus, and Muslim law to Muhammadans, and that excluded everybody else?—Yes.

D123. And in Calcutta the Privy Council have pointed out that the Hindu law applies to Hindus and that everybody who was not a Musselman was governed by Hindu law, and that was applied by the British Courts. That has been going on for about a century and a half?—Quite so. That is one of the things I am objecting to.

D124. Your complaint therefore is of the past?—And the present.

D125. The difficulty has now arisen that that law has now become stereotyped in the case of many aboriginal types who have been following notens volens, the family law, and accepting it?—In some cases, that is true; in many cases not. I do not think it applies among the Gonds of the Central Provinces at all.

D126. Many of them claim to belong to the Kshatriyas, the ruling classes?—Some of the sophisticated Gonds do.

D127. And the rest would belong to the Hindus?—Many of them; not all of them.

D128. Have you noticed that these tribes are gradually becoming assimilated to Hinduism?—In some cases, certainly. In one case, at any rate, to Muhammadanism.

D129. But in the bulk of them the tendency is to gravitate towards Hinduism?—Yes.

D130. For how long has this process been going on?—I imagine for 2,000 years.

D131. Therefore, if you were to lock them up in compartments of their own, do you not think this process of evolution would be retarded?—Not necessarily. Nobody wants to interfere with their religion; at least, I do not.

D132. At the present moment, every member of the aboriginal tribe when he leaves the village and comes to the town becomes a member of the Hindu community (I am speaking of the bulk of them; some of them become members of the Muslim community as well) and they take part in the daily life of the Hindus and mix with them, and they are not regarded as depressed classes at all?—They are usually regarded as depressed classes when they become Hindus.

D133. Not the Gonds?—In Bihar and Orissa, certainly.

D134. That may be so, but in the Central Provinces the Gonds and the Bhils are not regarded as depressed classes?—Are they not?

Sir Reginald Craddock,] They governed the country for four centuries.

Sir Hari Singh Gour.

D135. Quite so. As a matter of fact they are proud of the fact that they were the rulers of the country?—In Madras, certainly they are treated as depressed classes.

D136. So the observations you have to make would be qualified to the extent that conditions throughout India are not the same and a generalisation dealing with the aboriginal tribes might be true as regards one province or locality, but would not be true of another province or another locality?—It might not be equally true as regards all provinces. I admit that you cannot generalise completely for India. It is a very large place.

D137. Looking at the question from the dual aspect of administrative and legislative protection and judicial protection so far as legislative protection to the aboriginal tribes is concerned as far back as 1874, the Indian Legislature enacted the Scheduled Districts Act which lays down that no Act of the Indian Legislature will ipso facto apply to the scheduled districts unless it is expressly extended to those districts?—Yes.

D138. And the scheduled districts were mostly the backward tribe areas where the aboriginal tribes and other backward races lived?—Yes, certainly some of them, anyway.

D139. Do you think that in spite of that Act, the aboriginal tribes have suffered?—I do.

D140. To what do you ascribe their suffering?—There are various causes in different places.

D141. So you are not able to generalise even on that ground?—No.

D142. If, therefore, we do not know what are the causes which lead to these sufferings on the part of the aboriginal tribes, we cannot lay down one general rule as to how to deal with them?—I would not say that. One may not know the causes of an illness, but one may know the general rule for applying a cure.

D143. For example, in one of your paragraphs it is stated that the tribal law amongst certain aboriginal tribes legalises a forcible marriage—marriage by capture?—Yes.

D144. It is in Memorandum No. 86?—Yes.

D145. I read to you that passage in your memorandum: "Further, wherever aboriginal areas come within the scope of the activities of the High Courts, actions which are perfectly correct according to aboriginal standards are liable to be punished as contrary to law. Thus, quite recently, a Bhil was convicted and sentenced for effecting a marriage by capture, which is a recognised form of Bhil marriage and which would undoubtedly have been acquiesced in by the society in which he lived, had there been no possibility of moving Courts." You think you would like to stereotype a law of that kind?—I would not stereotype the law. It is the stereotyped law that I am objecting to. It is the High Court that has stereotyped the law.

D146. The High Courts say that it is against common morality and the freedom of man that a man should run away with a girl and seize her by force and that society should tolerate that as a marriage, and you say that the High Courts were wrong in punishing the man because he used force in obtaining a wife?—It was probably a put-up job. All those runaway marriages are.

Sir Reginald Craddock.

D147. Gretna Green?—The trouble comes in when you stereotype the law and do not allow a case like that to be settled by local custom. I quote a definite case later on from Assam. Everybody knows what happened there. The man ran away with a girl because he could not pay the price demanded by her parents, and the parents brought a case in Court pro forma simply in order to save their faces. There was no intention of harming the man. Everybody was horror-struck when the man was sentenced to penal servitude for life.

Sir Hari Singh Gour.

D148. I am not horror-struck if a man runs away with a girl without her consent, whether the father was reconciled

M.P., and Dr. J. H. HUTTON, C.I.E., I.C.S.

to it or not, I would still regard the man as guilty of abduction?—On paper.

D149. With regard to the nature of the protection that you advocate for the backward aboriginal tribes, you said that they should be excluded altogether from the White Paper scheme?—I should like to see them excluded, yes.

D150. Completely excluded and constituted petty States?—I think that is best.

D151. Is that the view of Commander James?—(Wing-Commander James.) I did not put the suggestion forward at all.

D152. Do you approve of that suggestion?—I have not thought it out. I only saw Dr. Hutton's Memorandum for the first time yesterday and I had never met Dr. Hutton before.

D153. Do you think, Dr. Hutton, that that is a feasible proposition?—(Dr. Hutton.) Yes, I think so, in certain cases, but I do not think so in all cases. I think in many cases it would be a most satisfactory solution.

Sir Reginald Craddock.

D154. You mean people like the Lushis?—Yes, the Lusheis. I see no reason why they should not run their own tribal states ultimately.

D155. And the same in Burma?—Yes, the same in Burma. I think it could be done in Lahaul and in Spiti, probably.

Sir Hari Singh Gour.

D156. That is to say, such a thing may work out in some cases?—Yes, I do not think you could do it in all cases.

D157. Then I think, you said, Dr. Hutton, that you would let justice be administered by tribal organisations?—I am not sure that I said that.

D158. You spoke in your oral statement about the tribal organisations?—Yes.

D159. Have they got any tribal organisations, as distinct from punchayets, which dispose of caste questions and questions dealing with ritual and the rest?—It is not necessarily identical with the punchayets. In Assam it would be generally a clan meeting within a village or part of a village. The organisation would vary tremendously in different parts of India.

D160. But do these organizations deal with secular matters?—Yes, certainly, secular rather than ritual. They do not deal with ritual matters.

D161. They do not deal with matters of religion and ritual?—I do not think so.

D162. They will not deal with questions of succession, inheritance, partition, and the rest of it?—Yes.

D163. They deal with all those things?—Certainly.

D164. But in the 150 years of British rule in India has any organization or any British officer ever pleaded in any court of law that such a custom existed? Are you aware of a single case in which such a plea was taken successfully or unsuccessfully in any court of law?—I am not sure that I quite follow your point.

D165. If there were a tribal organization, that would deal with questions of domestic law?—Yes.

D166. Questions such as partition, marriage, succession, and inheritance, as distinct from the general Hindu or Muhammadan law, as the case may be. I should have expected that such a plea would have been taken in a court of law during the 150 years of British rule in which the courts have been administering justice according to the customary law in the absence of any rule to the contrary?—But we do administer the customary law; my court often administered the customary law.

D167. If they do administer the customary law, then what is your complaint against the administration of the courts at the present moment?—There is nothing against the courts that administer the customary law. What I am afraid of is that once the district is regularized the administration of the customary law will be prevented.

D168. But you have no complaint at present?—There have been complaints. In some parts of India, certainly I have a complaint. I think the law that administers the Succession Act in certain Provinces has not always administered the Gond law fairly. The number of tribes excluded from the Succession Act by Government Administrative Orders in the Central Provinces is only eight, whereas there is a very much larger number of tribes in which the succession customs are not those of the general law.

D169. The point I am making is that it is open to those tribes to set up a customary law at variance with the general law if they wish to enforce that custom?—I do not think it is open to them under their present conditions, in practice; theoretically it may be open to them.

16° Octobris, 1933.] Wing-Commander A. W. H. JAMES, M.C.,
M P, and Dr. J. H. HUTTON, C.I.E., I.C.S.

D170. But what is the impediment in the way of pleading, setting up a custom at variance with the general law?—Finance, probably.

D171 And the assistance that they would get from the lawyers you want to do away with?—Certainly, I do; I should like to have lawyers totally excluded.

D172. You would like to do away with the lawyers and with the High Court?—And with the High Court.

D173. The lawyers are the only people who can advise them to set up a custom because that would be a very good plea in their case if they wished to set it up in derogation of the ordinary law?—We get on very well without them in the hills.

Mr. R. A. Butler.

D174. Is not it true that the pleader would have to get the permission of the Deputy Commissioner before entering an excluded district?—In some districts that is true, in some it is not; it depends upon the Province and the local orders.

D175. That ban would appeal to you?—It is required in some districts yes. I do not know that it applies to the whole of India.

D176. It is a proposition which appeals to you?—It certainly does, very strongly.

Sir Hari Singh Gour.

D177. What is the Deputy Commissioner's position in giving information?—In my own case I should have regard to the financial position of the parties, and as to whether I thought a pleader would be likely to obscure the issue or not. I have found pleaders extremely useful but there are cases in which I should prefer that no pleader should appear, because there would be some chance then of getting at the truth.

D178. Would you not be prejudging a case in deciding a question by finding out whether a pleader should be appointed, because you do not know what the pleader would set up?—Exactly. He would set up all sorts of points which the parties would never think of for themselves, and would therefore introduce an element of injustice into the decision.

D179. But that is an objection to pleaders as a class, not in relation to their appearing for the aboriginal tribe; it is an objection to the class appearing in the courts at all, is not it?—Not quite; I do not think that is a fair assumption.

D180. It may be a difference of degree but not of kind?—Quite so. I admit that May I add that Sir John Simon came to the district in which I was serving and he said, "Do you allow lawyers in your Courts?" I said: "They are not allowed without the permission of the Commissioner, which is only given for good and sufficient reasons." He said: "Whatever you do, do not let them come in. They will only ruin the place if they come in."

Dr. Shafa'at Ahmad Khan.

D181. Dr. Hutton, I suppose you think that Section 52A (2) of the Government of India Act dealing with the backward tracts has not worked well?—I am afraid I do not know what Section 52A (2) of the Government of India Act is.

D182. You are not satisfied with the proposals in the White Paper?—No, I am not satisfied with the proposals—quite.

D183. You think that they should go further?—I think they should go further, yes.

D184. You agree, generally, with the recommendations of the Simon Commission?—As regards the backward tracts, yes.

D185. Could you give me, very briefly, an estimate of the area of the backward tracts? Besides Assam, what other tracts would you include in the area of the backward tracts?—I have given you that on pages 19 and 20 of my Memorandum.

D186. Are you aware of the fact that the Government of India opposed some of the proposals of the Simon Commission?—Yes, I am aware of that.

D187. Are you also aware of the fact that a number of local governments have not agreed with the proposals of the Simon Commission?—No, I am not aware of that fact, but I should think it is quite likely.

D188. Are you aware of the fact that the Punjab Government have actually said that there is no need for the protection of Lahaul and Spiti?—I disagree with the Punjab Governments entirely.

D189. The Madras Government said also that the proposals of the Simon Commission regarding the backward tracts go too far and that a slight modification of the existing practice would be quite suitable?—I disagree with the Madras Government.

D190. So that, in your opinion, the backward tracts which exist now must

16^o Octobris, 1933.] Wing-Commander A. W. H. JAMES, M.C.,
M.P., and Dr. J. H. HUTTON, C.I.E., I.C.S.

be retained in their entirety?—Yes, and I should like to see them added to.

D191. And the possibility of the fusion of the backward areas with other areas should be taken into account?—I should not say that. I should leave the backward tracts to fuse themselves at any time afterwards, if they wished to do so, of their own motion.

D192. In holding that opinion, you crystallize and make rigid the arrangements of the backward tracts, not only for the wholly excluded areas, but, as you propose, for the partially excluded areas?—I see no difficulty in an area applying to be included with an adjacent district or Province, and, if the Province were willing to take it in, to include it ultimately.

D193. You agreed, in reply to a question, that a process of assimilation and absorption is going on?—In certain areas it is certainly going on.

D194. Do not you think that the process will be checked as you go further if you make your arrangements so rigid as to place the backward areas in watertight compartments?—(Wing-Commander James.) I would suggest that it would be accelerated, because if you do not exclude them they would absolutely certainly be starved by the rest of the Province.

D195. Do you agree with Commander James's opinion, Dr. Hutton?—(Dr. Hutton.) Yes, I think I do. I had not thought of it in that light. I should like to think that over. I am not quite sure whether I have read your question in the same light as he has. I think Commander James's point is that if the area is not excluded it will be starved of money and will have no chance of development on its own lines. I entirely agree with that.

D196. Are you not aware of the fact that even according to the conditions of the White Paper the backward tract may not be starved at all because the Governor may have power to allot funds for the development of the backward tract?—(Wing-Commander James.) That would be so if you assumed that the White Paper does not mean what it says when it allots the whole of the Forest revenue to the Province.

D197. Your contention is that the revenue derived from the forests, which are inhabited exclusively by primitive tribes, should be devoted exclusively for the development of that particular area?—I would not make it as rigid as that, but that is the general idea.

D198. Are you aware of the fact that this was the claim of the hill tribe of Nainital put forward in my province, and they demanded that they should be allowed to cut any amount of timber they liked from the forest, and the Government quite rightly pointed out that if this was done the whole Province would be seriously affected? If your principle is carried out, do you not think that the revenue derived from those forests will be devoted almost exclusively to a particular area and the Province cut up into spheres of influence or spheres of revenue earmarked for particular areas?—No, I do not presuppose any tariffs or financially rigid barrier.

D199. But you do propose earmarking revenue?—No. All I pointed out was that under the existing proposals, without qualification, the whole of the revenue from the areas inhabited by the primitive tribes is allotted to the Provinces.

Mr. R. A. Butler.

D200. May I say that that would not prohibit the Governor from making a regulation or passing an Act which would assist the partially excluded area and so help the aboriginals? The powers necessary for this are all to be found in the White Paper?—But he would do so presumably through an Order in Council.

Lord Eustace Percy.] No.

Mr. R. A. Butler.

D201. His powers are derived from the procedure known as that of his "special responsibility," which gives him full powers to assist the partially excluded areas in the way that Commander James desires?—Is there not a potential source of conflict between the Governor and the Legislature which will normally be thinking in terms of its constituents and not of the hill tribes?

Sir Hari Singh Gour.

D202. May I point out that the Legislature cannot even ask questions relating to the backward tribes? True, I accept that, but equally the Governor, according to the Secretary of State's reply the other day, has no power of intervention whatever with regard to forest matters. I am merely pointing out that that appears to be a complete conflict of principle in the White Paper.

16^o Octobris, 1933.] Wing-Commander A. W. H. JAMES, M.C.,
M.P., and Dr. J. H. HUTTON, C.I.E., I.C.S.

Mr. R. A. Butler.

D203. He has a perfectly full power under his special responsibilities. I think Commander James is confusing the question of forests in India with the question of the future aboriginal population?—I am submitting that they are so inextricably mixed up that the present proposals are conflicting.

Mr. R. A. Butler.] I do not agree.

Dr. Shafa'at Ahmad Khan.

D204. Commander James, even under the existing rules framed by the Government of India in accordance with Section 52A (2) of the Government of India Act, the Government can allot funds for the development of backward tracts without going to the Legislative Council for the purpose?—I am very glad to hear it.

D205. Then would not you be satisfied with the existing arrangement?—No.

D206. Why?—Because I see in the existing arrangement there being a perpetual source of conflict.

D207. You would like to have definite sources of revenue placed at the disposal of the Governor for that particular purpose. Is that what you mean?—No. All I have pointed out is that the normal source of revenue derived from the area inhabited by the primitive tribes is at present allotted without qualification to the Provincial Government.

D208. But of the total amount a certain amount is taken for the development of the backward tracts? Does not that come to the same thing?—It might do; I hope it would.

D209. But has it not done so actually?—It may have done so in the past; I am trying to safeguard the future.

D210. But is not it an adequate safeguard if the Governor is given power of allotting funds without going to the Legislative Council?—I am not competent to express an opinion upon that. I have put forward my fears.

D211. Then your conception of a separate cadre for this service is intimately connected with Forest Service?—I think in the interests of economy it would have to be so.

D212. You would differ from Commander James on that point, Dr. Hutton. You would like to have a separate cadre, not necessarily connected with the Forest Service?—(Dr. Hutton.) No, not necessarily so. I should like to have the opportunity of drawing officers from the Forest Service.

D213. Of course they have an opportunity of drawing officers from other Departments also?—Certainly.

D214. You would not restrict it to the Forest Service?—No.

D215. You would, Commander James?—(Wing-Commander James.) I would not restrict it to the Forest Service, no.

D216. But generally you would restrict it to the Forest Service?—Not even that. I think at the present moment, to start with, it would probably be found that most of the officers available and suitable were in the Forest Service mainly because that is the Service mostly in touch with the primitive tribes.

D217. It would be an All-India Service?—I take it so.

D218. How could the officers of the All-India Service know the numerous backward tracts to which they might be assigned because, I take it, there is no positive factor uniting the various backward tracts, the only negative factor is that of being backward?—That is so.

D219. How can you be really certain if there are a tremendous variety of customs throughout India?—That difficulty exists at present as Dr. Hutton pointed out in a reply to a previous question.

D220. Would not it be better to have Provincial Officers appointed by each Province for this service instead of an All-India Service?—It might be found better to do it that way.

D221. And more economical?—It might be found to be so. I only put it forward as a tentative suggestion.

Dr. B. R. Ambedkar.

D222. Dr. Hutton, in reply to a question by Major Attlee, I think you stated that you would prefer that the administration of the excluded areas should be a central subject, rather than a provincial subject?—(Dr. Hutton.) That is my own feeling.

D223. I just want to ask this. When you say it is to be a central subject, do you propose that it should be a reserved subject or a transferred subject?—A reserved subject.

D224. I just want to turn to some other matters which have been discussed in your paper. I think you are proceeding upon the basis that these people should under no circumstances come within the purview of the new constitution?—That is so.

D225. That is the hypothesis and the basis upon which you are proceeding?—

16^o Octobris, 1933.] Wing-Commander A. W. H. JAMES, M.C.,
M.P., and Dr. J. H. HUTTON, C.I.E., I.C.S.

I admitted that in some circumstances where they are very scattered living among other populations, it would be otherwise.

D226. But in the main, that is the hypothesis upon which you are proceeding?—Yes, in the main.

D227. What is the ideal that you have before you for these people? I will crystallise my question so that you may answer it better?—The minimum of interference by anybody.

D228. Let me put it in the way I visualise the question. Is it your ideal that these primitive people should continue to remain primitive people without having anything to do with the affairs of the rest of India, or do you propose that the destinies of these people should be so regulated that in course of time they should cease to be an isolated part of humanity and take part in the public affairs of their country as the rest of Indians are doing now?—I think that the second is my ideal.

D229. That they should not continue permanently as primitive people?—The question would have to be that, if possible, ultimately they should take a part in the life of their country.

D230. That is what I say?—But it is possible that in some cases you might never be able to achieve that ideal.

D231. Let us, first of all, ascertain what the ideals are?—Yes.

D232. I am not introducing the religious question at all, whether they should be this or that?—No.

D233. What you do point out is this: You do say, and I think it is your ideal, that they should become part and parcel of the civil society?—Yes.

D234. And outgrow their tribal condition?—Yes, I think that is necessary.

D235. Let me therefore proceed further. If that is the view, is it not desirable that there should be a common cycle of participation both for the civilised people of India and for these primitive people?—Not yet.

D236. So that there may be a percolation of the ideas which are agitating the minds of the civilised part of Indian society into this primitive class of people?—I think the ideas will percolate without any difficulty.

D237. How?—What troubles me is that unless they are separated they are likely to be destroyed by too abrupt contact. That is what has happened nearly everywhere else in the world.

D238. I do not know but I do want to submit to you for your consideration whether if, as you have admitted, that is your idea, namely, that they shall some day become part of the Indian society, segregation, and so complete and so rigid a segregation as you propose, is the proper way for the realisation of that ideal?—I think it is the only possible one myself.

Sir Reginald Craddock.

D239. Might I put a question? There are various educational agencies going on in some of those tribes. Is not that the case?—Yes, certainly.

D240. Are they chiefly missions, or was the Government any schools?—The Government has a number of schools.

D241. That would be one of the points that you would refer to in connection with the improvement of these places, would not you?—I should.

Dr. B. R. Ambedkar.

D242. I want to proceed a little further. I see from your paper (correct me if I am wrong) that you are troubled about two things. You think that a contact or incorporation, if I may use that term, of the educated or the advanced or the civilised Indians, and of the primitive people in one constitution is likely to result, first of all, in their exploitation by the advanced classes or, shall I say, the civilised part of the Indian society?—Yes.

D243. Secondly, I suppose I am right in summarising it thus, that you are afraid that sufficient attention will not be paid to them in the new Council?—Yes.

D244. Let me put to you one question: I will take the case of their land. Is it not a fact that this question, namely, of keeping the land in the hands of the primitive people as far as possible so that they may not be rendered a class of landless labourers, is also the problem which is before many of the agricultural classes in India, and that even for their protection it has become necessary to pass Acts like the Deccan Agricultural Relief Act in Bombay and the Alienation of Land Act in the Punjab and several other cases?—I believe such Acts have been passed.

D245. My suggestion is this, that if these primitive people are brought under the same constitution as the rest of India they would not be quite alone in their demand for keeping the moneylender out and seeing that the land remains in the hands of those who cultivate it. There would be many others who would have a similar demand to make in the Legislature. The point I want to make is that they would not be isolated?—The point which I should be inclined to answer was that the proof of the pudding was in the eating, and, as far as experience went, it has shown that they always have been done out of their land.

M.P., and Dr. J. H. HUTTON, C.I.E., I.C.S.

D246. But, Dr. Hutton, would you mind making this distinction, that the Legislatures, as they are composed to-day, and as they were composed some time ago, are not going to be the same as the legislatures that will be composed under the White Paper?—Yes.

D247. You would have a certain amount of representation of the depressed classes in the various Legislatures. You would have a certain amount of representation assigned to labour, and you would have, I am sure, a certain amount of representation drawn from the general electorate who would favour the poorer classes. The experience of the last Legislatures would be no safe guide in a matter of this kind?—I would sooner be on the safe side and exclude them.

D248. I do not know, but you are not prepared to deny the fact that they would have many friends in the Legislature?—I would not admit that. I should like to be convinced first that they would have many friends. There may be others with similar interests, but they would have very little in common with them individually.

D249. Yes, but I mean so far as the general question of protection for a class similarly situated is concerned?—I can conceive that a Musalman cultivator of Sylhet would demand the maximum of protection for himself and the maximum of non-protection for his neighbours.

D250. Do you think the Legislature would go to the length of saying that certain laws which are necessary in the interests of Indians are not to be extended, and that the protection of those laws is not to be given to the primitive classes?—No, I do not think they would go as far as that.

D251. How would the discrimination arise?—I think the primitive classes might have extreme difficulty in obtaining the necessary protection. There is no guarantee with the depressed classes that the cultivator will obtain the necessary protection under the new constitution.

D252. Quite true; I agree with you. There can be no protection that the other classes probably would not club together and prevent protection being given to some other minorities? The fear is legitimate, but taking into calculation all the forces on the one side and all the forces on the other, the point I want to make to you is that the fear, that one or two, or a few representatives of the primitive classes in the Provincial Council will feel that they are overwhelmed by the forces on the other side, is not quite justified by an analysis as I am presenting it to you of the composition of the future Legislature as it will be under the White Paper proposal?—In view of the difference of race, I think it is possibly justified, at any rate in certain places.

D253. Take the question again of education. I happen to know something about these primitive people in the Bombay Presidency. We have a backward class?—Yes, I know.

D254. We ourselves are not very far divided from them?—I know.

D255. Educationally speaking, one could not really say that a good many people in India are in less need of education than the primitive or the backward people?—You could not say what?

D256. You could not say (take, for instance, the depressed classes) that bare educational need is less?—You could not say that it was less.

D257. One could not say it?—No.

D258. I have been sitting on the backward class board in Bombay, which is a composite board for the depressed classes and these primitive people?—Yes, in certain cases the primitive people are very much more educated.

D259. Therefore, as I say, taking their educational need, in the legislative Council, they would not find themselves isolated?—They might do.

D260. You would desire that they should be completely excluded, and their need, such as education, which I think is the greatest need of these people myself, should be met entirely by revenues supplied by the Governor under his special responsibilities?—Yes.

D261. I want to put this to you: whether a Governor would at all go to the length of providing what he thought was a sufficient amount of funds for the education of the primitive classes if his Ministers did not support him?—That is a serious difficulty.

16^o October, 1933.] Wing-Commander A. W. H. JAMES, M.C.,
M.P., and Dr. J. H. HUTTON, C.I.E., I.C.S.

D262. If there is something in the point that I have put to you, would not it be desirable that some representatives of these people should be in the Legislative Council so that a Minister may be dependent upon their votes, and may be amenable to their wants?—An odd vote or two would not be likely to affect a Minister.

D263. I do not say one or two. You may have a small number, but, assuming they have adequate representation in the Legislature, would not the Minister be dependent upon their votes, and, therefore, he might be more amenable to their wants?—Theoretically, but not in practice. Their numbers would be so small.

Dr. B. R. Ambedkar.] In politics a single vote might turn the balance.

Lord Eustace Percy.

D264. I thought Dr. Hutton's recommendation was that they should be excluded from the purview not only of the Province but of the Governor also, and that they should be administered from the centre. Is not that so?—That is what I should on the whole, prefer. I have stated in my memorandum that in the case of the proposals of the White Paper for the totally excluded areas in which the Governor acts as the agent of the Governor-General, the White Paper proposal is satisfactory. I do not say I should prefer it.

D265. I thought from your proposals for setting up petty States that you intended that it should as far as possible be a central function?—My intention was that it should be central as far as possible, certainly.

Dr. B. R. Ambedkar.

D266. Even in that case, the criticism I have offered would be equally applicable even if the subject was made central, because the Governor would have to certify the amount necessary for the administration of the subject and, if the Ministers in the Central Government objected to spending that amount of money, the conflict would still be there; it would only be transferred from the Provincial Field to the Central Field?—I am assuming the Minister would not have a word in it.

Dr. B. R. Ambedkar.] But my point is that the Minister would have a word, because there would be other rival claims for the expenditure, and a Minister cannot be expected to be interested in primitive peoples who are not part of the Legislature.

Dr. Shafa'at Ahmad Khan] Would not the representatives of the primitive people in the Legislature generally combine with the depressed classes?

Dr. B. R. Ambedkar.

D267. That is what I am visualising, and, therefore, they would have many friends?—I do not think the representation would be affected.

D268. If I felt as pessimistic as you feel I should at once say. "I do not want this constitution at all"?—But I do not, for the primitive tribes.

Lord Eustace Percy.

D269 May I ask one or two questions, Dr Hutton, first on a special point which is not covered by your memorandum? You may have seen a letter in the Press the other day, raising the question of the delimitation of the Assam-Burma Frontier in connection with the primitive tribes?—No; I did not see the letter.

D270 Have you got any views, supposing that Burma were separated from India, as to the desirability of changing the present Frontier so as to have a homogeneous block?—I think what I proposed to the Government of Assam, but it would not meet with approval there, was that there should be a sub-Province of Burma which would embrace the North-East Frontier Districts of Assam with the North-West Frontier Districts of Burma. The people in Assam on the Assam side of the present boundary are much nearer to the Burmese than they are to the Indians. Their languages are exactly the same in some cases as those on the Burma side, and there is no difference of race at all, and there is constant communication, so far as there is any communication at all—it runs across from the Hukong Valley into the Naga Hills on the Assam side. I think it would be impossible to put the Assam Districts directly under a Burma administration because of the difficulties of language and of the distances and of communication through the hills but I do think you could establish a centre somewhere near Manipore, for instance, from which it would be possible to administer as Commissioner or Chief Commissioner, under the Burma Government, a block of Frontier Districts of Assam and North-West Burma.

D271. I suppose in the event of a separation between Burma and India the military strategists might raise objections to that on grounds of forming a defensible frontier?—Between Burma and India?

D272. Yes—supposing we are going to argue those questions between the two places?—I do not know how the military strategists would make objections to that frontier; it is a very difficult frontier indeed. There are only three possible routes for a railway, I believe, through from Assam to Burma.

Sir Hari Singh Gour.] What about the air?

Lord Eustace Percy.

D273. We cannot go into that. Perhaps, Dr. Hutton, if on thinking it over you have any further views which you would like to state on that question of the rectification of frontier or special arrangements of that kind you would send them in to the Committee, would you?—Yes, I will certainly.

D274. Now I should like to get clear, if I might (I am still not very clear about it), the precise difference between the proposals you have put forward and the proposals in the White Paper. Take the totally excluded areas. I understand, of course, that you attach importance to the maximum number of areas being totally excluded, but apart from that on the whole you regard the White Paper provisions as to totally excluded areas as fairly satisfactory?—Yes, the proposals are fairly satisfactory.

D275. And Commander James agrees, except that he wishes——?—(Wing-Commander James.) Further delimitation.

D276. And you wish specifically to put the excluded areas under a Central Government and not under the Province?—As the Simon Commission recommended.

D277. You are not content with the fact that under the White Paper proposals the Governor will administer them directly in his own responsibility and, doing so, will be subject to the directions of the Governor-General, as he is in all respects in which he is not a constitutional Governor?—No; I am apprehensive of the phrase “for the time being” in paragraph 107.

D278. “For the time being declared to be an excluded area”?—Yes, “for the time being”—what does that mean?

D279. I thought Dr. Hutton had already given evidence that he did not necessarily want the exclusion to be permanent—for all time?—No.

D280. That is what “for the time being” means, is it not?—The whittling down in the White Paper is so extensive that I am made suspicious of mere phrases.

D281. We will see before I have finished my questions as to how extensive it is, but in any case except for those words, “for the time being,” which have not struck me as being very sinister, you are more or less satisfied?—Yes.

D282. What I do not understand about Dr. Hutton's and Commander James's evidence with regard to the administration of these areas is this: I gather that the property, as it were, in the whole area, being outside the White Paper, being outside the Province, would vest in the Central Government or in the Provincial Government. I am thinking of the forests—what under your idea of an area so completely excluded might be erected into a petty State of its own: How would you reconcile the administration of forests in which the Province might be extremely interested, as affecting water and so on in the Province, with the Provincial administration of forests as a whole and with the Provincial agricultural policy as a whole?—I think it is a matter for further inquiry. As I say, I did not put forward a cut and dried watertight scheme.

D283. You have been speaking of a conflict between the Governor and his Ministers, but surely a conflict between a separate forestal administrative service run from the centre and the interests of the Province which may depend upon the forests which it controls is a far more dangerous source of conflict, is it not?—It might be, but presumably the Simon Commission when they made their recommendations had that in mind.

Lord Eustace Percy.] We have got to form our own opinion; we cannot take the Simon Commission, of course.

Major Atlee.

D284. I do not think the Simon Commission recommended the forests from your point of view at all. The forests were recommended by the Simon Commission to be transferred?—No. I put that forward as a suggestion for the economical administration of an excluded area.

Lord Eustace Percy.] Perhaps Dr. Hutton will deal with this difficulty, because I do not understand what a totally excluded area is in which the provincial forest official and the provincial forest policy prevails.

M.P., and Dr. J. H. HUTTON, C.I.E., I.C.S.

Dr. B. R. Ambedkar.

D285. If I may say so, the area is not excluded; it is the people who are excluded?—(Dr. Hutton.) No, the area is excluded, as I read the White Paper. Is there any definition of a totally excluded area in the White Paper?

Lord Eustace Percy.

D286. No, there is not?—If the area is excluded, clearly the forest must be excluded also.

D287. And it is essential to your proposals that it should be the area which is excluded because you want the whole administration of land ownership to be in the hands of the excluded administration?—Yes, certainly, but I see that the funds for the administration need not necessarily be drawn directly from the revenue of a given district.

D288. No, I was not thinking of that, but I suppose among these totally excluded areas that you have recommended on page 20 of your Memorandum there are several in which the Province as a whole is very much interested in the soundness of the afforestation policy?—I do not think there are very many in the Assam frontier districts. The forests have been mostly already excluded and put down into the plains districts adjoining. The Mikir Hills, I think, have no valuable forests. The Garo Hills have valuable forests—that is one.

D289. I am not talking of the intrinsic value of the forest in itself but the value of the forest existing, so to speak, to prevent denudation?—I think you must separate that. The principle of denudation raises the whole question of cultivation. It is an extraordinarily difficult thing.

D290. When you say you must separate it, how do you mean?—You must treat it as excluded from the purview of the Provincial Council.

D291. And the Provincial Council would have to trust to the good will of the Central Government—because that is what it comes to?—Yes.

Sir Reginald Craddock.

D292. I was just going to say apropos of what was going on that the tribal tract, if you set it up, would be governed by regulations, would it not?—Yes.

D293. Therefore you could make regulations about the forest if you wished?—Yes.

Sir Hari Singh Gour.] Under the White Paper scheme.

Lord Eustace Percy.] I quite see that under the White Paper, only if you emphasise the Central Government's control over it you do have more or less possibly a conflict of jurisdiction between the Central Government and the Province
Sir Reginald Craddock.] Yes.

Major Attlee.

D294. Does not the same difficulty arise where you have separate Provinces; one perhaps may be interested in a part of it from the point of view of water supply and so forth?—Yes, that might easily arise, it has arisen.

Lord Eustace Percy.

D295. I will not keep the Committee a moment, but coming to partially excluded areas, you agree that there must be some areas which unfortunately for them from that point of view could only be partially excluded?—Yes.

D296. Under the White Paper you have a power in the Governor with the consent of the Governor-General to repeal any law applying to those areas which I understand would include excluding the jurisdiction of the High Court in any matters which the Governor-General might please, and so far as I can see under the White Paper the Governor has complete power, acting in his discretion, under the instructions of the Governor-General, to sterilise that area, as it were, from the influence of the Province so far as the body of law in the Province is concerned?—Yes.

D297. I will come on to the question of administration later; but so far as law and the jurisdiction of the High Courts are concerned I do not quite understand what your proposals would add to those? The position is so obscure that it is not known in Assam how an appeal lying from a partially excluded area would be disposed of or who would dispose of it. I believe I am right in saying that the question has been already discussed provincially and no certain interpretation has been reached as to what would happen under the existing proposals.

D298. What will happen under these proposals?—Yes. There is no certainty as to whom an appeal lies. Who will hear an appeal from an order passed in a partially excluded area? The appeal at present, if the area is a non-regulation district in Assam, is heard by the Governor sitting with a Legal Remembrancer.

D299. Surely under paragraph 108 it is perfectly clear that the appeal may be anything that the Governor-General lays down?—They have not taken that view in Assam.

D300. The words I am referring to are: "The Governor will also be empowered at his discretion to make Regulations for the peace and good government of any area which is for the time being an Excluded Area or a Partially Excluded Area and will be competent by any Regulation so made to repeal or amend any Act of the Federal Legislature or of the Provincial Legislature which is, for the time being, applicable to the area in question"?—Yes. It does not give any guidance as to the actual disposal of business arising under a law.

Lord Eustace Percy.] The Regulations which can make law can surely determine the administration of the law.

Dr. Shafa'at Ahmed Khan.

D301. Can the Constitution Act as such go into all these details?—No, I do not know that it can. I happen to have had a letter from a colleague in Assam who was called to sit at a discussion which took place at the Headquarters of Government as to how under the White Paper the new Constitution—assuming that the White Paper is accepted as it stands—would act in regard to the Excluded and Partially Excluded Areas. The question that arose was: Would a criminal appeal from a Partially Excluded Area be heard by the Governor or would it be disposed of by the Ministers? There is nothing to show that here.

Lord Eustace Percy.

D302. As you will realise, the White Paper is not a legal draft?—Yes, I realise that.

D303. But anyway, so far as that is concerned, there does not seem to be very much difference between your proposals and my interpretation of the proposals of the White Paper?—No.

D304. Then as regards administration, I gather that your proposals confine themselves to this really, that the Governor should have power to instruct any officer in a Partially Excluded Area to exercise any powers of expelling undesirable residents in that area?—Yes. It would be very difficult to exercise powers in the Partially Excluded Areas.

D305. That is what I was going to put to you?—That is why I am pressing for greater use of total exclusion.

D306. I was just going to ask you whether you saw how such a power could in practice be used except within very narrow limits?—It would be very difficult indeed in Partially Excluded Areas. I am not sure that it could be exercised.

D307. I think that is all I have got to ask you. I do not know whether you would like to add anything to your evidence, Dr. Hutton?—No, I do not think I have anything to add.

D308. Or you, Commander James?—(Wing-Commander James.) I would only like to say this, that I have not put forward any of these suggestions with a view to being obstructive to the White Paper proposals; in fact, my idea was solely to make the White Paper proposals more workable by not mixing up the very small boys with the big boys.

Lord Eustace Percy.] I quite understand. I think you have put the issues very clearly before us.

Mr. R. A. Butler.] I think we all understand that, if I may say so.

Lord Eustace Percy.] We are very grateful to you, gentlemen. Thank you very much.

(The witnesses are directed to withdraw.)

APPENDIX D.

STATEMENT BY LIEUT.-COLONEL SIR HENRY GIDNEY, I.M.S. (retired).

(See Question 16,111)

I desire to appeal not only to those Members of the Joint Select Committee who will draw up and sign the Report, but to my Indian fellow citizens on the British India Delegation.

Before the curtain falls on the stage on which we are enacting one of the last scenes of the last Act of our joint deliberations, I feel it a sacred duty to my Community, maybe my last effort, to place before you an appeal. In doing so, let me assure you and the British Parliament that the Community, through me, does not approach you as beggars, but as suitors in a just and honourable cause. I speak on behalf of a Community that is devoted to India—its Motherland—and anxious for her advance, but it must be admitted under some suspicion, because of its unflinching loyalty to its Fatherland, England. Let me assure you that, whatever may be the case with other Communities, the loyalty of Anglo-Indians is to both England and India, it must be so. In the fusion of these two countries, we find our truest welfare and in the growth of affection, trust and co-operation between them, we find our highest contentment. In short, my Lord Chairman, the Anglo-Indian Community is the joint responsibility of both England and India and everyone present in this room is a co-Trustee of this responsibility and neither can disclaim its honourable obligations to protect us. In the concluding chapter of my Memorandum, I ended with the appeal which was questioned and misinterpreted by an Indian Delegate "O, England! who are these if not thy sons?" Surely no one in this room will deny the truth that as "sons of England", we are England's hostages to India and as "sons of India", we are committed to her care and, will anyone here, after examining his conscience, disagree with me when I state that, those who give and those who receive hostages are in honour bound to regard them as a sacred trust. This forms the nucleus of my appeal to those who are about to draw up the draft report of the new Constitution Act and who will sign it.

I have devoted many pages of my Memorandum to detailing the great and abiding services rendered by the Community, to England, the Empire and India in particular, services unparalleled in any part of the British Empire. Great as these services have been in the past and every page of Indian history bears evidence of these records, they have not been in any way less in recent times. It has been said that no Community can live on its past and attempts were made during my examination to question my efforts when I placed my demands on the past services of the Community's loyalty, of patriotism unparalleled in any part of the Empire and a devotion to duty, which is mirrored in the splendid services, especially the lines of communication and transport, which we see operating in India to-day.

I may be permitted to ask, for what reason has the White Paper recommended concessions (may I call them anomalies?) to various Communities and States and recommended their incorporation in the Constitution Act? Has not that great Community, the Muslim Community received or been promised support for its great past services for non-co-operating with the Congress and Civil Disobedience Movements? Has not the Sikh Community based its claim on its past Military Services? Are not the British firms receiving commercial protection to safeguard the millions of pounds they have, in the past, sunk in India? Indeed, as has been admitted in the Montagu-Chelmsford Report, England gave the 1919 Reforms to India as a debt of gratitude for her past services during the War. Is the Anglo-Indian Community alone, though small in numbers, to be denied an equal right and equal claim to bring before the Committee, the great and abiding past services it has rendered to the British nation and the British Empire in India? These past and present services which stand to our credit are the basis on which I have drawn up my Memorandum and my demands. I have, I know, made a claim which to some may seem impracticable of incorporation as a clause in the Statute. If this be so, I ask, does not the White Paper contain and admit claims more impracticable and more anomalous in character? In any case, my claim remains a just and a reasonable one and, if that claim is admitted, it must be adequately protected, for I submit, with all respect, that this is an honourable duty on the part of every Englishman and every Indian. It has been said that, pari passu with other Communities, as a result of retrenchment and economy in India to-day, the Anglo-Indian Community is, in comparison, proportionately suffering and, during my examination, questions were asked me from various parts of the room to dispute the figures I had put forward in my Memorandum as representing the losses we had sustained in appointments, especially on Railways.

Let me, in a final effort, substantiate every grievance I have incorporated in my Memorandum.

Statement A. under Chapter "Railways", gives the total reduction per Community during the Quinquennium 1925/26 to 1929/30. From this, it will be seen that the Hindus are reduced by 10 per cent., the Muslims by 13 per cent. and the Anglo-Indians by 7 per cent. It was in these comparisons that some questionnaires tried to prove that the Anglo-Indian Community had not suffered as much as other Communities and it, therefore, had no cause for complaint. This assumption, in my opinion, is quite wrong (and here I must again repeat my conviction that the Muslims are hopelessly and inadequately employed in Government services and I should hail the day when they receive their proper share) because, these losses in as far as they refer to other Indian communities, are mainly confined to the menial staff, such as Railway workshops and maintenance departments and not to those appointments which demand a certain degree of efficiency in English and for which alone Anglo-Indians are competitors and in which they are to-day employed. I refer to Subordinate appointments, both upper and lower. It is in these appointments that Anglo-Indians have been largely retrenched and I repeat, in higher percentages than any other Community. A reference to Statement B. Railways, page 20 of my Memorandum, dealing with Subordinate appointments, with salaries rising to Rs.250 p.m. and over, will show that in 1925/26 the total number of these appointments in all Communities was 8,213, as against 8,591 in 1931/32, but, whereas the Anglo-Indian Community held 3,809 of these appointments in 1925/26, in 1931/32, they held only 3,629, a decrease of 180 positions. A detailed study of these figures will also show, beyond doubt, that the Hindus received during this period, an increase of 487 appointments and the Muslims an increase of 88, against an Anglo-Indian decrease of 180. The correctness of my statement that we have unduly suffered in these retrenchments is still further proved by a reference to Statements C. and D. page 21 of the Memorandum, from which it will be observed that during the 3 years 1929/32, when 1,003 new appointments were created, Anglo-Indians received 77 or 7.6 per cent. only, as against 658 or 63.7 per cent. to Hindus and 314 or 30.4 per cent. to "other classes". But my grievance is further supported by the figures for the period 1929/30 to 1931/32, during which years 655 of these appointments were retrenched. Of this total, the Anglo-Indian was called upon to bear 257 of these retrenched positions, in other words, 39.3 per cent., indeed, if a combined total of European and Anglo-Indian appointments retrenched were made (the number of Europeans retrenched was 153) it would make a total of 410 out of a total of 655 or about 62 per cent. and, remember that about 50 per cent. of the balance left are men nearing superannuation. Statement D. shows a similar condition concerning Anglo-Indians in the Gazetted Officers' Department of Railways and proves that, during the years 1927/28 to 1931/32, the number of appointments of Anglo-Indians which were retrenched was 52 or 28.5 per cent., as against an increase of 81 per cent. Hindus and 10.5 per cent. Muslims and I should like to emphasise the extraordinary fact that these retrenchments of Anglo-Indians and the increase of other Communities in the official ranks occurred during the two years ending March 1931, which were characterised by heavy retrenchments of officials. These figures conclusively prove, on the one hand, that, while Anglo-Indians are made to bear the brunt of these retrenchments they are not being recruited in sufficient numbers to fill up their vacancies. To augment and justify my grievance, let me refer you to page 10 of my Memorandum, which deals with the retrenchments that have recently taken place in the various Departments of the Government of India Secretariat, under the personal Supervision of the Ministers forming His Excellency, the Viceroy's Council. A reference to these figures will show that in a total retrenchment of 72 appointments in the Secretariat, there were 26 Anglo-Indians and 11 Europeans, many of whom were Domiciled Europeans, this works out at 22.2 per cent. of Anglo-Indians and 26.1 per cent. of Europeans, a total of 48.3 per cent. of the appointments that have recently been retrenched, as compared with 4.5 per cent. of Hindus. I have emphasised these figures to prove conclusively that the economic position of the Anglo-Indian Community is being steadily and insidiously prejudiced in the operation of the day-to-day administration of all Government Departments and it is just in these matters that the Community desires protection and which is not to be found in the White Paper, indeed the White Paper specifically states that it is not the intention of the Governor-General or the Governor to interfere with the day-to-day administration of any Department, which means that such safeguards afford absolutely no protection whatever to the Anglo-Indian Community.

Other Delegates seemed to try to discredit the total number of unemployed in the ranks of the Community to-day, the result very largely of Indianisation of the Services and by speedy, mathematical deductions, endeavoured to prove that, with the numbers of working men in the Community and the number stated to be employed, the figure given by me was not a correct one. Let me impress on this Committee that the total of about 20,000 unemployed in the Community is approximately correct and includes both men and women of both the Anglo-Indian and Domiciled European Communities. But, apart from these considerations, let me, in the name of the Community whom the British nation has called into being, the result of the official policy of the Government of India from the John Company days, impress on you, that it matters not whether you call this Community "Statutory Indians", "Anglo-Indians", "Domiciled Europeans" or by any other name, in any case, Indians, who desire employment, will continue to look upon the Community, for occupational purposes as foreigners and aliens, as much as they do the purest blooded Englishman. The undeniable fact which the Committee must keep prominently before its mind when it decides on a clause for incorporation in the Statute, giving us economic protection is, that in India the Anglo-Indian is considered as nothing else but an alien and a foreigner and the Councils Act of 1870 affords him no economic protection nor does the present Instrument of Instructions to Governors. A new orientation has arisen and must be met by new methods. Sympathy, pious hopes, persuasions and the goodwill of other Communities and Ministers will afford us no economic protection. Nothing but a clause in the Act can be of any practical use to us in our desperate condition to-day, a condition which cannot be met by half measures of communal goodwill and tolerance and, what is more, the Governor-General and Governors must have the executive power to put into operation, measures needed for our economic protection and periodically to examine the situation.

With no new appointments being created to-day, I challenge any member of Government or any Indian, to deny the fact that every appointment that is given to an Indian to-day is taken away either from a European or an Anglo-Indian and yet, an Anglo-Indian is a Statutory Native of India and is advised to accept such a status. Surely it is wrong to deprive one section of Indian to supply another. This surely is differential treatment with a vengeance and clearly proves that even the Government looks upon Anglo-Indians as a sect apart from other Indians and, I ask, it is surprising that Indians should look upon us as aliens? And so it matters not what is contained in the Instrument of Instructions or what directions are communicated to Governors or the Public Services Commissions, because the only effective power that will work these instructions, must be and will be, in the hands of Ministers who control these Departments and neither the Governor-General nor the Governor is expected to interfere in these Transferred Departments. It is just here where the Anglo-Indian Community has suffered and will continue to suffer and it is for this reason that no Instrument of Instructions except one on a Statutory basis will effectively protect us. I repeat this can only be done by the Constitution Act. I do not say this in disparagement of Ministers, but "blood is thicker than water" and it is only natural that the Anglo-Indian will not be recruited, as one sees to-day. We see this exclusion going on steadily and insidiously to-day, in the day-to-day administration of every Department and in some cases, to such an extent that the Anglo-Indian is practically extinct from Services he has helped to build up.

I believe the British nation is a grateful nation to its servants. Surely the British nation cannot forget the debt of gratitude it owes to this small Anglo-Indian Community that it has created, nor can any reasonable Indian do the same. You can, by not affording us adequate statutory protection, within a few years dispossess us of all the appointments we hold to-day, but if this is done, it will be to the eternal discredit of both the British and Indian nations. For centuries, the Anglo-Indian Community has followed in the steps of his British forbears; he has fought with him in every Empire War, even stood by him behind his mud walls, defending his property in the early John Company days and, for King and glory, their bloods have mixed, both in life while building up the Indian Empire and in death when they have lain dead side by side on all battlefields in India and elsewhere. In short, we have lived together, we have built up India together, we have fought together and we have died together. To-day you are leaving us and are giving India a larger measure of responsibility. I join with you in that effort, for India's advance is my advance, but when this full measure of responsible Government has been given to India, I beg each one of the Members of this Honourable Committee, before he signs the Report, to put his hand on his heart, examine his conscience and ask himself, "what will be the fate of our descendants and kinsmen in India?", kinsmen, whom certain sections of Indians refuse to identify as sons of the soil, kinsmen who have been refused identification even by Englishmen, the nation who gave birth to him. The apparent "Not wanted". Surely, under such circumstances, the Community whom I have the honour to represent, has every justification in claiming adequate statutory safeguards from the British Parliament. Our origin, our religion, our education, our manners, our culture, our appointments in Public Services, all of which have been represented in my Memorandum, must be protected and, if India is to be given a large measure of self Government, England, as represented in you honourable gentlemen of the Committee, must, in your report, demand and see that Parliament guarantees and India gives and operates effective protection to the Anglo-Indian and Domiciled European Citizens of India, who are beyond doubt, one of the most loyal communities that His Majesty the King and the British Empire possess to-day. I would beg of this Committee not to repeat the error made in regard to Irish loyalists in Ireland, those Loyalists whose interests we were told in 1922 were abundantly safeguarded and who are at this hour starving and proscribed. If we are not adequately protected, I fear a similar fate awaits us, the Anglo-Indian Loyalists and the Government will only have created another discontented and turbulent Ulster.

I cannot conclude my appeal without quoting from the words of that astute Statesman, who happily is one of the honoured members of this Committee—I refer to my colleague Sir Austen Chamberlain—who in a recent speech on India said “Now and again in the affairs of men, there comes a time when courage is safer than prudence”. With my apologies to him, may I be permitted to transpose that and offer it as my appeal to the Select Committee, “Now and again in the affairs of a nation, there comes a moment when loyalty is of more value than any other quality”.
